START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER
Andover, MA 01810

June 1994

Camera Operator:
John Sullivan

MASTER NEGATIVE NUMBER: BSO-56-038

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A Cooperative Project Between the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives and the Boston Public Library (August 1993 - April 1994)

The Microfilming Project incorporates two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection of the Boston Public Library (BPL) Music Department. Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Press Clippings collection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repository:

Music Department
Boston Public Library
Post Office Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SCRAPBOOKS

1889 - 1973

132 VOLUMES

Source: Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives

FINDING AID

Boston Symphony Orchestra Scrapbooks (Series 56, Sub-Series 1)

Source: Press Office (Office of the Public Relations Director)

The BSO scrapbooks comprise part of one series in the BSO Archives. Series 56, Press Clippings, is divided by format into 3 sub-series: 1) Scrapbooks, 1889-1973 (132 volumes); 2) Loose Clippings, 1931-1991 (9 record cartons); and 3) Oversize Newspapers and Journals, 1919-1979 (1 oversize box). Each sub-series is arranged chronologically.

The scrapbooks contain concert notices and reviews, record reviews, and feature articles. Early scrapbooks may also contain programs, tickets, and subscription orders. Materials are organized by concert season into the following categories: BSO (including tours); Kneisel Quartet (and later Boston Symphony Chamber Players); Boston Pops (referred to in early years as Promenade concerts); and Tanglewood (including the Tanglewood Music Center, the Tanglewood Festival, Tanglewood-on-Parade, and the Fromm Festival of Contemporary Music).

Reviews and articles cover a wide range of subjects: Founder H.L. Higginson; BSO conductors, players, trustees, and other personnel; guest artists and composers; BSO and Pops performances and recordings; U.S. and overseas tours; BSO/Cecilia Society joint performances; open rehearsals; and special events connected to anniversary celebrations and fundraising.

Feature stories document changes in the size, composition, and location of the orchestra. Topics include the hiring of women and minorities; the unionization of players; controversies (such as the internment of conductor Karl Muck during World War II); the sale of the old Music Hall; and the construction of Symphony Hall and other structures (such as the Koussevitsky Music Shed at Tanglewood).

Reproductions of the materials in the collection may not be made without permission from the Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives.

GUIDE TO CONTENTS

Institution: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Series Name: PRESS CLIPPINGS
Series Number: 56
Series Dates: 1889-1991

Sub-series Name: SCRAPBOOKS
Sub-series Number: 1
Sub-series Dates: 1889-1973

VOLUME LISTING

VOL	TITLE	DATES
1	BSO	1889-1890
2	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1890-1891
3	BSO	1891-1892
4	Promenade (Pops)	1892
5	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1892-1893
6	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1893-1894
7	BSO Kneisel Quartet	1894-1895
8	BSO	1895-1896
9	Promenade (Pops)	1895-1896
10	BSO	1896-1897
11	BSO	1897-1898
12	Promenade (Pops)	1897-1898
13	BSO	1898-1899
14	BSO	1899-1900
15	Pops	1899-1900
16	BSO	1900-1901
17	BSO	1901-1902
18	Pops	1901-1903
19	BSO	1902-1903
20	BSO	1903-1904
21	BSO	1904-1905
22	Pops	1904-1905
23	BSO	1905-1906
24	BSO	1906-1907
25	BSO	1907-1908
26	BSO	1908-1909
27	BSO Pops	1909-1910
28	BSO Pops	1910-1911
29	BSO Advertisements	1910-1911
30	BSO Pops	1911-1912
31	BSO Pops	1912-1913
32	BSO Pops	1913-1914
33	BSO Pops	1914-1915
34	BSO Pops	1915-1916
35	BSO Pops	1916-1917
36	BSO Pops	1917-1918
37	Karl Muck	1918
38	BSO Pops	1918-1919
39	BSO Pops	1919-1920
40	BSO Advertisements	1919-1920
41	BSO Pops	1920-1921
42	BSO Pops	1921-1922
43	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1922-1923
44	BSO Pops	1922-1924
45	BSO Pops	1924
46	BSO BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1924-1926
47	BSO Pops	1925-1926
48	BSO Advertisements Pops Advertisements	1926-1927
49	BSO Pops	1926-1928
50	BSO	1928
51	BSO Pops	1928-1929
52	BSO Pops U.S. Tour	1929-1930
53	BSO	1930-1931
54	BSO Pops	1931-1932
55	BSO Pops	1932-1933
56	BSO	1933-1934
57	BSO	1934-1935
58	BSO	1935-1936
59	BSO	1936-1937

VOL	TITLE	DATES
60	Pops
	Tanglewood	1936-1937
61	BSO	1937
62	BSO	1937-1938
63	Pops
	Tanglewood	1938
64	BSO	1938-1939
65	Pops
	Tanglewood	1939
66	BSO	1939-1940
67	Tanglewood	1939-1941
68	BSO
	Pops	1940
69	BSO	1940-1941
70	Tanglewood	1940-1944
71	BSO	1941-1942
72	BSO	1942-1943
73	BSO	1943-1944
74	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1944-1945
75	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1945-1946
76	BSO
	Pops
	Tanglewood	1946-1947
77	Tanglewood	1947-1948
78	BSO	1947-1949
79	Tanglewood	1949-1950
80	BSO	1949-1951
81	Tanglewood	1950-1951
82	BSO
	Pops	1951-1952
83	BSO
	Pops	1952-1953
84	Tanglewood	1952-1953
85	BSO	1953-1955
86	Tanglewood	1953-1954
87	Tanglewood	1954-1955
88	BSO
	Pops	1955-1956
89	Tanglewood	1955-1956
90	Tanglewood	1955-1956
91	European Tour	1956
92	European Tour	1956-1957
93	BSO
	Pops	1956-1957
94	Tanglewood	1957
95	BSO	1957-1958
96	BSO
	Pops	1958-1959
97	BSO	1958-1959
98	Tanglewood	1958-1959
99	Tanglewood	1959
100	BSO
	Pops	1959-1960
101	Tanglewood	1959-1960
102	Far Eastern Tour	1959-1960
103	BSO
	Pops	1960-1961
104	Tanglewood	1961
105	BSO
	Pops	1961-1962
106	Tanglewood	1962
107	BSO
	Pops	1962-1963
108	Tanglewood	1963
109	BSO
	Pops	1963-1964
110	Tanglewood	1963-1964
111	BSO
	Pops	1964-1966
112	Tanglewood	1965
113	BSO 85th Anniversary	1965
114	BSO
	Pops	1965-1966
115	Tanglewood	1966
116	BSO
	Pops	1966-1967
117	Tanglewood	1967
118	BSO
	Pops	1967-1968
119	Tanglewood	1968-1969
120	BSO
	Pops	1968-1969
121	Tanglewood	1969
122	BSO
	Pops	1969-1970
123	Tanglewood	1970
124	BSO
	Pops	1970-1971
125	Tanglewood	1971
126	BSO
	Pops	1971-1972
127	European Tour	1970-1971
128	European Tour	1971
129	Tanglewood	1972
130	BSO
	Pops	1972-1973
131	Tanglewood	1973
132	BSO
	Pops	1973-1974

MATERIALS NOT FILMED

SUB-SERIES NUMBER	SUB-SERIES NAME	SUB-SERIES DATES
2	Loose Clippings	1931-1991
3	Oversize Newspapers and Journals	1919-1979

COPYRIGHT STATEMENT

The copyright law of the Unites States - Title 17, United States Code - concerns the making of photocopies or other reproductions of copyrighted material.

Under certain conditions specified in the law, libraries and archives are authorized to furnish a photocopy or other reproduction. One of these specified conditions is that the photocopy or other reproduction is not to be "used for any purpose other than private study, scholarship, or research." If a user makes a request for, or later uses, a photocopy or reproduction for purposes in excess of "fair use," that user may be liable for copyright infringement.

This institution reserves the right to refuse to accept a copy order if, in its judgment, fulfillment of the order would involve violation of the copy-right law.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 14X

FILM STOCK:

REEL 38

Volumes 69-70

BSO
1940-41
to Tanglewood
1940-44

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

200 mm

150 mm

100 mm

A3

A4

A5

1.0 mm

1.5 mm

2.0 mm

2.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century A&P

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 69

BSO

1940 - 1941

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

BLANK PAGE

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.

SEP 1 - 1940

Petrillo Orders Concert Soloists to Join AFM

New York City—James C. Petrillo wants union music blown through the horns of solo concert performers.

Irked because big-name instrumentalists were affiliating themselves with Lawrence Tibbett's American Guild of Musical Artists, he has issued an ultimatum to all solo concert instrumentalists to join up with the AFM by Labor Day.

The point of contention, it is alleged, are non-union orks such as the Boston Symphony. If Petrillo can control the soloists, he can presumably organize the entire orchestra. AGMA officials, however, were inclined to pooh-pooh the threat, pointing out that Petrillo is relatively powerless to do anything but prohibit AFM members from working with guild members. But AFM spokesmen pointed out that that restriction in itself, if put into effect, would deprive all non-AFM instrumental soloists of accompanists, since most of them are AFM members. AFM officials also pointed to the possibility of placing on the national unfair list the names of concert halls, theaters, and all other auditoriums playing non-union artists.

The ASCAP-BMI battle is important to us who play their music; keep up to date on developments through the pages of Down Beat every issue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.

SEP 2 - 1940

The Tough Boss

Although the patrician Boston Symphony, one of the world's three or four greatest orchestras, sounds sweet to most U. S. citizens, it grates on the ears of James Caesar Petrillo, new boss of the American Federation of Musicians. For the Boston Symphony is the only big non-union orchestra in the U. S.

Because of the A. F. of M. hold on the radio chains, the Boston Symphony has not broadcast in more than a year. Last fortnight tough Boss Petrillo forbade RCA Victor to make any more Boston Symphony recordings. "They're through," explained Mr. Petrillo. "We've taken them off the radio and off the records."

A union separate from A. F. of M., but not heretofore regarded as its rival, is the American Guild of Musical Artists (also an A. F. of L. affiliate)—1,800 concert musicians, headed by Baritone Lawrence Tibbett. Boss Petrillo singled out A. G. M. A.'s instrumentalists—including Violinists Jascha Heifetz and Efrem Zimbalist, Pianists Vladimir Horowitz and José Iturbi—and commanded them to join A. F. of M. by Labor Day. The alternative: they would be barred from radio and recording. The catch: once in A. F. of M. they would be forbidden to play as soloists with the Boston Symphony. Asked Mr. Petrillo: "Since when is there any difference between Heifetz playing a fiddle and the fiddler in a tavern? They're both musicians."

In Manhattan, Baritone Tibbett went into a huddle with Boss Petrillo, emerged hopeful. Said Mr. Petrillo: "I'll never be unreasonable with anybody. . . . They can call me tough if they want to, but my word is as good as any contract. . . . Everybody calls me the tsar, the chieftain and this and that. What can I do?"

Last week Baritone Tibbett flew to Los Angeles, flew back with the support of the Screen Actors Guild against "encroachment on [A. G. M. A.'s] jurisdiction." If Boss Petrillo continued to act tough, it looked as if the music industry might land in a tie-up.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER

SEP 13 1940

To Conduct Symphony With Boston Orchestra

According to a publicity release of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens will conduct this orchestra in a performance of his symphony completed last year. No date was given. The management of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, of which Goossens is permanent conductor, was unable yesterday to confirm details.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BLOOMINGTON, IND.
STAR
9/13/40

C Sharp Minor . .

Bloomington and Its Look-in on Music

BY PROF. GUIDO H. STEMPEL
Star Music Editor

A CLIPPING which John handed me records the feat of Captain Eugene La Barre and his World's Fair Band in playing Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumblebee" in forty-nine seconds—almost before you could say "nikolaiandreyevichrimskykorsakoff." I began to ask my musician friends "how about it." It got to be a kind of "whY is the fourth of julY" gag. Alice, finally, summed up what they had all said—conductors, composers, historians, musicologists, doctors of music, professors, pianists, violinists, and so on down to program-annotators and critics (four persons in all)—summed up them and shut up the inquiring reporter with, "What of it?"

But something did come "of it" for fathaw in that it led to a very pleasant and informative chat with Vincent Mariotti of the first-violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to whom we were introduced at a Tanglewood intermission by his cousin, Mrs. Frank K. Edmondson. My question reminded Mr. Mariotti of the legendary stories of Paganini's "Perpetuo Mobile" and his incredible prestissimo in its performance. Heifetz, the present-day wizard of the violin, has been unable to approximate this particular bit of virtuosity by nearer than twenty-five per cent longer. Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst, the Moravian-German violinist, who followed Paganini about in an endeavor to discover his secret, clocked Paganini's playing of it time and again to find that the extreme variation was two seconds.

really an oversight on my part. The reminder is indirect, not even to be read between the lines of his letter. I wish he had spoken out and given me a sounder basis of fact to work upon. But I believe I am not far off in saying that the set-up of the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge is comparable for drama to that of Tanglewood for music. Thus, there is connected with the playhouse a workshop which suggests a likeness to the Music Center at Tanglewood. In other words, we see here an educational as well as an amusement enterprise; not merely a summer theater in which young actors are given a trycut, but a school of the theater of wide and comprehensive scope. I should welcome a statement from Mr. Miles or one of his co-workers as to just what is attempted. To the excellence of the results in the one play we saw—staging, movement, climaxes, projection of the drama, support [illegible] ognized star—I can bea testimony. — Kouss[illegible] the Music Center [illegible] outstanding cond years; William Mi[illegible] shire Playhouse set-up, except t standing, cert[illegible] serviceable, ac trum.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

SEP 11 1940

Symphony Orch. Concert Oct. 11

Serge Koussevitzky has made known from "Seranak," his recently purchased estate in Lenox, notable plans for the 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open under his direction in Symphony hall on Friday, Oct. 11. This will be the 17th successive season of the orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Soloists to be heard in the Friday and Saturday series will include Vladimir Horowitz, returning after 10 years; Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein, and Gregor Piatigorsky. Further soloists will be announced later. Richard Burgin will repeat the Violin Concerto of Hindemith, which had its first performances here last season. There will be two notable guest conductors: Igor Stravinsky and Deside Defauw, the outstanding Belgian leader, who is to be heard in Boston for the first time. New works are to include symphonies by two outstanding composers of the day who have made their first venture into this traditional form: Igor Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith. Benjamin Britten, one of the most highly regarded of the younger composers in England, will have his first hearing in Boston when his Variations for String Orchestra are played. The British composers Vaughan Williams and Arnold Bax will also be represented.

From American composers, Koussevitzky announces a new Symphony of Roy Harris (the Fourth,) which is written for orchestra with chorus, and a new Symphony by Arthur Shepherd to be conducted by the composer. Also listed are the American Sketches of the late Frederick Converse.

In the New Year, which will mark the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, that composer's "Requiem" will be revived. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, and the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt will be played, together with more frequently heard works of the symphonic repertory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

SEP 14 1940

Comment

BY NO MEANS "THROUGH"
(Boston Herald)

The phenomenal success of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival is a dramatic contradiction of the remarks of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in New York. Discussing the activities of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, a non-union organization, Mr. Petrillo is quoted: "They're through. We've taken them off the radio and off the records." He was referring to contracts of his organization with certain broadcasting and record-making companies which forbid the employment of all but union musicians.

Whatever one's opinion may be regarding the justice and wisdom of a system which restricts the performances of a great musical organization — Atty. Gen. Jackson might well regard it as worth at least a glance by his anti-monopoly investigators—there is satisfaction in knowing that the orchestra's artistic qualities were never higher than they are today. Its influence on the musical life of America was never more vital. Its popularity with the thousands of people to whom, in Boston and elsewhere, it annually brings pleasure, comfort and inspiration was never rooted more deeply. Far from being "through," the orchestra might be said to be only now beginning to realize the dream of service to the entire nation which Maj. Higginson and its other early friends envisioned long ago.

The Boston orchestra has no argument with Mr. Petrillo or with unionized musicians. It is an almost unique institution, a permanent group of professional musicians who, financed on a non-commercial basis, provide several series of concerts which cover nearly the entire year. Although its average scale of pay is certainly as good as that of the unionized orchestras, its members do not face the same problems or need the same protection as their fellow-musicians, who work on a weekly basis for commercial enterprises. Nor can it be said that they compete with the average musical organization.

The Boston orchestra would like to work in friendship with the unions. Certainly its aims regarding artistic standards and the welfare of its men are the same as theirs. But if that friendship is refused, it feels confident that it can carry on successfully in its own way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM

SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

SEP 25 1940

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
SUNDAY JOURNAL HERALD

SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE

OCT 4 - 1940

ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN

SEP 15 1940

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

SEP 15 1940

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

SEP 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION

SEP 14 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER

SEP 14 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

SEP 14 1940

Koussevitzky Opens 17th BSO Season

Orchestra Will Start Concerts at Boston Oct. 11

Important music long unplayed, familiar classics, new scores, and soloists of the first rank are announced for the pending 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The season will open in Symphony Hall on Friday, Oct. 11, when Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 17th successive year as the orchestra's illustrious head.

The 60th season will include the usual double series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and 6 Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. The orchestra will continue its series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn, and performances in New England and the Middle West.

Soloists of the first importance are announced for the Friday and Saturday series. Vladimir Horowitz will return after 10 years' absence, appearing in the number which marked his notable debut with this orchestra—the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff. Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein, and Gregor Piatigorsky are also announced. Mr. Piatigorsky will introduce a new violoncello concerto of Hindemith. Guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky who, in addition to music of his own, will present Tchaikovsky's little-known Third Symphony, and Desire Defaus, the outstanding Belgian leader, who is then to make his first appearance in Boston.

Among the new works to be heard are two symphonies by foremost composers of today, each of whom has just completed his first work in this traditional form—Igor Stravinsky, and Paul Hindemith. Benjamin Britten, one of the foremost of England's younger composers, will be introduced to the concerts by his Variations for String Orchestra. Other British composers to be heard are Vaughan Williams, Arnold Bax, and Eugene Goossens who will conduct a symphony of his own.

Notable American works are also announced. Koussevitzky will introduce a new symphony by Roy Harris (No. 4) for Orchestra and Chorus. Arthur Shepherd will conduct a symphony he has recently completed. Frederick Converse, who died last summer, will be represented by his American Sketches.

The year 1941 will mark the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, and several works of that composer are to be performed, including his "Requiem." The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony, and excerpts from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" symphony will be revived.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DOWN BEAT
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP 1 - 1940

Petrillo Orders Concert Soloists to Join AFM

New York City—James C. Petrillo wants union music blown through the horns of solo concert performers.

Irked because big-name instrumentalists were affiliating themselves with Lawrence Tibbett's American Guild of Musical Artists, he has issued an ultimatum to all solo concert instrumentalists to join up with the AFM by Labor Day.

The point of contention, it is alleged, are non-union orks such as the Boston Symphony. If Petrillo can control the soloists, he can presumably organize the entire orchestra. AGMA officials, however, were inclined to pooh-pooh the threat, pointing out that Petrillo is relatively powerless to do anything but prohibit AFM members from working with guild members. But AFM spokesmen pointed out that that restriction in itself, if put into effect, would deprive all non-AFM instrumental soloists of accompanists, since most of them are AFM members. AFM officials also pointed to the possibility of placing on the national unfair list the names of concert halls, theaters, and all other auditoriums playing non-union artists.

The ASCAP-BMI battle is important to us who play their music; keep up to date on developments through the pages of Down Beat every issue.

THIS CLIPPING FROM TIME MAGAZINE
CHICAGO, ILL.
SEP 2 - 1940

The Tough Boss

Although the patrician Boston Symphony, one of the world's three or four greatest orchestras, sounds sweet to most U. S. citizens, it grates on the ears of James Caesar Petrillo, new boss of the American Federation of Musicians. For the Boston Symphony is the only big non-union orchestra in the U. S.

Because of the A. F. of M. hold on the radio chains, the Boston Symphony has not broadcast in more than a year. Last fortnight tough Boss Petrillo forbade RCA Victor to make any more Boston Symphony recordings. "They're through," explained Mr. Petrillo. "We've taken them off the radio and off the records."

A union separate from A. F. of M., but not heretofore regarded as its rival, is the American Guild of Musical Artists (also an A. F. of L. affiliate)—1,800 concert musicians, headed by Baritone Lawrence Tibbett. Boss Petrillo singled out A. G. M. A.'s instrumentalists—including Violinists Jascha Heifetz and Efrem Zimbalist, Pianists Vladimir Horowitz and José Iturbi—and commanded them to join A. F. of M. by Labor Day. The alternative: they would be barred from radio and recording. The catch: once in A. F. of M. they would be forbidden to play as soloists with the Boston Symphony. Asked Mr. Petrillo: "Since when is there any difference between Heifetz playing a fiddle and the fiddler in a tavern? They're both musicians."

In Manhattan, Baritone Tibbett went into a huddle with Boss Petrillo, emerged hopeful. Said Mr. Petrillo: "I'll never be unreasonable with anybody. . . . They can call me tough if they want to, but my word is as good as any contract. . . . Everybody calls me the tsar, the chieftain and this and that. What can I do?"

Last week Baritone Tibbett flew to Los Angeles, flew back with the support of the Screen Actors Guild against "encroachment on [A. G. M. A.'s] jurisdiction." If Boss Petrillo continued to act tough, it looked as if the music industry might land in a tie-up.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
SEP 13 1940

To Conduct Symphony With Boston Orchestra

According to a publicity release of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugene Goossens will conduct this orchestra in a performance of his symphony completed last year. No date was given. The management of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, of which Goossens is permanent conductor, was unable yesterday to confirm details.

C Sharp Minor . . .

Bloomington and Its Look-in on Music

By Prof. Guido H. Stempel
Star Music Editor

A CLIPPING which John handed me records the feat of Captain Eugene La Barre and his World's Fair Band in playing Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Flight of the Bumblebee" in forty-nine seconds—almost before you could say "nikolaiandreyevichrimskykorsakoff." I began to ask my musician friends "how about it." It got to be a kind of "whY is the fourth of julY" gag. Alice, finally, summed up what they had all said—conductors, composers, historians, musicologists, doctors of music, professors, pianists, violinists, and so on down to program-annotators and critics (four persons in all)—summed up them and shut up the inquiring reporter with, "What of it?"

But something did come "of it" for fathaw in that it led to a very pleasant and informative chat with Vincent Mariotti of the first-violin section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to whom we were introduced at a Tanglewood intermission by his cousin, Mrs. Frank K. Edmondson. My question reminded Mr. Mariotti of the legendary stories of Paganini's "Perpetuo Mobile" and his incredible prestissimo in its performance. Heifetz, the present-day wizard of the violin, has been unable to approximate this particular bit of virtuosity by nearer than twenty-five per cent longer. Heinrich Wilhelm Ernst, the Moravian-German violinist, who followed Paganini about in an endeavor to discover his secret, clocked Paganini's playing of it time and again to find that the extreme variation was two seconds.

really an oversight on my part. The reminder is indirect, not even to be read between the lines of his letter. I wish he had spoken out and given me a sounder basis of fact to work upon. But I believe I am not far off in saying that the set-up of the Berkshire Playhouse in Stockbridge is comparable for drama to that of Tanglewood for music. Thus, there is connected with the playhouse a workshop which suggests a likeness to the Music Center at Tanglewood. In other words, we see here an educational as well as an amusement enterprise; not merely a summer theater in which young actors are given a tryout, but a school of the theater of wide and comprehensive scope. I should welcome a statement from Mr. Miles or one of his co-workers as to just what is attempted. To the excellence of the results in the one play we saw—staging, movement, climaxes, projection of the drama, support— cognized star—I can bea testimony. — Kousse the Music Center t outstanding cond years; William Mi shire Playhouse set-up, except t standing, cert serviceable, ac trum.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER
SEP 11 1940

Symphony Orch. Concert Oct. 11

Serge Koussevitzky has made known from Seranak," his recently purchased estate in Lenox, notable plans for the 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will open under his direction in Symphony hall on Friday, Oct. 11. This will be the 17th successive season of the orchestra under the leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Soloists to be heard in the Friday and Saturday series will include Vladimir Horowitz, returning after 10 years; Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein, and Gregor Piatigorsky. Further soloists will be announced later. Richard Burgin will repeat the Violin Concerto of Hindemith, which had its first performances here last season. There will be two notable guest conductors: Igor Stravinsky and Deside Defauw, the outstanding Belgian leader, who is to be heard in Boston for the first time. New works are to include symphonies by two outstanding composers of the day who have made their first venture into this traditional form: Igor Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith. Benjamin Britten, one of the most highly regarded of the younger composers in England, will have his first hearing in Boston when his Variations for String Orchestra are played. The British composers Vaughan Williams and Arnold Bax will also be represented.

From American composers, Koussevitzky announces a new Symphony of Roy Harris (the Fourth,) which is written for orchestra with chorus, and a new Symphony by Arthur Shepherd to be conducted by the composer. Also listed are the American Sketches of the late Frederick Converse.

In the New Year, which will mark the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, that composer's "Requiem" will be revived. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, and the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt will be played, together with more frequently heard works the symphonic repertory.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
SEP 14 1940

Comment

BY NO MEANS "THROUGH"
(Boston Herald)

The phenomenal success of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival is a dramatic contradiction of the remarks of James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, in New York. Discussing the activities of Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestra, a non-union organization, Mr. Petrillo is quoted: "They're through. We've taken them off the radio and off the records." He was referring to contracts of his organization with certain broadcasting and record-making companies which forbid the employment of all but union musicians.

Whatever one's opinion may be regarding the justice and wisdom of a system which restricts the performances of a great musical organization — Atty. Gen. Jackson might well regard it as worth at least a glance by his anti-monopoly investigators—there is satisfaction in knowing that the orchestra's artistic qualities were never higher than they are today. Its influence on the musical life of America was never more vital. Its popularity with the thousands of people to whom, in Boston and elsewhere, it annually brings pleasure, comfort and inspiration was never rooted more deeply. Far from being "through," the orchestra might be said to be only now beginning to realize the dream of service to the entire nation which Maj. Higginson and its other early friends envisioned long ago.

The Boston orchestra has no argument with Mr. Petrillo or with unionized musicians. It is an almost unique institution, a permanent group of professional musicians who, financed on a non-commercial basis, provide several series of concerts which cover nearly the entire year. Although its average scale of pay is certainly as good as that of the unionized orchestras, its members do not face the same problems or need the same protection as their fellow-musicians, who work on a weekly basis for commercial enterprises. Nor can it be said that they compete with the average musical organization.

The Boston orchestra would like to work in friendship with the unions. Certainly its aims regarding artistic standards and the welfare of its men are the same as theirs. But if that friendship is refused, it feels confident that it can carry on successfully in its own way.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
SEP 25 1940

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
SUNDAY JOURNAL HERALD
SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE
OCT 4 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ROCHESTER, N. Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION & REPUBLICAN
SEP 15 1940

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
SEP 15 1940

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
SEP 15 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
SEP 14 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
SEP 14 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
SEP 14 1940

Koussevitzky Opens 17th BSO Season

Orchestra Will Start Concerts at Boston Oct. 11

Important music long unplayed, familiar classics, new scores, and soloists of the first rank are announced for the pending 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The season will open in Symphony Hall on Friday, Oct. 11, when Serge Koussevitzky will begin his 17th successive year as the orchestra's illustrious head.

The 60th season will include the usual double series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and 6 Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts in Symphony Hall. The orchestra will continue its series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn, and performances in New England and the Middle West.

Soloists of the first importance are announced for the Friday and Saturday series. Vladimir Horowitz will return after 10 years' absence, appearing in the number which marked his notable debut with the orchestra—the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff. Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein, and Gregor Piatigorsky are also announced. Mr. Piatigorsky will introduce a new violoncello concerto of Hindemith. Guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky who, in addition to music of his own, will present Tchaikovsky's little-known Third Symphony, and Desire Defauw, the outstanding Belgian leader, who is then to make his first appearance in Boston.

Among the new works to be heard are two symphonies by foremost composers of today, each of whom has just completed his first work in this traditional form—Igor Stravinsky, and Paul Hindemith. Benjamin Britten, one of foremost of England's composers, will be introduced the concerts by his Variations String Orchestra. Other composers to be heard are V Williams, Arnold Bax, and Goossens who will conduct phony of his own.

Notable American works announced. Koussevitzky introduce a new symphony Harris (No. 4) for Orchestra Chorus. Arthur Shepherd conduct a symphony he recently completed. Frederick verse, who died last summer be represented by his American Sketches.

The year 1941 will mark the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart, and several composer are to be heard, including his "Requiem." Symphony of Beethoven, "Faust" symphony of Liszt, "Manfred" from Berlioz' symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

SEP 15 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY TO PRESENT NEW MUSIC THIS YEAR

Boston, Sept. 14.—(AP)—Much new music by illustrious composers will have its first hearing this winter as part of the Boston Symphony's celebration of its sixtieth season. An unusual number of top flight soloists and a group of guest conductors headed by Igor Stravinsky also will share the celebration.

Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith each has just completed his first work in the traditional symphonic form. Both of these will be heard in Boston this winter.

Britain will furnish four works by four important composers: Benjamin Britten, Vaughan Williams, Arnold Bax and Eugene Goosens, the latter now almost as much American as British because of his long tenure as conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony.

Two new American symphonies also are scheduled, Roy Harris' fourth for chorus and orchestra, and a new symphony by Arthur Shepherd. The late Frederick Converse's "American sketches" also are included. Sergei Koussevitsky, famous conductor of the Boston Symphony, also will offer a miniature Mozart "Festival" in memory of the composer, the 150th anniversary of whose death falls in 1941.

The Boston Symphony will play a series of concerts in Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn, in addition to its usual schedule in Boston and a tour of the Middle West.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION

SEP 14 1940

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 16 1940

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

SEP 15 1940

60th Symphony Season Opens in Boston Oct. 11

Serge Koussevitzky Will Direct for 17th Year; New Works Being Played

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will open its sixtieth season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on Friday, Oct. 11 under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. This will be Mr. Koussevitzky's seventeenth successive year as director of the organization. The usual double series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, and six Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts will be given in Boston. The orchestra will continue its series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn and will be heard in other parts of New England and in the Middle West.

Guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky who will direct Tchaikovsky's relatively unfamiliar third symphony in addition to his own works, and the Belgian, Desire Defauw, who will appear for the first time in Boston. Soloists in the Friday and Saturday series will include Vladimir Horowitz, Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein and Gregor Piatigorsky. Further soloists will be announced later.

Among new works to be heard are recently completed symphonies by Stravinsky and Hindemith. The English composer Benjamin Britten will be represented for the first time at these concerts by his Variations for String Orchestra. Eugene Goossens will appear conducting a symphony of his own.

Prominent among new American works to be given are Roy Harris's Fourth Symphony, for orchestra and chorus, and a newly finished symphony by Arthur Shepherd, with the composer conducting. Frederick Converse, who died last summer, will be represented by his American sketches.

The year 1941 will mark the 150th anniversary of Mozart's death and several of his works, including the Requiem, will be played. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony will be revived.

JEWISH REVIEW AND OBSERVER
CLEVELAND, O.
9/20/40

CLEVELAND CONCERT COURSE ANNOUNCES ATTRACTIONS

The Cleveland Concert Course which is under the direction of Mrs. Emil Brudno and under the auspices of The Cleveland Museum of Art will open its eighth season on October 27th with the coming of the Philadelphia

VRONSKY & BABIN

Symphony Orchestra. Other great musical events include Dorothy Maynor, negro soprano on November 8 Artur Rubinstein, pianist on November 29; Boston Symphony Orchestra December 13; Vronsky and Babin, duo pianists, on January 10; Simon Barer, pianist on January 24; and John Charles Thomas, baritone on February 14.

Two special attractions under the direction of the course but not included in the season ticket sales will be Alec Templeton, talented blind pianist who will be here on New Year's Eve, and Marian Anderson, Negro coloratura who will be here on January 12th.

All the events will take place in the Public Music Hall on Fridays at 8:45 p. m. except the Philadelphia Orchestra which is on Sunday night. Two dance events will also be sponsored by the course outside its curricular activities. On October 20, Katherine Dunham and her group of 19 dancers will appear in Tropics and Jazz Ho and on January 19th, the Littlefield Ballet of 65 people will be here.

The tickets for this course and events are now on sale at The Korner & Wood Company, 1512 Euclid avenue.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

SEP 16 1940

Music:

Boston Orchestra to Begin Its Sixtieth Season

By Carl E. Lindstrom

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is 60 years old.

It is proper that in observance of such an anniversary the management should plan a particularly brilliant season, although with so high a standard as the organization has always maintained it must be something of a problem to make any one season stand out from another.

In the first place it has, as always, its Serge Koussevitzky, whose very presence makes any occasion illustrious. He is now beginning his 17th season on the Boston podium, which means that one quarter of all the Boston Symphony years have been Koussevitzky years. It is no overstatement to say that this has been the Orchestra's greatest period; that in spite of the fact that the tenures of such men as Gericke, Nikisch, Paur and Muck, established such a musical excellence that, so it seemed, could not be surpassed.

A beautifully printed booklet announcing the concerts for 1940-41 summarizes the brilliant history of the Orchestra. It begins with the vision of Major Henry L. Higginson, while still a student of music in Vienna in 1860, who upon his return to this country, and having made a business success, found himself with sufficient means to establish an orchestra modeled upon the great orchestras of Europe.

Briefly is told the beginnings under Georg Henschel, the period under Gericke and his successor, Nikisch. "The first conductor was a pioneer; the second, a polisher; the third, in his way, a firebrand."

Great emphasis is laid, as it properly should be, upon the work of the present leader.

"Serge Koussevitzky had organized and conducted an orchestra in Moscow and St. Petersburg. He was accounted a leader of commanding power, a pioneer ready to break a lance for new music by publication and by performance. He conducted in western Europe, and his "Concerts Koussevitzky" in Paris were found a new and electrifying experience. Anticipation ran high when, in September, 1924, he first set foot on American shores.

"Koussevitzky manifested his qualities at the first concerts of the season. It was evident at once that the future of the Orchestra was in the hands of a leader of extraordinary courage and brilliance, a musician of sensitive sympathy and emotional penetration. The audiences soon learned that they would be kept abreast with what was vital in the advance of music; they also learned to expect revivified and enthralling performances of the accepted music of the past."

* * *

Account is also to be taken of the tremendous influence that Dr. Koussevitzky has exerted in behalf of American composers. In this field he has been second to none in the country. The prospectus promises a new Symphony by Roy Harris for Orchestra and Chorus, his Fourth; another by Arthur Shepherd and the "American Sketches" by Frederick Converse, who died last summer.

The concerts this season will comprise 24 Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, six Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons, two Pension Fund concerts and six Youth concerts. In addition there will be 10 appearances in Carnegie Hall, New York, eight at Harvard University, five at the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, five in Providence, two at Bushnell Memorial and as many for the Pittsburgh Orchestral Association and at Yale University.

There will be a single concerts under the auspices of the Civic Music Association of Worcester, the Cleveland Museum of Art, Connecticut College, the Griffith Music Foundation of Newark, the Philadelphia Forum, Rutgers University, Smith College, the University of Rochester, the University of Michigan, for the members of the Toledo Museum of Art and at the new Kleinhans Music Hall in Buffalo.

The Pop concerts will be held between May 7 and July 3 followed by the Esplanade Concerts July 6 to July 28.

The Berkshire Music Center will occupy the period July 7 to August 18, with the Symphonic Festival July 31 to August 17.

The men of the Symphony are busy 47 out of the 52 weeks in the year, a schedule which is not even approached by any of the large orchestras in the country. Being a Boston Symphony man is a full time career. The roster comprises 107 musicians, each of whom is a virtuoso performer in his own right. The stability and prominence of the Orchestra are attested by the fact that the roster this year contains only one new name, that of William Page, a bass player who, after training in one of the big music schools in the country, developed, it is interesting to note, at the Berkshire Music Center.

As the anniversary booklet so rightly points out: "The long association of the players with each other and with their conductor gives this orchestra its marked individuality and its unexcelled powers of musical expression."

* * *

Important music long unplayed, familiar classics, new scores and soloists of the first rank are announced for the new season which will open in Symphony Hall on Friday, October 11.

Soloists of the first importance are announced for the Friday and Saturday series. Vladimir Horowitz will return after 10 years absence, appearing in the number which marked his debut with this orchestra—the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff. Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein and Gregor Piatigorsky are also announced. Mr. Piatigorsky will introduce a new Violoncello Concerto of Hindemith. Further soloists will be announced later. Guest conductors will include Igor Stravinsky who, in addition to music of his own, will present Tschaikowsky's little-known Third Symphony and Désiré Defauw, the outstanding Belgian leader, who is then to make his first appearance in Boston.

Among the new works to be heard are two symphonies by foremost composers of today, each of whom has just completed his first work in this traditional form—Igor Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith. Benjamin Britten, one of the foremost of England's younger composers, will be introduced to the concerts by his Variations for String Orchestra. Other British composers to be heard are Vaughan William, Arnold Bax and Eugene Goossens who will conduct a symphony of his own.

The year 1941 will mark the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart and several works of that composer are to be performed, including his "Requiem." The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony and excerpts from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony will be revived.

ROCKLAND, ME
COURIER
9/21/40

Hermann Hans Wetzler, distinguished conductor-composer, who was a Rockport visitor this late Summer, write that Eugene Goossens is to conduct one of his symphonic numbers with the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra in January of next year.

Hearing Mr. Wetzler speak of Dr. Karl Muck who was director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and who died in Stuttgart, Germany, in March of this year, reminds me of a clipping I kept, of an editorial which appeared in Musical America shortly after Muck's death. In part it read:

"It is as a conductor that musicians will remember Dr. Karl Muck whose death at 80 removes from the world scene one of music's grand old men. The passions and events of the World War can have no part in an estimation of his place among the men who did most for our present day orchestral standards. Under his leadership the Boston Symphony could challenge all rivals, here or abroad. It had been a grand orchestra before and it has been a grand orchestra since. From the first conductor, George Henschel, to the illustrious incumbent, Serge Koussevitzky, it has been brilliantly led. But Muck's is one of the names that musicians will remember first, because of his distinctive technical mastery and the interpretative powers that went far beyond that. As much as any other conductor who may be named, he set a high standard of musical discrimination for this country's symphonic programs. His performances were individual, distinct, brilliantly detailed, and bore the vital stamp of authority."

Mr. Wetzler's comment was to the effect that probably without exception Dr. Muck was the greatest orchestra conductor who has yet lived.

Horowitz to Play Rachmaninoff Work With Symphony

Springfield Sept 21

An announcement amplifying the original notice concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 60th season, which begins Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, has been sent to this office. We note first that Vladimir Horowitz, in his guest appearance, will play the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff, a work he played in his debut with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. And that Gregor Piatigorsky will present Hindemith's new Concerto for Violoncello.

Besides symphonies by Stravinsky, Hindemith, Roy Harris and the young Englishman, Arthur Shepherd, there is listed a symphony of Eugene Goossens, to be conducted by the composer. Symphonies to be played which haven't been heard here in recent memory include the Beethoven Ninth, the Third "Rhenish" of Schumann, the Second "Resurrection" of Mahler, Vaughan Williams' "Pastoral" Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, the "Italian" Symphony of Mendlessohn, the "Manfred" and Third Symphonies of Tchaikovsky, and orchestral sections of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

In all there will be 24 pairs of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, plus six pairs of Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts.

Symphony Season Begins October 11

Serge Koussevitzky announces a number of the musical works, old and new, which will make significant the sixtieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The season, the 17th under Koussevitzky's direction, will open in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and will extend through May 8. The subscription office has opened at Symphony Hall for each of the four series (24 Friday afternoons and Saturday evenings, 6 Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons).

The announcement includes pieces of the established repertory less frequently performed, and new music of significance. The more frequently played symphonies and other works of the great composers of the past will of course predominate. Symphonies which have not been performed recently include the Ninth Symphony of Beethoven, the Third "Rhenish" Symphony of Schumann, the Second "Resurrection" Symphony of Mahler, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt, the "Pastoral" Symphony of Vaughan Williams, the "Italian Symphony" of Mendelssohn, the "Manfred" and Third Symphonies of Tchaikovsky, and orchestral portions of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Three notable symphonies are to be heard for the first time here: They are by Igor Stravinsky, Paul Hindemith, and Ray Harris ("Folk Song" Symphony, No. 4). Eugene Goossens and Arthur Shepherd have been invited each to conduct a symphony of his own.

Soloists will include Vladimir Horowitz, who will be heard in the Third Piano Concerto of Rachmaninoff, the music in which he made his memorable debut with this orchestra. Gregor Piatigorsky will present a new Concerto for Violoncello, by Hindemith. Violinists announced at this time are Jascha Heifetz and Nathan Milstein. Mozart's "Requiem" will be performed, as well as orchestral pieces by this master, in 1941—the year which marks the 150th anniversary of his death.

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

SEP 22 1940

THE SIXTIETH

. . . season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will open on Friday, Oct. 11 under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky. This will be the 17th consecutive season as director for Mr. Koussevitsky. The season will consist of the usual 24 Friday afternoon and Sunday evening concerts and six Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon programs in Boston. The orchestra will make a tour and present concerts in Cambridge, Providence, New York, Brooklyn and other parts of New England and in the midwest. Soloists include Horowitz, Heifetz, Milstein and Piatigorsky.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM

SEP 22 1940

Boston Symphony Series

The Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky gives two Carnegie Hall series, one on five Thursday evenings and one on five Saturday afternoons. Prices range from $5 to $10. A five-concert Friday evening series at the Brooklyn Academy of Music has a price range from $5 to $12.50. Soloists have not yet been announced.

Carnegie Hall will also house two series by that excellent training organization, the National Orchestra Association, Leon Barzin, conductor. Between November and March, five Saturday afternoons will be devoted to a Brahms cycle that includes all four symphonies, the two piano concertos, the violin concerto and the German Requiem. Membership prices range from $2 to $7. Six Monday evenings are offered to members who contribute anything from $1 up; location of seats depends upon size of contribution. For details address 113 West 57 St.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

SEP 22 1940

STORY OF A FLIGHT FROM THE NAZIS

Desire Defauw Tells of His Travels to a Refuge Here

By ROSS PARMENTER

DESIRE DEFAUW, who before the war held so many important Belgian musical posts that some critics dubbed him "the musical dictator of Belgium," is now in this country as a refugee because his homeland was invaded by a dictator of a different sort.

The erstwhile "dictator"—and he was obviously not displeased with the title, for it was he himself who mentioned it—is a vivacious, energetic, good-humored, dapper little man of fifty-five who weighs 130 pounds and is only 5 feet 4 inches tall. With his hat off he looks the part of the conductor for he has a leonine shock of gray hair and he stands erect with his heels smartly together. But when he wears his gray homburg and carries his gray gloves he suggests a gentleman of fashion at pre-war Ascot or Longchamps.

* * *

Mr. Defauw, who was director of the concerts of the Royal Conservatory in Brussels, conductor of the Belgian National Orchestra and director of Belgium's Radio Institute, made his first visit to this country last December when he came over as guest conductor of the NBC Symphony orchestra. He will probably conduct that orchestra again. He will be a guest leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra during the season. He has already conducted once for the Concerts Symphoniques de Montreal and he has four more engagements with that organization.

He arrived in this country on Aug. 21 on the Cunard White Star liner Samaria. It gave him "a wonderful feeling of relief," for from the time his country was invaded until he reached here his life was a nightmare of hectic travel. Always he was flying from war and he got so used to bombing planes that even now he mistakes loud noises for the explosions of bombs and it is still a source of wonder to him that planes should fly overhead and be harmless.

Mr. Defauw left Brussels on May 2 to fill engagements in Italy. There was no thought of invasion then, he said. The city was quiet and he had been giving concerts every week. His first Italian concert was in Bologna on May 9.

"I never thought when I put down the stick at midnight," he said, "that my country was at war again."

He learned the news at noon the next day. He packed his belongings and caught the first train for Switzerland. Across the border that night he caught another train for Paris. The journey took twenty-four hours. In Paris he took a train for Brussels. It was so crowded with Belgians called home that he had to sit up all night on his luggage. The train was stopped at least ten times by air raid warnings. When they reached the Belgian border the next morning they could see great fires where bombs had struck oil tanks.

When he reached Brussels there was a "tremendous bombardment" going on. He rushed to his home, which was in a dangerous spot, for it was near an airport. As quickly as he could he collected his wife, his son, his daughter-in-law, his two automobiles and a few belongings, including his Stradivarius, which is dated 1729 and which he proudly calls "one of the finest fiddles existing."

* * *

He drove one car and his son Jean, an architect, drove the other. They set out that morning and for the next month practically lived in those cars as they fled before the advance of Hitler's victorious armies. Whenever bombers flew over the roads they had to throw themselves in ditches or hide in woods. The top of one of the cars was punctured by machine-gun bullets. Finally they drove only by night. The stops in the flight included Paris, Orleans, Tours, Bordeaux and Bayonne, the last French port on the Atlantic before the Spanish border.

Jean and his American-born wife, the former Gladys Timmerman of Memphis, Tenn., got across the border into Spain. But the conductor and his wife, the former Jeanne Vancaubergh, a pianist, were held up because her passport was not in order.

The Germans were getting closer and closer. There happened to be a small, 34-year-old Belgian freighter, the Leopold II, in port. Mr. Defauw and some thirty others boarded it and tried to induce the captain to take them to England. He refused because he was afraid of mines. Mr. Defauw promised to give his automobile to a pilot if he would take them out. The inducement was sufficient. They cleared the harbor two hours before the Germans entered the town.

The trip across the Channel took four days and three nights. They landed in Falmouth and proceeded to London, where they stayed for six weeks. While there Mr. Defauw conducted a concert with the B.B.C. Orchestra and, thanks to the intervention of his old friend, Arturo Toscanini, obtained papers to come to this country.

Mr. Defauw was willing to face the dangers of the ocean trip for himself, but he was afraid to take his Stradivarius. Accordingly he stored it with Hill's on Bond Street. Ironically, the trip was entirely safe, while Bond Street has since been bombed.

* * *

"I have been through so many things," said Mr. Defauw the other day, "that it is as though I have lived more than one life. So many emotions, each one deeper than the other, and one on top of the other. It's ghastly, wartime. I feel that I have crowds to say, such loads of possibilities in my heart which I will start to put into my art. I was ruined before in the last war. Now I will not be downhearted."

Asked if he would make any comment on King Leopold's surrender, the conductor thought a moment, revolved his horn-rimmed glasses by holding the ends of their sidepieces and then shrugged his shoulders sadly.

"I do not know what has happened," he said.

Asked if he would continue to conduct German music despite the war, he replied:

"You can't do without Beethoven or Wagner. One can't live without that, because those are above"—Here he paused, shrugged his shoulders again and asked, "Do you know the French phrase on doesne de melee?"

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLINTON, ILL.
JOURNAL - REPUBLIC

SEP 24 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS

SEP 29 1940

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE

SEP 22 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD
SEP 22 1940

Music Groups Soon To Open New Seasons

Boston Symphony Orchestra To Celebrate 60th Anniversary This Year

New York, Sept. 21.—(U.P.)—The Boston Symphony Orchestra heralds its winter concert programs as "important music long unplayed, familiar classics, new scores and soloists of the first rank."

Under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky, the Boston orchestra will celebrate its 60th anniversary season this year. The series will open in the Boston Symphony Hall on Friday, Oct. 11. It will be Koussevitsky's 17th successive year as head of the group.

Officials said the current season will include the usual double series of 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts as well as six Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon concerts. The orchestra also will continue its series in Cambridge, Providence, New York and Brooklyn, with other performances scheduled for New England and the Middle West.

Among soloists scheduled to appear with the Boston Symphony are Vladimir Horowitz, Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein and Gregor Piatigorsky. Guest conductors during the Winter will include Igar Stravinsky and the eminent Belgian conductor, Desire Defaux.

From the nation's capital comes announcement of the National Symphony Orchestra's three series of concerts opening its tenth season in Constitution Hall on Nov. 6. Hans Kindler, conductor, said two of the scheduled series will feature a distinguished roster of world-famous soloists, while the third series will be made up of "beloved symphonic masterpieces."

A total of 20 concerts will be presented by the National Symphony in Washington, in addition to two joint performances with the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo on Nov. 19 and 20 and a series of student's concerts.

The National Symphony organization has contracted for 35 out-of-town engagements, including its first New York appearance at Carnegie Hall on Feb. 4.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CARLISLE, PA.
SENTINEL

SEP 24 1940

First Symphony Program

Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony" and Beethoven's Fifth will constitute the program of the opening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixtieth season, Oct. 11-12, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting.

C.S.M. 9-26

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WILLIMANTIC, CONN.
CHRONICLE

SEP 30 1940

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

SEP 22 1940

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

. . . plans to present many new works in the 1940-41 season, among them will be recently completed symphonies by Stravinsky and Hindemith. Benjamin Britten, English composer will be represented for the first time in Boston by his Variations for String orchestra and Eugene Goossens will present his own symphony. Among American works to be given first hearing are Roy Harris' Fourth Symphony for orchestra and chorus; a newly finished symphony by Arthur Shepherd and "American Sketches" by Frederick Converse who died last week. The year 1941 marks the 150th anniversary of the death of Mozart and several of his works will be played as well as Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" symphony; Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" and excerpts from Berlioz "Romeo and Juliet."

This Clipping From
PIQUA, O.
CALL

SEP 23 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET

SEP 22 1940

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

SEP 22 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

SEP 20 1940

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS

SEP 25 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIDDLETOWN, N. Y.
TIMES HERALD

SEP 21 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM STILLWATER, OKLA.
PRESS

SEP 22 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM CLEVELAND, TENN.
BANNER

SEP 23 1940

COMPOSERS UNITE

N.Y. Times — Sept 22

Contemporaries Join in Venture to Publish Their Own Scores

By NOEL STRAUS

ALTHOUGH serious contemporary American composers have passed from the experimental period of a decade ago into a healthier stage of creative endeavor, and despite the fact that their output comes to increasingly more frequent performance, the truth remains that even the most gifted of the confraternity are known merely by name to the majority of the musically inclined throughout the country. How to overcome this handicap and bring their works to the attention of the public at large has been a problem difficult to solve.

The answer to the riddle was furnished by Lehman Engel, who evolved a cooperative plan whereby the composers might become their own publishers and thus disseminate their compositions themselves. Two years ago the idea bore fruit in the founding of an enterprise known as the Arrow Music Press, Inc., with Mr. Engel as president; Marc Blitzstein and Virgil Thomson, vice presidents, and Aaron Copland, secretary-treasurer.

That, in spite of its success, the venture has not hitherto been announced, resulted from the unwillingness of Mr. Engel and his associates to publicize it until they were certain that the plan had materialized on a permanent basis and was not a flash in the pan.

* * *

THE Arrow Music Press, which is registered with the United States Government as a non-profit-making enterprise, was started with a modest capital supplied by certain persons philanthropically disposed toward music. In accordance with Mr. Engel's plan, these and subsequent funds, so raised, have been used to defray one-half of the cost of publishing music which interested the group, with the provision that the composer furnish the other half of the money. This is the Press's established policy, yet there have been cases where works deemed sufficiently worthy were paid for entirely from money raised for the purpose by the group, while in some instances the composer has met all the expense himself with the understanding that the proceeds accruing from the sale and performance rights, except 10 per cent to help meet costs, be returned to him.

According to the regular plan the composer gets half of the proceeds until his share in the costs has been met, and, thereafter, the complete earnings brought in by the composition published. But in no way is any profit permitted to the Press or any of its stockholders.

"We have not set ourselves up as a board of judges to say whether a work is good or bad, or even whether or not it coincides with our taste," said Mr. Engel in explaining the editorial policy, "but it is our sole intention to help all serious composers who we feel are sincere, workmanlike and talented, to reach their public. So far most of the works we have issued are by composers of repute. This has been true simply because to date no works submitted by unknown composers have been considered worth publishing. It happens that the officers of the Press have published compositions of their own, but entirely out of their own pockets.

"I felt that music had to be published if it were to be made available to the public," Mr. Engel continued. "Up to the present so few of the larger works by living American composers have reached publication that in practically all cases the composer has to supply the manuscript whenever a work of his receives performance. For the composer to make copies of a symphony or any other composition in the larger forms takes a long time, and it is very expensive to have copies made by others, amounting in the case of a symphony, with a set of orchestral parts, to more than $200."

* * *

BUT a composer would go to all that trouble again and again.

As a rule, performers would want to keep the copy sent them, so that none would be available for the next request. For instance, Roger Sessions once made a copy of his string quartet in E minor for a prominent ensemble, which took it to Vienna to study for presentation in America the next season. Meanwhile he had a chance to have the work played by another quartet here and had no set of parts to give them.

Of course, there have been other attempts during the present century to cope with this state of affairs, but the works issued have either been few and far between and chosen on a contest basis, or brought out by organizations which are no longer in existence, such as the Wa-Wan Press (1901-1912), founded by Arthur Farwell.

With the exception of Henry Cowell's "New Music"—which is rather in the nature of a monthly magazine, and as regards large works publishes but one or two quarterly—the Arrow Music Press stands alone in its own field, according to Mr. Engel.

* * *

AS for the Cos Cob Press (which was, like the Arrow Music Press, devoted to publishing contemporary American works in the larger forms), Mrs. Paul Lester Wiener, its founder, discontinued adding to its catalogue some five years ago. Mrs. Wiener, however, consented to lease her complete list of works to the Arrow Music Press without any financial consideration. In fact, the new group started out with the thirty compositions thus acquired, but immediately began to build up its own catalogue, now containing thirty-five more. The pending initial prospectus of the new press containing the full listing is to be sent throughout the country to music clubs and schools in the hope that the works will have a wide national distribution.

"To make possible the publication of the catalogue," Mr. Engel said, "we arranged a private benefit last Spring in the home of a patron friend, at which Mr. Blitzstein played excerpts from one of his new stage works. From this event we realized enough to pay for the catalogue."

Thus far the works published by the Arrow Music Press consist of symphonies, concertos, string quartets, piano sonatas, violin sonatas, choruses and songs. Harrison Kerr, manager of the American Music Center, who is also the production manager of the new group, alone has been responsible for all the mechanical details in seeing the music through the press and for such duties receives a small stipend.

* * *

ONE of the important works soon to be brought out by the group is the "Concord" sonata by Charles Ives, which was privately published by the composer in 1920. The copies were not for sale, but were presented to friends, and the edition was soon exhausted. The new press intends to publish it with the many revisions made by its composer and will make it accessible to all for the first time. Among composers already represented in the catalogue are Walter Piston, Richard Donovan, Roger Sessions, Arthur Shepherd, Ross Lee Finney, Elie Siegmeister, Henry Gowell, Douglas Moore, Wallingford Riegger and numerous others, including such youthful aspirants as Norman Cazden and Harold Brown.

The format employed in these numbers is simple, neat and attractive. In general, the larger works are reproduced photographically from manuscript, because that is the most inexpensive method of procedure. But short compositions are engraved, and then the engraving is photographed. All the scores are of ample size, except the string quartet music, which is got out in "miniature" style.

To reach the widest public the Press has encouraged those desiring works published to submit preferably those of an esthetically and technically viable type. Such would hardly have been forthcoming a decade ago, when most modernist American composers were still in the "art for art's sake" stage, writing weird experimental stuff, performed at concerts attended principally by a small clique.

* * *

BUT in the last several years the composers have associated themselves with undertakings such as the ballet, movies and theatre, that have brought them face to face with a much wider public than most of them dreamed of ten years ago. Formerly the modernist composers functioned in their own world. Now they tend, more and more, to function in a living world, and automatically they have evolved, so as to become appropriate to their hearers.

Since this is the case, the present time seems particularly propitious for the launching of the new publishing venture. Although the plan has its novel aspects, the idea of composers becoming their own publishers is, in reality, a very old one. As far back as 1574 Tallis and Byrd were granted the sole right to print music in Elizabethan England, and the privilege of printing song books was extended to Thomas Morley shortly thereafter. Did not Bach, moreover, engrave some of his works that he especially wished to bring to public attention?

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

SEP 27 1940

Would Have Surprised Koussevitzky

BOSTON, Sept. 26 (AP) — Here's what Mr. Koussevitzky would have seen if he had paid a surprise visit to Symphony Hall today to see if everything was ready for the opening of his Boston Symphony Orchestra's season . . .

A replica of the Liberty Bell was set up in the place on the stage that is sacred to his director's podium, and the commander of the American Legion was whacking the bell with a mallet.

A big Legionnaire smoking a fat cigar was sitting in the concert master's place, shorthand machines were set up in the first violin section, photographers' bulbs littered the floor where the second fiddles beat time with their feet, and ladies' auxiliary members with their posies and banners had back seats where the kettle drummers hold sway at concert time.

The press was in the orchestra's tuning room—eating ham-on-rye—and the click-click of telegraphers' keys made a new sound in the place where the French horns sound their "A."

Koussevitzky knows what it is to receive an ovation in the hall, but the rendition of a Beethoven symphony never caused the audience to jump up and flock to the stage bearing cards with the names of all the states and territories of the United States.

There was music there, but Brahms and Mozart didn't have a chance. Irving Berlin was top man with "God Bless America" being rendered in all forms ranging from a quick chorus by a bugle corps to a solo—a capella by Milwaukee's youthful Mayor Zeigler.

And, no photographer ever yelled at Koussevitzky as they did at the new commander of the Legion—

"Hey, Milo, just give us one more shot!"

This Clipping From
HACKENSACK, N. J.
BERGEN-RECORD

SEP 27 1940

This Clipping From
UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH

OCT 5 - 1940

Tibbett Vs. James Petrillo Starts With Name Calling

Status Of The Fight Rests On Decision By Steuer; Injunction Being Sought Through Courts

By MARK BARRON

Lawrence Tibbett says that James Caesar Petrillo is a czar and Petrillo replies that everybody calls him the czar, the chief, and this and that, but what can he do?

MAY BE IMPORTANT

So with this preliminary name calling, concert artists and musicians became further entangled this week in a union jurisdictional fight that may be as far reaching in the amusement world as was a similar battle last August when a quarrel between actors and stagehands threatened to close virtually every theater and movie studio in the country.

The status of the fight at the moment rests on a decision which Supreme Court Justice Aaron Steuer is considering after hearing a plea from the American Guild of Musical Artists for an injunction to restrain Petrillo and his American Federation of Musicians from attempting to force A. G. M. A. members to join the A. F. M.

The A. F. M., of which Petrillo is president, is a union of 158,000 musicians and dominates most of the orchestras in the United States. The A. G. M. A., headed by Tibbett, is a union of 1,800 concert and operatic stars and includes in its membership such names as Frank Chapman, Gladys Swarthout, Frederick Jaegel, Jascha Heifetz, and Jose Iturbi.

Petrillo demands that the instrumentalists who are members of the more exclusive A. G. M. A. resign from that body and move their membership over to his A. F. M.

In the event the star artists refuse to make the change, Petrillo says, none of their members will be allowed to appear on radio programs, in movies, or make phonograph records with orchestras which belong to his union.

In reply Tibbett asserts the right of his A. G. M. A. members as free people to freely associate with each other for their own mutual benefit.

Justice Steuer says that he will not arrive at his decision for some time. Pending this decision Petrillo is restrained from carrying out his ultimatum to the star solo instrumentalists by an order granted by Justice Ferdinand Pecora on August 29.

As a sort of innocent bystander caught in the middle of this family fight is the non-union Boston Symphony Orchestra which has not broadcast on radio chains for more than a year because A. F. M. would not allow it to do so. Also, the union does not permit it to make records.

As members of the A. G. M. A the solo instrumentalists are allowed to appear as guest stars with the Boston Symphony, of which Serge Koussevitzky is conductor If they joined A. F. M. they could no longer appear with the Boston group.

GETS $46,000 ANNUALLY

Petrillo, who gets $26,000 a year as president of A. F. M. and an additional $20,000 a year as head of the Chicago local, is a short, rather heavy set and aggressive man who got into the musicians' union because he used to play a trumpet at political outings around Chicago. Today he only plays the trumpet occasionally in private for his own enjoyment.

He guides his Union either from his headquarters in Chicago or from his second offices in a Park Avenue hotel suite in New York. His Chicago offices, while fitted with a thick oriental rug and decorative red cedar panels, also features a large illuminated sign which reads: "Straight Ahead To Pay Dues".

In Chicago, where musicians wages have jumped about 60 per cent since Petrillo took over the Union, he stages free summer concerts in the Grant Park band shell on the Lake Michigan shores.

Petrillo says that these free concerts are staged under his personal supervision and one of his pet peeves against the A. G. M. A. solo stars is that his A. F. M. local has had to pay fees in four figures to persuade them to appear on the free concert programs.

His answer to the A. G. M. A. suit cites the following artists as those booked for his concerts and the fees paid them by his A. F. M. local:

Tibbett, $2,500; Kirsten Flagstad, $2,000; Lily Pons, $5,000; John Charles Thomas, $4,000; Grace Moore, $2,250; Giovanni Martinelli, $1,000; Helen Jepson, $3,000; Mischa Elman, $2,500; Jascha Heifetz, $3,000; Vladimir Horowitz, $1,500, and Albert Spalding, $2,250.

Tibbett serves as president of the A. G. M. A. union for no salary at all, and in addition made several large contributions from his personal income to the Union treasury when it was in the process of being organized in 1936.

Tibbett says that he has made several efforts to negotiate differences with Petrillo, but charges that the negotiations were broken off every time by the A. F. M. leader.

Petrillo contends that his charter from the American Federation of Labor, of which Tibbett's A. G. M. A. also is a member, gives the A. F. M. exclusive jurisdiction over performers on musical instruments of any kind who render musical services for pay. For that reason, he claims, the case should be decided by the A. F. of L. council instead of in a court of law.

If he should win this latter point and the case comes before the Council, there looms another debate as to whether President William Green of the A. F. of L. would sit in his usual position as chairman of that deciding group. For Green is a member of Petrillo's Chicago local. When Green was expelled from the United Mine Workers Union he was in an embarrassing position because an A. F. of L. president must belong to an affiliated union. The A. F. M. solved his dilemma by admitting him as a member.

Green is not a musician and plays no instrument, although when a coal miner he was a lusty singer of hymns. He had visions of becoming a Baptist minister.

After listening to the plea by Petrillo's counsel, Samuel Seabury, and then listening to an argument by Tibbett's counsel, Justice Steuer said:

"I have reached a point where physically I can't pay much more attention . . . decision reserved."

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION

SEP 26 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EASTON, PA.
EXPRESS

SEP 26 1940

This Clipping From
ALLENTOWN, PA.
CHRONICLE-NEWS

SEP 26 1940

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

SEP 29 1940

Concert fans who complain that symphony orchestras run through the same old standard items season after season will bless the name of Dr. Koussevitzky who promises a veritable feast of new music for the Boston Symphony's programs. There's Roy Harris's Fourth Symphony, complete with chorus, and new symphonies by Hindemith, Stravinsky, Eugene Goossens and Arthur Shepherd. Moreover, Gregor Piatigorsky is billed to introduce a new Hindemith concerto for cello.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

SEP 17 1940

Music and The Drama

LEGION TAKES OVER SYMPHONY HALL

BOSTON, Sept. 26-AP-Here's what Mr. Koussevitzky would have seen if he had paid a surprise visit to Symphony Hall today to see if everything was ready for the opening of his Boston Symphony Orchestra's season.....

A replica of the Liberty Bell was set up in the place on the stage that is sacred to his director's podium, and the commander of the American Legion was whacking the bell with a mallet.

A big Legionnaire smoking a fat cigar was sitting in the concert master's place, shorthand machines were set up in the first violin section, photographers' bulbs littered the floor where the second fiddles beat time with their feet, and ladies' auxiliary members with their posies and banners had back seats where the kettle drummers hold sway at concert time.

The press was in the orchestra's tuning room—eating ham-on-rye—and the click-click of telegraphers' keys made a new sound in the place where the French horns sound their "A."

Koussevitzky knows what it is to receive an ovation in the hall, but the rendition of a Beethoven Symphony never caused the audience to jump up and flock to the stage bearing cards with the names of all the States and territories of the United States.

There was music there, but Brahms and Mozart didn't have a chance. Irving Berlin was top man with "God Bless America" being rendered in all forms ranging from a quick chorus by a bugle corps to a solo—a capella—by Milwaukee's youthful Mayor Zeigler.

And, no photographer ever yelled at Koussevitzky as they did at the new commander of the Legion—

"Hey, Milo, just give us one more shot!"

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

OCT 1 - 1940

Musical Calendar

Fritz Kreisler, upon opening the Aaron Richmond celebrity series Sunday afternoon, Oct. 27, will be acclaimed by an audience composed of 70 per cent. of series subscribers. Although Kreisler's Symphony hall concert is an "optional" event, as are the concerts of such other eminent artists as Rachmaninoff Don Cossacks Smeterlin, Busch and Serkin, and Flagstad, the vast majority realize that the Boston appearance of this famous violinist will be the only one of the year. The Lynn subscribers of Aaron Richmond's "celebrity series" are also welcoming the opportunity to hear —as "optional" numbers—the first Boston concerts by the Trapp Family, Donald Dickson, and Kerstein Thorborg.

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the superb program which will open the 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which is to be undertaken in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. Included, we find Ralph Vaughan Williams "A London Symphony" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" in C minor.

Koussevitzky promises a glowing number of revivals of special interest for the anniversary season, besides new music of extra significance—these pieces to be interspersed among the more familiar classical masterpieces comprising the usual repertory of the season.

Symphonies announced include Shostakevitch's "Fifth Symphony," Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Beethoven's "Ninth," Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony, Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony (orchestral portions), Bruckner's "Eighth Symphony" and climaxed by "Rhenish" Symphony. Such new works to be introduced will include the "Folk Song" Symphony of Roy Harris, a new Symphony by Paul Hindemith, and a new 'Cello Concerto by Hindemith.

In conclusion, I do wish to pass along a bit of Ruskin's philosophy that "smacks" of understanding. "The entire object of true education is to make people not merely do the right things, but enjoy them—not merely industrious, but to love industry— not merely learned, but to love knowledge—not merely pure, but to love purity—not merely just, but to hunger and thirst after justice." Let's all say, Amen.

William Hastings Jr.

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
OCT 2 - 1940

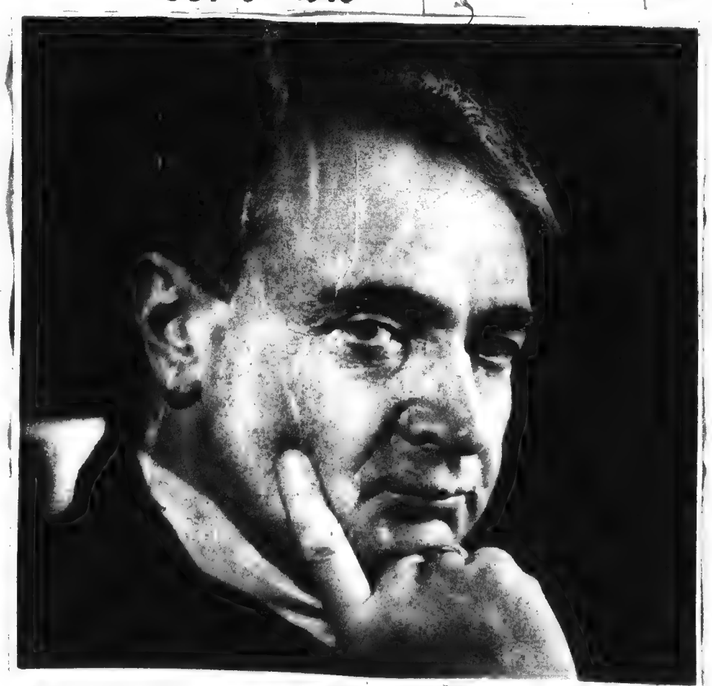
Non-Union Boston Symph Plays American Legion As Hal Redden Reddens

Appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week before the American Legion convention in Boston was a headache to Harold Redden, executive chairman of the Legion's committee on arrangements. The Boston symph is noted as the only ranking non-union orchestra in the country. Redden is first vice-president of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor and an official of the AFL.

First Redden heard of the scheduled appearance was when local representatives of the musicians' union came to him with squawks about booking a non-union orchestra for the date. They demanded that the deal be called off. Redden discovered, however, that the contract had already been signed and that the Legion would have to pay, even if the orchestra was not permitted to play. So he refused to intervene and the date went through as scheduled, with local music union officials sizzling.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE

OCT 6 - 1940



THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—with Serge Koussevitsky (above) conducting, is scheduled for a Dec. 9 performance in the second feature of the Series "A" concerts.

Symphony Resumes Friday

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will open its 60th season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, who begins his 17th consecutive year at the head of the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the program with "A London Symphony," by Ralph Vaughan Williams. This symphony is suggestive of its subject by the introduction of such sounds familiar to Londoners as the chimes of Big Ben, and certain street cries.

Albert Coates, who introduced the Symphony to America, was more explicit, characterizing the first movement as the Strand in the bustle of morning traffic; the second movement as Bloomsbury at dusk; the third as Saturday night on the Thames Embankment; the fourth as "the crueler aspects of London, the London of the unemployed and unfortunate."

The symphony which has contributed more than any other work to the fame of its composer has been performed here several times, but not until now under the direction of Koussevitzky. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor will complete the program.

The concert will be repeated on Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts will begin on Oct. 28 and 29.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 6 - 1940

City Concert Season Will Begin Oct. 22

Boston Symphony Will Open Varied Series of Attractions

FIRST of Providence's big concert series to launch the new musical season will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 22, followed a week later, on Oct. 29, by the opening of the Providence Community Concert Association's schedule.

Arrangements already completed indicate the 1940-41 season will be unusually busy and varied. Noted artists and organizations, including a number new to the local concert stage, will share the limelight with those in the ever-growing ranks of native talent.

Added to the season's concert series is a new one already under way at the Museum of Art, Rhode Island School of Design. This one specializes in Rhode Island talent through a series of monthly Sunday afternoon programs free to the public.

Another prominent newcomer, though no stranger to local musical circles, is Arthur Fiedler, well-known conductor of various choral and orchestral groups and member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be the new director of the University Glee Club, Ray W. Greene, president.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

OCT 6 - 1940

In Boston

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 60th anniversary season a day later than the three orchestras noted above that is, on Friday, Oct. 11. It will be the 17th consecutive year as conductor for Serge Koussevitsky.

Among soloists scheduled to appear with the orchestra are Vladimir Horowitz (who plays here March 31 on the Capital series) Jascha Heifetz (who plays here Oct. 21, also on the Capital series) and Nathan Milstein and Gregor Piatigorsky. Guest conductors during the winter will include Igor Stravinsky and Desire Defaut.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 4 - 1940

More Details of Boston Symphony's Events for Coming Season.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has amplified with further details his plans for the 60th year of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The season—which will be his 17th as conductor—is to begin at Symphony hall with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of Oct. 11 and 12.

Among works of the "standard" repertory which have not been heard in the recent past, and which Koussevitzky proposes to do, are Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Third or "Rhenish" Symphony of Schumann, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and the "Manfred" and Third Symphonies by Tschaikowsky. The "Pastoral" Symphony by the English Vaughan Williams, a remarkable modern score unplayed at Symphony hall for a number of years, will be performed, and there will be a revival of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony, the "Faust" Symphony by Liszt, and excerpts from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of Berlioz.

The new Fourth Symphony by Roy Harris, it turns out, is called the "Folk Song" Symphony. As previously announced, it requires a chorus. New symphonies by Hindemith, Stravinsky, Eugene Goossens and Arthur Shepherd are promised. The three last-named will conduct their own music.

The Requiem and various orchestral pieces by Mozart will be heard in the year 1941, which will bring the 150th anniversary of his death.

Of the four soloists now announced for the Friday-Saturday series, Gregor Piatigorsky is to precent a new Cello Concerto by Hindemith, and Vladimir Horowitz will make his first symphony appearance in a decade, offering the work of his local debut in 1928—the Third Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff, Jascha Heifetz and Nathan Milstein, violinists, will be heard; what they will play is not specified.

An all-Sibelius program, in December, will mark the Finnish composer5s 75th birthday. Sibelius was born Dec. 8, 1865.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

OCT 6 - 1940

Opening programs of two major symphony orchestras this week are extremely short in quantity, long on quality. Serge Koussevitsky and his Bostonians open in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday night with the "London" symphony of Vaughan Williams (last heard at Boston in 1934) and the Beethoven fifth. John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic begin at Carnegie Hall Thursday night with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," the "Enigma Variations" by Elgar (of which Mr. Barbirolli is the most eminent interpreter) and the Sibelius second.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 6 - 1940

Koussevitzky Begins Boston Season Friday

Two Symphonies Listed for Opening Program of the Sixtieth Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its sixtieth season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Boston's Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will devote his program to Beethoven's fifth symphony and Ralph Vaughan Williams's London Symphony. The regular season, as usual, will consist of twenty-four pairs of Thursday and Friday concerts and six concerts each on Monday nights and Tuesday afternoons. Two pension-fund benefits and six youth concerts in Symphony Hall and eight Thursday night concerts in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, complete the schedule in the Boston area.

This will be the orchestra's seventeenth season under Dr. Koussevitzky. Igor Stravinsky will reappear as guest conductor in his own music and in Tchaikovsky's third symphony. The Belgian conductor Desire Defauw, who made his American debut with the NBC Symphony last season, will also fill a guest engagement in Boston. New works scheduled included Roy Harris's Folksong Symphony, for orchestra and chorus, a recently completed symphony of Arthur Shepherd, to be conducted by the composer, and the late Frederick S. Converse's American Sketches.

The 150th anniversary of Mozart's death will be commemorated by performances of his Requiem and other works. Other major works listed in the preliminary announcement are Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony and parts of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Other novelties announced are symphonies by Mr. Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith, both representing their first instrumental works to be thus designated; variations for string orchestra by Benjamin Britten and other British works by Vaughan Williams and Arnold Bax. Eugene Goossens, of the Cincinnati Symphony, will conduct his symphony which he introduced to Cincinnati last season.

Among the soloists in the regular series are Vladimir Horowitz in Rachmaninoff's third piano concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky, in a new cello concerto by Mr. Hindemith, and Jascha Heifetz and Nathan Milstein, violinists.

The orchestra's usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall will begin on Nov. 21 and 23. As before, one of the evening concerts will take place on a Friday. The first of the five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be held on Friday night, Nov. 22.

Other concerts scheduled for outside of Boston are five concerts in Providence, two in Hartford, Pittsburgh and Yale University, New Haven, and single concerts in Worcester, Cleveland, Connecticut College, Newark, Philadelphia, Rutgers University (New Brunswick), Smith College (Northampton), University of Rochester, University of Michigan (Ann Arbor), Toledo and Buffalo.

In all, 113 concerts will be given in the regular season. The usual season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will be held from May 6 to July 3, and the free Esplanade concerts from July 6 to 28.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

SEP 27 1940

Music and The Drama

LEGION TAKES OVER SYMPHONY HALL

BOSTON, Sept. 26-AP-Here's what Mr. Koussevitzky would have seen if he had paid a surprise visit to Symphony Hall today to see if everything was ready for the opening of his Boston Symphony Orchestra's season.

A replica of the Liberty Bell was set up in the place on the stage that is sacred to his director's podium, and the commander of the American Legion was whacking the bell with a mallet.

A big Legionnaire smoking a fat cigar was sitting in the concert master's place, shorthand machines were set up in the first violin section, photographers' bulbs littered the floor where the second fiddles beat time with their feet, and ladies' auxiliary members with their posies and banners had back seats where the kettle drummers hold sway at concert time.

The press was in the orchestra's tuning room—eating ham-on-rye—and the click-click of telegraphers' keys made a new sound in the place where the French horns sound their "A."

Koussevitzky knows what it is to receive an ovation in the hall, but the rendition of a Beethoven Symphony never caused the audience to jump up and flock to the stage bearing cards with the names of all the States and territories of the United States.

There was music there, but Brahms and Mozart didn't have a chance. Irving Berlin was top man with "God Bless America" being rendered in all forms ranging from a quick chorus by a bugle corps to a solo—a capella—by Milwaukee's youthful Mayor Zeigler.

And, no photographer ever yelled at Koussevitzky as they did at the new commander of the Legion—

"Hey, Milo, just give us one more shot!"

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM

OCT 1 - 1940

Musical Calendar

Fritz Kreisler, upon opening the Aaron Richmond celebrity series Sunday afternoon, Oct. 27, will be acclaimed by an audience composed of 70 per cent. of series subscribers. Although Kreisler's Symphony hall concert is an "optional" event, as are the concerts of such other eminent artists as Rachmaninoff Don Cossacks Smeterlin, Busch and Serkin, and Flagstad, the vast majority realize that the Boston appearance of this famous violinist will be the only one of the year. The Lynn subscribers of Aaron Richmond's "celebrity series" are also welcoming the opportunity to hear—as "optional" numbers—the first Boston concerts by the Trapp Family, Donald Dickson, and Kerstein Thorborg.

Serge Koussevitzky has announced the superb program which will open the 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which is to be undertaken in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon, Oct. 11, and Saturday evening, Oct. 12. Included, we find Ralph Vaughan Williams "A London Symphony" and Beethoven's "Fifth Symphony" in C minor.

Koussevitzky promises a glowing number of revivals of special interest for the anniversary season, besides new music of extra significance—these pieces to be interspersed among the more familiar classical masterpieces comprising the usual repertory of the season.

Symphonies announced include Shostakevitch's "Fifth Symphony," Liszt's "Faust" Symphony, Beethoven's "Ninth," Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" Symphony. Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony (orchestral portions), Bruckner's "Eighth Symphony" and climaxed by "Rhenish" Symphony. Such new works to be introduced will include the "Folk Song" Symphony of Roy Harris, a new Symphony by Paul Hindemith, and a new 'Cello Concerto by Hindemith.

In conclusion, I do wish to pass along a bit of Ruskin's philosophy that "smacks" of understanding. "The entire object of true education is to make people not merely do the right things, but enjoy them—not merely industrious, but to love industry— not merely learned, but to love knowledge—not merely pure, but to love purity—not merely just, but to hunger and thirst after justice." Let's all say, Amen.

This Clipping From VARIETY
NEW YORK, N.Y.
OCT 2 - 1940

Non-Union Boston Symph Plays American Legion As Hal Redden Reddens

Appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra last week before the American Legion convention in Boston was a headache to Harold Redden, executive chairman of the Legion's committee on arrangements. The Boston symph is noted as the only ranking non-union orchestra in the country. Redden is first vice-president of the Massachusetts Federation of Labor and an official of the AFL.

First Redden heard of the scheduled appearance was when local representatives of the musicians' union came to him with squawks about booking a non-union orchestra for the date. They demanded that the deal be called off. Redden discovered, however, that the contract had already been signed and that the Legion would have to pay, even if the orchestra was not permitted to play. So he refused to intervene and the date went through as scheduled, with local music union officials sizzling.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 6 - 1940

City Concert Season Will Begin Oct. 22

Boston Symphony Will Open Varied Series of Attractions

FIRST of Providence's big concert series to launch the new musical season will be the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Oct. 22, followed a week later, on Oct. 29, by the opening of the Providence Community Concert Association's schedule.

Arrangements already completed indicate the 1940-41 season will be unusually busy and varied. Noted artists and organizations, including a number new to the local concert stage, will share the limelight with those in the ever-growing ranks of native talent.

Added to the season's concert series is a new one already under way at the Museum of Art, Rhode Island School of Design. This one specializes in Rhode Island talent through a series of monthly Sunday afternoon programs free to the public.

Another prominent newcomer, though no stranger to local musical circles, is Arthur Fiedler, well-known conductor of various choral and orchestral groups and member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will be the new director of the University Glee Club, Ray W. Greene, president.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
OCT 6 - 1940

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—with Serge Koussevitsky (above) conducting, is scheduled for a Dec. 9 performance in the second feature of the Series "A" concerts.

Symphony Resumes Friday

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA will open its 60th season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, who begins his 17th consecutive year at the head of the orchestra.

Dr. Koussevitsky will open the program with "A London Symphony," by Ralph Vaughan Williams. This symphony is suggestive of its subject by the introduction of such sounds familiar to Londoners as the chimes of Big Ben, and certain street cries.

Albert Coates, who introduced the Symphony to America, was more explicit, characterizing the first movement as the Strand in the bustle of morning traffic; the second movement as Bloomsbury at dusk; the third as Saturday night on the Thames Embankment; the fourth as "the crueler aspects of London, the London of the unemployed and unfortunate."

The symphony which has contributed more than any other work to the fame of its composer has been performed here several times, but not until now under the direction of Koussevitzky. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor will complete the program.

The concert will be repeated on Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts will begin on Oct. 28 and 29.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN
OCT 6 - 1940

In Boston

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra opens its 60th anniversary season a day later than the three orchestras noted above that is, on Friday, Oct. 11. It will be the 17th consecutive year as conductor for Serge Koussevitsky.

Among soloists scheduled to appear with the orchestra are Vladimir Horowitz (who plays here March 31 on the Capital series) Jascha Heifetz (who plays here Oct. 21, also on the Capital series) and Nathan Milstein and Gregor Piatigorsky. Guest conductors during the winter will include Igor Stravinsky and Desire Defaut.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
OCT 4 - 1940

More Details of Boston Symphony's Events for Coming Season.

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky has amplified with further details his plans for the 60th year of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The season—which will be his 17th as conductor—is to begin at Symphony hall with the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of Oct. 11 and 12.

Among works of the "standard" repertory which have not been heard in the recent past, and which Koussevitzky proposes to do, are Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, the Third or "Rhenish" Symphony of Schumann, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and the "Manfred" and Third Symphonies by Tschaikowsky. The "Pastoral" Symphony by the English Vaughan Williams, a remarkable modern score unplayed at Symphony hall for a number of years, will be performed, and there will be a revival of Mahler's "Resurrection" Symphony, the "Faust" Symphony by Liszt, and excerpts from the "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony of Berlioz.

The new Fourth Symphony by Roy Harris, it turns out, is called the "Folk Song" Symphony. As previously announced, it requires a chorus. New symphonies by Hindemith, Stravinsky, Eugene Goossens and Arthur Shepherd are promised. The three last-named will conduct their own music.

The Requiem and various orchestral pieces by Mozart will be heard in the year 1941, which will bring the 150th anniversary of his death.

Of the four soloists now announced for the Friday-Saturday series, Gregor Piatigorsky is to precent a new Cello Concerto by Hindemith, and Vladimir Horowitz will make his first symphony appearance in a decade, offering the work of his local debut in 1928—the Third Piano Concerto by Rachmaninoff, Jascha Heifetz and Nathan Milstein, violinists, will be heard; what they will play is not specified.

An all-Sibelius program, in December, will mark the Finnish composer's 75th birthday. Sibelius was born Dec. 8, 1865.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 6 - 1940

Opening programs of two major symphony orchestras this week are extremely short in quantity, long on quality. Serge Koussevitsky and his Boston[illegible] in Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday night with the "London" symphony of Vaughan Williams (last heard at Boston in 1934) and the Beethoven fifth. John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic begin at Carnegie Hall Thursday night with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," the "Enigma Variations" by Elgar (of which Mr. Barbirolli is the most eminent interpreter) and the Sibelius second.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 6 - 1940

Koussevitzky Begins Boston Season Friday

Two Symphonies Listed for Opening Program of the Sixtieth Year

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its sixtieth season next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Boston's Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky will devote his program to Beethoven's fifth symphony and Ralph Vaughan Williams's London Symphony. The regular season, as usual, will consist of twenty-four pairs of Thursday and Friday concerts and six concerts each on Monday nights and Tuesday afternoons. Two pension-fund benefits and six youth concerts in Symphony Hall and eight Thursday night concerts in Sanders Theater, Harvard University, complete the schedule in the Boston area.

This will be the orchestra's seventeenth season under Dr. Koussevitzky. Igor Stravinsky will reappear as guest conductor in his own music and in Tchaikovsky's third symphony. The Belgian conductor Desire Defauw, who made his American debut with the NBC Symphony last season, will also fill a guest engagement in Boston. New works scheduled included Roy Harris's Folksong Symphony, for orchestra and chorus, a recently completed symphony of Arthur Shepherd, to be conducted by the composer, and the late Frederick S. Converse's American Sketches.

The 150th anniversary of Mozart's death will be commemorated by performances of his Requiem and other works. Other major works listed in the preliminary announcement are Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Liszt's "Faust" symphony, Tchaikovsky's "Manfred" symphony and parts of Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" symphony.

Other novelties announced are symphonies by Mr. Stravinsky and Paul Hindemith, both representing their first instrumental works to be thus designated; variations for string orchestra by Benjamin Britten and other British works by Vaughan Williams and Arnold Bax. Eugene Goossens, of the Cincinnati Symphony, will conduct his symphony which he introduced to Cincinnati last season.

Among the soloists in the regular series are Vladimir Horowitz in Rachmaninoff's third piano concerto, Gregor Piatigorsky, in a new cello concerto by Mr. Hindemith, and Jascha Heifetz and Nathan Milstein, violinists.

The orchestra's usual series of five Thursday evening and five Saturday afternoon concerts at Carnegie Hall will begin on Nov. 21 and 23. As before, one of the evening concerts will take place on a Friday. The first of the five concerts at the Brooklyn Academy of Music will be held on Friday night, Nov. 22.

Other concerts scheduled for outside of Boston are five concerts in Providence, two in Hartford, Pittsburgh and Yale University, New Haven, and single concerts in Worcester, Cleveland, Connecticut College, Newark, Philadelphia, Rutgers University (New Brunswick), Smith College (Northampton), University of Rochester, University of Michigan (Ann Arbor), Toledo and Buffalo.

In all, 113 concerts will be given in the regular season. The usual season of "Pop" concerts in Symphony Hall will be held from May 6 to July 3, and the free Esplanade concerts from July 6 to 28.

—Symphony Orchestra's 60th Season—

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS

Symphony Season Begins This Week The 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Symphony Hall Friday afternoon at 2:30. Serge Koussevitzky, entering his 17th year as conductor, will conduct "A London Symphony" by the English composer, Vaughan Williams, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, in C minor. On Saturday evening at 8:15 the program will be repeated.

Though a remarkable modern score, "A London Symphony" has been performed at only four pairs of Boston Symphony concerts previously—February and April, 1921; April, 1923, and November, 1933 (not 1934, as erroneously stated in this column a week ago). Vaughan Williams composed it in 1912-13 and later revised it. The dedication must have been applied to the revised score, for it was "to the memory of George Butterworth," a young English composer who, as a lieutenant of the Durham Light Infantry, was killed Aug. 5, 1916, after leading a successful bombing expedition against an enemy trench.

"A London Symphony" is a "big" score, both in musical apparatus and subject, calling for a numerous orchestra and extra percussion. Williams did not attach any titles to the four movements, but Albert Coates, who conducted its American premiere, wrote down an elaborate description.

The opening of the first movement, says Mr. Coates, is the placid river Thames at daybreak, with the sound of "Big Ben"; then as the tempo changes to allegro, we see morning traffic on the Strand. The second movement is down-at-heel Bloomsbury; the third Saturday night on the Thames Embankment. In the finale is presented "the crueler aspect of London, the London of the unemployed and unfortunate," and toward the end "Big Ben" chimes again.

Mr. Coates' description is in the present tense. How much of the London in the symphony now remains only some Londoners know. Certainly the city which has been bombed for two months past could not be "London . . . whole, vast and unfathomable" as in the epilogue to Williams' music. Which leads to another conclusion that Mr. Koussevitzky may have had a reason other than art for placing the work upon his initial program of the season. Did he not give us "Finlandia" during the height of the trouble in that valiant country last Winter? Incidentally this will be his first conducting of "A London Symphony" here. In 1933 Mr. Bagin presented it.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 6 - 1940

"Peter" in Book Form

Prokofieff's "Peter and the Wolf" has been published in book form by Alfred A. Knopf as a story for young people. The volume is illustrated with musical notations of the Prokofieff themes, and Serge Koussevitzky has written a foreword. Text is by Hollis Holland, and the designs are by Warren Chappell.

THIS CLIPPING FROM LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
OCT 8 - 194

Musical Calendar.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will wield his baton for his 17th consecutive year at Boston Symphony Hall, Friday afternoon, over this highly acclaimed 60 year old orchestra.

The repertoire is superb—It includes "A London Symphony" by Ralph Vaughan Williams—a highly suggestive type of music introducing such sounds familiar to Londoners, as the chimes of Big Ben, and certain street cries. Albert Coates, who first introduced the symphony to America was more explicite, for he characterized the first movement as "the Strand in a mid morning bustling traffic;" the second movement as "Bloomsbury at dusk"; the third as Saturday night on the "Thames Embankment"; the fourth as "the crueler aspects of London, the London, of the unemployed and unfortunate."

This fine symphony, which has contributed more than any other work to Ralph Vaughan Williams' fame, is being performed under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky for the very first time. Beethoven's superb Fifth Symphony will complete the unusual opening program.

In conclusion, may I quote a few lines from a true genius of thought? To quote Lombard: "In art, as in business, originality is one of the most valuable possessions. Unless a composition possesses individuality, where is the reason for its being? Commonplace ideas, however well expressed, add not one iota to the sum of human knowledge and edification. Models, though well copied, add nothing to art. The most useful power of man is his ability to create something; all his knowledge should be utilized to that end."

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 9 - 1940

Symphony Season.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, opens its 16th anniversary season with the concerts on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of this week. In view of the ideals for which the British are fighting today, it was doubtless not by accident that Dr. Koussevitzky put upon the opening programs "A London Symphony," one of the most impressive orchestral works of the English composer Vaughan Williams. This will be partnered on the programs by the majestic Fifth Symphony of Beethoven.

This will be Dr. Koussevitzky's 17th season as conductor of the orchestra. It was fitting, therefore, that the brief summary of the history of the orchestra which was printed in the prospectus recently issued should have culminated in a tribute to his service. As the article says: "More than a quarter of the orchestra's years have been Koussevitzky years. They have been years of a single and interrupted leadership, of stability in membership, and of the co-ordination which these conditions have made possible. The present expansion of the orchestra's activities and its public is the result of these years. It is not enough that Koussevitzky has brought the orchestra to a tonal richness, a brilliance of virtuosity, and a warmth of response quite beyond compare. Koussevitzky looks always to a more complete capturing of beauty."

Activities for the season include the 24 pairs of concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening; six pairs of the supplementary Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon series, two pension fund concerts, and the customary series in Carnegie hall, New York and in Brooklyn, Providence and Harvard university, besides an increasing number of appearances elsewhere. After the regular season these will be followed by the Pops, the Esplanade concerts and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Occasional Thoughts on The Symphony's 60th Season

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

As we pick our way through the traffic of Massachusetts avenue next Friday afternoon or Saturday night toward Symphony Hall it might be well to pause and think—upon reaching at last the curb—of the institution that enters its 60th year and the conductor who begins his 17th in the service of that institution. Such thoughts will inevitably be mellow, let us hope not smug. Yet a good deal of self-satisfaction on the part of the Boston Symphony would not be out of place. It has accomplished technical miracles; its activities are not growing inwards; it is as much if not more than ever a leader in the field.

If, however, we can not summon a complaint as to the orchestra's standards or standing, we can always discuss its repertoire. Mr. Koussevitzky's taste, of course, is remarkably catholic, a fact which, with the orchestra's amazing quickness in reading unfamiliar music, insures us a wide variety. Still, this year we can not expect new scores of great interest from Europe, even though many foreign composers are now resident on these shores. Is it not time, then, to hear a number of "seconds" or "thirds"?

Few authors care to collect first editions, for their keenness grows just where the bibliophile leaves off. So, too, composers are glad to get their scores performed, but how much more delighted to hear their works a second time! How pleasant to watch the audience's sympathy, perhaps distant and cold in the first performance, quicken as the composer's ideas make themselves understood! That, ideally, is what every composer must hope and feel, unless he be a very inhuman, cold fish indeed. Here, then, in the second year of the war is the composer's chance to get heard and the public's to catch up with him.

FORGOTTEN MUSIC

If you look back, as we have been doing, through the programs of the 17 years of Mr. Koussevitzky's reign, you will discover, in the first place, that the amount of neglected or forgotten music is not as much as you might suppose. We may correctly assume that a certain portion of "novelties" were never worth a second hearing. One reason or another—policy, friendship, honoring the American composer and so forth—may have dictated the performance. That done, we are under no pressing need to hear the work again. A few scores climb straightway into favor and remain there. Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, Ravel's Bolero, Respighi's Pines of Rome are examples of this rare tendency. Other works earn a respectable place and are kept in the repertoire, because the conductor and at least a part of the public discern their unusual quality. Examples are Hindemith's Matthis der Maler Symphony, Prokofieff's Piano and Violin Concertos, Roussel's Third Symphony, Stravinsky's Symphony of Psalms and a number of others.

At that there remain scores which ought to be heard again, which were far from negligible to begin with and deserve to be rejudged in the light of the experience in listening we have all had since. The list of compositions that follows makes no attempt to be comprehensive, but suggests one or two titles and composers who might be considered. Take the late Albert Roussel, as a starter. His Third Symphony, written for the orchestra's 50th anniversary, and his Suite in F have been played a number of times; but what has happened to the no less worthy fourth, the "Evocations," the "Padmavati" Suite and the Symphony in B flat? A score that cries out to be performed again, for it was admitted to be one of the most difficult that the orchestra ever tackled, is Florent Schmitt's Symphonie Concertante. We hear lots of Hindemith and Prokofieff; so why not revive the former's Symphonic Dances and the latter's Fourth Symphony and Fifth Piano Concerto?

Some of the modern composers have almost disappeared from the Boston Symphony's calling list, as it were. There are many things by Honegger, Kodaly, Milhaud, Bartok on the shelves of the orchestra's library which might be profitably taken down and dusted off. We could do with another go at Malipiero's Second Symphony and Piano Concerto, Szymanowski's Second Violin concerto, Berg's Violin Concerto (so called) and Casella's Trio Concerto.

The American composer has had so much boosting of late that for once we shall not advance his cause. Mr. Koussevitzky is going to give us some Vaughan Williams, and two other Englishmen deserve a hearing. One of these, certainly, is the late Gustav Holst, who once led the orchestra in a most interesting concert of his own works; and the other is William Walton. A good word should be said, too, for the Czech composer, Bohuslav Martinu, who has written some remarkable music.

Of more established symphonies, Mr. Koussevitzky has promised us revivals of Beethoven's ninth, Liszt's "Faust," Tchaikovsky's "Manfred," Schumann's "Rhenish," Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet," Mahler's "Resurrection" and Bruckner's eighth. That is an impressive list of more or less neglected works, and we would only add to it in two respects. The Clementi symphony, rediscovered by Casella, was such a success a few years ago that it would be interesting either to repeat that one or to play another. Also, may we not beg Mr. Koussevitsky to give us again the Taneley Symo- Mozart in view of the fact that the composer died 150 years ago come 1941. Let us hope that Mr. Koussevitzky will keep this promise, for he made the same one last year and did not!

This Clipping From
SO. NORWALK, CONN.
SENTINEL
OCT 10 1940

Through the efforts of Miss Alma Stoddart, music director in the schools, the music groups are to have with them on Saturdays four professional musicians from the Goldman Band. They are: M. R. Dahm, cornetist; Philip Grant, percussion player; Magnini Chamber, clarinetist, and Miss Leona Smith, brass player and once soloist yith the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THIS CLIPPING FROM CONSHOHOCKEN, PA
RECORDER
10/4/40

Phila. Forum's 20th Season

The Philadelphia Forum will celebrate its twentieth anniversary season with William K. Huff, Executive Director of the Forum, announcing a definite increase over last season's enrollment.

As is customary, the season will start in mid-October, on Tuesday, the 15th, at the Academy of Music with the Forum's own Town Meeting to be presided over by George V. Denny, Jr., Moderator of America's Town Meeting of the Air, and Arthur E. Bestor, president of Chautauqua Institute.

Lothrop Stoddard noted journalist; "Eugen Onegin", the Tchaikovsky opera to be given in English for the first time by the Philadelphia Opera Company, and General Evangeline Booth, late Commander-in-Chief of the Salvation Army are other events scheduled for October.

February is scheduled to bring to Forum members Nicol Smith, author of Burma Road; the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Jascha Heifetz in his only local recital of the year, and Sir Hubert Wilkins with the first color motion pictures of both polar regions.

Dr. Walter Damrosch in a lecture-piano recital; Captain John D. Craig, "The Philippines Today" with new motion pictures; the third talk by William Lyon Phelps and a piano recitad by Jose Iturbi are events scheduled for March.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
OCT 11 1940

NEW ORCHESTRA UNDER LEADERSHIP OF FORMER BOSTON SYMPHONY MAN

Emil Arcieri, former clarinetist with the Boston Symphony, has organized and is conductor of a new orchestra called the New England Philharmonic. The new orchestra was formed in response to the needs of a large group of ambitious players who desired to apply their talents to the performance of great music. Under Mr. Arcieri's leadership they have become a dynamic unit and have won high praise in musical circles. Several concerts already have been given in New England. The next is scheduled for Friday evening, Oct. 25 in the Malden high school auditorium. The program consists of Berlioz's Le Carnival Romain, Brahms' Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Scheherazade Suite.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOLYOKE, MASS.
Transcript Telegram
OCT 11 1940

DEEPLY disturbed by England's present plight, Dr. Serge Koussevitzsky opens the 60th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony orchestra today with "A London Symphony"—a moving musical picture of the World War scene. Entering his 17th season as conductor, Dr. Koussevitzzky hoped to express his sympathy for the British in music with the seldom-played score composed by Vaughan Williams, an Englishman, in 1914 and revised by the author in 1920.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 6 - 1940

A HALL'S ANNIVERSARY

By FRANCIS D. PERKINS

MAY 5, 1941, will mark the fiftieth anniversary of the formal opening of Carnegie Hall. The management, however, has decided not to wait until next spring for a special semi-centennial commemoration, but to consider the entire musical schedule of 1940-'41 in this historic building as a celebration of its golden anniversary. In view of the hall's long-standing importance and prestige as one of this country's principal musical and cultural centers, it is appropriate that this observance should be of an extensive character, representing many fields of music and including the participation of artists and organizations who have often appeared in this auditorium. The beginning of the Philharharmonic-Symphony Society's season next Thursday recalls the fact that one of its ancestors, the New York Symphony Society, figured in the five-day festival under Walter Damrosch's direction which launched the hall upon its career of public service.

* * *

A Meeting and Its Result

THE genesis of the hall dates back to 1887 and the meeting of Andrew Carnegie and Mr. Damrosch on a steamer bound for Europe. Mr. Carnegie, then on his wedding trip, had rented an estate, "Kilgraston," in Scotland, and invited the young conductor to visit him there late that summer. Although Mr. Carnegie, Mr. Damrosch notes in his "My Musical Life," did not then care for the more intricate symphonic works, he had "a natural and naïve love for music." He had also known and admired the conductor's father, Dr. Leopold Damrosch. As a result, Mr. Damrosch was able to enlist his interest and support not only in the Symphony and Oratorio Societies, of which he became president, but also in the construction of a hall which would satisfy the needs of this organization.

In 1889, Mr. Carnegie organized a company, and William Burnet Tuthill was chosen as the architect. The site at West Fifty-seventh Street and Seventh Avenue was then considerably north of the city's musical and theatrical district. The Philharmonic and the Symphony Societies gave their concerts in the Metropolitan Opera House. The other principal centers of music, the Academy of Music, Chickering Hall and Steinway Hall, were all in the neighborhood of Union Square. In going uptown, however, Mr. Carnegie and his associates showed a justified foresight. West Fifty-seventh Street has long been a focal point of New York's musical life.

* * *

The Inaugural Festival

LATE in 1890, preliminary plans were made for the five-day dedicatory festival. To give this a special significance, Mr. Damrosch invited Peter Ilyich Tchaikovsky to come here and conduct the participating ensembles, the Oratorio and Symphony Societies, in some of his own works.

"A triumph of musical and architectural ability," to quote the New-York Tribune of May 6, 1891, was celebrated on the first festival evening. "Promptly at 8 o'clock the young conductor, Walter Damrosch, raised his baton, and the strains of 'Old Hundred' filled the hall." The inaugural address was delivered by the Right Rev. Henry Codman Potter, who was introduced by the president of the owning company, Morris Reno. After the singing of "America," Mr. Damrosch opened the regular program with Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture. Tchaikovsky conducted his "Marche Solenelle." "His bearing was modest but unconstrained," wrote Henry E. Krehbiel, "his beat firm but undemonstrative. The orchestra started the glad acclaim with a fanfare." Berlioz's "Te Deum," with Italo Campanini as tenor soloist, closed the concert.

Mendelssohn's "Elijah," directed by Mr. Damrosch, occupied the second evening. The third program, on the afternoon of May 7, included the overture and second act finale from Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro," Massenet arias sung by Clementine De Vere and Theodor Reichmann and the prelude and finale from "Tristan und Isolde." Tchaikovsky conducted his third suite. In the evening, Mr. Damrosch led the orchestra and chorus in his father's "Sulamith" and in Heinrich Schütz's "The Seven Last Words of Our Saviour." Tchaikovsky introduced two unaccompanied choruses, "Pater Noster" and "Legend." His share of the following afternoon's program included a song and the B flat minor piano concerto, with Adele aus der Ohe as the soloist. Mr. Damrosch, represented by a song, also conducted Beethoven's fifth symphony and music from Wagner's "Parsifal." The final concert, on the evening of May 9, was devoted to Handel's "Israel in Egypt."

* * *

Some Early Concerts

THE Symphony Society, under Mr. Damrosch, opened the new hall's first regular season on Nov. 13, 1891. The program included Beethoven's seventh symphony, Brahms's violin concerto with Adolph Brodsky, concertmaster of the orchestra, as soloist; Tchaikovsky's "Hamlet" and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." The first recitalist to appear in the new auditorium was no less a figure than Ignace Jan Paderewski, who made his much heralded American debut on Nov. 17 with a success which matched the advance reclame.

The closing of the Metropolitan Opera House for reconstruction after a fire brought the Philharmonic Society to Carnegie Hall for its fifty-first season, which opened under Anton Seidl on Nov. 18, 1892. The program included the "Meistersinger" prelude, airs from Dvorak and Saint-Saens operas sung by Mme. De Vere; the first movement of Beethoven's violin concerto, played by Richard Arnold, and Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony. "The effect of the music in the new concert room," wrote Mr. Krehbiel, "was superb." The Boston Symphony first came to Carnegie Hall in the following season. It returned to the Metropolitan for four years, but came back to Fifty-seventh Street in 1898.

* * *

Alterations and a Change of Name

ACCORDING to a resolution of the directors in 1890, the official title of the new building was "Music Hall, founded by Andrew Carnegie," and at first it was usually referred to simply as the Music Hall. It was styled Carnegie Music Hall early in 1894, judging by a pair of tickets for Adelina Patti's recital of March 22. By 1895, it had come to be known as Carnegie Hall, although the new name was not officially adopted until 1898. In his "Life of Andrew Carnegie," Burton J. Hendrick suggests that one reason for the change of title was the reluctance of European artists to book dates in the new building, since the term "Music Hall" abroad implied entertainment differing considerably from symphony concerts or recitals.

A Carnegie Hall patron of 1891, returning to it nearly fifty years later, would find some changes in its external appearance. In its first seasons, as pictured in Miss Ethel Peyser's "The House That Music Built," it was topped by a windowless mansard roof. There were no stores at the street level, and a long and shallow flight of steps led to the main entrance. Studios replaced the mansard roof on the top floor in 1894, and the tower and the rows of studios on the east and south sides were added in 1896. Stores were added in 1925.

* * *

Later History and Economic Questions

ALTHOUGH Mr. Carnegie built the hall, he did not endow it, feeling that it should pay its own way and derive its support from the public. The annual revenue, however, often did not meet expenses, and September, 1924, brought the unwelcome report that the building was to be sold and replaced by apartments and offices. In January, 1925, it was acquired by the late Robert E. Simon, who agreed to a provision that it should be continued as a concert hall for five years, unless some other hall capable of replacing it should be built within that period. New halls were rumored, but none were built. Mr. Simon, however, as a business man of artistic tastes and vision, gave tangible proof of his intention to maintain the building permanently as a home of music by embarking upon a long-range improvement program, designed both to better its economic position and its suitability for its principal purposes. His policies are being continued by his son, Robert E. Simon jr., the present president of the owning company.

Only a cursory mention can be made here of the improvements and changes of the last fifteen years, such as the new organ installed in 1929, the lounge and art gallery, redecoration, bettered ventilation, arrangements for broadcasting and the rehabilitation of the chamber music hall. Broadcasting on a national scale from Carnegie Hall began in the fall of 1927 over the WOR network, and the Philharmonic-Symphony first went on the air over the Columbia System's stations three years later. Meanwhile, throughout its career of nearly half a century, the main auditorium has maintained the paramount asset for which it has long been praised, its excellent acoustic conditions. These have been an important factor in its vogue for public purposes outside the realm of music, for lectures, meetings and memorable political debates.

* * *

Prospects for the Future

WITHIN the last decade, the future of the building has twice been in question. In April, 1933, after a period of shrinking bookings and rentals as a result of hard times, it was announced that the hall might have to be converted to non-musical uses. A year and a half later the proposed amalgamation of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society and Metropolitan Opera Association threatened the hall with loss of its principal tenant. But now, so far as one can venture to say in an unpredictable era, Carnegie Hall promises to continue for many years to come as the scene of a large proportion of the city's major musical events, while the schedule for the next seven months promises a fitting observance of this season's memorable anniversary.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
OCT 6 - 1940

WITH SOME ORCHESTRAS

AT its first New York concert of the season, Oct. 15, the Philadelphia Orchestra, under Eugene Ormandy, will be heard in a program containing the initial performance in this city of Mr. Ormandy's transcription of a Handel concerto in D major; Sibelius's First symphony, in commemoration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the composer's birth; four songs by Brahms for women's voices, with accompaniment of two horns and harp, which will be presented with the assistance of the Women's Glee Club of the University of Pennsylvania, Harl McDonald, director, and Respighi's "Feste Romane."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, opens its sixtieth anniversary season this Friday in Boston, Mass., with a program composed of Vaughan Williams's "A London Symphony" and the Fifth symphony by Beethoven.

The Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra, under Eugene Goossens, opens its season Friday in Cincinnati, Ohio. There will be twenty pairs of concerts on Friday afternoons and Saturday nights; five young people's concerts and thirteen out-of-town engagements. The guest conductors include Igor Stravinsky, on Nov. 22-23, and Georges Enesco, on Jan. 24-26. Thirteen soloists will be presented.

Eight conductors will participate in the forthcoming season of the Detroit Symphony Orchestra, which opens Oct. 17 in Detroit, Mich. In order of their appearances these leaders are Victor Kolar, Bruno Walter, Efrem Kurtz, Tauno Hannikainen, Désiré Defauw, Georg Szell, Georges Enesco and Albert Stoessel. A total of forty-five performances is scheduled.

At its opening concert of the season Thursday in Cleveland, the Cleveland Orchestra, under Artur Rodzinski, will be heard in the Brahms "Variations on a Theme by Haydn"; the Vaughan Williams "A London Symphony"; Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance."

The Montreal Orchestra, under Douglas Clarke, will give ten concerts in Montreal, Canada, this season, beginning Nov. 3. Soloists engaged include Béla Bartók, Georges Enesco, Kathleen Parlow, Shura Cherkassky, Charles Naegele, Anis Fuleihan, Leonard Shure and Maria Marova.

The new $1,500,000 music auditorium, Kleinhans Music Hall, in Buffalo, N. Y., will be opened next Saturday night with a concert by the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra under Franco Autori. Eudice Shapiro, violinist, will be the soloist. The music hall was built with funds from the estates of the late Mr. and Mrs. Edward L. Kleinhans, jointly with a WPA grant.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
OCT 11 1940

Music Box

As we start up the old Music Box for another season, we discover there's a lot of dust which has gathered during the summer and probably it's pertinent to get rid of that first before we really start grinding out for what lies before us. The coming season for music lovers in the Springfield area should be one of the best. We hope by next Friday to present as complete a schedule as our checking up will allow so that you may have a list of coming attractions within a radius of approximately 25 miles, and the dates as far as they can be obtained. Publishing of this material in a handy table often prevents embarrassing conflicts later in the season, and if we can help avoid them, that suits us.

* * *

In the eyes of outsiders, probably the biggest thing that happened during the summer was the tremendous success of the Berkshire Music festival. Crowds were never so large nor so enthusiastic before and the new academy seems headed for considerable recognition. The way memberships for 1941 were gobbled up shows best of all the rising tide of popularity of the music center at Tanglewood.

* * *

One fly appears in the ointment. The new president of the American Federation of Musicians, James C. Petrillo, and a very tough gentleman, is gunning for the Boston orchestra, the only major non-union orchestra in the country. He's been able to drive them from the radio and now they have had to stop making records, though officials of the orchestra claim that they're not too disturbed by either action. The ace up Petrillo's sleeve, however, is that he can order other orchestras not to play in any hall where the Boston orchestra appears. That tremendous power can put quite a crimp not only in the orchestra's schedule and its income, but it will probably set up enough apprehension in the hearts of concert managers that they will think twice before signing up the Bostonians for the 1941 series. Petrillo has said that he would not pull that play this year. Boston supports its own orchestra pretty well and perhaps it might make a go of it in the Hub and at Tanglewood, but we feel we express the hope of most music lovers when we say we hope things never come to that pass.

* * *

Petrillo has also started war on the American Guild of Musical Artists, which is headed by Lawrence Tibbett. Petrillo thinks that instrumentalists like Heiftez, Iturbi, Zimbalist, Spalding, Feuermann and Balokovic should join up with his organization before they are permitted to appear as soloists with orchestras which belong to his union. The comic phase of the battle is that both groups belong to the American Federation of Labor. If Mr Petrillo was struggling along on less than his $46,000 annual income, he'd have gained much more sympathy by now. As it is, the battle is stalemated, though high A. F. L. officials are trying to bring about peace within the family. Tibbett, incidentally, is leading the battle, though his doctor has advised a rest from singing until about Christmas because of some throat ailment.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
OCT 6 - 1940

MUSIC

Carnegie Hall Has Golden Anniversary

Carnegie Hall this year approaches its 50th birthday. With painters and decorators busily engaged in retouching the Hall and its surroundings, plans were announced last week for an extensive all-year observance of the golden anniversary.

When the stately reddish brown building was opened in 1891 it was called, functionally, Music Hall. The guiding personality behind its erection was the eminent industrialist and patron of the arts, the late Andrew Carnegie. Seven years after the dedicatory festival it was decided by the board of directors to rename the hall after its foremost benefactor as a tribute to his foresight, interest and generosity in providing New York with its finest home for concerts.

First as Music Hall and later as Carnegie Hall the building became known as a superb acoustical theater for music. Its particular location at the corner of 7th Ave. and 57th St., moreover, was the reason for New York's music center becoming focused along 57th St., often referred to now as "music row"

Mr. Carnegie was inspired to foster the building of the hall by Walter Damrosch, then the young conductor of the New York Symphony Society Orchestra. It was built primarily to house the rehearsals and concerts of both Dr. Damrosch's Orchestra and the Oratorio Society Chorus, also under his direction. However, its unprecedented acoustical properties immediately revealed its potentialities as a place for recitals. The choice of top-rank artists for their principal American recitals, Carnegie Hall became the goal toward which all younger musicians aspired. Around the hall there grew an aura matched by few of the world's concert auditoriums.

Recalling the rich half century which Carnegie Hall has helped to inscribe in the annals of American culture this year's program will present one of the widest range fares in the hall's history. Many of the famed artists who have been closely associated with the season in the past will appear once again during the golden anniversary season. Damrosch, Barbirolli, Koussevitzky, Toscanini, Walter, Stokowski, Ormandy, Rodzinski, Stock, Hofmann, Rachmaninoff, Horowitz, Serkin, Rubinstein, Cassadesus, Heifetz, Kreisler, Menuhin, Milstein, Spalding, Feuermann, Marian Anderson, Paul Robeson, Kirsten Flagstad, John Charles Thomas, the Oratorio Society Chorus and the Schola Cantorum are among the outstanding musical personalities and organizations who will participate in the festival program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 12 1940

Don't forget to keep "het up" that Petrillo, erstwhile Chicago peanut vender who played a mediocre trumpet in a brass quartet of his organizing and climbed the union bosses' ladder to a $46,000 plus salary, is responsible for a ban upon broadcasting and record-making by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This finest orchestra in the world is not in his union, being content to bow and blow and pound as the best paid (because almost continuously occupied) orchestra in the country.

Symphony's Sixtieth Season Opens Tomorrow

'A London Symphony' Listed; First Time From Koussevitzky

By L. A. Sloper

As the symphony season opens, interesting revivals are foreshadowed for the first two programs. This week, Dr. Koussevitzky is directing for the first time Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony." Next week he will pay a similar honor to Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony.

Both these works were introduced to Boston by Richard Burgin, the assistant conductor. Neither of the composers has seemed hitherto to enjoy the favorable notice of Dr. Koussevitzky. At least he has seldom listed any of their works, and the musical public has deduced from this fact that he was not sympathetic to their art.

But Dr. Koussevitzky has always been exceptionally catholic in his tastes, and he appears to be growing more so. Presumably he has devoted further study to these two composers, and quite possibly has discovered unsuspected beauties in their work. At all events, he is giving evidence of his high sense of responsibility as guide of musical taste in the community by presenting his interpretation of these two works.

* * *

No doubt the timeliness of a tribute to the defense of the British capital was in Dr. Koussevitzky's thought when he decided to produce "A London Symphony." The conductor is keenly aware of world problems. His sympathy with the cause of the democracies is well known. What more appropriate than to begin the sixtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, whose first conductor was Georg Henschel, naturalized British subject, with this musical portrait of London?

From a musical viewpoint, too, the opportunity to hear the "London" Symphony from Dr. Koussevitzky is welcome. Vaughan Williams is a distinguished and a representative British composer. By many he is considered the foremost living composer of Great Britain. The "London" Symphony is one of his most important works, containing, it would seem, endless opportunities for the exercise of Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretive genius.

The symphony is dedicated to the memory of George Butterworth, a young composer of promise, who was killed on Aug. 5, 1916, "after successfully taking an enemy trench at the head of a bombing party." Albert Coates, who introduced the symphony to the United States, wrote a detailed description of the work, which was published in the bulletin of the Symphony Society of New York. According to this account, the music depicts variously the Thames, the Strand, the Adelphi, Bloomsbury, the Temple Embankment, a march of unemployed, finally again the Thames flowing ceaselessly. "Big Ben" and street cries are among the familiar London sounds heard in the symphony.

* * *

Mr. Coates' description apparently has not received the approval of the composer, who has been quoted as saying: "The title might run, 'A Symphony by a Londoner,' that is to say, various sights and sounds of London may have influenced the composer, but it would not be helpful to describe these. The work must succeed or fail as music, and in no other way. Therefore, if the hearers recognize a few suggestions of such things as the Westminster chimes, or the lavender cry, these must be treated as accidents and not essentials of the music."

If Dr. Koussevitzky has evidenced little sympathy for the music of Vaughan Williams, he has displayed less for that of the Soviet composers. Before Shostakovich wrote the Fifth Symphony, he had been both exalted and disgraced by the Stalin Government. Finally he was reinstated in favor.

At the time Mr. Burgin introduced this symphony to Boston (Jan. 22, 1939) the present writer commented as follows on Shostakovich and his work: "Both his talent and the effect of governmental restriction on it are evident in his Fifth Symphony. . . . In this score pages of great beauty stand side by side with pages of rubbish. It is as if Shostakovich had written for a time under the guidance of his own imagination, then suddenly remembered that if he was going to write at all, or at least if his music was to be heard at all, he must celebrate the virtues of communism; whereupon he put in a cheap military march, or a bombastic coda in the manner of Liszt. And he had his reward in the form of official approbation."

But a rehearing of this music under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton may give us quite another impression of it. That has happened to us before, and it would not surprise us if it happened again. It is one of the virtues of Dr. Koussevitzky that he never allows us to sink to fixed conceptions of music.

News of Music

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which begins its 60th season at Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This is Dr. Koussevitsky's 17th season in Boston.

Vaughan Williams Work Opens Season

The Boston Symphony orchestra will open its 60th season in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon under the conductorship of Serge Koussevitzky, who will then begin his 17th consecutive year at the head of the orchestra. Mr. Koussevitzky will open the program with "A London Symphony" by Ralph Vaughan Williams. This symphony is suggestive of its subject by the introduction of such sounds familiar to Londoners as the chimes of Big Ben, and certain street cries. Albert Coates who introduced the symphony to America was more explicit, characterizing the first movement as the Strand in the bustle of morning traffic; the second movement as Bloomsbury at dusk; the third as Saturday night on the Thames Embankment; the fourth as "the crueler aspects of London, the London of the unemployed and unfortunate." The symphony, which has contributed more than any other work to the fame of its composer, has been performed here several times, but not until now under the direction of Koussevitzky. The Fifth Symphony of Beethoven in C minor will complete the program.

The concert will be repeated on Saturday evening, Oct. 12. The shorter series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts will begin on Oct. 28 and 29.

WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
OCT 10 1940

Music Association Season Planned

First Concert, Nov. 7, Will Feature Hortense Monath, Young Pianist

Membership cards have been mailed out to members of the Woonsocket Civic Music association along with an announcement of the first concert, which will be conducted Nov. 7 in the Hotel Blackstone ballroom. Hortense Monath, a brilliant young pianist, will be featured in the first event on the local association's program.

Miss Monath, who is an assistant of Arthur Schnabel, is an American. She studied first in New York and then completed her musical studies in Berlin, returning to this country to make one of her first appearances as solo artist with the Boston Symphony orchestra under Koussevitsky.

The second season, like the first season, will have three concerts. Felix Knight will be heard on Jan. 14 and Ossy Renardy on March 4. Members have been reminded of the change of place, however, for last year's concerts were all staged in the Park theatre, while the 1940-41 series will be presented in the hotel ballroom.

Reciprocity again will be enjoyed. Members have been mailed a schedule of the concerts that have been planned for the associations at Pawtucket-Attleboro (Pawtucket senior high school); Fall River (St. Ann's auditorium; New Bedford (New Bedford high school); Newport (Rogers high school); Waltham (Hovey Memorial Institute; Salem (Empire theatre), and Webster, Mass.

At all of the places mentioned, excepting the Pawtucket senior high school, the membership card for the local association will entitle the member to admission to the concerts. Any members planning to attend Pawtucket-Attleboro offerings may secure admission tickets from Mrs. Ethelbert P. Hebert, secretary of the Woonsocket group.

This Clipping From
ST. LOUIS, MO.
GLOBE-DEMOCRAT
OCT 13 1940

Negro Soprano First on Principia Course

Dorothy Maynor, Negro soprano whose debut last year was one of the major events of the New York music season, will open the Principia concert and lecture course next Friday evening with a recital in Howard Hall.

Two summers ago Miss Maynor, then virtually unknown beyond a small circle interested in Negro music, went to the Berkshire Festival to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Koussevitzky. A friendly festival sponsor persuaded Koussevitzky to grant an audition during a morning rehearsal. Roused to enthusiasm by the musical "find," Koussevitzky invited her to sing the next day at the picnic he gives each year for members of his orchestra, festival artists and critics. When Miss Maynor had finished her impromptu recital, which ranged from Negro spirituals and German lieder through difficult arias by Handel and Mozart and ended with the Wagnerian "Ho-Yo-To" from "Die Walkuere," her reputation was made, for the audience was enthusiastic and went forth to spread her fame.

A brilliant New York debut a few months later was followed by engagements with the Boston Symphony, New York Philharmonic, Chicago and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras and a successful tour of Eastern cities consolidated that success.

THIS CLIPPING FROM SAN MATEO, CALIF.
Times & News Leader
OCT 8 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN
OCT 12 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS
OCT 13 1940

THE WORLD OF MUSIC

NEW YORK, Oct. 8.—(UP)—After a lapse of 26 years, Verdi's opera, "Un Ballo in Maschera," (The Masked Ball) will return to the operatic repertoire here when it is presented on the opening night of the Metropolitan 1940-41 season, December 2.

It was choesn as something fresh to mark the company's first performance in its own house, which it purchased last year with funds raised by public subscription in a $1,000,000 drive. Through radio subscriptions, many people throughout the country feel a proprietary interest in the opera.

"Un Ballo in Maschera" was last revived here in November, 1914, when Arturo Toscanini conducted it at the Metropolitan. It was first presented in this country at the New York Acedemy of Music in 1861.

The Metropolitan's new production will be the first time the opera has been presented here in it original form, as Verdi wrote it. Its premiere performance in Rome in 1859 could be given only after the local censors, over Verdi's vehement protests, insisted on a complete change in the characters and locale of the drama.

Verdi based the opera on a play by Scribe, dealing with the assassination of King Gustav III of Sweden. The Rome censors feared it would displease the royal courts of Europe.

The time of the drama was turned by a century and the scene laid in Boston. King Gustav III became the Earl of Warick, English governor of Boston and all the other characters were changed. The heat and fire of conspiracy surrounding court life in eighteenth century Stockholm was transferred to the stolid athosphere of Puritan New England. The changed version has been followed ever since.

* * *

Just across the river from Manhattan lies music-minded Brooklyn, which is far from being dependent on the main borough for its music. The Brooklyn Institute has announced the most extensive program of concerts, recitals and lecture-recitals to be offered anywhere in the country by on organization. It comprises at least 75 musical events to be held in the Brooklyn Academy of Music between October 16 and next April.

The schedule is headed by a large number of internationally famous artists, including Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Fritz Kreisler, Kirsten Flagstand, the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo, Josef Hofman, Dorothy Maynor, Artur Rubinstein, Percy Grainger, Harold Bauer, Moriz Rosenthal, Alexander Kipnis, Josef Szigeti, the New Yark Philharmonic-Symphony Chamber Orchestra, the Budapest String Quartette, and many others.

Showing that Brooklynites are ready to storm a concert hall as well as a ball park, it was announced a week ago that only 150 seats remained available for subscription sale. The house seats 2207.

This Clipping From
PIQUA, O.
CALL
OCT 12 1940

MUSICALENDAR

Or From "Long Hair" to "Jumping Jive" and Back.

By LOLA HILL

Carnegie Hall, New York, which will be 50 years old next May 5, has set aside the entire season for the celebration of its golden anniversary. The celebration got under way this week with the opening of the 99th season of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, which next season will observe its centenary, the oldest major orchestra in the country. The Philharmonic-Symphony has made its headquarters in Carnegie Hall since the house was built.

Over the years, Carnegie Hall has become a New York and almost a national institution. It is more than an auditorium. It is a center of music and art. Besides the main hall, the big building houses the Chamber Music Hall and the Chapter Room for meeting and lectures. There is a small but impressive art gallery and the 156 studios for musicians and artists. The city's music center has grown up along 57th street in the vicinity, which is known as "music row."

During the anniversary season, many famous artists, who have been closely associated with the hall in the past, will appear there. Among them will be Damrosch, Barbirolli, Koussevitzky, Toscanini, Walter, Stokowski, Ormandy, Rodzinski, Stock, Hofmann, Rachmaninoff, Serkin, Rubinstein, Heifitz, Casadesus, Kreisler, Menuhin, Milstein, Spalding, Feuermann, Marian Anderson, Paul Robeson, Kirsten Flagstad, John Charles Thomas—names to conjure with.

"THE SYMPHONY AT SIXTY

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra begins this week its sixtieth consecutive season. As observance of this anniversary, it has issued a brochure elegantly printed and illustrated with pen drawings of its five most eminent conductors, from Henschel, its first, to Dr. Koussevitzsky, its present; and a notable dynasty they make: Gericke, the polisher; Nikisch, the romantic poet; Muck, the classicist, and Koussevitzsky, the explorer.

"Sixty years ago a resident orchestra of the first rank in America did not exist. The country had to be shown. It was. By 1900 we had six major symphony orchestras; in 1940 we have sixteen, and, in the second rank, two hundred and fifty lesser ones, four-fifths of which have been established since 1919, and one-half of which, slump or no slump, post date 1929. And after six decades of trail-blazing the Boston orchestra is still preeminent.

"It goes on blazing trails. Pops, Esplanade concerts, Berkshire Symphonic Festival, and, in its sixtieth year, the new music school at Tanglewood. So soon as one path has been found, it starts another.

"The great creative epoch of music (from about 1720 to 1920), a period in which masterpieces came tumbling over one another from the brains of composers, was one in which musical form was being elaborated, but performances were often, if not generally, crude. That epoch has now been succeeded by one in which performance of the music is now being elaborated. Bach never heard his B Minor Mass. We can hear it annually—or daily by phonograph. Wagner never heard as good a performance of Tristan as those at the Metropolitan in New York. But in the art of composition, our epoch, with one or two exceptions, is a long way behind the two centuries from 1720 to 1920.

Where we do excel is in performance. This art of interpretation in music is relatively new. It was, of course, always there, but in the background. Bach and Handel were virtuoso organists, but primarily they were composers. The change began among the concert pianists. A hundred years ago, Clara Schumann, then a young girl in braids and muslins, was a strict classicist. In Vienna she heard Liszt. He was a one-man revolution. Flashing eyes and floating hair, 19th-century romanticism had burst the dykes of the formal 18th century. Music had changed its dress from satin and ruffles to the flowing cape and Byronical collar open at the throat.

"At the turn of the present century something similar happened to orchestral conducting. Hitherto the conductor had been secondary to the orchestra; now he began to be an interpretive artist in his own right; like a fine instrumentalist, he not only played the music, he played on the music. Were we today to return to the flawless technical perfection of Gericke's orchestra, or even to the austere classicism of Dr. Muck, it is a question whether, after having grown expectant of Dr. Koussevitzsky's performances that glow like October foliage, we would any longer be quite satisfied with the older style. For the art of conducting, too, has moved forward.

"This epoch of elaborate performance has its perils. Vast as the literature of music is, its masterworks are being subjected to an ordeal of repetition by concert, by radio, and by phonograph such as no other art except architecture, which we see and use daily, has ever been required to endure. How can its charm of novelty survive? Partly in the abiding unexpectedness which is an ingredient of all fine music, and partly in the art of interpretive conducting which recreates anew the music in each performance. Here, again, after sixty years of pioneering, the Boston Symphony Orchestra is still pioneer.

UNCLE DUDLEY.

Boston Globe, C

C.S.M. Oct 12

Symphony Begins New Season

The Arts in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, began its sixtieth season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program read: Vaughan Williams, A London Symphony; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5 in C minor, op. 67. This is Dr. Koussevitzky's seventeenth season here.

The program book noted that in honor of the orchestra's anniversary a collection is being shown in the first balcony gallery, including photographs of conductors and players, and a complete set of the programs.

Since the orchestra now plays virtually 11 months a year, it is unnecessary to stress that it began the new series in mid-season form. The personnel, as forecast recently in this place, is virtually unchanged. Mr. Tortelier, still presumably in France, was missing. His chair at the second desk of cellos was occupied by Mr. Chardon. A new doublebass player has been added. Otherwise no change was observable from the floor. Thus the new season had a beginning auspicious in all respects.

There was both timeliness and musical interest in the performance of the "London" Symphony. As was remarked the other day in these columns, this was the first interpretation of the work by Dr. Koussevitzky. The symphony was first heard here from Mr. Monteux, nearly 20 years ago. It was played again in 1923. Richard Burgin directed it once more, in 1933. He had previously played the composer's "Pastoral" Symphony.

Already, in 1933, this writer found that in the "London" Symphony, "the Thames flowed now less mysteriously, that there was less vigor in the London populace, less gloom and pathos and menace in the air." Yesterday's performance, which was technically brilliant, did not materially alter this impression. Certainly there was no want of vigor in the populace in this presentation; but for all the topicality of the subject, the pathos—despite a careful reading—and the menace — despite some tremendous volumes of sound —did not come through as they did on the first hearing, two decades ago.

No doubt this was due in considerable part to the changes that time brings in music, and in listeners. On this rehearing, the structure of the first movement seemed less impressive than formerly, the "program" a little obvious. The Scherzo appeared yesterday the best integrated of the four movements. The influence of Debussy was more noticeable than formerly.

But everybody present must have felt the tragic impact of the thought of London today, sensed the continuity reflected in the flow of the river, and appreciated the devotion of a conductor who, although he may not find the music congenial, nevertheless paid his tribute to a people. The reception was warm. L. A. S.

This Clipping From
HAYWARD, CALIF.
REVIEW

OCT 8 - 1940

KIMBER ANNOUNCES MUSICAL SCHOLARSHIPS IN MEMORY OF BROTHER KILLED IN 1918 WAR

Announcement was made Tuesday by John E. Kimber, Niles poultry breeder and president of the Southern Alameda County Musical association, of the establishment of several scholarships for the 'cello and other orchestra instruments. The scholarships are given by Mr. Kimber as a memorial to his brother, Lieut. Arthur C. Kimber, who was an American aviator during the World war I, killed in action on the French front in 1918 shortly before the Armistice.

Because Lieutenant Kimber was a fine amateur 'cellist, preference in the scholarships will be given to students of the 'cello, Mr. Kimber announced, although provision also is made for instruction of talented students of the violin, viola and string bass.

Lessons Planned

The scholarship will consist of a series of master lessons by the distinguished 'cellist and violinist, Marsden Brooks of Hayward, who recently came here after an Alaskan visit. Mr. Brooks has played in the New York Symphony orchestra under Walter Damrosch's direction, also in the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck. He also was once a solo 'cellist with Victor Herbert, a great 'cellist as well as composer. Mr. Brooks, who won applause with 'cello numbers played for the recent Musical association banquet, was originally a professional violinist and teaches all stringed instruments.

Students in the five high schools of Southern Alameda County will be eligible for the Kimber scholarships. Elementary school students of outstanding ability also will be eligible, Mr. Kimber said.

Only requirement of those granted the scholarships, he said, will be the ownership or use of an instrument. Lessons may be as frequent as may be warranted in the opinion of Mr. Brooks.

Supplement Schools

The scholarships are intended to supplement the regular instruction in instrumental music already provided by the schools. Students sufficiently advanced also will be given an opportunity to play in a special string ensemble, as well as in the Southern Alameda County Symphony orchestra now being organized, various chamber music groups and in solo concert appearances, Mr. Kimber said.

During the next few days Mr. Brooks will interview students nominated for the scholarships by the high school principals and music instructors, after which their instruction will start. An object of the scholarships, Mr. Kimber said, will be stimulation of serious study by able students and discovery and development of outstanding musical talent.

Rehearsals of the Southern Alameda County chorus began at the high school Monday night under direction of Glenn Woods, and the next is set for Oct. 21.

The first fall orchestra rehearsal is set for Wednesday night at 7:45 o'clock, the second for Wednesday, Oct. 23. The association's band will rehearse Oct. 16 and Oct. 30, under direction of Frank Mancini.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 12 1940

Koussevitzky Opens 60th Season Of BostonSymphony

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky opened the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon by conducting a brilliant and timely program. The concert opened with Vaughan Williams' London Symphony and ended with Beethoven's Fifth.

The two masterpieces, one of English, the other of German music, were given a sensitive and stirring interpretation before an enthusiastic audience, as if to remind us gently that after every war must come peace.

Dr. Koussevitzky throughout the London Symphony made up for incidental weaknesses of structure in the music, particularly in the second Lento movement, by creating and sustaining that mood of love and understanding for London which dominates the Symphony. His conducting enabled even those unfamiliar with London to see and hear, not so much the actual chimes of Big Ben, the street cries of costermonger or lavender seller, or the steady quiet flow of the Thames, as the good humor, noisy rush and stubborn vitality that is London.

Description of London

Specific descriptions of traffic on the Strand, dusk in Bloomsbury, Saturday night on the Temple Embankment, and the London of the jobless, can be assigned to the four movements, but these were not necessary, thanks to the skilled interpretation of the orchestra and its leader. The deep orchestral sonorities of the piece made an effective balance against passages which were really vocal lines from old English folk songs.

In many ways the best movement of the London Symphony is the fourth. Brass and strings here match in a savage duet as if to show the cruelty that runs through city life. The struggle is ended abruptly by the chimes of Big Ben, and then follows the quiet theme that indicates the ceaseless flow of the Thames and which is used to open the first movement. The symphony ends with another series of chimes from Big Ben, but this time the last and resolving chime of the chord is omitted, as if to show that life in the city can never come to a full stop.

Beethoven's Fifth

To the playing of the familiar Beethoven Fifth Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky brought a familiar ease and assurance. The formal, yet impelling vigor of the first movement was stirringly performed. With his gift for unity, he made the "fate knocking at the door" theme an integral phrase in the longer musical sentences of which it is a part.

The broad warmth of melodic variation in the second movement was indicated in a particularly moving fashion. Perhaps orchestra and conductor were at their best in their rendition of the difficult changes of mood in the scherzo. The transitions from the rollicking fugato of the cellos to the mysterious quality which dominates the movement were made in a rare and memorable manner.

One of the dangers of the last movement is that the crashing chords with which it begins can easily make the finale seem only an anti-climax, but Dr. Koussevitzky managed to achieve the almost impossible feat of increasing the triumphant crescendo of the first passage of the movement. His handling of the reintroduction of the ominous theme from the scherzo made the power and joy of the finale all the more noble and commanding.

For its second concert, Oct. 18 and 19, the Boston Symphony will play: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" Mozart's Symphony in E-flat and Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 5. J. A.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

OCT 13 1940

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 13 1940

Out of Town

For their third program of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 13 1940

DANFORTH-DUNBAR

The following Danforth-Dunbar students went to Boston last night, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. Rufus B. Dunbar, to attend the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony Hall: Miss Mary Elizabeth Morton of Chicago, Miss Harriet Kelly of Rochester, N. Y., Miss Helen James of Yalaha, Fla., and Miss Helen Skladzien of Detroit, Mich.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 12 1940

(9)

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, first concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, with the following program:
A London Symphony....Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5, in C minor....Beethoven

Sonorous Splendors

BOSTON, Oct. 11.—And so, in cerulean sunshine and through indescribable splendors of autumnal leafage, to Boston—the Hub of the Universe, the home of the Bean and the Cod. The home, as well, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the finest by all-around criteria of our resident instrumental foundations.

The sixtieth season of its concerts opened this afternoon with Vaughn Williams's "London Symphony." I remember hearing the work nearly twenty years ago in that same Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux conducting. It is the same piece it was then, too, in spite of some cuts operated by the composer. The first two movements are long, episodic, disjointed. The third is short, delicate, neatly sequential, compact, efficacious, charming. The finale is rich and varied. Its musical material is of high quality, its instrumental organization ample and solid. Also, it is not without expressive power. Perhaps one is accustomed to the lengthiness and the slow reflective atmosphere of the symphony by the time one gets to this movement. The improvement in melodic material that manifests itself as the work progresses helps, too. In any case the last two of the symphony's four movements are anything but dull, which the first two are, and more than a little.

Making a program out of only that and Beethoven, out of one live Englishman and one dead German, classic and great though he be, is an obvious reference to current events and sympathies. The reference might have turned out in its effect to be not nearly so gracious as in its intention, had those last two movements of the "London Symphony" not been in themselves so impressive, the finale so moving and deeply somber. It was written in 1913, I believe. It might have been written last month, so actual is its expressive content.

The Vaughan Williams symphony served also as a vehicle for a display of orchestral virtuosity on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men such as few orchestras are capable of offering their subscribers. Not that the piece itself is of any great difficulty; it is only reasonably hard to play, I imagine, but the Boston organization is in such fine fettle after its Berkshire season that every passage, any passage, no matter what, serves as a pretext for those constant miracles of precision and of exact equilibrium that a first-class modern orchestra is capable of.

Musically considered, these refinements are more of a delight in themselves than a help of any kind to the work played. They rather tend, especially in the fine moulding and rounding off of phrases, to interrupt the music's continuity, to give it an exaggerated emphasis all over that tends to obliterate any real emphasis or meaning that the score may imply. Only the toughest of the classics and the most glittery of the moderns can satisfactorily resist that kind of polish in execution.

* * *

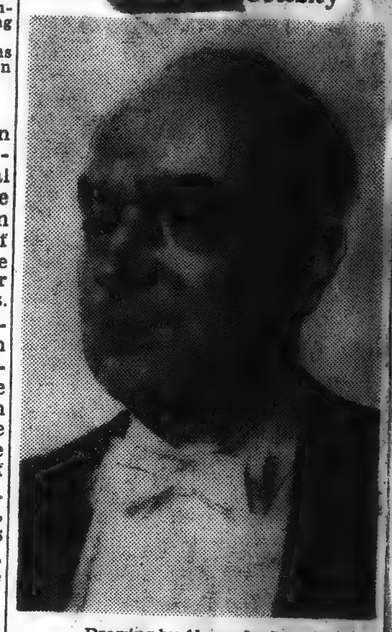
The Beethoven fifth symphony resists it quite satisfactorily, indeed. Dr. Koussevitzky, be it said to his credit, doesn't try to get away with too much careful modeling, either. Rather he puts his effort into a rhythmic exactitude that adds to Beethoven's dynamism a kind of monumental weight that is appropriate and good. When he tries to achieve more of that weight by forcing the strings beyond their optimum sonority, the result is not so good. The sound that comes out is less loud and less weighty than that which would have come out if the point of maximum resonance had not been surpassed.

All instrumentalists know this and conductors, of course, know too when they are calm enough to remember it. But at the back of every conductor's mind is a desire to make his orchestra produce a louder noise than any one else's orchestra can produce, a really majestic noise, a Niagara Falls of sound. Sometimes in the course of nearly every concert this desire overpowers him. You can tell when it is coming on by the way he goes into a brief convulsion at that point. The convulsion is useful to the conductor, because it prevents his hearing what the orchestra really sounds like while his fit is on. But if you watch carefully from the house you will usually find that the sound provoked out of a group of exacerbated musicians by any gesture of the convulsive type is less accurate in pitch and less sonorous in decibels than a more objectively conducted fortissimo.

* * *

It may seem graceless on my part to mention here a fault almost no conductor is free of and imply by so doing that there is something particularly regrettable about Dr. Koussevitzky's sharing it. I do mean to imply exactly that, however, because somewhere, some time, some conductor must get around to doing some serious work on the orchestral fortissimo comparable to the work that has already produced from our orchestras such delights of delicacy. And I think it not unfair to suggest that perhaps our finest instrumental ensembles might be just the groups to profit most by such an effort; that maybe it is even their duty to do something about correcting the inefficiency that comes from being over-strenuous.

Serge Koussevitzky



Drawing by Alexandre Iacovleff

Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its sixtieth season yesterday

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
RADIO DAILY

OCT 11 1940

Agency Execs Like Classics As Compared To [illegible]

Business leaders, including agency executives, prefer the "better class of music to swing," the vast majority preferring classical music and only five per cent listing popular music as their favorite, according to the results of a poll just completed by the "Concert Program Magazine." The results, which appear to shatter some legends about the "tired business man's" entertainment tastes, came after 2,000 questionnaires had been sent to "leading industrialists and advertising agency heads in all parts of the country." Twelve musical questions were asked and they revealed, it was stated, that 75 per cent of those who answered "prefer classical music, 20 per cent all music, and five per cent liked popular music best."

Major concert halls and music centers were visited regularly by 80 per cent of those responding. Detailed analysis of the replies reveals that the American business executive listens to the Philharmonic or Boston Symphony Orchestras, the Goldman Band, the Hall Johnson Choir, the Wallenstein Sinfonietta and Fred Waring's musical radio group in that order.

Goes For Wagner

When he goes to the opera his choice is "Tristan" over "Carmen," "Butterfly" or "Aida." In musical comedy his tastes run to plays like "Show Boat," or the operettas of Victor Herbert and Gilbert and Sullivan.

Flagstad and Tibbett are first choice in vocalists, with Marian Anderson, John Charles Thomas and Kate Smith next in preference. Jascha Heifetz and Josef Hofmann are favored instrumentalists, with Menuhin, Gieseking, Kreisler and Rachmaninoff next in order.

The personal musical habits of the "tired business man" reveal that fully one third of those answering play an instrument or sing. Nine per cent declared a participating interest in folk dancing and ballet.

CSM. Oct 12

Symphony B... Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, began its sixtieth season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program read: Vaughan Williams, A London Symphony; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5 in C minor, op. 67. This is Dr. Koussevitzky's seventeenth season here.

The program book noted that in honor of the orchestra's anniversary a collection is being shown in the first balcony gallery, including photographs of conductors and players, and a complete set of the programs.

Since the orchestra now plays virtually 11 months a year, it is unnecessary to stress that it began the new series in mid-season form. The personnel, as forecast recently in this place, is virtually unchanged. Mr. Tortelier, still presumably in France, was missing. His chair at the second desk of cellos was occupied by Mr. Chardon. A new doublebass player has been added. Otherwise no change was observable from the floor. Thus the new season had a beginning auspicious in all respects.

There was both timeliness and musical interest in the performance of the "London" Symphony. As was remarked the other day in these columns, this was the first interpretation of the work by Dr. Koussevitzky. The symphony was first heard here from Mr. Monteux, nearly 20 years ago. It was played again in 1923. Richard Burgin directed it once more, in 1933. He had previously played the composer's "Pastoral" Symphony.

Already, in 1933, this writer found that in the "London" Symphony, "the Thames flowed now less mysteriously, that there was less vigor in the London populace, less gloom and pathos and menace in the air." Yesterday's performance, which was technically brilliant, did not materially alter this impression. Certainly there was no want of vigor in the populace in this presentation; but for all the topicality of the subject, the pathos—despite a careful reading—and the menace—despite some tremendous volumes of sound—did not come through as they did on the first hearing, two decades ago.

The Arts in Boston

No doubt this was due in considerable part to the changes that time brings in music, and in listeners. On this rehearing, the structure of the first movement seemed less impressive than formerly, the "program" a little obvious. The Scherzo appeared yesterday the best integrated of the four movements. The influence of Debussy was more noticeable than formerly.

But everybody present must have felt the tragic impact of the thought of London today, sensed the continuity reflected in the flow of the river, and appreciated the devotion of a conductor who, although he may not find the music congenial, nevertheless paid his tribute to a people. The reception was warm.

L. A. S.

This Clipping From
HAYWARD, CALIF.
REVIEW

OCT 8 - 1940

KIMBER ANNOUNCES MUSICAL SCHOLARSHIPS IN MEMORY OF BROTHER KILLED IN 1918 WAR

Announcement was made Tuesday by John E. Kimber, Niles poultry breeder and president of the Southern Alameda County Musical association, of the establishment of several scholarships for the 'cello and other orchestra instruments. The scholarships are given by Mr. Kimber as a memorial to his brother, Lieut. Arthur C. Kimber, who was an American aviator during the World war I, killed in action on the French front in 1918 shortly before the Armistice.

Because Lieutenant Kimber was a fine amateur 'cellist, preference in the scholarships will be given to students of the 'cello, Mr. Kimber announced, although provision also is made for instruction of talented students of the violin, viola and string bass.

Lessons Planned

The scholarship will consist of a series of master lessons by the distinguished 'cellist and violinist, Marsden Brooks of Hayward, who recently came here after an Alaskan visit. Mr. Brooks has played in the New York Symphony orchestra under Walter Damrosch's direction, also in the Boston Symphony orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck. He also was once a solo 'cellist with Victor Herbert, a great 'cellist as well as composer. Mr. Brooks, who won applause with 'cello numbers played for the recent Musical association banquet, was originally a professional violinist and teaches all stringed instruments.

Students in the five high schools of Southern Alameda County will be eligible for the Kimber scholarships. Elementary school students of outstanding ability also will be eligible, Mr. Kimber said.

Only requirement of those granted the scholarships, he said, will be the ownership or use of an instrument. Lessons may be as frequent as may be warranted in the opinion of Mr. Brooks.

Supplement Schools

The scholarships are intended to supplement the regular instruction in instrumental music already provided by the schools. Students sufficiently advanced also will be given an opportunity to play in a special string ensemble, as well as in the Southern Alameda County Symphony orchestra now being organized, various chamber music groups and in solo concert appearances, Mr. Kimber said.

During the next few days Mr. Brooks will interview students nominated for the scholarships by the high school principals and music instructors, after which their instruction will start. An object of the scholarships, Mr. Kimber said, will be stimulation of serious study by able students and discovery and development of outstanding musical talent.

Rehearsals of the Southern Alameda County chorus began at the high school Monday night under direction of Glean Woods, and the next is set for Oct. 21.

The first fall orchestra rehearsal is set for Wednesday night at 7:45 o'clock, the second for Wednesday, Oct. 23. The association's band will rehearse Oct. 16 and Oct. 30, under direction of Frank Mancini.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

OCT 12 1940

Koussevitzky Opens 60th Season Of Boston Symphony

Special to The Hartford Times

Boston—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky opened the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon by conducting a brilliant and timely program. The concert opened with Vaughan Williams' London Symphony and ended with Beethoven's Fifth.

The two masterpieces, one of English, the other of German music, were given a sensitive and stirring interpretation before an enthusiastic audience, as if to remind us gently that after every war must come peace.

Dr. Koussevitzky throughout the London Symphony made up for incidental weaknesses of structure in the music, particularly in the second Lento movement, by creating and sustaining that mood of love and understanding for London which dominates the Symphony. His conducting enabled even those unfamiliar with London to see and hear, not so much the actual chimes of Big Ben, the street cries of costermonger or lavender seller, or the steady quiet flow of the Thames, as the good humor, noisy rush and stubborn vitality that is London.

Description of London

Specific descriptions of traffic on the Strand, dusk in Bloomsbury, Saturday night on the Temple Embankment, and the London of the jobless, can be assigned to the four movements, but these were not necessary, thanks to the skilled interpretation of the orchestra and its leader. The deep orchestral sonorities of the piece made an effective balance against passages which were really vocal lines from old English folk songs.

In many ways the best movement of the London Symphony is the fourth. Brass and strings here match in a savage duet as if to show the cruelty that runs through city life. The struggle is ended abruptly by the chimes of Big Ben, and then follows the quiet theme that indicates the ceaseless flow of the Thames, and which is used to open the first movement. The symphony ends with another series of chimes from Big Ben, but this time the last and resolving chime of the chord is omitted, as if to show that life in the city can never [illegible]

Beethoven's Fifth

To the playing of the familiar Beethoven Fifth Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky brought a familiar ease and assurance. The formal, yet impelling vigor of the first movement was stirringly performed. With his gift for unity, he made the "fate knocking at the door" theme an integral phrase in the longer musical sentences of which it is a part.

The broad warmth of melodic variation in the second movement was indicated in a particularly moving fashion. Perhaps orchestra and conductor were at their best in their rendition of the difficult changes of mood in the scherzo. The transitions from the rollicking fugato of the cellos to the mysterious quality which dominates the movement were made in a rare and memorable manner.

One of the dangers of the last movement is that the crashing chords with which it begins can easily make the finale seem only an anti-climax, but Dr. Koussevitzky managed to achieve the almost impossible feat of increasing the triumphant crescendo of the first passage of the movement. His handling of the reintroduction of the ominous theme from the scherzo made the power and joy of the finale all the more noble and commanding.

For its second concert, Oct. 18 and 19, the Boston Symphony will play: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" Mozart's Symphony in E flat and Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 5. J. A.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

OCT 13 1940

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

OCT 13 1940

Out of Town

For their third program of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Mozart's symphony in E flat major and Shostakovitch's fifth symphony.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

OCT 13 1940

DANFORTH-DUNBAR

The following Danforth-Dunbar students went to Boston last night, chaperoned by Mr. and Mrs. Rufus B. Dunbar, to attend the Boston Symphony concert in Symphony [illegible] Mary Elizabeth Morton of Chicago, Miss Harriet Kelly of [illegible]ester, N. Y., Miss Helen James [illegible]na, Fla., and Miss Helen [illegible]n of Detroit, Mich.

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, first concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, Boston, with the following program:
A London Symphony....Vaughan Williams
Symphony No. 5, in C minor....Beethoven

Sonorous Splendors

BOSTON, Oct. 11.—And so, in cerulean sunshine and through indescribable splendors of autumnal leafage, to Boston—the Hub of the Universe, the home of the Bean and the Cod. The home, as well, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the finest by all-around criteria of our resident instrumental foundations.

The sixtieth season of its concerts opened this afternoon with Vaughn Williams's "London Symphony." I remember hearing the work nearly twenty years ago in that same Symphony Hall, Pierre Monteux conducting. It is the same piece it was then, too, in spite of some cuts operated by the composer. The first two movements are long, episodic, disjointed. The third is short, delicate, neatly sequential, compact, efficacious, charming. The finale is rich and varied. Its musical material is of high quality, its instrumental organization ample and solid. Also, it is not without expressive power. Perhaps one is accustomed to the lengthiness and the slow reflective atmosphere of the symphony by the time one gets to this movement. The improvement in melodic material that manifests itself as the work progresses helps, too. In any case the last two of the symphony's four movements are anything but dull, which the first two are, and more than a little.

Making a program out of only that and Beethoven, out of one live Englishman and one dead German, classic and great though he be, is an obvious reference to current events and sympathies. The reference might have turned out in its effect to be not nearly so gracious as in its intention, had those last two movements of the "London Symphony" not been in themselves so impressive, the finale so moving and deeply somber. It was written in 1913, I believe. It might have been written last month, so actual is its expressive content.

The Vaughan Williams symphony served also as a vehicle for a display of orchestral virtuosity on the part of Dr. Koussevitzky and his men such as few orchestras are capable of offering their subscribers. Not that the piece itself is of any great difficulty; it is only reasonably hard to play, I imagine, but the Boston organization is in such fine fettle after its Berkshire season that every passage, any passage, no matter what, serves as a pretext for those constant miracles of precision and of exact equilibrium that a first-class modern orchestra is capable of.

Musically considered, these refinements are more of a delight in themselves than a help of any kind to the work played. They rather tend, especially in the fine moulding and rounding off of phrases, to interrupt the music's continuity, to give it an exaggerated emphasis all over that tends to obliterate any real emphasis or meaning that the score may imply. Only the toughest of the classics and the most glittery of the moderns can satisfactorily resist that kind of polish in execution.

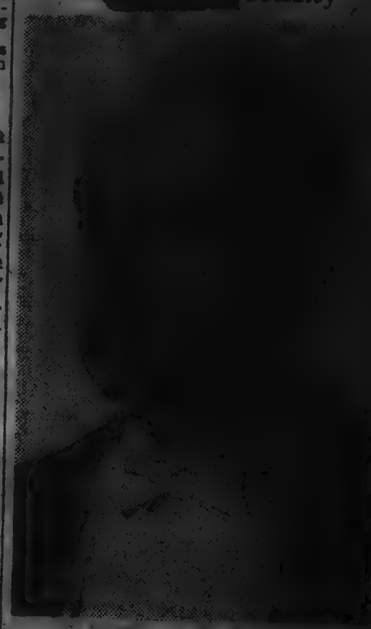
The Beethoven fifth symphony resists it quite satisfactorily, indeed. Dr. Koussevitzky, be it said to his credit, doesn't try to get away with too much careful modeling, either. Rather he puts his effort into a rhythmic exactitude that adds to Beethoven's dynamism a kind of monumental weight that is appropriate and good. When he tries to achieve more of that weight by forcing the strings beyond their optimum sonority, the result is not so good. The sound that comes out is less loud and less weighty than that which would have come out if the point of maximum resonance had not been surpassed.

All instrumentalists know this and conductors, of course, know too when they are calm enough to remember it. But at the back of every conductor's mind is a desire to make his orchestra produce a louder noise than any one else's orchestra can produce, a really majestic noise, a Niagara Falls of sound. Sometimes in the course of nearly every concert this desire overpowers him. You can tell when it is coming on by the way he goes into a brief convulsion at that point. The convulsion is useful to the conductor, because it prevents his hearing what the orchestra really sounds like while his fit is on. But if you watch carefully from the house you will usually find that the sound provoked out of a group of exacerbated musicians by any gesture of the convulsive type is less accurate in pitch and less sonorous in decibels than a more objectively conducted fortissimo.

* * *

It may seem graceless on my part to mention here a fault almost no conductor is free of and imply by so doing that there is something particularly regrettable about Dr. Koussevitzky's sharing it. I do mean to imply exactly that, however, because somewhere, some time, some conductor must get around to doing some serious work on the orchestral fortissimo comparable to the work that has already produced from our orchestras such delights of delicacy. And I think it not unfair to suggest that perhaps our finest instrumental ensembles might be just the groups to profit most by such an effort; that maybe it is even their duty to do something about correcting the inefficiency that comes from being over-strenuous.

Serge Koussevitzky



Drawing by Alexandre Iacovleff
Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opened its sixtieth season yesterday

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
RADIO DAILY

OCT 11 1940

Agency Execs Like Classics As Compared To Swing Music

Business leaders, including agency executives, prefer the "better class of music to swing," the vast majority preferring classical music and only five per cent listing popular music as their favorite, according to the results of a poll just completed by the "Concert Program Magazine." The results, which appear to shatter some legends about the "tired business man's" entertainment tastes, came after 2,000 questionnaires had been sent to "leading industrialists and advertising agency heads in all parts of the country." Twelve musical questions were asked and they revealed, it was stated, that 75 per cent of those who answered "prefer classical music, 20 per cent all music, and five per cent liked popular music best."

Major concert halls and music centers were visited regularly by 80 per cent of those responding. Detailed analysis of the replies reveals that the

Railroad In Studio

Chicago—"Carnation Contented Hour," sound effects man wore conductor's cap while problem of recreating [illegible]

Flagstad and Tibbett are first choice in vocalists, with Marian Anderson, John Charles Thomas and Kate Smith next in preference. Jascha Heifetz and Josef Hofmann are favored instrumentalists, with Menuhin, Gieseking, Kreisler and Rachmaninoff next in order.

The personal musical habits of the "tired business man" reveal that fully one third of those answering play an instrument or sing. Nine per cent declared a participating interest in folk dancing and ballet.

This Clipping From PORTLAND, OREGON
OREGON JOURNAL

OCT 13 1940

Carnegie Hall's Anniversary Noted

Mecca for Rising Young Artist Plans Observance of Erection 50 Years Ago

By Susie Aubrey Smith

Carnegie Hall, New York's finest home for concerts and American musical mecca for rising young artists, will be 50 years old May 5, 1941. Rather than set aside just one day for commemorative events, it has been decided to celebrate with a golden anniversary season during 1940 and 1941. From the East comes a special story of the planned observance, which will offer one of the widest ranges of musical fares in the hall's entire history.

Andrew Carnegie Guiding Personality

From the story sent by Arthur W. Hepner, publicity director for the hall, come these interesting excerpts: "When the stately reddish brown building was opened in 1891, it was called . . . Music Hall. The guiding personality behind its erection was the industrialist and patron of the arts, the late Andrew Carnegie. Seven years after the dedicatory festival, it was decided to rename the hall after its foremost benefactor. . . .

"First as Music Hall and later as Carnegie Hall, the building became known as a superb acoustical theatre for music. Its particular location at the corner of 7th avenue and 57th street was raison d'etre for New York's music center becoming focused along 57th street, often referred to now as 'music row.'

"Mr. Carnegie was inspired to foster the erection of the hall by Walter Damrosch, then young conductor of the New York Symphone Society orchestra.

"Recalling the rich half century which Carnegie Hall has helped to inscribe in the annals of American culture . . . many of the artists who have been closely associated with the hall in the past will appear again during the golden anniversary season. Damrosch, Koussevitzky, Toscanini, Walter, Stokowski, Ormandy Rodzinski, Stock, Hofmann, Rachmaninoff, Horowitz, Rubinstein, Heifetz, Kreisler, Milstein, Spalding, John Charles Thomas, the Oratorio Society chorus and the Schola Cantorum are among the outstanding personalities and organizations who will participate in the festive programs. (Also Barbirolli, Serkin, Cassadesus, Menuhin, Marian Anderson, Paul Robeson, Kirsten Flagstad).

"A long list of orchestral concerts is headed by the annual series of the ((New York) Philharmonic-Symphony, National Orchestral association, Boston symphony and Philadelphia orchestra."

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL

OCT 13 1940

Noted Wisconsin Composer, Kreutz, to Conduct Here

ARTHUR KREUTZ, La Crosse (Wis.) composer and conductor will share honors with Jan Peerce the tenor, at the opening concert of the fifth winter series of the Wisconsin symphony orchestra, a unit of the works projects administration at the Milwaukee Auditorium next Sunday at 3 p. m.

Mr. Kreutz will conduct his symphony in three movements, called "Music for Symphony Orchestra," with which he won the Prix de Rome award last spring. The term of the award, which was endowed by the late Frederic A. Juilliard, is two years. It began Oct. 1, and its estimated value is $4,000. Normally, the winner would study at the American Academy in Rome and would travel six months each year. Because of European conditions, Mr. Kreutz had the option of deferring his fellowship, or fulfilling it in America. He chose to continue his studies at teacher's college, Columbia university.

A native of La Crosse, he received a bachelor of science degree in engineering at the University of Wisconsin in 1930, and in 1935 won a bachelor of music degree at the same university. He also received a master's degree at Columbia university last year. Several years ago, he won a first prize in Belgium for violin playing.

He has also participated in numerous concerts and recitals in Wisconsin cities, including one with the Wisconsin symphony orchestra in Milwaukee in 1937. He has appeared with Koussevitzky and Ormandy, has made recordings of his compositions and was one time a pupil of Roy Harris, American composer.

Excepting for the Kreutz composition, the orchestra will be conducted by Dr. Sigfrid Prager.

This Clipping From SAN DIEGO, CAL.
UNION

OCT 13 1940

Mrs. Bok Gives Funds For Opera Theater

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Boston symphony conductor and director of Berkshire Music center, Tanglewood, Mass., recently announced the gift of $10,000 from Mrs. Mary Louise Curtis Bok, to build an opera theater at Tanglewood and a hall for chamber music concerts.

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

OCT 13 1940

The World Of Music

NEW YORK, Oct. 12 (UP).—Carnegie Hall, which will be 50 years old next May 5, has set aside this entire season for the celebration of its golden anniversary.

The celebration got under way this week with the opening of the 99th season of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony orchestra, which next season will observe its centenary, the oldest major orchestra in the country.

The Philharmonic-Symphony has made its headquarters in Carnegie Hall since the house was built.

Over the years, Carnegie Hall has become a New York and almost a national institution. It is more than an auditorium. It is a center of music and art. Besides the main hall, the big building houses the Chamber Music Hall and the Chapter Room for meetings and lectures. There is a small but impressive art gallery and 155 studios for musicians and artists. The city's music center has grown up along 57th street in the vicinity, which is known as "music row."

During the anniversary season, many famous artists, who have been closely associated with the hall in the past, will appear there. Among them will be Damrosch, Barbirolli, Koussevitzky, Toscanini, Walter, Stokowski, Ormandy, Rodzinski, Stock, Hofmann, Rachmaninoff, Horowitz, Serkin, Rubinstein, Cassadesus, Heifetz, Kreisler, Menuhin, Milstein, Spalding, Feuermann, Marian Anderson, Paul Robeson, Kirsten Flagstad, John Charles Thomas, the Oratorio Society Chorus and the Schola Cantorum.

In addition to the Philharmonic-Symphony, orchestras to be heard will include the Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago and Cleveland orchestras; the National Symphony of Washington, the N. B. C. Symphony under Toscanini, the New Friends of Music, the New York Orchestra, and the National Orchestral Association.

Beginning with a composite photograph of the original group of players under Georg Henschel, set against the heroic statue of Beethoven and the immense organ of the old Music Hall, photographs trace the changes and developments of the orchestra through the 60 years of its growth. A collection of programs shows the history of the program book from its one-sheet beginning to its present form.

The collection from which these memorabilia have been chosen has grown from year to year, partly through the natural accretion of official records, but also through the generosity of friends of the orchestra who from time to time have contributed either as loans or as gifts scrap books, programs, photographs and clippings.

This Clipping From
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

OCT 13 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

OCT 14 1940

Symphony Hall Filled for 60th Opening

Koussevitzky Cheered —Historical Display In Gallery

Not a seat was empty in Symphony Hall, Friday and Saturday, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, opened the orchestra's 60th season. At both concerts, the audience stood and cheered and applauded when the conductor stepped to the podium. On the program were Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony" and Beethoven's symphony No. 5.

This week's program will include the much discussed Symphony No. 5 by Shostakovitch.

In celebration of the orchestra's 60th anniversary, a collection relating to its history is being shown in the first balcony gallery. Photographs of its conductors are to be seen and of the orchestra under them, in different periods, both in the Boston Music Hall and in Symphony Hall.

THIS CLIPPING FROM GREENFIELD, MASS.
RECORDER-GAZETTE

OCT 14 1940

Music for Everybody

Up and down the Connecticut valley, as over the hills in Berkshire and for all we know generally through the land, music seems to be coming out of hot houses and to thrive in common garden soil.

Time was when the more accomplished professional artists and companies made extended concert tours that were very successful financially. The public took its music from them with pleasure, but with a feeling that it was an exotic art not found in themselves nor in their neighbors. The radio has cut heavily into the concert tour possibilities even while it increased the audiences for those broadcasting.

This switch of the professional from stage to microphone perhaps opened space for growth of more indigenous musical organizations. Some of the top professionals, barred from radio like Serge Koussevitzky and his Boston Symphony, encourage this trend by planting themselves as examples and instructors in a bucolic summer setting far from their sophisticated urban background of the winter. The people, thousands of them, not only enjoyed the Berkshire Festival concerts this summer but were inspired to create more music about them.

The Pioneer Valley Symphony orchestra is one manifestation of this new idea of music. It centers in Greenfield but it is not as unique as we supposed a year ago for similar movements are afoot in Vermont and Connecticut and from eastern Massachusetts far out into the wilds of Michigan. It is music made by those who like to make it, although only a few of them at other times seek livelihood from it. It is music heard by those who like music, not simply by those hoping culture may be reflected from a famous personage.

Based on its initial success last winter and with the impetus given last week by the eloquent Stanley Chapple, the Pioneer Symphony seems headed for an even greater season. Its founder and conductor, Harold Leslie, has meanwhile been employed to lead another venture into humanizing music. The Brattleboro Vt., town recreation department and the Woman's club have combined to invite him to give in that town a series of 11 related lectures and demonstrations looking toward appreciation of music.

If Chapple, a conductor and composer, is at all right in contending that every person is born with an instinct for music requiring only development and if existing large number of music lovers are right in contending it is among their more valuable experiences, then these current developments will make life better and more interesting for those in this valley.

Post Oct 13

THEY MIXED MUSIC AND POLITICS

THE NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

By WARREN STOREY SMITH

PRESUMABLY the most gifted and certainly the most renowned of the Russian composers who have come to maturity under the Soviet regime is 34-year-old Dmitri Shostakovitch. Before he was 20 he had composed a symphony so striking and individual that, in spite of certain obvious defects, it has won for itself a place in the repertory. After this, young Mr. Shostakovitch went Communist in his music, and his next symphonies celebrated certain epochal dates in the Revolutionary calendar. In his next phase, however, he was writing such works as the scandalous opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," and a ballet, "Limpid Stream," which went counter to the artistic conservatism that seems to be inseparable from political radicalism—witness the banning of Hindemith's music by the Third Reich.

For a time, then, our hero was in bad odor with the Russian government but he redeemed himself with a Fifth Symphony that was free from "bourgeois" tendencies (or full of them, if you care to look at it that way.) In Russia enthusiasm knew no bounds. The lost sheep had returned to the fold.

Two years ago Mr. Burgin introduced this Fifth Symphony to Boston, having already done similar service to the First. Now Dr. Koussevitzky, making his initial venture into the music of Shostakovitch, will conduct the piece at this week's pair of Symphony Concerts. How will it impress on a second hearing and at the hands of the conductor-in-chief?

For basis of comparison there is herewith appended the opinion registered in the Post at that time: "Whether the almost arrogant simplicity of this Symphony was dictated by contrition or conformity will probably never be known. In any event, the piece was widely hailed in Russia, and it seemed to please the audience of yesterday. When so much modern music is harsh, arbitrarily complex and anything but melodious, it is almost ungrateful to suggest that the Shostakovitch work—a few spirited pages and affecting episodes aside—is vapid and wishy-washy."

* * * *

Another and quite different Russian composer, Alexander Gretchaninov, has recently come to New York with the intention of settling there. While he does not complain of his treatment by the Soviets, this pupil of Rimsky-Korsakov says that he can no longer stomach the mixing of art and politics. Born in 1864, Gretchaninov is the last surviving member of what may be called the second generation of Russian nationalist composers. His more prominent colleagues, some of them long deceased, were Arensky, Liadov, Glazounov and Ippolitov-Ivanov.

Although he is now at work on his Sixth Symphony and has written other compositions of large dimensions, including two operas, Gretchaninov is best known for his church music and his songs. One of the latter, "Over the Steppe" is destined to long endure. A recording of it is now available. Of the orchestral and chamber works, this reviewer, who has been about musically quite a bit, can recall hearing only one, a charming Trio for piano, violin and 'cello, and that in semi-private performance. In an interview published in last Sunday's New York Times Mr. Gretchaninov said that while he understood the music of Stravinsky, Prokofieff and Shostakovitch he did not compose as they did, but remained faithful to the musical manner of his earlier years.

In March, 1929, Mr. Gretchaninov appeared in Jordan Hall. The occasion was a recital by his fellow-countrywoman, Nino Koshetz. The second half of Mme. Koshetz's programme was devoted to Mr. Gretchaninov's songs for which he himself provided the accompaniment. The Post described him thus: "A man of medium build and stature, with brownish hair and beard, distinctly a Slav of the intellectual, visionary type. A composer who plays rather than a pianist who composes, Mr. Gretchaninov nevertheless proved himself a wholly satisfactory performer of his own music."

To return to Dr. Koussevitzky's programme, the Shostakovitch Symphony will be preceded on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening by a pair of classics, Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Mozart's Symphony in E-flat major.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

By JULES WOLFFERS

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Its Current Season

CONDUCTOR

Serge Koussevitzky, who this week opens the Boston Symphony's sixtieth season. This will be the noted leader's 17th year in Boston.

Concert Master

RICHARD BURGIN
Assistant conductor and concert master of the orchestra.

Pops Leader

ARTHUR FIEDLER
Who will conduct the Pops and Esplanade concerts.

HARRY ELLIS DICKSON
Violinist

SAMUEL SEINIGER
Violinist

JEAN BEDETTI
Noted first cellist of the orchestra.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

OCT 16 1940

The Boston Symphony.

Participation of the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Berkshire Festival, to say nothing of such summer activities as the Pops and the Esplanade concerts, brought the ensemble back to Symphony Hall last week in fine fettle for the opening of the regular season. That is one advantage of the extended activities of the orchestra. There is just enough leeway between times for the relaxation that every artist needs but not so much as to induce what we call a let-down. The result last week was glowing performances of Vaughn Williams' London Symphony and the classic Fifth of Beethoven. The ensemble is practically unchanged since last season. A new double bass has joined and Mr. Tortellier of the second desk among the 'cellists is still detained somewhere in France. For the time being Mr. Chardon is taking his place.

On the program for this week's concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening are the Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" by Gluck; Mozart's E flat major Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the latter of which will give an opportunity for the first time to hear Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of it. When last presented in Boston, as we recall it, Mr. Burgin held the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOWELL, MICH
PRESS
10/16/40

Ann Arbor, Oct. 15 - Negro spirituals, operatic airs, and songs, will make up the program with which Marian Anderson will inaugurate the 62nd University of Michigan Choral Union Concert Series on the evening of October 23rd, according to Charles A. Sink, president of the University Musical Society. Other concerts in the series will be given by Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Don Cossack Chorus; New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; Richard Bonelli, baritone; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra; Budapest String Quartet; and Georges Enesco, violinist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR

OCT 15 1940

Defauw and Elman Next Tuesday

The first concert in the series presented by the "Concerts Symphoniques des Montreal" will take place next Tuesday, October 22nd, at Plateau Hall. The occasion will bring together two of the greatest personalities in the world of contemporary music.

Desire Defauw, the eminent Belgian conductor, with whom Montreal became acquainted at the last concert on the Mountain, will conduct the orchestra. M. Defauw who made a sensational American debut with Toscanini's N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra last year, has been re-engaged with the same orchestra, and has also been chosen by Koussevitsky to conduct a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after his Montreal appearances. Mischa Elman will be the soloist. He started his amazing career as a boy-prodigy some twenty-five years ago, and his name has become to music lovers in the five continents, a synonym of virtuosity and richness of tone.

...se Wisely . . .

MR. HOME-BUYER

...ying a home is an important step in any-...e's life. It should be taken under the ...st possible conditions. Here is the best ...mbination to insure the protection of ...ur interests.

A GOOD BUILDER — plus
F. H. A. INSURANCE — plus
A DIME SAVINGS BANK OF BROOKLYN MORTGAGE

Let us tell you about this home buyer's team. Write or phone TRiangle 5-3200 for your copy of "Five Ways to Borrow Mortgage Money." We lend money on property in parts of Kings, Queens and Nassau Counties. F.H.A. Insured Mortgages at prevailing rates.

The Dime Savings Bank of Brooklyn
Fulton Street and De Kalb Avenue
Bensonhurst: 86th Street and 19th Avenue
Flatbush: Avenue J and Coney Island Avenue
BROOKLYN, NEW YORK

VISIT OUR AIR-CONDITIONED SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

TUNE IN WMCA "AT THE TOP OF THE DIAL" MON-WED-FRI-6:25 P.M.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 16 1940

The Boston Symphony.

Participation of the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Berkshire Festival, to say nothing of such summer activities as the Pops and the Esplanade concerts, brought the ensemble back to Symphony Hall last week in fine fettle for the opening of the regular season. That is one advantage of the extended activities of the orchestra. There is just enough leeway between times for the relaxation that every artist needs but not so much as to induce what we call a let-down. The result last week was glowing performances of Vaughn Williams' London Symphony and the classic Fifth of Beethoven. The ensemble is practically unchanged since last season. A new double bass has joined and Mr. Tortellier of the second desk among the 'cellists is still detained somewhere in France. For the time being Mr. Chardon is taking his place.

On the program for this week's concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening are the Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" by Gluck; Mozart's E flat major Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the latter of which will give an opportunity for the first time to hear Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of it. When last presented in Boston, as we recall it, Mr. Burgin held the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOWELL, MICH
PRESS
10/16/40

Ann Arbor, Oct. 15 - Negro spirituals, operatic airs, and songs, will make up the program with which Marian Anderson will inaugurate the 62nd University of Michigan Choral Union Concert Series on the evening of October 23rd, according to Charles A. Sink, president of the University Musical Society. Other concerts in the series will be given by Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Don Cossack Chorus; New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; Richard Bonelli, baritone; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra; Budapest String Quartet; and Georges Enesco, violinist.

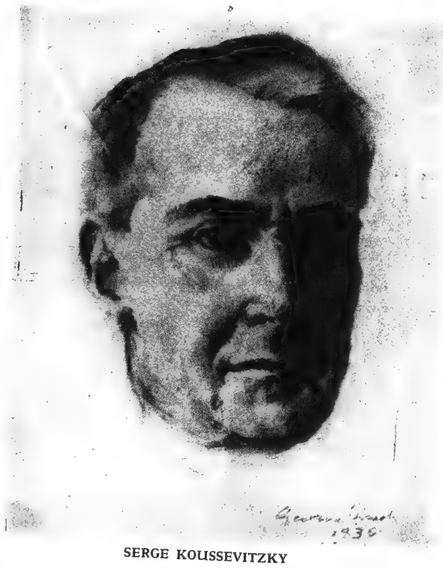
THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
OCT 15 1940

efauw and Elman ext Tuesday

The first concert in the series sented by the "Concerts Symoniques des Montreal" will take ce next Tuesday, October 22nd, Plateau Hall. The occasion will ing together two of the greatest rsonalities in the world of conmporary music.

Desire Defauw, the eminent Belan conductor, with whom Montal became acquainted at the last ncert on the Mountain, will conct the orchestra. M. Defauw who ade a sensational American de- with Toscanini's N.B.C. Symony Orchestra last year, has been engaged with the same orchestra, has also been chosen by Koussitzky to conduct a series of conrts with the Boston Symphony chestra, after his Montreal apearances. Mischa Elman will be soloist. He started his amazing reer as a boy-prodigy some enty-five years ago, and his me has become to music lovers the five continents, a synonym of rtuosity and richness ...

SKETCH BOOK: BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

INDIVIDUAL MUSICIANS MAKE UP AN ORCHESTRA, BUT ONLY when they blend into one playing unit have they the right to greatness. The Boston Symphony Orchestra meets this test. Since its founding, the orchestra has been known for its excellent performances. Its members are distinguished not merely for separate virtuosity; they possess the spirit of true ensemble musicianship. When Henry Lee Higginson founded the organization in 1881, his plans called for sixty selected musicians; for concerts that should be short rather than long; and for a conductor who "was to have the sole artistic direction of everything. . . . In my opinion, nothing but constant, steady, intelligent playing and rehearsing under one conductor and one conductor alone would make the orchestra good."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has grown to almost twice its original size and scope. Since 1924, the orchestra has found in Dr. Serge Koussevitzky a permanent conductor who has extended its reputation until many deem it unmatched anywhere in musical performance. This season Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra return to the Institute for their annual series of five concerts, the first of which takes place Friday evening, November 22.

On this page are reproduced charcoal sketches of leading members of the orchestra. Each musician sat for the artist, Gerome Brush, in the little room in Symphony Hall that houses the Casadesus Collection. Each played a solo for Mr. Brush in order to avoid any trace of self-consciousness.

RICHARD BURGIN
Concert-master

JEAN LEFRANC
Viola

JEAN BEDETTI
Violincello

GEORGES MOLEUX
Double Bass

JULIUS THEODOROWICZ
Second Concert-master

BERNARD ZIGHERA
Harp

FERNAND GILLET
Oboe

GEORGES LAURENT
Flute

VICTOR POLATSCHEK
Clarinet

GEORGES MAGER
Trumpet

JACOB RAICHMAN
Trombone

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Concert Master

[redacted]

Tel Aviv might be a target for Italian bombers, not because of military importance, of which it has none, but for terrorization. The reply of the Palestine Government to the expert's warnings about danger to civilians in Tel Aviv, Haifa and elsewhere, and the need for a Government program of protection for the population, was given by one of the highest civilian officials, Edward Keith-Roach, District Commissioner of Jerusalem. He said: "God helps those who help themselves."

No anti-aircraft guns were installed in Tel Aviv, and apparently there are still none there. Strange still, there is no word of a single British plane opposing the raiders, although a major military airfield is within a few minutes' flight.

One wonders what the British people and the world at large would say if the Nazis winging over London encountered no balloon barrage, no anti-aircraft fire, no defending fighter planes.

And there is something more. The raid took place on September 9. It was reported in a British military communique in Cairo on the 10th, and the whole world knew about it from the British and Italian wireless that day. But messages from newspaper correspondents in Palestine itself were held up by the censor there, and were not released until September 11.

If you were the chief of censorship in a country at war and the enemy carried out a wanton [illegible] enemy [illegible] prevent the cafes and cinemas from being filled nightly, and the dancers at Cafe Rehavia and Talpiot and Cafe Europe tread on each other's heels as closely as in normal times.

"Habimah's premiere this week was a great success; so was the first performance in Palestine of Ernest Bloch's oratorio, 'Avodath Hakodesh.'

"The press still reports new economic developments, including the registration in the past month of new industrial and commercial enterprises representing a total investment of over L.P.100,000 ($400,000). And my tailor has just phoned to inform me that he has some smart new summer suitings.

"After the initial shock of Italy's entry, there was almost a feeling of relief that now at least we know where we stand. It's not a very pleasant standing, but at least it's firmly defined.

"The Food Controller has told us what we've enough of, and of what we'll be short; the latter includes butter, fish and all kinds of tinned stuff and preserves. (Here the censor has inked out two lines.) And, of course, we are still accessible to the outside world from the east.

"Our old friends are still as rancorous, malevolent, impossible or charming respectively—all in the names yourself—as of yore. Tempers are somewhat more exacerbated, and faces rather more haggard.

"Rumors abound, and make the correspondent's life harder

Common knowledge in Palestine is the attitude of one of the highest ranking officials who told a Jewish business man: "I don't like to encourage Jewish business because that encourages Jewish labor, and I don't like to encourage Jewish labor because that encourages Jewish immigration, and I don't like to encourage Jewish immigration because I don't like Jews."

That man, and others of his stripe, still hold their posts in war-beleaguered Palestine. Their viewpoint, at best, can hardly be consistent with readiness to struggle to the death against Nazism; at worst, it might produce actual treachery. The handling of the Palestinian censorship in the war has unquestionably been such that a good case could be made for the thesis that it is helping the enemy and not Britain. The same thing can be said of the protection of civilians against air raids, particularly in view of the fact that experience has shown that reassuring arrangements to prevent panic are as essential an element of defense as guns and planes.

The Churchill Government apparently has been making a real effort to ferret out elements that may undermine the united determination of Britons to defend their freedom and democracy. It might not be a bad idea for them to take a good, sharp look into

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 16 1940

The Boston Symphony.

Participation of the musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Berkshire Festival, to say nothing of such summer activities as the Pops and the Esplanade concerts, brought the ensemble back to Symphony Hall last week in fine fettle for the opening of the regular season. That is one advantage of the extended activities of the orchestra. There is just enough leeway between times for the relaxation that every artist needs but not so much as to induce what we call a let-down. The result last week was glowing performances of Vaughn Williams' London Symphony and the classic Fifth of Beethoven. The ensemble is practically unchanged since last season. A new double bass has joined and Mr. Tortellier of the second desk among the 'cellists is still detained somewhere in France. For the time being Mr. Chardon is taking his place.

On the program for this week's concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening are the Overture to "Iphigenie en Aulide" by Gluck; Mozart's E flat major Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch, the latter of which will give an opportunity for the first time to hear Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of it. When last presented in Boston, as we recall it, Mr. Burgin held the baton.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOWELL, MICH
PRESS
10/16/40

Ann Arbor, Oct. 15 - Negro spirituals, operatic airs, and songs, will make up the program with which Marian Anderson will inaugurate the 62nd University of Michigan Choral Union Concert Series on the evening of October 23rd, according to Charles A. Sink, president of the University Musical Society. Other concerts in the series will be given by Rudolf Serkin, pianist; Don Cossack Chorus; New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra; Richard Bonelli, baritone; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Vladimir Horowitz, pianist; Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra; Budapest String Quartet; and Georges Enesco, violinist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTREAL, CANADA
STAR
OCT 15 1940

Defauw and Elman Next Tuesday

The first concert in the series presented by the "Concerts Symphoniques des Montreal" will take place next Tuesday, October 22nd, at Plateau Hall. The occasion will bring together two of the greatest personalities in the world of contemporary music.

Desire Defauw, the eminent Belgian conductor, with whom Montreal became acquainted at the last concert on the Mountain, will conduct the orchestra. M. Defauw who made a sensational American debut with Toscanini's N.B.C. Symphony Orchestra last year, has been re-engaged with the same orchestra, and has also been chosen by Koussevitsky to conduct a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, after his Montreal appearances. Mischa Elman will be the soloist. He started his amazing career as a boy-prodigy some twenty-five years ago, and his name has become to music lovers in the five continents, a synonym of virtuosity and richness

Choose Wisely . . .

MR. HOME-BUYER

Buying a home is an important step in anyone's life. It should be taken under the best possible conditions. Here is the best combination to insure the protection of your interests.

A GOOD BUILDER — plus
F. H. A. INSURANCE — plus
A DIME SAVINGS BANK OF BROOKLYN MORTGAGE

Let us tell you about this home buyer's team. Write or phone TRiangle 5-3200 for your copy of "Five Ways to Borrow Mortgage Money." We lend money on property in parts of Kings, Queens and Nassau Counties. F.H.A. Insured Mortgages at prevailing rates.

The Dime Savings Bank of Brooklyn

Fulton Street and De Kalb Avenue
Bensonhurst: 86th Street and 19th Avenue
Flatbush: Avenue J and Coney Island Avenue

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK

VISIT OUR AIR-CONDITIONED SAFE DEPOSIT VAULT

TUNE IN WMCA "AT THE TOP OF THE DIAL" MON-WED-FRI-6:25 P.M.

Symphony Opening

Trans. Oct. 12

Koussevitzky and Players Welcomed Home And Boston Season Is Officially Opened

By EDWARD DOWNES

With a traditionally conservative program, but one nevertheless eloquent of the hour, Serge Koussevitzky opened the sixtieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. As Dr. Koussevitzky approached the conductor's stand, the entire hall rose to receive him with an ovation which combined anticipatory excitement and affection for an old friend. "A London Symphony" by the contemporary Englishman, Vaughan Williams, and the Fifth Symphony in C minor of that still greater contemporary, Ludwig van Beethoven, officially launched the Boston musical season.

Reunited after a relatively short vacation which followed the Berkshire Festival, the orchestra played with the sensitive response, much of the technical precision and the tonal glamour which have won it its unrivaled position.

Vaughan Williams' "London Symphony," which falls so poignantly upon the ear today—and we may be forgiven if extra-musical thoughts play their part here—was written a quarter of a century ago, before London had dreamed of even such comparatively harmless air-raids as those of the first World War. There is no opera which preserves for us the spirit of pre-war London as legendary Vienna survives in the Strauss-Hofmannthal "Rosenkavalier" or the Paris of 1900 lives on in Charpentier's "Louise."

The "London Symphony" may be as near as we shall come to such a work. But the composer has warned that in spite of his use of the Lavender Cry and the chimes of Big Ben, his music is not to be taken literally or pictorially. It must stand as pure music, he says. However you take it the symphony contains real flights of imagination, passages of deep emotion.

Among the strongest are the quiet, almost impressionalistic moments: Bloomsbury at dusk (in the second movement), the sudden descent of the fog (in the third) and the epilog to the fourth, portraying the enigmatic soul of Father Thames. These are also the moments of greatest originality. The delicacy of Koussevitsky's orchestral palette and his air for creating atmosphere contributed much. At the conclusion, after the bells of Big Ben have died away, there was a long moment of complete silence before the spell was finally broken by applause.

On the other hand the Saturday night rejoicing of the Cockney slums is anaemic and convincing while the march of the unemployed of the last movement proper is unimaginative. The march theme itself is commonplace and only at its climax does the movement attain anything like the intensity of feeling its subject suggests.

In spite of the composer's warning against too literal interpretations, the English conductor, Albert Coates, issued a long and detailed itinerary for the listener, which makes strange reading today. Its descriptions of the various quarters of London are all too reminiscent of settings into which bombs are now falling — which makes the rather macabre impression of a prematurely printed obituary. It is better to follow the composer's advice and listen only to the spirit of London itself—a spirit which has meant many things through the ages and which today means a courage and a faith which command the respect of all mankind.

Curiously enough this spirit is expressed more directly and emphatically in the C minor Symphony of Beethoven, a symphony full of the violence of the Napoleon-hater, by a passionate democrat and a gallant fighter to the last, who, when a thunderstorm passed over his deathbed, shook his clenched fist in defiance at the sky as he died. There is much of tenderness in this symphony too, and it was in the quieter second and third movements that Koussevitzky and his men were at their finest. Particularly graceful in line and rich in subtle shadings were the variations of the second movement. The last movement unfolded at the broadest tempo we had heard.

This program will be repeated tonight in Symphony Hall and Thursday evening in Sanders Theater, Cambridge. The program for next week's Friday-Saturday concerts lists the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenie en Aulide," Mozart's E flat major Symphony and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Inaugurates Its 60th Season

Post Oct 12

An elderly lady who sat next to me in Boston's Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon got herself in a genteel dither as Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra prepared to sound the 60th season's opening notes. She leaned over and exclaimed: "Isn't it wonderful to see them again?"

You could have taken a quick Gallup poll of the audience and tabulated a unanimous agreement with my friend. It was, indeed, good to see the beloved maestro and his men, looking tanned and healthy, ready to begin another season after their summer success at Tanglewood. And it was good to realize that a fine orchestra, really a national institution, could exist for 60 years in spite of war and revolution, creating beauty in a world sorely needing it.

For this first occasion, Dr. Koussevitzky exercised his gift for program making and offered Vaughn Williams's "London" symphony, followed by the Beethoven fifth.

No season could have had a better start than the performance of the "London" symphony, a work 28 years old and yet strangely neglected, not heard in Boston since 1933. Whether taken as absolute music, which Williams intended, or as an impressionistic extended tone poem, the score is a rich, satisfying experience.

Probably most of yesterday's audience leaned to the sentimental side and accepted the music as a series of pictures, poignantly evocative of a London that may never be again. You could hear that London echoing in every page of the score—Big Ben striking, slum noises of a Saturday night, a concertina, a hurdy-gurdy, an old street fiddler, the lavender cry. Forever lost.

It must be noted that in the performance of this difficult work, the Boston orchestra exhibited nearly mid-season form. The brass was splendid, the strings incisive, the entire ensemble flexible and responsive.

After intermission, everybody relaxed and settled down to familiar music. No extended comment is necessary on either Beethoven's music or Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of it except to note that with the good, gray maestro at the helm, you hear Beethoven and no nonsense about it. The symphony completed a perfect afternoon.

The customary opening day audience of dowagers, debutantes and other music lovers welcomed the orchestra ardently and made noises indicating approval of what was played.

J. T.

60th Season of Boston Symphony

SYMPHONY OPENS 60TH MUSIC YEAR

Herald Oct 12

William's "London" Given Expressive Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With a program born of world conditions Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra inaugurated yesterday afternoon that organization's 60th season and the conductor's 17th. Ralph Vaughan William's "London" Symphony, which had not been heard here since the fall of 1933, and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, of fate and final triumph, completed it.

FITTING CONDITIONS

Although this last previous performance or "A London Symphony" came within Dr. Koussevitzky's reign at Symphony Hall, it was Richard Burgin who directed it and its repetition on Saturday evening. Indeed, Dr. Koussevitzky had never before turned his attention to the piece and might never have done so had not London's present plight so pointedly suggested the revival of a work prompted in every measure by some phase or other of that unhappy city.

Anyway, it is an ill wind that bloweth no one good. Yesterday London's distress ministered indirectly to the pleasure and satisfaction of those—and they must have been many—who found the performance a deeply affecting experience.

Hearer Builds Own Story

Unquestionably, the work is more London than symphony and, paradoxically speaking, leans very heavily upon the programme which its composer was disinclined to give it. That programme, possibly in too much realistic detail, was later supplied by Albert Coates, and it is difficult to believe that the composer was not consulted; that the Thames, the Strand, the Adelphi, Bloomsbury and the rest are merely fanciful and arbitrary suggestions on Mr. Coates' part. The music bears out his programme much too well.

Yesterday, however, some of us perforce constructed a programme of our own. The London we heard was not wholly the late Edwardian London of Vaughan Williams' imaginings or the London of poignant personal memories, but the London now suffering under the savage blows of those who would utterly destroy it. Parts of the music, such as the agonizing opening of the last movement, and the subsequent so-called "Hunger March," allegedly inspired by "the crueler aspects of London, the London of the unemployed and unfortunate," might have had their origin in the horrors of the present.

Impressive Performance

The performance was an impressive one, moving in expression and often unbelievably eloquent and beautiful as sheer sound. And the perfect tribute to the piece, and the playing of it, came not in the applause that twice returned Dr. Koussevitzky to the stage but in the silence which for a time fell upon all concerned, when the music died in the soft chiming of Big Ben, with the last tone of that familiar sequence purposely unheard.

For those to whom this music, whether directly or indirectly, had meant so much the Fifth Symphony constituted a rather rude return to musical reality. The performance, to which Dr. Koussevitzky gave all that he had—gave perhaps, more than the music required—aroused some enthusiasm though one cannot record an ovation. Except for the very young and the very old, or the musically inexperienced, the Fifth Symphony has lost its punch.

Herald Oct 12

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The first concert of the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows.

A London Symphony....Vaughan Williams
Symphony, No. 5 in C minor Op. 67 Beethoven

It was a stroke of genius on Dr. Koussevitzky's part to start off the season with Vaughan Williams' London Symphony. Because of our sentiments just now regarding the havoc that is being wrought in one of the world's most beautiful cities there was added emotion in our response to this particular symphony. When the clamor of the orchestral voices was at length silenced and the chimes sounded from afar we will wages that there was not a dry eye in the audience.

Even without the feelings aroused by current events, Vaughan Williams' London Symphony is an impressive work. Its quality is very English and its title is certainly appropriate. Just how we instinctively that this symphony is English to the core is hard to explain. The shape of a phrase, a rhythm or tune or particular harmonic twist, these perhaps, if analyzed and pointed out, might give us the answer. For most of us it is sufficient that here is beautiful music that definitely evokes for us the spirit of the English capital.

The ending of hte symphony is a marvelous capturnig of an effect. After the splendid, brazen climax what could have been better than this hushed stillness. It is, if you like, on the sentimental side, but in such an evocative work this mood not only could not but also should not have been avoided. Another remarkable feature of this symphony is the sustained beauty of the slow movement and the skill of the composer working with such simple material. The scherzo, delightful in its way, is more commonplace, more what anyone would expect.

The London Symphony can hardly have been very familiar to most of yesterday's audience. We can forget a lot of music in the course of seven years. If we recalled it agreeably, though, we could not have been prepared for the positively shattering effect which Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation and the orchestra's playing brought about. It was an extraodinarily eloquent performance and reminded us forcibly, in case we tsood in any need of it, of the prowess of the Boston Symphony.

We shall own that ofr us the performance of Beethoven's 5th Symphony, which followed, was something of an anti-climax. That is one of the tribulations of listening constantly to music and was in no way due to any lack of care in the performance. On the contrary Mr. Koussevitzky recreated the music with great clarity and vigor. Let us hope that it glowed for most of the audience with all the magic of hearing it for the first time.

The Boston Symphony is now entering its 60th year and Mr. Koussevitzky his 17th as its leader. His record speaks for itself. The orchestra is the finest in the world today, and its concerts are consistently interesting. There is nothing stodgy about the performances or the variety of music chosen. On the other hand we do not get eccentric interpretations and exhibitions of temperament. And this high standard is due in the long run—a run of 16 years or more than a quarter of the orchestra's ristory—to the conductor. When the audience and the orchestra rose to greet Mr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon the gesture should not have been perfunctory. We all owe him a tremendous debt of gratitude; and if standing at the beginning of the season is the only way we can show our thanks, by all means let us stand with a will.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the following program: Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Mozart's Symphony in E flat major, K 543; Shostakovitch's Symphony No. ', Op. 47.

London Symphony Features Opening of Boston Season

Koussevitzky Directs Superb Performance of Williams' Work

Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony entered another season of concert-giving at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. When the small, graceful, energetic and faultlessly tailored man emerged to open his 17th year as conductor, what happened was familiar and ritualistic. The audience rose and applauded enthusiastically; Mr. Koussevitzky smiled and ascended the stand, shook the hand of concert-master Richard Burgin, bowed again and again, and finally with his usual gesture bade listeners and players be seated. So began the 60th season of the greatest orchestra.

That Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony" was the first number indicates more than artistic significance. One may assume its performance was at once recognition of a masterly score and of what has happened to London these past few months. Last Winter Mr. Koussevitzky paid a similar tribute, during the Russo-Finnish war, by playing that hymn of racial strength, Sibelius' "Finlandia."

Splendid Orchestration

On purely musical grounds, too, "A London Symphony" was long due for revival. It was last heard at Symphony Hall in 1933, Mr. Burgin conducting. This week's performances are the first Mr. Koussevitzky has given the work in Boston, and they also observe for the first time in this city the third revision Vaughan Williams made to his score. The revision is said to be mostly cuts, largely in the finale.

"A London Symphony" is the sort of music best heard two or three times before a militant opinion is ventured. Not that it is abstruse or hard to grasp, but there is so much atmosphere that one is apt to put it down as a vaguely pleasant sort of tone painting with a good many loud pages. This reviewer, on first acquaintance with the Symphony in 1933, made just that mistake.

Yesterday it seemed quite different, and what was most impressive was the solid musical fabric, the skillful writing, ingenious harmony and splendid orchestration. While Vaughan Williams intended no literal pictures of London, one cannot escape an undeniable flavor of locality.

There is no harm, accordingly, in following the outline of Albert Coates, who introduced the Symphony to the United States, who found the introduction symbolic of the placid Thames, who found the bustling Strand in the first allegro. Bloomsbury at dusk in the slow movement, a Saturday night on the Thames Embankment in the scherzo, and the London poor in part of the finale.

Beethoven's Fifth

By the time Vaughan Williams has built up the majestic finale, one senses more than just local atmosphere. Then you are aware of the immensity of a great old city, of its vast stream of human history. Perhaps the scherzo and the finale are the finest movements of all. Somehow they seem to go deeper than the rest, although certain pages like the hushed introduction and much of the slow movement are remarkable music.

In the scherzo are odd and faint suggestions of Ravel, specifically of "Le Tombeau de Couperin." It will not do to explain them on the ground that Vaughan Williams as a young man was a pupil of Ravel, and perhaps was influenced by him as late as the writing of "A London Symphony." If there are Ravellian echoes, no doubt they just happened. A masterly touch was giving the quotation of the notes of the Westminster Chimes to a solo harp, producing an effect of distance.

Mr. Koussevitzky's reading must surely have done complete justice to the Symphony. Splendor and intensity went together, as they did in Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, which came after intermission as the one other number of the program. Indeed, a more taut or stirring performance of Beethoven's perennial masterpiece, is hardly imaginable.

The depth and clear beauty of the Boston Symphony tone again was thrilling. So were the collective skill and precision. Not without good reason is the Boston Symphony called the greatest orchestra.

Next week the program assembles the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia In Aulis," the E-flat Symphony (K 543) by Mozart, and Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony.

C. W. D.

Orchestra Is Opened with 'London Symphony'

13

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRADFORD, PA.
ERA

1940

Geraldine Farrar Says Modern Music Is Noise and Cacophony, Swing Ghastly

By MILTON MARMOR

Newark, N.J., Oct. 14.—(AP)—The grand lady leans forward, her eyes sparkle, but she smiles sadly as she speaks of a grand era that is gone and of the cacophony that is the music of today.

Geraldine Farrar, America's contribution to the golden age of music, of Caruso and Schumann-Heink, gives an interview in her hotel suite.

"Yes, music will survive the brutality of war which has hampered, has retarded, but never has crippled the creative urge. There is an inner something that persists despite persecution, despite suffering and migration."

"The music of today?" someone asks.

"Music is not made today."

"There is marvelous mechanism, but it is all noise and cacophony. x x x I wouldn't know where one could find a Bizet, a Gounod, a Debussy or a Puccini today."

Blames Mechanics

Miss Farrar sees the mechanistic age with its accelerated tempo, its noise and its great utilitarian benefits as the reason for the emptiness in the modern world of great creative music and art.

Only in a return to plain, hard work and not from synthetic, fabricated fame can there be a resurgence of the "aristocratic genius of the great century of art in whose tail-end I had the great fortune to live," she observes.

In the music world, she says, there were three carry-overs from a glorious yesteryear; conductor Aruro Toscanini, violinist Fritz Kreisler and pianist Serge Rachmaninoff. "They are three superb artists in the tradition of the aristocracy of art."

Of the Metropolitan Opera company, in which she was one of the brilliant stars, Miss Farrar says she derives pleasure in listening to Lily Pons, Kirsten Flagstad or to Kerstin Thorsberg, but "they are surrounded by very unfortunate examples of the vocal art."

Not Happy About Place

No, she is not happy about the old place these days.

"Do you know anywhere where there is a Caruso, a Lehmann or a Schumann-Heink? May I suggest that the present crop of vocalists should learn their trade the hard work way. You don't become opera singers synthetically and out of large headlines."

Igor Stravinsky, Serge Prokopieff and the others of the modern music school ((Sibelius is of the old world) do not appeal to her. "I don't care for that type of calculated noise."

She tells how she was wont to "suffer through Stravinsky" at a Boston symphony concert because [redacted] has the "good taste to put Brahms last and I could go home in the proper Christian spirit of good will."

"Why do people with machine minds want to make music? A great many people are permitted to think they have talent when they should be told to seek another field and vocation."

Glad She's Apart

Then, with a sigh:

"Personally, I am very glad I am not a singer at this moment. If I were 30 years younger I might be a part of what is wrong with music today."

She reflects:

"People were not engaged in the 'Met' in other days who did not know their trade. Today they are."

A week with the opera star of today—in the eyes of Miss Farrar:

Monday, a role at the opera; Tuesday, a plane trip and a concert in Chicago; Wednesday, Hollywood and a guest appearance on the radio with Bing Crosby; Thursday, another hurried plane trip and a concert in Dallas; and so on. "In one week six mental disturbances."

In other days, Miss Farrar recalls, if Monday's performance did not suit the artist, he or she knew that Thursday's would be better because he or she worked to make it so.

Thinks Swing Ghastly

On the subject of "swinging the classics":

"It's ghastly, this stealing of music; it's nauseating. There ought to be a law."

But, in all this there is a cheering note: the remarkable recordings of great artists for all to hear. She tells how the great Enrico Caruso blazed the way on the phonograph.

"He didn't want to; he was afraid. We all were afraid. "How he tore his hair when he heard his voice. He never was satisfied. Ah, but this voice was wonderful, even on those old recording machines."

THIS CLIPPING FROM KENOSHA, WIS.
NEWS

OCT 16 1940

Richard Cerzwonky to Lead Kenosha Civic Orchestra

Services of Internationally Known Conductor, Violinist, and Composer Obtained by Local Board and Officers; Rehearsals to Begin at 7:30 P. M. Thursday

Richard Czerwonky, conductor, violinist, and composer of international reputation, will serve as director of the Kenosha Civic Orchestra.

This announcement was made today by G. M. Phelan, director of the city department of public recreation, under whose supervision the orchestra is being reorganized after having been discontinued for more than a year. First rehearsals will be in the Kenosha Historical and Art museum tomorrow evening at 7:30 o'clock.

Cards were sent out this morning by the recreation department to prospective members of the orchestra. All musicians in Kenosha who are interested in participating in the organization, whether or not they received a card, are welcome to attend Thursday's rehearsal.

Newly-elected officers and other members of the board of directors, who have been working for several weeks on reorganization of the orchestra, feel extremely fortunate in obtaining the services of Richard Czerwonky, and they are hopeful that under the direction of his capable leadership, the Kenosha Civic Orchestra will become an outstanding musical unit.

Ot the present time on the faculty of De Paul university school of music, Chicago, Mr. Czerwonky is perhaps best known in Kenosha as conductor of the Chicago Philharmonic Orchestra which played in the Grant Park summer series in 1936 and 1937. His fame went out over the air in broadcasts from Grant Park.

Before Mr. Czerwonky became a naturalized American citizen in 1915, he achieved honors in Germany and other countries of Europe where he became known as a brilliant violinist. He served as assistant concertmaster of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1907 and was for ten years concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra. He was instrumental in organizing the unique Woman's Symphony Orchestra of Chicago and was its conductor for two years.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
DISPATCH
OCT 17 1940

Famed Conductor Realizes Dream Of Three Decades

Establishes School of Music In Berkshire Hills.

STOCKBRIDGE, MASS., OCT. 17.—A dream of three decades was fulfilled by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Back in pre-war Russia, Dr. Koussevitzky wanted a school of music in Moscow. But the Red revolution forced the postponement of this idea and Dr. Koussevitzky came to America.

The stock market crash of 1929 wiped out the second attempt started in White Plains, N. Y.

Now, three decades later—in another war year—Dr. Koussevitzky has his dream school, located in the Berkshire hills.

340 Students Attend

Chiefly, the music center is unusual because of its teaching plan and the caliber of its teachers.

Here, 340 students have as their general director Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony, called the finest orchestra the world has ever known.

Dr. Kossevitzky believed his school should be divided to give intensive training to musicians of first grade intending to make a life work of it. About a third of the student body is in that class. So he tailored the course of study to fit.

Five of the advanced students he has accepted for personal coaching in the art of conducting. Dr. Herbert Graf has a small theater of his own in which 20 pupils are coached in the art of operatic interpretation. Aaron Copland and Paul Hindemith head a class in the study of composition. G. Wallace Woodworth teaches a class in choral conductifng.

Other classes: Advance orchestra, chorus of 200 voices, lectures, chamber music classes—even dancing.

Boston Society Attends Opening of 60th Season of Symphony Concerts

THE BOSTON HERALD, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1940

Audience Fills Symphony Hall In Welcome to Dr. Koussevitzky

Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, Mrs. Allan Forbes, Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld Are Noted

By ALISON ARNOLD

Boston's winter social season began officially yesterday with the opening of the 60th season of Symphony concerts. From now on until spring, Friday afternoons will be steadfastly reserved for these concerts. The huge audience that filled Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon followed the gracious tradition of rising in one vast body to greet Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor. Poignantly appropriate, with London so strongly in the minds and hearts of us all these days, was Ralph Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," during which one felt the very soul of the big city with the mighty Thames flowing calm and silent through the fog. Also on the program was Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor.

Again this year, as in the past, there was that same air of restrained excitement at this opening of Symphony. Everywhere greetings were exchanged as friend met friend after the long summer. Corsages bloomed on many a shoulder, and smart fall tweeds vied in popularity with furs and silks. Particularly chic in her favorite black and white was Mrs. Robert Treat Paine, who wore with her costume a sumptuous silver fox cape. Mrs. Charles Goddard Weld wore with her black ensemble a pearl choker and pearl and diamond earrings, and in her snowy coiffure a brilliant comb sparkled.

Chatting together in the foyer during the intermission were Mrs. S. Huntington Wolcott, Mrs. J. Gardner Bradley and Mrs. Robert H. Stevenson. Nearby we glimpsed Mrs. Allan Forbes, perky black and white wings on her hat, discussing the concert with Mrs. Guido Perera, in black, her hat banded with rose. Mrs. Forbes' sister, Mrs. Daniel A. de Mesnal, also wore black.

Although there were many in the audience who have hardly missed a concert in 50 years, the younger generation was also well represented. Miss Elizabeth Sears, debutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Francis P. Sears, who topped her black frock with a fur jacket, stopped to greet three North Shore post-debutantes, Miss Cynthia Sortwell, Miss Pauline McKean and Miss Diana Bird, the latter in a black wool suit and gold hoop earrings, her pompadour most becoming.

Mrs. Edward MacNichol, Jr. (Anne Ayer) wore a becoming taupe frock and Miss Ethel Febiger contrasted her black frock with a coat of Lilac red. Also wearing a red jacket with her black frock was Miss Dorothy Gannett. Miss Joan Lawson, subdebutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lawson of Salem, wore smart tweeds. Miss Josephine Murray attended with her aunt, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr.; Miss Elizabeth Jenney wore with her black frock an off-the-face hat of black beaver, white gloves and a string of pearls.

There were many mothers and daughters present. With Mrs. John T. Bottomley was her debutante daughter, Miss May Bottomley, and with Mrs. Fuller Halsey, in a striking purple ensemble, was her pretty daughter, Miss Hope Halsey, in brown. Mrs. Phister Cowin had with her her daughter, Miss Jean Cowin, and attending together were Mrs. Edmund Sears Kelley and Mrs. I. Alexander Vance (Jane Kelley).

Mrs. William Stanley Parker's tailored suit was brightened by a scarf of gay Roman stripes, and Mrs. Ronald T. Lyman wore with her black coat a colorful striped turban. Mrs. John E. Yerxa wore sables with her brown suit and Mrs. John Moseley Abbot chose for the occasion a suit of cinnamon brown and an off-the-face hat. With her black gown which had a fringed skirt, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt wore a mink cape.

Still others we noted were Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller, Miss Barbara Bremer, Mrs. William Morris Hunt (Rosamond Pier), Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. William B. Long, Mrs. Alexander Stelnert, Mrs. Samuel J. Newman, Mrs. Paul F. Clark, Miss Jean Ciark, Mrs. J. Brooks Fenno, Jr., Miss Olive Perry, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Horatio Lamb, Miss Louise Sargent, Mrs. Frank Sawtell, Mrs. Horace G. Arnold, Miss Jane Megrew, Mrs. Sidney Conrad, Mrs. Adolph Leeds, Mrs. Frank Allen, Mrs. C. Nichols Greene, Miss Jeannie Robinson, Miss Mary Woodberry, Mrs. Henry N. Pratt, Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Miss Constance Learned, Miss Ernestine Hills and Mrs. Edward Harding.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION
OCT 18 1940

Berkshire Festival Meeting Reflects Success of Concerts

Gertrude Smith Re-elected President; 1941 Membership Lists Already Closed

STOCKBRIDGE, Oct. 17—Miss Gertrude Robinson Smith of Stockbridge and New York was re-elected president; Norval H. Busey, Jr. of Lee and New York, vice-president; Henry W. Dwight of Stockbridge, treasurer; and George W. Edman of Pittsfield, clerk, at the annual meeting of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc. today.

Trustees Elected

The following trustees were elected to the board to serve for three years: Mrs. Carlos de Heredia of Lenox and New York, Mrs. John B. Lloyd of Lee, Mrs. Elizabeth C. T. Miller of Stockbridge and New York, Robert K. Wheeler of Great Barrington, Edward S. Rogers of Lee, John F. Noxon, Jr. of Pittsfield, and Dr. James P. Baxter, 3d of Williamstown.

The meeting was held at the home of Mrs. Charles Robinson Smith in Stockbridge. Reports of officers reflected the outstanding success of the seventh annual series of concerts and great interest was indicated in the 1941 concerts.

Allied Relief Benefit

A report was received from the Boston Symphony Orchestra stating that the net receipts from the Allied Relief benefit concert at Tanglewood during the festival period were $23,512.94. The proceeds have been devoted to the civilian and medical relief so much needed in England. The auction conducted by Owen Johnson furnished a mobile surgical unit. The sum of $5000 was allocated at the suggestion of the donors to aid needy musicians and their families in Britain.

Miss Robinson Smith reported that 1500 applications for membership had been received early in September for each of the three series of concerts in 1941, and as a result the membership lists were closed long before the anticipated deadline of Nov. 1. She also reported equally as keen interest in subscriptions and boxes. The treasurer's report showed all bills paid with a balance to be applied to much needed improvements in festival facilities at Tanglewood.

Presto Music Times
Oct 1930

AN OLD PROBLEM IN A NEW DRESS

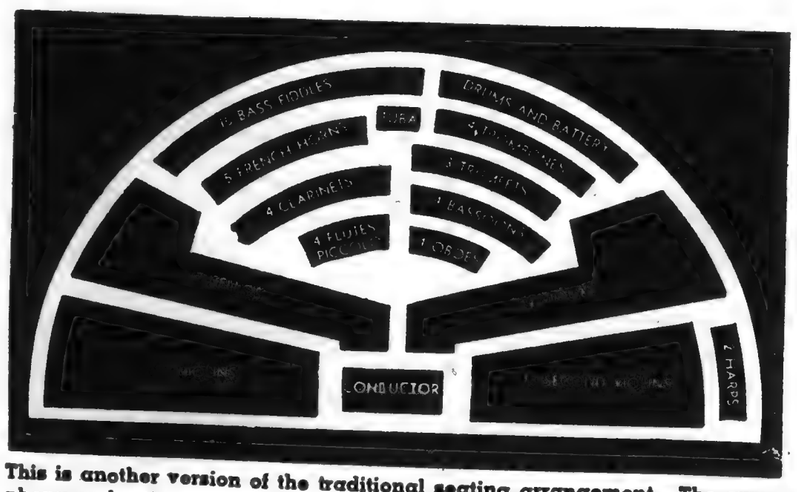
In the East this year public and critics are much exercised over the seating arrangement of the symphony orchestra. Leopold Stokowski who has probably garnered more headlines than any other conductor alive, is harvesting a new crop now by reason of his recent bold challenge to tradition. He has picked up the string section and transferred it bodily to the back of the stage, bringing forward in its stead such long-hidden instruments as flutes, oboes, clarinets, horns, trumpets, trombones and even percussions.

Experiments in the seating arrangements of the orchestra are an old story, but such experiments have usually been carried on in such a way that basic traditions have not been disturbed. These basic traditions require that the small strings—by far the most numerous, most used, and most important orchestral family—should be down front in close touch with conductor and audience. These traditions require also that brass instruments and double basses should be kept in the background and compelled to perform their relatively small tasks in obscurity.

Past experimenters, instead of challenging the soundness of these general ideas, would merely change the position of violas or second violins within the string section or shift whole small choirs (the wood wind, for example) from one part of the platform to another. In comparison with these conservative changes Stokowski's action is as radical as that of a football coach who should decide to place all of his backs slightly in advance of the line.

A glance at the diagram of the orchestra conducted by Arturo Toscanini will acquaint the reader with the conventional seating arrangement and will demonstrate the fact that this conventional seating arrangement is not absolutely rigid. Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and Toscanini agree on major points but disagree on several minor ones. The former likes the cellos bunched cozily in front of him; the latter puts them to his left, behind the first violins. The former keeps his brasses to the extreme right; the latter has them directly in front of him.

Even the most perfunctory study of the diagram of the Philadelphia orchestra will serve to establish the fact that Stokowski's ideas differ radically from those of his colleagues. The concertmaster (principal first violin), who traditionally occupies the place of honor at the front of the stage and right under the conductor's left hand, now must peer at his chief thru rows of clarinets and flutes. The cellists, who in other days could actually go thru life without ever seeing a bassoon, now find that instrument directly in front of them.



This is another version of the traditional seating arrangement. The symphony orchestra conducted by Arturo Toscanini keeps its strings forward.

This is Leopold Stokowski's radical rearrangement of the Philadelphia orchestra. Brasses and wood winds are down front, strings back.

Advantages of New Arrangement

The advantages of the new arrangement are as follows:

It brings forward flutes and clarinets—which are soft of tone and few in number—and permits their tone to reach the audience without having first to cut its way thru the great mass of strings.

It gives people who come to concerts to look as well as to listen (and this includes virtually every member of the audience) an opportunity to get acquainted with other instruments besides strings.

It reunites the strings after generations of separation. The string basses have always stood along the back wall, and in Stokowski's arrangement they continue to do so. Now, however, their proud cousins—violins, violas, cellos—have at last come back to join them.

Disadvantages Of New Arrangement

And here are some disadvantages of the new system:

It banishes the most important sections of the orchestra (the strings) to positions back of the wood winds and endangers the rapport between the conductor and his hardest working men.

And of course it banishes the concertmaster along with his lesser fellows.

The audience will see much idleness—for brasses, wood winds, and percussions rest frequently and for long periods—and a suspicion may conceivably arise that a full money's worth is being withheld.

The brass instruments whose tone does not always blend easily with that of the rest of the orchestra even in the conventional seating arrangement, are apt to be more difficult still to control when those instruments are at the front of the stage.

But there is too much theory in all the above and too resolute an avoidance of an important factor in orchestral seating. The factor is the shape and the acoustics of the hall in which the orchestra habitually plays. Mr. Stock has arranged his orchestra by ear, as it were. If a certain position gives the best tonal result in Orchestra Hall, then that position is the best.

The present seating arrangement of the Chicago Orchestra represents the results of decades of experimentation. Three years ago an important change took place when the percussion instruments were moved from the right rear to the left rear in order to get them away from other highly sonorous instruments such as the heavy brasses. The tonal weight of the right rear (in the old arrangement) made proper balance almost impossible.

The Chicago Orchestra once tried an experiment almost as novel as Mr. Stokowski's present one. All of the strings were put on the right side and all of the wind instruments on the left. This looked logical enough, but it just didn't sound right.

In reference to the problem of orchestral seating in general Mr. Stock recently said: "We have found that the present arrangement of the orchestra is best suited to the acoustical properties of Orchestra hall", and that is that.

Soviet Symphony

Trans. Oct 19

Fifth Symphony of Young Russian Composer Is Climax of Brilliant Concert Program

By EDWARD DOWNES

A twentieth century masterpiece of volcanic splendour and fury, Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, climaxed a concert of extraordinary brilliance given by the Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. This was the first time Koussevitzky had directed the work of the young Soviet composer, and to many a listener who had heard this symphony with other orchestras, under other conductors, this performance was something in the nature of a premiere. Its revitalizing and recreative power was tremendous. A confrontation of this with other interpretations should scotch once and for ever the pious theory that, given a merely adequate conductor and orchestra, masterpieces will speak for themselves. Few masterpieces do, and the Shostakovitch Fifth isn't one of them.

The program opened with a more firmly established masterpiece: The ascetic, almost archaic Overture to Gluck's opera, "Iphigenie en Aulide." The performance was superb, the music of the greatest, but the response of the audience was curiously lethargic.

Gluck's stern voice was an ideal foil for the seraphic Symphony in E flat major of Wolfgang Amade Mozart which followed. And the Mozart Symphony in turn made a peculiarly effective introduction to the clangorous dissonances of Shostakovitch. This was Koussevitzky's flair for program building at its finest.

Of course the Mozart was not just introduction. It is younger than the Shostakovitch, for all its youthful temperament, is—even today. And it will continue to be played when the name of Shostakovitch is forgotten. Its serene and balanced beauty is the product of a banished esthetic dictum: That all art, no matter what it expresses, should have a pleasing and graceful exterior.

The warm timbre of the orchestra in this work, indeed much of the mellowness of the symphony as a whole is determined by the fact that Mozart speaks here without the slightly acid voice of the oboes. The golden tone of the Boston Symphony strings enhanced the sensuous appeal of Mozart's cantilena, and Koussevitzky moulded the first two movements with an exquisite sense of style and finesse.

Only in the Menuetto and Finale was the tempo hurried. Thus in the trio of the Menuetto, the delicious inter-play of clarinet and flute never had quite the breathing space to unfold with the grace and ease inherent in the notes. And the Finale coursed at a speed which was exhilirating and brilliant, but definitely out of character. The whole would have gained immeasurably, had it been performed with reduced orchestra.

The Royal Blue Line

Without making any comparisons of artistic rank, we may put down the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony as a continuation of the great line of symphonic rhapsodies which run from Berlioz, through Liszt to Richard Strauss. Like Strauss, Shostakovitch uses many themes which are banal and flat enough in themselves, and depends on his dazzling virtuosity in developing and orchestrating them, or on sheer temperament, to carry him through.

Ideas come to Mr. Shostakovitch so fast that it cannot be called mere fertility; it is a volcanic eruption of ideas. But the volcano is uncritical, and along with the pure fire of inspiration it casts up a deal of slack and ashes. Alongside passages of true grandeur and power there are moments of brassy bombast that are simply embarrassing. The dramatic and the merely theatrical are closely mixed. Even at second or third hearing it is not necessarily easy to tell the gilt from the gold, the musical diamonds from—paste.

For one listener, however, the slow third movement was by far the realest of the four—the most original, the most sincere and perhaps the most effective as well. This brooding song appears to grow out of itself, not have been put together by any craftsman, however skilled. Its language is its own and its form organic. Its climax, when it finally arrives, rises to an almost unbearable pitch of intensity before subsiding to the deep calm of the beginning.

The exact antithesis of this is the short and brutal but extremely effective scherzo. The name of a new composer jumps into your head every time Shostakovitch throws another theme into this symphonic maelstrom. There is everything in it, as the saying goes, but the kitchen stove. Of course, he may have meant to do this. It may be intentional eclectic parody. Or parody of parody. Say the late Stravinsky?

Though the first and last movements too have their derivative moments, their heroic stature is little reduced thereby. Whatever his faults may be, Shostakovitch is still obviously one of the few vital symphonists of our day. His work was received yesterday with some shaking of conservative heads and much vigorous applause.

Yesterday's program will be repeated this evening in Symphony Hall. The next pair of Friday-Saturday concerts on October 25 and 26, will bring the first performance of "Cipressi" by the Italian composer now resident in this country, Castelnuovo-Tedesco. Haydn's Symphony No. 88 in G major, Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque and "Death and Transfiguration" by Richard Strauss complete the program.

MUSIC

Oct 19

15

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second regular concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows:

Gluck....Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"
Mozart.....Symphony in E flat major, K. 543
Shostakovitch.....Symphony No. 5 Op. 47

Philip Hale used to say that if a piece of music made enough noise, especially at the end, it could not help but succeed and garner a huge measure of applause. This discouraging aesthetic doctrine was well illustrated yesterday afternoon by the Shostakovitch fifth symphony. That this vapid and tedious work could so go down amazes us, and we must hope that there is a more discriminating section of the public that refuses to be taken in by it.

There is in the symphony just one passage indicative of an artistic imagination, with some originality at work; and this occurs at the conclusion of the first movement. The scherzo tries desperately to imitate Prokofieff and fails. The largo is a wilderness of boredom in which the device of the pedal point is flagrantly abused. The finale is a bit of bombast for the crowd.

A number of cheap bits—witness the march in the first movement—were inserted, we assume, as a sop to the proletariat. There is no artistic justification for them. At any rate it must have taken the OGPU to prevent the workers walking out on that largo! The reputation of Shostakovitch is, we believe, grossly overrated. This symphony is pretentious and with hardly a spark of real, creative talent. Judging by the applause, even between movements, there were many who would not agree with this opinion. Nevertheless, after due reflection, we can find no better summing up of the fifth symphony than to say that it is a crashing bore.

Now, the trouble is that the playing of the Boston symphony under so inspired a leader as Mr. Koussevitzky can never be dull. As pure sound or orchestral tone even bad music takes on luster. "Pop Goes the Weasel" would sound perfectly bully if Mr. Koussevitzky undertook to play it. Therefore a very inferior work of symphonic art, such as this by Shostakovitch, does not seem as empty and stupid as in fact it is. The sheer athletic prowess of the orchestra carries it along and gives it a specious triumph which it does not deserve. And, as an opportunity for the orchestra to shine, we suppose that Mr. Koussevitzky elected to revive it.

The first part of the concert was a triumph of quite another and entirely legitimate color. Mozart's E flat symphony has, perhaps, been too much played as compared with others of his symphonies no less deserving. Still, it is always a delight to hear it. Mr. Koussevitzky is singularly at home with Mozart. His interpretations are miracles of clarity, lightness and precision. Another conductor might not have taken the andante as slowly or the finale as fast, but these tempi were justified by the performance yesterday. For some reason it is not supposed to be quite "the thing" to single out one member of the orchestra for special praise, unless he be really a soloist. But for once we cannot forbear to mention the perfection of Mr. Polatschek's playing of the clarinet solo in the trio. It must be heard to be believed.

Gluck's overture is a grand piece of music, not too often heard. His importance in the history of opera has led to a great deal being written about him; but, as things go in the world of music nowadays, the public gets little chance to hear his music. The overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" is one of the best ways to get acquainted with him.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky offers Haydn's symphony No. 88, Castelnuovo-Tedesco's "Cipressi," Chabrier's Bouree Fantasque and Strauss' "Tod und Verklaerung."

SOVIET MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Shostakovitch's Fifth Is Effective

Oct 19

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Having placed Vaughan Williams ahead of Beethoven at last week's Symphony Concerts, Dr. Koussevitzky adhered yesterday to a strict chronology, playing Gluck and Mozart before the interval, Shostakovitch after it. The 18th century Austrians were represented by the Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and the Symphony in E-flat major, respectively; the contemporary Russian, by his Fifth Symphony.

We were reminded yesterday, through Mr. Burk's ever-admirable programme notes, that Mozart wrote his E-flat major when he was harassed by debts and family cares. Yet of these trying circumstances this most serene of symphonies reveals not the slightest trace. Also these notes set forth the now familiar background of Shostakovitch's Fifth: how the composer had fallen out with the Soviets because of certain radical scores and had re-established himself in their good graces with this tuneful and uncomplicated music.

Now while we can listen to Mozart with no thought of the pressing creditors and the ailing Constanze, we cannot take the Shostakovitch Symphony entirely at its face value. There must always arise the question of the composer's sincerity. Did these simplicities, and also these trivialities and vulgarities, come from the heart or were they the result of a deliberate attempt to write down to what might be assumed to be the musical level of the masses?

Add the evidence of our ears to our knowledge of Shostakovitch's previous music and the latter conclusion seems inescapable. Nevertheless, with no government to intimidate him, Stravinsky could follow "The Rite of Spring" with the "Apollo Musagetes," "The Fairy's Kiss" and the "Card Game." And equally free from external pressure, Strauss could write first "Elektra" and then "The Egyptian Helen" and the ballet, "Cream-Puffs." Surely the historian of the future is going to be perplexed by this swing from radicalism to conservatism, from complexity to simplicity, from dissonance to consonance

Possibly music cannot be made to sound better than it is, but it was difficult to believe yesterday that Dr. Koussevitzky, who had not conducted the piece here before, was not ennobling and improving upon Shostakovitch's Symphony wherever such assistance was at all possible. In any case, the work was more effective, more palatable than in the previous performance under the direction of Richard Burgin, who had been more disposed to let the music speak for itself. But no conductor, not even Dr. Koussevitzky doing his darndest, could free the music from all its insipidities and banalities, its triteness and claptrap.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The concerts this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have a heavenly beginning and a Soviet conclusion. Serge Koussevitzky's program starts with the Overture to Gluck's opera "Iphigenia in Aulis," continues with "big" E-flat Symphony of Mozart (K. 543), and comes to anticlimax with the Fifth Symphony by Dmitri Shostakovitch.

Without doubt some in the audience at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon will strongly disapprove of calling Mr. Shostakovitch's ideological effort "anticlimax." But in sincerity this reviewer again finds it so.

After the scherzo and the slow movement, some listeners in the rear and the upper parts of the hall forgot the etiquette of not clapping between symphonic movements, and burst out in a flurry of applause. As a matter of strict justice, one may add that about 4:15 the customary number who have trains, teas or cocktail parties to make, could be seen taking their departure.

Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony was intended to commemorate the Bolshevik revolution of 1917, and its first perforcence in 1937 restored him to Soviet good graces. For some months previously, he had been in disfavor because certain of his music allegedly had failed to express the proper Soviet ideology. Too much has probably been made of the ideological side of Shostakovich's work. At best that could be only an unimportant external element.

Had Ravel written his "Bolero" to celebrate the Bolshevik revolution, the composition would still have been the "Bolero," no better and no worse for whatever outside influences prompted it. What counts in music, therefore, is substance and the skill of its writing.

When Richard Burgin introduced the Shostakovitch Fifth here a year ago last January, this reviewer found it disappointing, "unoriginal, long-winded and banal." Let those words stand; add thin and sterile to them. For one reason or another the Fifth shows no fruition of the promise of the Shostakovitch First Symphony, a clever work of student years.

Technically the Fifth Symphony has a good deal in its favor, the orchestration for example, and some pages sound very well by themselves. But "some pages" are no more a good work that one swallow is a Spring. At that, Mr. Koussevitzky's painstaking interpretation must have accounted largely for whatever brilliance there was. A virtuoso orchestra and conductor can make some music sound better than it is. Yesterday's performance was Mr. Koussevitzky's first of this score.

One enjoyed hearing again the solemn and imposing Gluck Overture, although it was played a bit heavily. The precision of the orchestra was quite astonishing, even to listeners thoroughly familiar with the finesse of the Boston Symphony. Would it not have been better to reduce the strings or increase the wind parts for the sake of closer orchestral balance?

Mozart's E-flat Symphony, like all true classics, never shows a sign of wear. The high point of yesterday's reading was, interpretively, the slow movement. The first movement and finale seemed nervously strained and a shade too fast.

Next week's program will be as follows: Haydn: Symphony in G major, No. 88; Castelnuovo-Tedesco: "Cipressi" (first performance); Chabrier-Mottl: Bourree Fantasque"; Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration."

C. W. D.

---

ussevitzky, Shostakovitch

C.S.M. Oct 19

The Arts in Boston

e second Friday afternoon rt of the Boston Symphony n, given yesterday afternoon ymphony Hall, was notable for inclusion in the program of e Fifth Symphony of Shostaovitch. It was not the first time his symphony had been heard here; Mr. Burgin introduced it nearly two years ago. Nor was it the first time Dr. Koussevitzky had conducted a composition from Soviet Russia; he made Starokadomsky's Concerto for Orchestra known to us three years ago. But it was the first time he had directed a composition by Shostakovitch, and that was what lent special interest to the occasion.

The symphony made a much better impression than it did on its first hearing. Was this due to the interpretation, to the greater familiarity of the players with the score, to a greater receptivity in the listener, or to all these factors? The reading, at all events, was intensely Russian. Shostakovitch sounded more Slavic than he ever had before in the ears of this hearer. He seemed to belong of right with Moussorgsky, Tchaikovsky, and Borodin.

A tense emotion permeated the score yesterday, particularly in the first movement and in the slow movement. The substance and the form of this first movement were made crystal clear, its architectural proportions were beautifully drawn. Passages that previously had seemed banal, irrelevant, or repetitious took their place in the design. Only the measures for brass fortissimo, before the recapitulation, seemed still unworthy of the scheme.

The slow movement (the third) was characteristic of the fatherland, rather than of Soviet ideology, in its profound somberness. Here, as in the first movement, the composer seemed to be feeling the ties of nationality and race that bind him to his musical forebears. The long lament was sung with exquisite beauty of tone, delicate balance of voices, and an eloquent lyricism.

The Scherzo now appeared as the expression of folk joy and playfulness; appropriately crude in its humor, but captivating with its tricky rhythms. The Finale is the least impressive of the four movements, being remarkable primarily for its much sounding; yet even here the substructure is firm, and it may be argued that the tumult is in the true Tchaikovsky tradition, though the thematic values certainly are not. We owe thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky for bringing us his interpretation of this extraordinary work, which makes us wonder what its composer might not do if he could write without thought of anything but his music.

The concert opened with a performance of Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" which revealed again—the amazing tonal beauties not only of the strings but of the wind choirs. The other item was Mozart's Symphony in E flat (K. 543), which was played with the technical brilliance and interpretative illumination which have become customary at Symphony Hall.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
OCT 20 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY THIRD PROGRAM

The following programme will be presented by Serge Koussevitzky at the third pair of concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixtieth season, the concerts to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The first number will be the Symphony of Haydn in G major, No. 88, a symphony of the Paris series. Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce a new piece by Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, the Italian composer now living in this country. It is entitled "Cipressi" (Remembrance of the Cypresses of Usiglian di Lari). Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," as orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and Strauss' tone poem "Death and Transfiguration" will complete the programme.

The series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin in Symphony Hall a week from Monday and Tuesday, October 28 and 29. Concerts of this double series will also be given on December 2-3, December 30-31, January 27-28, March 3-4, and April 14-15.

Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct at the opening pair of concerts the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, and "A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams, the symphony which was played at the opening concert of the season and evoked a tremendous response from the audience.

SOCIETY

Traveler Oct. 19 16

Symphony Concert Revives Memories of Old Music Hall

By NATALIE GORDON

YESTERDAY'S SOCIAL SCHEDULE was a long full one for many a prominent Bostonian who started the day with Eunice Harriet Avery's opening lecture at the Copley Plaza in her season's series benefitting the Children's Hospital, lingered over lunch at the hotel, and then dashed uptown for the Friday afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, divided the program between Gluck, Mozart and Shostakovitch.

Although the symphony opened its 60th season last week, yesterday's concert was actually the closest anniversary date to the first Friday "Public Rehearsal" (as they were then called) of the orchestra, given 60 years ago on Oct. 22, 1881, in the old Music Hall on Hamilton place. There were a few yesterday who remembered that first concert, when an excited and breathless attendance gathered to hear the orchestra which had resulted from Henry Lee Higginson's daring experiment in appointing young and talented Georg Henschel on a yearly salary to gather around him 60 musicians, also on a yearly salary, to give Boston a permanent symphonic orchestra instead of the hit-and-miss concerts which had taken place previously.

There were a few yesterday who, as Hub debutantes or young matrons, remembered the social highlight of those falls in the late 80's, when crowds gathered for the yearly public auction of Symphony seats, which prior to the beginning of the last war took the place of the present subscription system, and the memorable Monday of Sept. 21, 1892, when a few fun-loving bidders jacked up Mrs. Jack Gardner's bid for a single seat to $392, to the highest price ever paid in Music Hall.

Excited reminiscing yesterday went back, also, to 1900, when the orchestra opened its own and present home in Symphony Hall, acclaimed by the press as actually being equipped with Edison electric lights! Thus memorabilia added sparkle to the delight of yesterday's music.

Among those who attended both the morning lecture and yesterday's Symphony were Mrs. Frank H. Stewart, able co-chairman with Mrs. Thomas H. Lanman of the Avery lectures, and her daughter, Mrs. C. Stewart Black, Mrs. Richard P. Waters, Mrs. Durham Jones, Mrs. Charles Dana Orcutt, Mrs. Channing H. Cox, Miss Elizabeth Leland, Mrs. Franklin G. Balch, Jr., Mrs. Alfred Kidder, 2d, Mrs. Caroline F. Ely and Mrs. Louis B. McCarthy.

Others we noted at the Symphony were Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr., lovely in a gray wool dress and tiny matching hat topped by a short fur jacket; Mrs. Maynard Hutchinson; charming debutante Mary Helen Brown, a picture in fluffy fox jacket over a black crepe dress whose full skirt had a wide band of velvet around the hemline, wore a small veiled hat with chartreuse and black-birds on it; Therese Thomas, Mrs. Richard Thompson, Mrs. Rene E. Paine and her son, L. Gerard Paine; Mrs. Hugh Bancroft, Mrs. Joseph Meigs, Mrs. Franklin W. Hobbs, Beth Killiam, Mrs. Frank G. Allen, Mrs. Roswell Parrish, Jr., Mrs. Frederic H. Chase, Mrs. Frederick Robinson, Mrs. Lyman P. Gutterson, Mrs. Edward B. Simmons, Mrs. Robert Treat Paine with Mrs. Garret Schenck; Mrs. Hamilton Edwards of Swampscott, Mrs. Prescott Warren, Mrs. Harold B. Jobes, Mrs. Jaffray de Hauteville-Bell, Mrs. John Correa, Jr., Dorothy and Priscilla Parrish, Leslie Lindsey, Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller and her daughter, Lydia; Mrs. George D. Aldrich (Alice Burrage), stunning in a full skirted frock topped by a waist-length silver fox jacket and diminutive black hat edged with tiny curled green ostrich tips; Mrs. Carl Dreyfus, Mrs. Albert C. Armstrong, Mrs. Donald Hood, the glamorous Cochrane sisters, Lucy and Nancy; Mrs. T. Barnet Plimpton, Mrs. Clement Stodder, Mrs. Samuel Cross, sub-deb Edith Winsor, Mary Amory, Harriet Bundy, Mrs. Robert Cushman and Mrs. John McDuffy.

Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike, Jr.

Still others were: Mrs. Edward R. Hale, Hope Halsey and her mother, Mrs. Fuller Halsey; Lucy Pope, Mrs. Harry Hayward, Mrs. Samuel Winslow of Worcester, Mrs. Roland Baker, Mrs. Moses Williams, post-deb Louise Sargent, in a trim black frock with lingerie collar and cuffs of soldier blue; Mrs. Charles F. Hovey, Mrs. James J. Storrow, Jane Megrew, Charlotte Rantoul, Mrs. John E. Yerxa, Mrs. George Willard Smith, Mrs. Charles Gaston Smith, Mrs. Charles Carney, Mrs Martin Bovey of Carlisle, Mrs. Kenneth Collison, Mrs. Edwin Webster, Mrs. Francis C. Hall and her daughter, Priscilla, Mrs. Morrill Wiggin, Jean Q. Clark, Mrs. Morris F. Lacroix, Mrs. Gilbert King, Mrs. Roger Converse, Mrs. Robert Barton, and Mrs. Franklin Hatch.

YOUNG FOLK CONCERTS IMPORTANT

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

WHAT assurance have we that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will not share the fate of the Boston Opera Company? How do we know but that on some dark tomorrow a for-sale sign will not chill our hearts as does the for-sale sign on the Opera House today?

Unthinkable, you say. But we should have learned by now that no calamity is unthinkable. Too many unthinkable things have already happened.

The Boston Opera Company was not self-supporting. No more is New York's Metropolitan. And the Boston Symphony, like all great orchestras, cannot pay its own way, and never has. The annual deficit of many thousands of dollars is met by a public-spirited body of men and women known as the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the sale of seats fell off too much or if these yearly contributions were not forthcoming in sufficient quantity, the Boston Symphony Orchestra would vanish from the scene. It is not likely that the city would take it over. Municipally-supported orchestras are as rare in this country as they are — or were — common in Europe. Certainly the city has shown no disposition to purchase the Opera House.

To come to the point of this jeremiad, how can we safeguard the future of the Symphony Orchestra, Boston's last claim to musical supremacy? There is only one way and that is by educating the younger generation. And the way in which that is best accomplished is through the Symphony Orchestra's own Youth Concerts, the current series of which begins on Wednesday afternoon. Obviously, the young patron of today's Youth Concerts may become tomorrow's subscriber to one of the four series of Symphony Concerts proper, or tomorrow's friend of the orchestra.

This year, as in the past two seasons, the six Youth Concerts will be under the able, experienced, wise and tactful guidance of Wheeler Beckett. Mr. Beckett's first programme (which exemplifies his well-tested theory that the youngsters do not want to be played down to) assembles, as Dr. Koussevitzky might have assembled them, Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, the First Rumanian Rhapsody of Enesco (a timely item), Debussy's Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" and the "Flying Dutchman" overture of Wagner. All these numbers, save Debussy's Prelude, will be new to Mr. Beckett's concerts. In the subsequent programmes American compositions will be heard.

• • • •

Coming back to the matter of the Opera House, a correspondent whose letter was printed in last Sunday's Post makes the suggestion that the present owners (the Messrs. Shubert) make public the financial situation regarding that theatre so we may all know just how much money would be needed to make the house at least self-supporting. In point of fact, they have admitted a loss of $250,000 over a period of 25 years. This correspondent, like most of the others, thinks the sale of the Opera House and subsequent disappearance of opera from our midst would be a great misfortune. Yet among these letters was one—not to the Post—which said, in effect, "What's the use?" If, as this writer maintained, the Opera House is to be used for only 10 days of opera, a fortnight of ballet and an occasional play or musical show, why should anyone assume the financial burden envolved?

To this realistic and cynical point of view one might reply that half a loaf is better than none; that if we have 10 days of opera now we might have two weeks, or even three in future. Moreover, the new subway will make the Opera House far more accessible than it has been in the past, and some day we might again have a company of our own. Philadelphia has one, and it has performances by New York's Metropolitan besides. On Tuesday of next week the Philadelphia Opera Company will give the first of the season's seven productions, a performance of Tchaikovsky's "Eugene Onegin" in English. Lucky Philadelphia can use its Academy of Music for both symphony concerts and opera. Symphony Hall would ill serve the latter purpose.

And, returning to the Symphony Orchestra, the series of six Monday evening and six Tuesday afternoon concerts begin next week and will end with those of April 14 and 15. The first programme, derived from those already given at the longer series, includes Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony No. 88, and the "London" Symphony of Vaughan Williams.

This Symphony of Haydn, famed for its noble and expressive Largo, is the first number on the list designed for this Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. After it will come, as the season's first novelty, a composition entitled "Cipressi," by the Italian composer Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, now living in this country; the Chabrier-Mottl "Bourree Fantasque" and, with grim appropriateness, Strauss' "Death and Transfiguration."

The first recital of the season will be given at Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon by Fritz Kreisler.

The People's Choral Union will open its 44th season next Sunday afternoon at 3:30 in Recital Hall, the New England Conservatory of Music. Stanley Hassell is again the conductor. Auditions for membership will be held at the Conservatory in Room 15 from 7 to 9 p. m. on Wednesday and Friday afternoon of this week.

Symphony Excites

Trav. Oct. 20

By LEO GAFFNEY

IT was, possibly, Serge Koussevitzky's humor and purpose to play such music in the Symphony. concerts over the weekend as would show us a bit of where we stand in this confused era of human history.

It was a striking contrast in the very old and the very new. Against the soulful singing of the Eighteenth Century masters, Gluck and Mozart—the "Iphigenia" overture of the former, the E-flat Symphony of the latter—the distinguished Boston conductor placed some of the best modern sound and fury, the Fifth Symphony of the contemporary young Sovietist, Dmitri Shostakovitch.

Both Mozart and Shostakovitch were in their early thirties when they produced their respective symphonies. Both, in their music at least, are in the idealist class. Mozart reached out for the Infinite; Shostakovitch, being under government subsidy, is bound to beat the drum for the immediate, worldly notion of the latest Five-Year plan, or whatever the inscrutable designs of Mr. Stalin may suggest.

IN the matter of inspiration, Mozart would seem to have the edge. He looked higher—and lasts longer, it seems. Although in all fairness to Mr. Shostakovitch there may be enduring young charms in his songs of social significance—especially in the Largo of the Fifth, where the long-breathed melodies sighing in the strings—were enough to beguile even the coolish Friday afternoon audience, persuading them to cheers at the end of the movement—though they certainly know better.

Say what you will of Mr. Shostakovitch, he does know how to shoot the works. And no matter what he is trying to convey—and many think he is not above spoofing—his Fifth Symphony is a most exciting experience.

Next Symphony

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Symphony Hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will present the Symphony of Haydn in G major; a new piece by Marie Castelnuovo-Tedesco, "Cipressi" (Remembrance of the Cypresses of Usiglian di Lari); Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," as orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

Today Marks Orchestra's Birthday

Boston Symphony Founded by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson

BOSTON.—Fifty-nine years ago today, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson started an experiment in Boston which was to fill New England and the rest of the world with its fame in increasing measure far into the next half century and more. That experiment was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was considered experimental because at its founding in 1881 none of the cities of the United States had its own permanent professional symphony orchestra.

In Boston, short series of orchestral performances were given by men assembled and dispersed from concert to concert. Maj. Higginson appointed an able and enthusiastic young musician, Georg Henschel, as conductor, with instructions to assemble, on a steady work, yearly salary, basis, 60 of the best instrumentalists locally available. They were to devote themselves practically exclusively to the presentation of 20 symphony concerts, and the same number of public rehearsals.

The first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played at a "public rehearsal" (for which tickets were sold), on Friday afternoon, Oct. 21, 1881, followed on Saturday night by what was reckoned the real concert. Music Hall, down town in Hamilton Place, off Tremont Street, was the auditorium. And so well was the experimental orchestra received that it was active there for 19 years, after which time, in 1900, it moved to its own permanent home, Symphony Hall, in the upper Back Bay.

During its second season, 1882-83, Boston's new orchestra began to visit neighboring cities. It gave two concerts each in Fitchburg, Lowell, and New Bedford, and three each in Salem and Worcester.

Size Increased

In the course of time, the size of the orchestra has been increased from its original 60 men to 110. With the corresponding gain in the richness of tone, the enlarged personnel has brought, of course, an increase in expenses of travel. But while that has resulted in the omission of various New England cities from its former touring list, modern transportation facilities have made it simple for music-lovers from a radius of 100 miles of Boston to come to Symphony Hall. A distinct advantage is, that no other auditorium surpasses the sound-quality of the orchestra's home auditorium. This was, in fact, the first music hall in the world to be built by strict adherence to the scientific laws of sound. Wallace Sabine of Harvard University was the responsible sound consultant.

Next week on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, hundreds of music-lovers will arrive at Symphony Hall from distant points by auto, bus, and train to attend the first of the annual series of six approximately monthly concerts in Boston, which have superseded various former out-of-town preformances of the orchestra. Commuters find the Tuesday concerts especially convenient, because they do not start until 3.

The commuters hear the entire orchestra, under its great leader, Serge Koussevitzky. Not only are acknowledged classics played, but also debatable modern works which may acquire classic standing in the future. A perfect illustration of this principle is found in the program which Koussevitzky will conduct Monday and Tuesday of next week. For old classics there are Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Haydn's G-major Symphony, No. 88, one of his most delightful works.

For what may be a future classic, there will be Vaughan Williams's "A London Symphony." When performed on the program which opened the orchestra's regular season two weeks ago, a profound impression was created by this work, which is very near being a tone poem on London.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

OCT 25 1940

NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

OCT 25 1940

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 20 1940

17

Symphony Season to Open-

Program Announced by Boston Orchestra

Providence to Act as Host to Organization on Its Birthday Tuesday.—Shostakovitch and Beethoven Works to Be Played.

BY JOHN TEBBEL

BY a happy though unplanned coincidence, Providence will play host to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its birthday, Tuesday night in Metropolitan Theatre. It was exactly 59 years ago, Oct. 22, 1881, that Georg Henschel raised his baton in Boston Music Hall to begin the career of what has become perhaps the finest orchestra in the world.

From Henschel to Koussevitzky, from the highly critical first night audience at the Boston Music Hall to enthusiastic acclaim everywhere today, stretches a sequence of events which is a bright spot in America's cultural history. The story has been told and re-told. Currently, it is presented in graphic form by means of an historical exhibition at Symphony Hall, Boston, where the start of the 60th season has brought on a flood of reminiscence and relics.

Personalities have changed as the orchestra has developed but the original ideals and ideas propounded by Henry L. Higginson, the founder, are fundamentally the same today. Mr. Higginson, if he could hear the concert Tuesday night, would doubtless see it as the full expression of the dreams he held for the orchestra's future 60 years ago.

Ignored in Providence

Few people, however, foresaw the Symphony's potentialities when it began. Providence, as a matter of record, ignored it. The Journal at that time was preoccupied in its columns with the Irish troubles and the Sprague case. News from Boston came by way of a spasmodic news letter written in Cambridge. The anonymous correspondent reported fully on the news from Harvard, which had a symphony orchestra of its own, but of such isolated doings as the launching of a new and unknown organization in Boston he had nothing to say.

The Cambridge man was as preoccupied in his own fashion as the Journal was with the Irish. Providence's "bright-eyed and stylish girls are decided additions to any Boston attraction," he reported in his blarneying manner. "Boston girls," he added bitterly, "are devoid of that nameless attribute which is known as style."

As for the Boston papers, they were skeptical from the very first in the eruditely violent manner of that day. Particularly they criticized Higginson's wisdom in naming so inexperienced a conductor as Henschel to lead the new orchestra. Henschel himself rather understated the case when he noted that "one paper—I think it was called the Saturday Gazette, a distinctly society paper—showed, and for some time maintained, a decidedly hostile attitude."

Stand in Line All Night

Nevertheless, when tickets for the first season went on sale early in September, some people stood in line all night to buy them and there were 75 standees at 6 o'clock in the morning. One man, it was said, had waited since 3 p. m. the day before.

The first concert pleased the audience more than it did the critics. Newspapers complained about the seating of the orchestra and with justice because Henschel followed the curious plan of dividing his celli and basses equally, seating them on opposite sides of the orchestra except for one man from each division placed anomalously together at the rear. The harpist nearly crowded the conductor from the podium. This arrangement was not long maintained.

More specifically the Boston critics were irritated by what they called Henschel's "un-Haydnesque" manner of conducting the Haydn B flat symphony, No. 12. That was the beginning of a first season storm of controversy in and out of the local journals, centred on the tempi of familiar classics heard under Henschel's baton. The storm blew itself out in time and the orchestra's first leader eventually got the generous appreciation he deserved.

Program for First Concert

The first concert began with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, appropriately enough. Annie Louise Cary, appearing as soloist, sang an "Air" from Gluck's "Orpheus" and the first half concluded with the Haydn symphony. After intermission, the orchestra played Schubert's ballet music to "Rosamunde," a piece by Max Bruch from "Odysseus" and wound up the evening with Weber's Festival Overture. When the audience recognized the English national air in the overture, reported the Boston Traveller, they "arose en masse and remained standing until the close." This first program pleased the listeners mightily even if it failed to satisfy the more exacting critical standards.

Sixty years and eight conductors later, Dr. Koussevitzky has planned a program for the orchestra's birthday which would, in part, have jarred that first audience from its foundations. He will offer two fifth symphonies separated by two generations of musical thought: those of Shostakovitch and Beethoven.

The mighty Beethoven fifth, probably the most popular of all symphonies, will be played here for the 13th time in 51 years by the orchestra, a more infrequent repetition than one would suppose.

No contemporary accounts are readily available but the symphony must have made a profound impression on the Providence audience when it was first offered here under the baton of Arthur Nikisch on Nov. 28, 1889. That was the first year of the Nikisch reign and concert-goers had never seen anything like him.

Graceful in Action

Nikisch was the founder of the beautiful-hands school of conducting and employed an early version of the style later made famous by Leopold Stokowski. The legend was current that Nikisch dipped his long, gorgeous fingers in warm rosewater before he appeared on the podium. In action, he was as graceful and poetic as a ballet dancer. He had a sensitive, medieval sort of face, well-obscured by a full beard.

It is difficult to imagine Nikisch conducting Beethoven at all. The Boston Sunday Globe nearly bogged down in an attempt to anatomize the man's bow and his gestures. Of the first, it was described as "erect, with expressionless face, motionless arms lying at his side, he inclines his spinal column slowly and at a very acute angle."

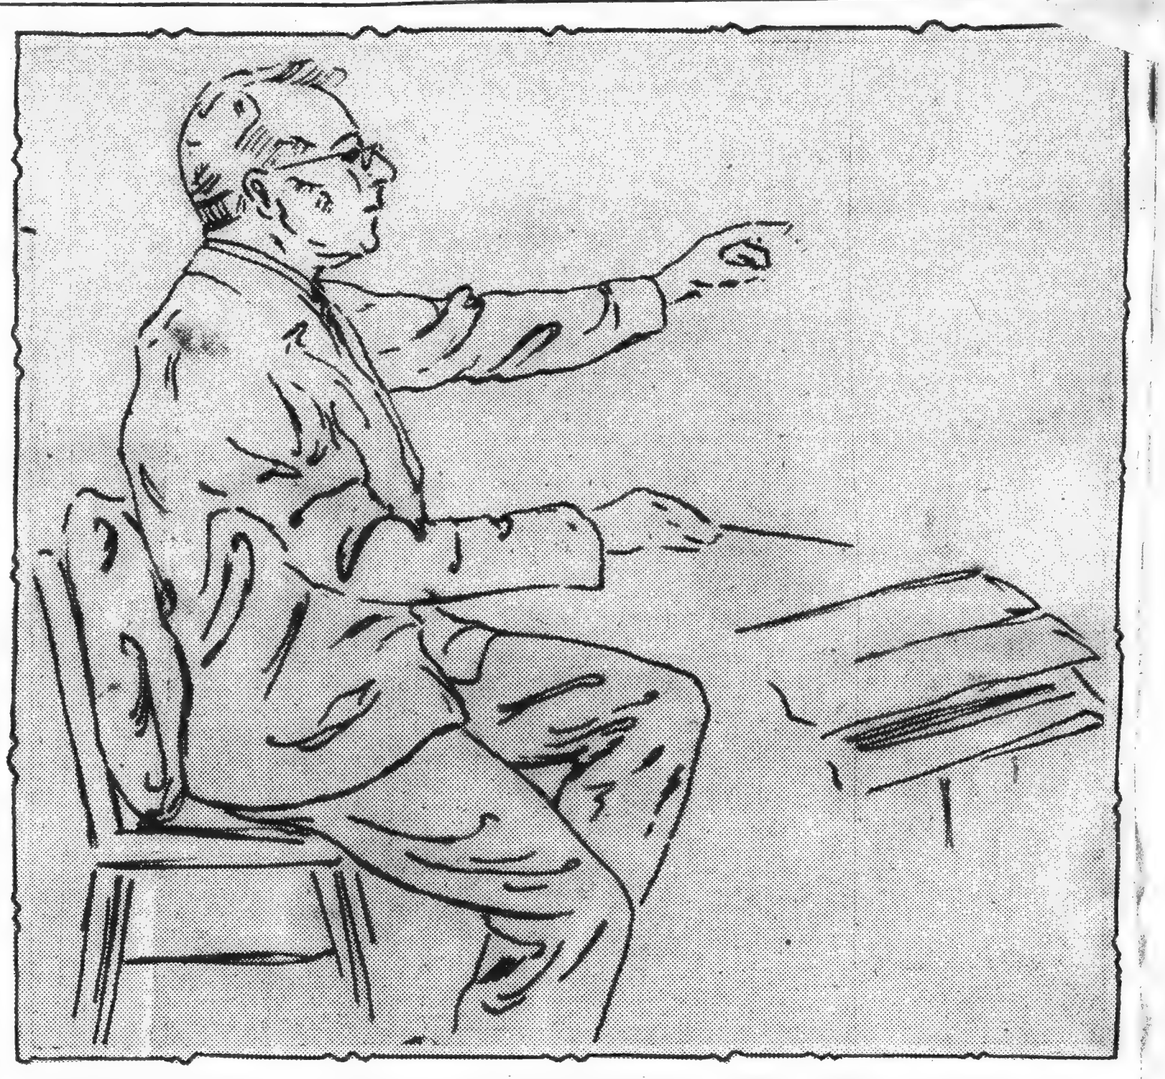
Concerning one gesture, the Globe was painfully explicit. "This movement is made with pianissimo intent. The forearm and hand are the factors. The former is raised not quite up to the level of the right forearm, and the hand curls toward the palm, first suggesting a driver pulling in his horses. The baton at that moment is lowered, as the driver lowers his whip after he has ceased to urge his ambitious steeds. This peculiar left-hand movement of Herr Nikisch also suggests the cold weather poise of a feathery biped's foot. But whatever it may suggest to you or me, it is decidedly effective."

A Startling Jump

From Nikisch and Beethoven to Shostakovitch is a startling jump. Dr. Koussevitzky will make it easier by reversing the process and playing the modern work first on the program. Composed in 1937, the Russian's symphony resembles older symphonies principally in the fact that it has four movements. Only the composer's first symphony, written 15 years ago when he was 19, has been more popular. It is powerful, rugged music in the modern idiom and in that way resembles the Beethoven music, although the contrast makes vivid the great change in expressing musical thought which has come upon the world in this century.

Thus begins the 60th season of the Boston Symphony. Ripened to near perfection, the great orchestra extends the benefit of its work far beyond its initial boundaries, even as Mr. Higginson hoped and believed it would. The schedule for this year includes appearances in New York, Brooklyn, Providence, Hartford, Pittsburgh, New Haven, Worcester, Cleveland, Newark, Philadelphia, Rochester, Ann Arbor, Toledo and Buffalo—as well as a total of 38 concerts in Boston itself. Even when the regular season ends on May 3, there are the pop concerts, the esplanade concerts and the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, easily the outstanding event of its kind in the world today.

In view of all this, and realizing the tremendous force for making the world a better place to live in which the orchestra has been these 60 years, Providence on Tuesday night may well expend more than ordinary fervor on the birthday greeting its gives to Dr. Koussevitzky and the men of the Boston Symphony.



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who comes here on Tuesday night with the Boston Symphony Orchestra to begin the orchestra's Providence season, is seen above in a characteristic attitude at rehearsal. The drawing was made on the scene by Martha Burnham.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
OCT 21 1940

Today Marks Orchestra's Birthday

Boston Symphony Founded by Maj. Henry Lee Higginson

BOSTON.—Fifty-nine years ago today, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson started an experiment in Boston which was to fill New England and the rest of the world with its fame in increasing measure far into the next half century and more. That experiment was the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was considered experimental because at its founding in 1881 none of the cities of the United States had its own permanent professional symphony orchestra.

In Boston, short series of orchestral performances were given by men assembled and dispersed from concert to concert. Maj. Higginson appointed an able and enthusiastic young musician, Georg Henschel, as conductor, with instructions to assemble, on a steady work, yearly salary, basis, 60 of the best instrumentalists locally available. They were to devote themselves practically exclusively to the presentation of 20 symphony concerts, and the same number of public rehearsals.

The first program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was played at a "public rehearsal" (for which tickets were sold), on Friday afternoon, Oct. 21, 1881, followed on Saturday night by what was reckoned the real concert. Music Hall, down town in Hamilton Place, off Tremont Street, was the auditorium. And so well was the experimental orchestra received that it was active there for 19 years, after which time, in 1900, it moved to its own permanent home, Symphony Hall, in the upper Back Bay.

During its second season, 1882-83, Boston's new orchestra began to visit neighboring cities. It gave two concerts each in Fitchburg, Lowell, and New Bedford, and three each in Salem and Worcester.

Size Increased

In the course of time, the size of the orchestra has been increased from its original 60 men to 110. With the corresponding gain in the richness of tone, the enlarged personnel has brought, of course, an increase in expenses of travel. But while that has resulted in the omission of various New England cities from its former touring list, modern transportation facilities have made it simple for music-lovers from a radius of 100 miles of Boston to come to Symphony Hall. A distinct advantage is, that no other auditorium surpasses the sound-quality of the orchestra's home auditorium. This was, in fact, the first music hall in the world to be built by strict adherence to the scientific laws of sound. Wallace Sabine of Harvard University was the responsible sound consultant.

Next week on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, hundreds of music-lovers will arrive at Symphony Hall from distant points by auto, bus, and train to attend the first of the annual series of six approximately monthly concerts in Boston, which have superseded various former out-of-town preformances of the orchestra. Commuters find the Tuesday concerts especially convenient, because they do not start until 3.

The commuters hear the entire orchestra, under its great leader, Serge Koussevitzky. Not only are acknowledged classics played, but also debatable modern works which may acquire classic standing in the future. A perfect illustration of this principle is found in the program which Koussevitzky will conduct Monday and Tuesday of next week. For old classics there are Gluck's Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," and Haydn's G-major Symphony, No. 88, one of his most delightful works.

For what may be a future classic, there will be Vaughan Williams's "A London Symphony." When performed on the program which opened the orchestra's regular season two weeks ago, a profound impression was created by this work, which is very near being a tone poem on London.

QUINCY, MASS.
PATRIOT LEDGER
OCT 22 1940

MANCHESTER, N. H.
UNION
OCT 22 1940

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 21 1940

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play the fifth symphonies of Beethoven and Shostakovitch in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

Of the Beethoven opus not much need to be said; the ingenuity and the force with which he has developed a simple motive in the first movement, the searching manner in which he refined the slow movement, and many other interesting facts and alleged facts have been scattered by the world's presses for decades.

The Shostakovitch is little known. It was not performed in this country until 1938, and has not been performed frequently. Soviet critics praise it—after having condemned several previous works by Comrade Shostakovitch as not adhering to the party line—but critics in other countries have not sung unison odes of approval. John N. Burk, in the program notes for the Boston Symphony, describes it as "conceived, developed, and scored for the most part with great simplicity," with themes "usually melodic and long-breathed in character."

"The composer tends to present his material in the pure medium of the string choirs, notably in the opening slow movements, where wind color and sonority are gradually built up," Mr. Burk says. "The first movement and the last gain also in intensity as they unfold by a gradual increase of tempo throughout, effected by continual metronomic indications."

G. Y. L.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
OCT 20 1940

THREE ORCHESTRAS

By VIRGIL THOMSON

THE New York Philharmonic, the Boston and the Philadelphia Orchestras are justly celebrated organizations. Their personnel is tops. They are composed of expert instrumentalists, internationally trained, prepared to meet any emergency of technique or of style according to accepted formulas. These elements are as mutually replaceable and as anonymous as members of the Roman Catholic clergy. And the summum of their integrity, their consecration and their efficacy is as beyond question.

* * *

The Conductor's Role

THE conductors of these orchestras, of all first-class orchestras everywhere, in fact, are, although in a pinch mutually replaceable, quite the opposite of anonymous. The modern world likes impersonal musicianship, but it will have none of impersonal conducting. The rôle of the orchestral conductor is therefore a dual rôle. He needs to be objective in rehearsal and dependable technically in performance, but he must project in the concert hall a personal and subjective interpretation of every work he conducts. If he lacks technical objectivity he is not a competent conductor, fails to draw the best from his players. If he lacks the power of personal projection, he does not hold his public. He should really be Bodanzky and Mary Garden at the same time.

Also, he must interpret an international repertory, because a resident symphony orchestra is a repertory theater. That repertory, all over the world, consists of the same fifty pieces. A small amount of playing time a year, say five or ten per cent of it, is more flexible, consists of foreign novelties and compliments to local composers. The reasons for the standardization of symphony repertory are many, and all of them are not pretty ones. But the fact is the fact that the standardized repertory is just another neutral background, like the standardized instrumental execution, that throws further into relief the glamour and the personality of the conductor.

* * *

Three Conductorial Types

CONDUCTORS' glamour and personality fall into three easily recognizable geographic types: the Slavic, the central European and the Latin. There are excellent American conductors, but there is no such thing (not yet, at any rate) as American conducting. There is such a thing as American music, however; and most of the unhappiness that exists about it in America is due to the fact that there is no way of interpreting it in our high-powered concerts except one of the European ways. An Arab or Chinese way would be more advantageous, because that would be a frank translation, comprehensible as such. But the most difficult thing in the world is to translate an American book into British. Musically we are Europe's child, just as we are linguistically Britain's, but we are already another person, just as our language is already another thing than England's English. It is the common grammar that deceives everybody. Still, the literary world is not so deceived as the musical world is. We do not try to produce plays by Odets and Saroyan and Erskine Caldwell with English actors or in an Anglo-international manner. They would come out pretty funny if we did. In fact, there is more to be said for playing Borodine here as if it were by Roy Harris, which is one way of coming to understand it, after all, than there is for the present practice of playing Roy Harris as if it were Borodine, which is a sure way of preventing anybody's ever understanding it.

However all that may be, the three geographical styles of conducting are what we have in our concert halls; and we have to take what we have. That's all there is, there isn't any more. Those three styles, conveniently enough, are represented by the conductors of our three first Northeastern orchestras. Dr. Koussevitzky holds the Slavic fort; the Hungarian Mr. Ormandy is admirably central European, and Mr. Barbirolli, for better or for worse, is unquestionably an Italian conductor.

* * *

Koussevitzky and the Slavic Style

THE characteristics of the Slavic style of playing are exaggerated dynamism and facile emotivity. It seems to be made for Tchaikovsky and Tchaikovsky for it. There is a tendency among all Slavs to overblow the brass and to encourage a thick and throaty, an absorbent string-tone. That Slavic string-tone blends the highly differentiated wind-instrument timbres unto itself in a muddy but unified sonority that is a powerful carrying agent for the facile and rather emotional substance of the Russian symphonists. Dr. Koussevitzky, although he has a Slavic weakness for dynamic exaggeration, is not Slavic-minded at all about string-tone; he is pure Parisian, the purest Parisian we have on this coast.

* * *

Ormandy and String Choirs

THE central European style of conducting is military, authoritative and energetic. It is capable of a gentleness in soft passages and of a nobility in loud ones that is incomparable. It is the musical language of the great Viennese masters from Haydn through Schoenberg, although it seems to have been made up both for and out of Handel. Perhaps the Handelian is its most easily exportable form. Mr. Ormandy is an admirable exponent of this style. His authority is authoritative, his tenderness tender. He happens also to have inherited from his Slavic predecessor a superb choir of rich Tchaikovskian string-players. He has toned down their dynamic violence and toned up their lethargic throat-tones, but he has kept their rare and finely blended dark coloration, a bright dark thing like red copper. The instruments themselves are, I am told, all from the old Cremona fiddle makers. At present the string-sound that comes from them is like nothing I have ever heard anywhere.

Koussevitzky is better at balancing a string-chord than anybody. He always was. When he first came to Paris after the war he could already do it, could do it with any pick-up orchestra. The French conductors themselves could not make such an exact equilibrium, a balance in which the most neutral viola part, the most secondary second violin part, were as clearly perceptible as the top-line melody or the bass. His Boston string section is a lovely thing, thinner and more brilliant, as is the Parisian taste, than that of the Philadelphia band; and his chord-balances, just because of that thinner and higher-voiced sonority, are neater, more stable, more exact. The Philadelphia tone, however, in its present condition, remains a luxury product of unmatched quality, a unique experience for its delicacy and for its almost tactile sensuality.

* * *

Barbirolli as a Latin

MR. BARBIROLLI is a Latin out of his natural water, perhaps, too, just a little over his head. By temperament a self-effacing accompanist, he is not at his best in a stellar rôle. He might be excellent at the opera. He is objective and clear-minded about music; he likes and produces from his band that centrifugal sonority that Latins love, a sonority that is not so much a blend of different sounds as a simultaneity of clearly differentiated ones. One has the feeling, all the same, that he might do better in rehearsal than in concert. He gives a reading rather than a performance. He deforms a composer's wish rather less than the more spectacular leaders do; but he rarely possesses a work and makes it his own. And I think he is bored by the necessity of being a personality. All of which gives him an air of trying to lift himself by his boot straps, of being out beyond his depth. His honest but elementary little breast stroke is no match for the streamlined baton technique that both his public and his players are used to. So he gets frantic and conducts with his hair, always the first refuge of an Italian when he can't think of the right next move.

* * *

The Case of the Philharmonic

THE Philharmonic does not have that tradition of great conductors under long tenure that the Philadelphia and the Boston have. The Philharmonic's best conductors, Mahler, Mengelberg, Walter, Furtwängler, Toscanini, have never stayed long enough to mould the orchestra into a thing at once expressive of its leaders and of the city and public it is supposed to honor, not, at least, in the way that the Philadelphia Orchestra seems to be at the same time Leopold Stokowski and Eugene Ormandy and also an appropriate symbol of that swanky and luxurious town. Nor in the way that the Boston Symphony seems, even after sixteen years of Koussevitzky, still to remember the martial elegance of Muck, the Gallic clear-headedness of Monteux, as well as to correspond in both programs and playing to that tradition of bourgeois dignity with intellectual open-mindedness that is Boston, the most characteristically Victorian and inveterately good-mannered of our intellectual centers.

I imagine the trouble with the Philharmonic is that nobody really cares. Nobody in New York could care, because New York is a musical capital, a crossroads. We are not obliged to take our nourishment from any one source of supply, to trade with any one store. And so, whereas a really first-rate orchestra is a necessity to a proud provincial city, it maybe isn't worth bothering about here. We don't need to keep any conductor around all the time. We can let them come and go, because even the best of them need our metropolitan accolade far more than we need the steady presence of their rather terrifying tension.

And so New York takes on an Emil Paur and keeps him for years, a Joseph Stransky, a Van Hoogstraten. Under such men the Philharmonic lies fallow, rests up, so to speak, for those terrific combats between the podium and the desks that mark the brief Metropolitan tenure of great conductors.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
OCT 23 1940

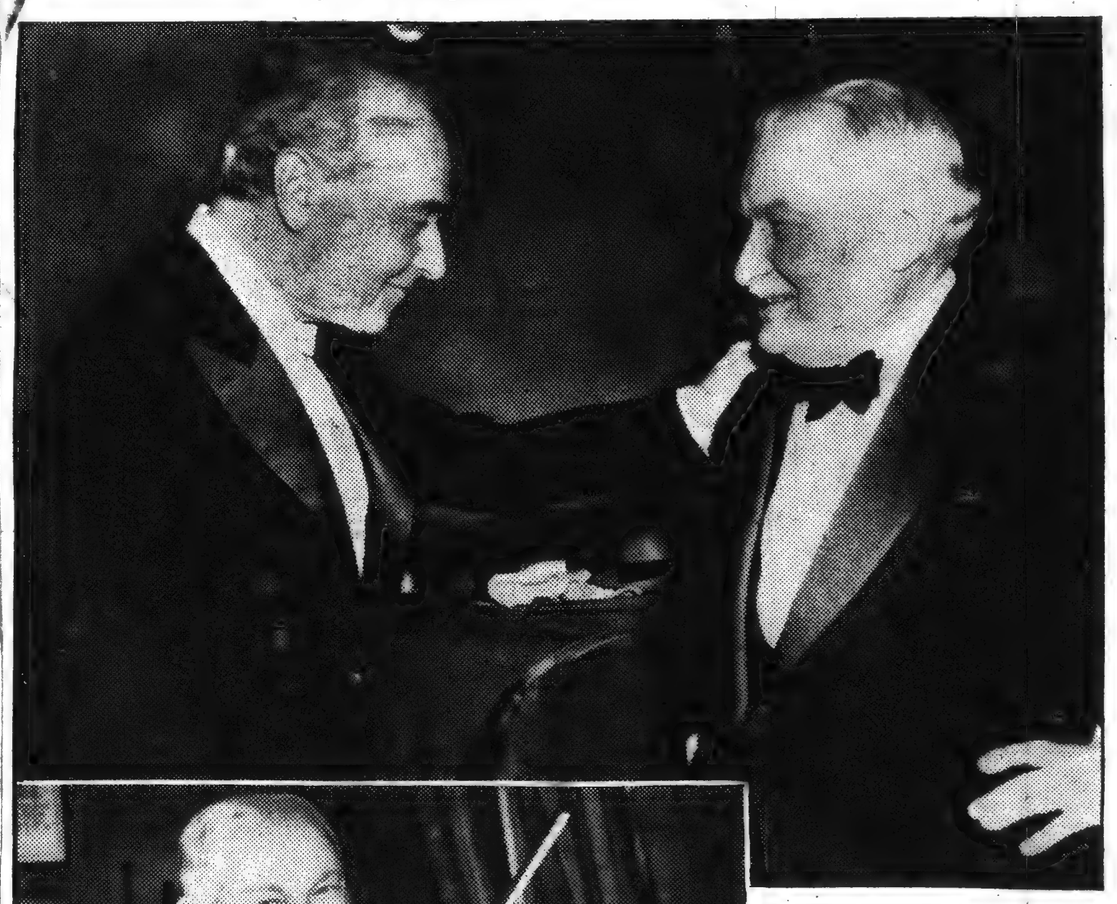
Soviet Music.

For the first time at the Boston Symphony concerts last week, Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the Fifth Symphony of the young Russian composer Shostakovitch. This, they tell us, is the work which on its first performance in Leningrad brought the composer back into the good graces of the Soviet regime from which he had fallen previously, apparently because his music did not reflect the new order there.

Whether it is possible to reflect a political philosohy in music is a question. This reviewer, hearing the symphony of last Friday, without the aid of program notes, might have identified it as Russian. It had Slavic characteristics and touches of Slavic melancholy amidst its sound and fury. But lacking previous knowledge, it would have been difficult to spot it as Soviet music, albeit beauty and grace were not its characteristics. The nearest approach to these was in the largo movement, in which every now and then a melodic theme appeared briefly merely to be tossed aside as if the composer were fearful of anything sentimental or sugary. Yet there was no denying that the clangor of the march passages which put the entire orchestra, piano and celesta into full cry had its thrill. At any rate, it was in sharp and strident contrast to the Mozart symphony which partnered it on the program.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 23 1940

He Played Again—And Remembered



WHILE Daniel Kuntz, who started with the Boston Symphony Orchestra just 59 years ago and played with it until 1914, waited for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, last night at the Metropolitan Theatre so that they could pose for the picture above, he took a violin from one of the musicians, tucked it under his chin—and remembered.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 23 1940

Violinist, 80, Who Looks 65, Tells How to Retain Youth

Veteran of Boston Symphony's First Concert Eats When He Is Hungry, Drinks When He Is Thirsty

By G. Y. Loveridge

Daniel Kuntz is only 80, looks more like recent 65. But he can remember a great many pleasant things and amusing things, most of which have to do with music.

He was sitting in a little room under the Metropolitan Theatre stage last night, among steam pipes and boilers, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiddlers tuning up on all sides, and the bassoonists burping, and the flute players giving forth elegant trills that seemed a little odd among the cement floors and iron staircases under the stage. Daniel Kuntz, sitting on a chair that had no back and clasping his hands about a cane that is more an ornament than a necessity, began to remember.

Saw Wagner Library

Fifty-nine years ago, precisely, he had been on the stage of the Boston Music Hall, waiting for Georg Henschel to give the sign that would start the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its first concert. Young Daniel was in the first violin section. At that moment he wasn't a particularly good violinist, but he got to be. He played with the symphony until 1914. He played at a Bayreuth festival once, and talked to Siegfried Wagner, who showed him Richard Wagner's library. He learned to know and love the great classics under the baton of leaders like Gericke and Muck.

He remembers when the men in the orchestra used to put their fiddles on their knees and laugh at the stupid stuff that a fellow named Richard Strauss had written and that they had been asked to play. They learned to appreciate Strauss, and even Debussy and Ravel.

"That's where I stopped," Mr. Kuntz smiled. "I don't know anything about the moderns."

He guardedly found the Shostakovitch fifth, on last night's program, "interesting," but Beethoven was another matter.

Still Fresh and New

"I have played and listened to his symphonies many, many times," he said, his blue eyes alight "and they are as fresh and new to me now as when I first heard them. I heard the seventh on the radio last Sunday. It was beautiful. But some of these new men try to impose their own personalities on Beethoven. That does not do for men who learned Beethoven from Gericke and Muck."

He remembers Gericke particularly, who used to say, "When I stand up here at rehearsal, I have no friends in the orchestra. But after rehearsal I like you all."

And so he did like them all. If they complained that their hotel rooms were not satisfactory, he inspected them himself and saw to it that they were well accommodated.

"We had a famous horn player, Xavier Reiter," Mr. Kuntz said. "He got a beautiful tone. He had long hair down to here, down to his shoulders. Sometimes when he had played a fine passage, he would raise the horn above his head and twirl it around, like this, right in the concert."

Recalls Gericke Incident

"Well, one night he was standing on the station platform and saying out loud, 'Look at Gericke. He has the only good stateroom, And I? What do I have? Does Gericke have to play horn tomorrow? No, but I do.'

"Gericke overheard him, He came out and invited Reiter into his stateroom. And Reiter slept there all night, and Gericke sat up in the smoking-car with the men all night from Portland to Boston."

It was in 1892 that he played at Bayreuth. He met Siegfried Wagner at a reception in the home of Madame Wagner.

"The young Siegfried came up to me and said, in English, 'You are from America?' And he took me to his father's library and showed me his scores and books, and he said, 'Do you know what composers my father liked best? Gluck, Weber, and Auber.' He showed me the scores."

How to Live Long

When Mr. Kuntz was complimented on his vigor at four-score, he laughed and remarked that his father, when 78, had appeared before five physicians, none of whom took him to be older than 65.

"They asked him what he did to live so long, and he said, 'Gentlemen, when I am hungry I eat, and when I am thirsty, I drink.' And I do the same. My father lived to be 85. I remember I sent him a five dollar bill once when the depression was on in Germany, and he got five million marks for it. But he couldn't buy breakfast with that. He wrote to me and said, 'I have lived a long time, but this is the first time I have been a millionaire.'"

Remembers Violin

As it was now about time for the concert to begin, Mr. Kuntz went upstairs to have his picture taken with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, when the conductor should come from his dressing room. He had to wait a minute or two. He began talking to the younger men of the orchestra, who were standing about.

Quietly he reached out and took a fiddle and a bow from one of them. He put the fiddle under his chin. He began to draw the bow across the strings. The jolly face began to grin. The stocky body danced without moving.

He remembered.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MALDEN, MASS.
NEWS
OCT 23 1940

ARCIERI TO LEAD SYMPHONY CONCERT

Program By New England Philharmonic Orchestra in New Malden High Hall Friday Night Under Lutheran Church Auspices. Eighty-five Players.

Emil Arcieri, well known members of Boston Symphony orchestra, will conduct the New England Philharmonic orchestra in a symphony concert Friday night at 8:15 in the new Malden High hall. The affair is under the direction of societies of the Lutheran church and has aroused much interest in Melrose, Medford and Everett, as well as Malden.

Mayor Wm A Hastings heads the list of patrons which includes Judge Emma Fall Schofield, Rev Carl S Ohman, pastor; Rev O K Olander, Miss Harriette M Perkins, teachers of Lincoln Junior High, Oliver T Bergstrom, Fire Com and Mrs L T West, Carl A Lindquist, Mr and Mrs Joseph Coguzzo, Mr and Mrs John D Brannon, the Ladies' Aid, Lutheran Guild and Men's club of the Lutheran church, Julius Johnson, Mr and Mrs John Haggkvist, Friendship circle, Mr and Mrs Leonard Bratt, Miss Ebba Anderson, Alvin Johnson, Miss Olive Dowd, Miss Eleanor Frey, Stanley Kelley, Miss Harriet Magnuson, Miss Marion Gustafson, A Russo & Sons, Tilden Motors of Melrose, Nelson's Bakery, Ideal Laundry Co, Lutheran church, Mr and Mrs Carl Schwartz, Mr and Mrs Richard Ericson, Mr and Mrs Carl Swanson, Mr and Mrs Elof Friberg, Mr and Mrs Harry Olson, Mr and Mrs C F Nystrom and Mr and Mrs Carlton R Nelson.

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
OCT 25 1940

What Others Have to Say

Letters from Readers of The News on Subjects and Questions of Contemporary Interest and Importance

To the Editor:

Sir—As a former Bostonian I beg to take exception to Willard B. Savary's expose of the Hub's cultural demise.

To begin with, classical music appreciation alone is not the ultimate in culture. However, if it were, Boston has for generations made substantial contributions thereto. A city of less than 1,000,000, Boston not only supported an opera house, but the Boston Symphony as well. And where else on earth do pop concerts enjoy such popularity?

New York, with a population of over 7,000,000, was obliged to solicit popular subscriptions to maintain its Metropolitan Opera.

Newark, with an ego twice the size of the Massachusetts capital, gets its opera dished out at rare intervals, attended with all the pomp and display that its snobbish suburbanites can muster.

In all of Beantown you'll find no former Jerseyite who will sit down and compose such a dissertation as Mr. Savary's on his Jersey home town, if for no other reason than association there has taught him better.

When it comes to scholastic moral and scientific culture, the gracious hospitality of its people and their general good manners, I'll still take Boston.

Newfoundland. M. J. O'GRADY.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
OCT 23 1940

MUSIC

Boston Symphony, Observing Anniversary of First Concert, Enthralls.

By G. Y. Loveridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which began in a small way in the Hub and has now worked up to five performances a season in Providence, had a birthday party in Metropolitan Theatre last night. The first concert was given in the old Boston Music Hall on Oct. 22, 1881; 59 years later, to the day and hour, the orchestra was receiving, as on many another occasion, the plaudits of discriminating outlanders in These Plantations.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducted. The program comprised the symphony No. 5 of Shostakovitch and the symphony No. 5 of Beethoven. They did not by any means add up to 10, but the evening was nonetheless interesting for that. The Shostakovitch produces a situation that may be said to be chronic between composers (those heaven-sent geniuses) and critics (them dopes). If an up-and-coming fellow tries something new he is accused of breaking the ear-drums of his listeners, flinging a pot of paint in the public's face, thumbing his nose at conservatism, and so on. If he doesn't try something new he is imitative, devoid of ideas, and so on in that direction.

So, now, Shostakovitch, having made a name for himself as a rebel and a new voice, comes forward with something that sets the teeth on edge hardly once in a dozen pages, and that does not seem at all baffling. What is the matter with the chap? Has working to the Soviet pattern stultified him? Has he said his say in earlier works? Surely he handles the orchestra with fluent mastery. He makes as much noise as Beethoven. But it isn't the same sort of noise. Here is a vigorous march, here a solo for flute with harp accompaniment, here the celesta, and, again, a sweep of strings, a dance among the basses. All wrought with skill, all interesting when played with the virtuosity that the Boston orchestra commands. But does one feel that this was music that sprang from any deep impulse or poetic insight? Echo, by some inexplicable acoustical phenomenon, answers, "No."

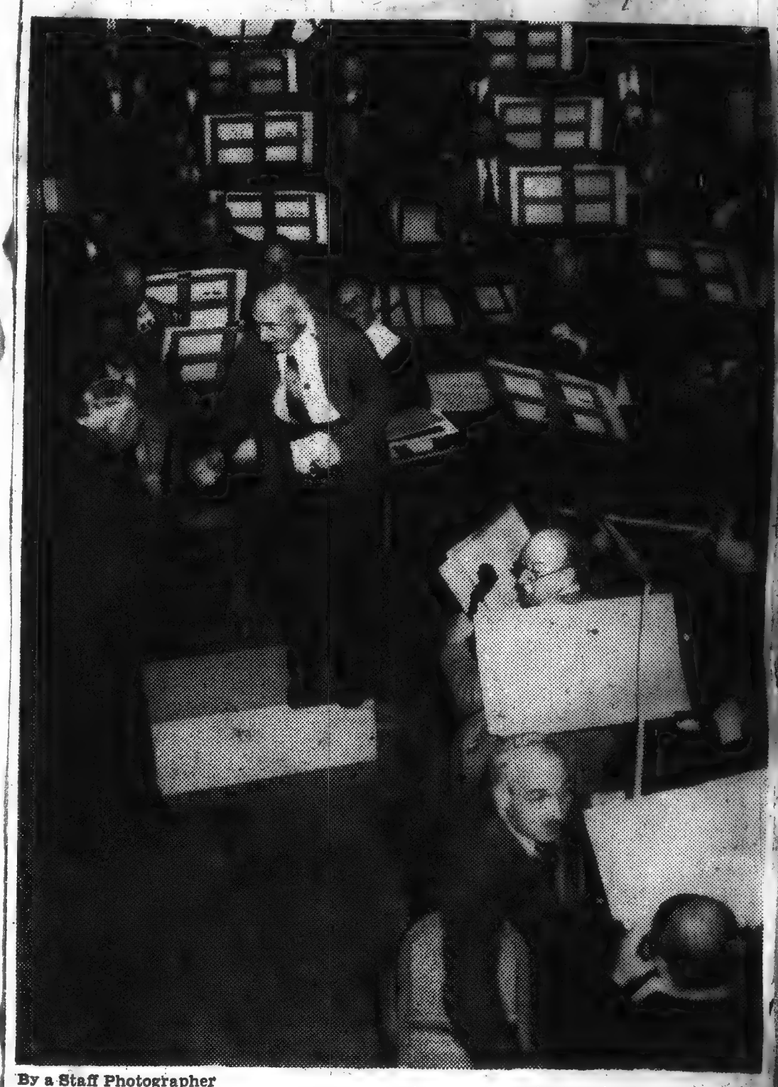
Now, as to Beethoven. If there is one symphony that is known to all the world (and there is not) it is the Fifth. Its rages, its determination, its lyricism have enchanted audiences for more than 100 years, and even the most cautious critic may safely proclaim it a masterpiece. Here is music urgent though familiar, in which one feels rather than hears the power of the composer.

Dr. Koussevitzky is famous for his unfolding of this work. He can create with it a sort of airflight thrill. One speeds evenly upon the earth, impatient, perhaps; to take to the sky. Suddenly one looks out, and the world is falling far away. Unimagined splendours reveal themselves. One lives in ethereal realms. Then, of course, one has to bail out rather coldly into the street and go home. But it was worth it.

Last night's revelation wasn't quite as good as that, but it will do. It certainly will.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR
BOSTON, TUESDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1940

Musician Honored



By a Staff Photographer

Member of First Orchestra Pays a Call

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, right, at conductor's desk, congratulates Daniel Kuntz, left, a member of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Kunz played in the first violin section at the first concert in Boston, Oct. 22, 1881.

Original Symphony Member Honored as Season Opens

Before Dr. Serge Koussevitzky shed his leaf-brown jacket, tore off his tie and opened his shirt at the throat under the mounting demands of a full orchestra rehearsal today, he took time to extend a gracious greeting to Daniel Kuntz of Boston. Mr. Kuntz, long-time member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, played in the first violin section under Conductor Georg Henschel at the first concert in Boston, the afternoon of Oct. 21, 1881.

Mr. Kuntz's appearance at Symphony Hall, as guest of Dr. Koussevitzky, marked the anniversary of the opening of the 60th season of the famed orchestra. He must have followed the rehearsal with mixed feelings, recalling, as he did later, the afternoon in 1881 when half a house, "and mostly schoolgirls," giggled when the conductor stopped the musicians fully ten times in the second movement of the First Symphony of Beethoven to correct ragged playing. Maj. Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra, finally sent word to the stage to make no further halts during the program. The musicians, Mr. Kuntz said, were all skilled players but were inexperienced in playing together and had little spirit of ensemble.

Introduced to Players

Dr. Koussevitsky introduced Mr. Kuntz to his players and congratulated him on his long years of service in music. Mr. Kuntz responded with a warm comment that he was very proud that Dr. Kousseviszky had kept the standard of his orchestra so high and hoped that it will continue so under his baton. The orchestra rose on Mr. Kuntz's departure from the stage.

In the half-light of the first balcony, just beyond a curtain that cut off the stage from the huge hall, Mr. Kuntz listened to one of the numbers to be played by the orchestra in Providence, R. I., tonight. Outside, he spoke of the earlier conductors of the '80's and up to 1914, when he resigned.

He recalled that the first program was played at "a public rehearsal" (for which tickets were sold), on Friday afternoon, Oct. 21, 1881, in Music Hall, in Hamilton Place off Tremont Street. So well was this experimental orchestra of 60 men received that it was active there for 19 years. In 1900 it moved to its permanent home in Symphony Hall.

Wedding Day

Conductor Henschel, later Sir Georg Henschel, he recalls as a fine musician, pianist, singer, composer, but not an experienced conductor. Wilhelm Gericke, who conducted from 1884 to 1889 and from 1898 to 1906, was a "drill-master and disciplinarian"; Arthur Nikisch (1889-1903), a poet. Mr. Nikisch demurred when Mr. Kuntz asked permission to be absent from one Thursday rehearsal but agreed when his violinist explained that he planned to be married that day. "But promise me," the conductor added, "that it won't happen again."

Mr. Kuntz played also under Max Fiedler, Emil Paur, and Karl Muck.

"Pops" are not new to Boston, he says. He was concertmaster of the "Promenades" in the old Music Hall downtown from May to September, 1886. These were the forerunner to present-day "Pops" and music went with refreshments.

He was leader of the orchestra for 22 summers at Poland Springs Hotel; 17 summers at the Lake Placid Club. He also conducted the orchestra at the Repertory Theater, under the direction of Henry Jewett. It is still recalled that audiences arrived early in order to enjoy the music preceding the play.

Concert Season Opened By Boston Symphony

Works of Contemporary Composer Delights Near Capacity Audience

By JOHN E. KENTON

Serge Koussevitzky opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixtieth year last night before an enthusiastic audience in Metropolitan Theatre. The orchestra played two fifth symphonies, contrasting the fifth symphony of the greatest of the Old Masters with the fifth of one of the contemporary composers farthest advanced in new musical fields.

Dmitri Shostakovitch, the contemporary represented on last night's program, wrote his Fifth Symphony in 1937. Shostakovitch's earlier works had met with cold receptions in Russia, being denounced as reflecting bouregois tastes and betraying the cultural ideology of the Soviet. It seemed as though Shostakovitch's promising career had come to a sudden end due to this official displeasure, when his Fifth Symphony was introduced and won resounding acclaim throughout Russia. Musicians and the laity outdid one did one another praising it and thus Shostakovitch was vindicated.

Indescribably Astonishing

This symphony is indescribably astonishing. Of course, it would have to be astonishing to ears accustomed only to Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—or even to Richard Strauss, Stravinsky, and Sibelius. It is no easy matter to try to describe a symphony so utterly novel and unfamiliar in conception as this one. A theme by theme and movement by movement description such as given in the program notes, riddled with cliches, would mean absolutely nothing here. But, although this corner does not claim to have "understood" this symphony last night—in fact we doubt if we could understand it after two or four or six hearings—nevertheless we did carry away certain definite impressions.

Symphony of Contrasts

Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony is a symphony of contrasts. There is a striking contrast between the humorous second movement and the deadly earnestness of the finale. There is a world of contrast between the beginning of the second movement which contains a spirit akin to that of Prokofieff's Classical and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphonies, and the beginning of the third movement which has an air of Bach or Handel about it. And above all there is the contrast between these vague traces of the styles of other composers, and the stunning originality that pervades the entire symphony.

It was a memorable experience to hear this symphony for the first time, and a distinctly pleasant one. The new musical territory which Shostakovich is exploring seem to us far more genuine, more interesting, more enjoyable, and more promising than the barren ones of Sibelius.

It is interesting to note the irony connected with the success of this symphony in Russia. For Shostakovitch's earlier symphonies which had explicit political messages were condemned as being "formalistic"; and the Fifth, which is abstract and is based to a greater extent on old structural and harmonic forms, is hailed as being folk-conscious and "consonant with Soviet philosophy". But Pravda and Izvestia and the rest of the Soviet press are, it seems to us, rather near-sighted in considering this symphony as a vehicle of national or political expression. Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony impressed us as being the kind of music that is international in conception and scope, and long-lived in popularity.

The other Fifth Symphony on last night's program was the all-too-familiar one of Beethoven's. Although this masterpiece has suffered somewhat from being overplayed, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it an exquisite performance that made it seem new and fresh again.

OPENS SEASON

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the first Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

Symphony Concerts

By LEO GAFFNEY

THREE great pieces of descriptive, or "program," music enlivened and illumined the Symphony concerts over the weekend.

For a First Performance we had the tone poem, "Cypresses," by the distinguished contemporary Italian (now forced in this direction by the war), Castelnuovo-Tedesco.

Written in 1920 as a piano work, "Cypresses" was recently orchestrated by the composer. Now, as before, "Cypresses" dotes on the solemn beauty of Tuscany's wooded hills, moving the composer—and the audience, too—to moody consideration of the forest primeval.

The melancholy oboe carries the principal tune—with the strings sweeping it along in windy gusts, all expressive of the leafy secrets whispered or roared by the swaying branches.

"Cypresses" may not be permanent music, but it is certainly impressive of an autumn afternoon. Needless to say, Koussevitzky and his musicians gave it eloquent performance. The composer was present to acknowledge grateful applause.

There was also Chabrier's "Bouree Fantasque," another piano piece enlarged for orchestra; Strauss' agonizingly beautiful "Death and Transfiguration," and Papa Haydn's Paris Symphony, the G major, the latter perfect offset for the emotions of the others.

In "Bouree Fantasque" Chabrier did a little doting himself. The "bouree," peasant dance of his native Auvergne, he whipped up into a tone poem—most of it pretty lively—expressive of the grim folks of that area. Koussevitzky performed it with evident enjoyment.

Of the Haydn Symphony and Strauss tone poem there can be nothing else to report, save that both works are now "standard" in Symphony Hall, and, as usual, came to performance with stunning vigor and effect.

Dorothy Maynor In Recital

SHE lost every test except the hardest. That explains why fame as the greatest singing "find" in 10 years has come to Dorothy Maynor, young Negro soprano, who will give her first Symphony Hall song recital on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 17.

Miss Maynor had met with one failure after another in competitive auditions. Someone else always won. But Miss Maynor counted her failures as pieces of good fortune. She took them as timely warnings that she needed more preparation and she acted accordingly. So, when confronted with the severest test of all, she was equal to it.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One listener came away from the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon with new faith in Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The more important of the two reasons for that exalted state of mind was a magnificent performance. So carefully imagined was Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation and so perfectly realized by the orchestra, that one might have been hearing the score for the first time.

"Death and Transfiguration" came at the end of a thoroughly enjoyable program. At the beginning was Haydn's G major Symphony, No. 88 (crisply done), and in between came orchestral transcriptions of two piano pieces—"Cypresses" by Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, and Chabrier's delectable but almost forgotten "Fantastic Bourree."

Spirit, idiom and "program" of "Death and Transfiguration" are 19th Century—mystically cheerful (or vice versa), full-blown, somewhat extravagantly poetic. Along with other manifestations of the 19th Century it has taken much abuse from some of the intellectual boys who would prefer to believe that nothing much of value happened between 1800 and the first World War. True, one has to be in the right mood for the score, but granted the right mood and such a recreation as Mr. Koussevitzky brought about, there is no difficulty in recognizing the enduring nature of the music.

Yet perhaps more than the other Strauss tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration" is very sensitive to interpretation. One has heard it done in a manner to makeit superficial. What is required is a poetic conception, complete belief in the soul of a dying man released into immortality, and in the alternately sentimental and heaven-storming character of the musical style. That is required, by the way, from both conductor and audience. This music must be felt. It cannot be rationalized.

Mr. Koussevitzky drew from the orchestra brass, wood and string sonorities that sent ecstatic chills down one's book. Those pages where death is illumined by a soul transfigured might have been a rending of heaven itself.

Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco has a romantic dispostion though he happens to be under 50. "Cypresses" must be of especial significance to him because it is a memory of a place where he and his wife lived and where he composed much of his music—the house called Usigliano di Lari on a cypress-clad hilltop in Tuscany. He wrote "Cypresses" as a piano piece 20 years ago, and orchestrated it the same year. Last Spring, at his present home in Larchmont, N. Y., he devised a second orchestration, and it is this which is heard, for the first times anywhere, at these concerts.

Castelnuovo-Tedesco writes warmly, delicately, taking great care to make transparent the soft colors of his orchestration. In "Cypresses" is a wealth of subtle contrasts and detail, of which Mr. Koussevitzky must surely have made the most. As a descriptive idyll of miniature proportions, the work has a valid claim to attention. The composer showed his enjoyment of the performance when he strode from his seat in the hall and shook hands with the conductor.

Poor Chabrier has been relegated to so-called "popular" concerts. As if he were not entitled to a hearing on more "serious" programs now and then! His "Espana" has survived better than most of his works. The "Fantastic Bourree," originally for piano and orchestrated years ago by the great conductor, Felix Mottl, has been unjustly neglected. While of no great consequence, its sheer joyousness of rhythm and melody is irresistible. Now that Mr. Koussevitzky has revived the score, one hopes he may go on to other music of the past which may not be masterpieces but whose occasional performance will freshen the symphonic repertory. C. W. D.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 3rd regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony in G major No. 88
Castelnuovo-Tedesco
"Cipressi" (Remembrance of the Cypresses of Usigliano di Lari)
Chabrier.....Bouree Fantasque (orchestrated by Felix Mottl
Strauss....."Tod und Verklaerung," Tone Poem Op. 24

Here was a concert of memorable performances, a thoroughly ingratiating and impressive program. The Haydn symphony is a gem, of which the brightest facet is perhaps the musette-like trio. Musettes, with their charming bagpipe drone, are conventionally supposed to be contrasted with gavottes; but Haydn evidently saw no reason why he should not exploit this manner in the minuet movement of a symphony.

The slow movement of this symphony is a particularly lovely largo, which Mr. Koussevitzky chose to take with great deliberation. Often this practice can spoil the classical slow movements, but in this case we felt that the conductor was completely justified by the results he obtained. On the other hand there was not the same excuse for the frenzied speed with which he whipped along the finale. Yes, the orchestra can play it thus and still maintain clarity; but it is not an artistic way of treating it.

Mr. Castelnuovo-Tedesco was in the audience yesterday to acknowledge the cordial applause for his orchestrated piano piece, "Cipressi." The piece is a charming, if not particularly original, work. It is rather on the lush side and in that vein is certainly effective. One can readily see how it would be successful as a piano piece, and the composer has also brilliantly succeeded in this, his second orchestration of it.

It is quite incredible that Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque has not been played at these concerts in fifteen years. Unaccountably, too, it is not often heard at piano recitals; nor is the composer's Valse-Scherzo, a grand piece for a virtuoso. Felix Mottl has made a splendidly exciting piece for orchestral display, of which, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage. It is a vastly attractive work, one that requires to be played with the last word in orchestral polish. You want, and we in fact got, a performance of glittering precision and a good dash of worldliness. Most conductors are so concerned with finding spiritual values in music that they are unwilling to show a cloven hoof. Mr. Koussevitzky, fortunately, had no qualms about doing the Bourree Fantasque up brown.

While we are on the subject, is it not time for reviving the same composer's "Espana"? Possibly some will object that the piece is heard too often over the radio. But we are not all radio addicts, and besides the Boston Symphony would play it so well. Moreover, Chabrier's 100th anniversary in January, 1941, would provide the occasion. Mr. Koussevitzky might also repeat the Bourree, for we do not always have so much fun at a concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" wears better than we had thought it would. Looking up our report of it in these columns three years ago we find that we had placed it midway in Strauss's tone poems between the best and the worst and had objected that it was too similar to and not as good as "Zarathustra." On the basis of yesterday's remarkably eloquent performance we should amend that opinion. The work has more unity in conveying its spiritual mood than we had given it credit for. The "program," if taken very generally, becomes strangely moving. Even the prolonged apotheosis has point and is not as tedious as we remember it to have been. Can it be that, after many years and much ink of protest, we are about to be converted to Strauss? But no; we shall buy records of the "Heldenleben" and the "Domestica" and hold the fort a while yet!

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's 3rd "Leonore" Overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade;" and Arthur Shepherd will conduct has own 2nd Symphony in D minor.

SYMPHONY IN SHORT PIECES

List Played One of Violent Contrasts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was one of violent contrasts. First, Haydn's generally sprightly Symphony in G major, No. 88, a pleasant novelty from Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, "Cipressi" (Cypresses) and the gay and witty Bouree Fantasque of Chabrier, as orchestrated by Mottl, and then, in a preternaturally solemn performance, the "Death and Transfiguration" of Strauss.

Many conductors nowadays are bolstering up a languishing repertory with transcriptions of short piano pieces. Not so Dr. Koussevitzky, who as a rule ignores such tidbits. Yesterday, however, there were two, since Mr. Castelnuovo-Tedesco's piece was his own orchestrated and then reorchestrated version of a piano composition that has enjoyed considerable vogue in its own right. The reorchestration, and a luscious one it is, was heard yesterday for the first time and with the composer, who now makes his home in Larchmont, N. Y., in attendance.

At Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation the distinguished visitor left his seat and walked down the centre aisle to the stage, where he shook hands with conductor and concert master, congratulated the richly deserving orchestra and modestly acknowledged the applause of his fellow auditors. Pleasant piece; pleasant occasion.

While on the matter of applause, the unmistakable enthusiasm aroused by Haydn's Symphony suggested a reversal of values. As time goes on, Haydn's symphonies gain rather than lose in appeal. Can as much honestly be said for the more imposing symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven? This No. 88 is one of the most delightful, and boasts withal the finest slow movement of any 18th century symphony. There are, nevertheless, many other charming symphonies of Haydn which are not heard at Symphony Hall today. Surely two or three a year would not be too many.

According to the individual listener's response Dr. Koussevitzky's underscoring of "Tod und Verklaerung," his abnormally slow tempo at the beginning, his very deliberate unfolding of the close made the music more impressive, or less impressive, than it might have been in a more straightforward, less artfully contrived presentation. The general verdict was plainly one of complete and emphatic approval.

Concert Season Opened By Boston Symphony

Works of Contemporary Composer Delights Near Capacity Audience

By JOHN E. KENTON

Serge Koussevitzky opened the Providence season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's sixtieth year last night before an enthusiastic audience in Metropolitan Theatre. The orchestra played two fifth symphonies, contrasting the fifth symphony of the greatest of the Old Masters with the fifth of one of the contemporary composers farthest advanced in new musical fields.

Dmitri Shostakovitch, the contemporary represented on last night's program, wrote his Fifth Symphony in 1937. Shostakovitch's earlier works had met with cold receptions in Russia, being denounced as reflecting bouregois tastes and betraying the cultural ideology of the Soviet. It seemed as though Shostakovitch's promising career had come to a sudden end due to this official displeasure, when his Fifth Symphony was introduced and won resounding acclaim throughout Russia. Musicians and the laity outdid one did one another praising it and thus Shostakovitch was vindicated.

Indescribably Astonishing

This symphony is indescribably astonishing. Of course, it would have to be astonishing to ears accustomed only to Bach, Beethoven and Brahms—or even to Richard Strauss, Stravinsky, and Sibelius. It is no easy matter to try to describe a symphony so utterly novel and unfamiliar in conception as this one. A theme by theme and movement by movement description such as given in the program notes, riddled with cliches, would mean absolutely nothing here. But, although this corner does not claim to have "understood" this symphony last night—in fact we doubt if we could understand it after two or four or six hearings—nevertheless we did carry away certain definite impressions.

Symphony of Contrasts

Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony is a symphony of contrasts. There is a striking contrast between the humorous second movement and the deadly earnestness of the finale. There is a world of contrast between the beginning of the second movement which contains a spirit akin to that of Prokofieff's Classical and Berlioz's Fantastic Symphonies, and the beginning of the third movement which has an air of Bach or Handel about it. And above all there is the contrast between these vague traces of the styles of other composers, and the stunning originality that pervades the entire symphony.

It was a memorable experience to hear this symphony for the first time, and a distinctly pleasant one. The new musical territory which Shostakovich is exploring seem to us far more genuine, more interesting, more enjoyable, and more promising than the barren ones of Sibelius.

It is interesting to note the irony connected with the success of this symphony in Russia. For Shostakovitch's earlier symphonies which had explicit political messages were condemned as being "formalistic"; and the Fifth, which is abstract and is based to a greater extent on old structural and harmonic forms, is hailed as being folk-conscious and "consonant with Soviet philosophy". But Pravda and Izvestia and the rest of the Soviet press are, it seems to us, rather near-sighted in considering this symphony as a vehicle of national or political expression. Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony impressed us as being the kind of music that is international in conception and scope, and long-lived in popularity.

The other Fifth Symphony on last night's program was the all-too-familiar one of Beethoven's. Although this masterpiece has suffered somewhat from being overplayed, Dr. Koussevitzky gave it an exquisite performance that made it seem new and fresh again.

OPENS SEASON

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, who conducted the first Providence concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

Dorothy Maynor In Recital

SHE lost every test except the hardest. That explains why fame as the greatest singing "find" in 10 years has come to Dorothy Maynor, young Negro soprano, who will give her first Symphony Hall song recital on Sunday afternoon, Nov. 17.

Miss Maynor had met with one success after another in competition. Someone also always [illegible] But Miss Maynor [illegible] pieces of [illegible] She took them as [illegible] that she needed [illegible] and she acted [illegible] So, when confronted [illegible] greatest test of all [illegible]

Adv Oct. 27

Symphony Concerts

By LEO GAFFNEY

THREE great pieces of descriptive, or "program," music enlivened and illumined the Symphony concerts over the weekend.

For a First Performance we had the tone poem, "Cypresses," by the distinguished contemporary Italian (now forced in this direction by the war), Castelnuovo-Tedesco.

Written in 1920 as a piano work, "Cypresses" was recently orchestrated by the composer. Now, as before, "Cypresses" dotes on the solemn beauty of Tuscany's wooded hills, moving the composer—and the audience, too—to moody consideration of the forest primeval.

The melancholy oboe carries the principal tune—with the strings sweeping it along in windy gusts, all expressive of the leafy secrets whispered or roared by the swaying branches.

"Cypresses" may not be permanent music, but it is certainly impressive of an autumn afternoon. Needless to say, Koussevitzky and his musicians gave it [illegible]

There was also Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque," another piano piece enlarged for orchestra; Strauss' agonizingly beautiful "Death and Transfiguration," and Papa Haydn's Paris Symphony, the G major, the latter perfect offset for the emotions of the others.

In "Bourree Fantasque" Chabrier did a little doting himself. The "bouree," peasant dance of his native Auvergne, he whipped up into a tone poem—most of it pretty lively—expressive of the grim folks of that area. Koussevitzky performed it with evident enjoyment.

Of the Haydn Symphony and Strauss tone poem there can be nothing else to report, save that both works are now "entered in [illegible] Koussevitzky [illegible] cause to perform [illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One listener came away from the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon with new faith in Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The more important of the two reasons for that exalted state of mind was a magnificent performance. So carefully imagined was Serge Koussevitzky's interpretation and so perfectly realized by the orchestra, that one might have been hearing the score for the first time.

"Death and Transfiguration" came at the end of a thoroughly enjoyable program. At the beginning was Haydn's G major Symphony, No. 88 (crisply done), and in between came orchestral transcriptions of two piano pieces—"Cypresses" by Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, and Chabrier's delectable but almost forgotten "Fantastic Bourree."

Spirit, idiom, and "program" of "Death and Transfiguration" are 19th Century—mystically cheerful (or vice versa), full-blown, somewhat extravagantly poetic. Along with other manifestations of the 19th Century it has taken much abuse from some of the intellectual boys who would prefer to believe that nothing much of value happened between 1800 and the first World War. True, one has to be in the right mood for the score, but granted the right mood and such a recreation as Mr. Koussevitzky brought about, there is no difficulty in recognizing the enduring nature of the music.

Yet perhaps more than the other Strauss tone poems, "Death and Transfiguration" is very sensitive to interpretation. One has heard it done in a manner to make it superficial. What is required is a poetic conception, complete belief in the soul of a dying man released into immortality, and in the alternately sentimental and heaven-storming character of the musical style. That is required, by the way, from both conductor and audience. This music must be felt. It cannot be rationalized.

Mr. Koussevitzky drew from the orchestra brass, wood and string sonorities that sent ecstatic chills down one's book. Those pages where death is illumined by a soul transfigured might have been a rending of heaven itself.

Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco has a romantic dispostion though he happens to be under 50. "Cypresses" must be of especial significance to him because it is a memory of a place where he and his wife lived and where he composed much of his music—the house called Usigliano di Lari on a cypress-clad hilltop in Tuscany. He wrote "Cypresses" as a piano piece 20 years ago, and orchestrated it the same year. Last Spring, at his present home in Larchmont, N. Y., he devised a second orchestration, and it is this which is heard, for the first times anywhere, at these concerts.

Castelnuovo-Tedesco writes warmly, delicately, taking great care to make transparent the soft colors of his orchestration. In "Cypresses" is a wealth of subtle contrasts and detail, of which Mr. Koussevitzky must surely have made the most. As a descriptive idyll of miniature proportions, the work has a valid claim to attention. The composer showed his enjoyment of the performance when he strode from his seat in the hall and shook hands with the conductor.

Poor Chabrier has been relegated to so-called "popular" concerts. As if he were not entitled to a hearing on more "serious" programs now and then! His "Espana" has survived better than most of his works. The "Fantastic Bourree," originally for piano and orchestrated years ago by the great conductor, Felix Mottl, has been unjustly neglected. While of no great consequence, its sheer joyousness of rhythm and melody is irresistible. Now that Mr. Koussevitzky has revived the score, one hopes he may go on to other music of the past which may not be masterpieces but whose occasional performance will freshen the symphonic repertory. C. W. D.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 3rd regular concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Haydn.....Symphony in G major No. 88
Castelnuovo-Tedesco
"Cipressi" (Remembrance of the Cypresses of Usigliano di Lari)
Chabrier.....Bourree Fantasque (orchestrated by Felix Mottl
Strauss.....Tod und Verklaerung," Tone Poem Op. 24

Here was a concert of memorable performances, a thoroughly ingratiating and impressive program. The Haydn symphony is a gem, of which the brightest facet is perhaps the musette trio. Musettes, with their charming bagpipe drone, are conventionally supposed to be contrasted with gavottes; but Haydn evidently saw no reason why he should not exploit this manner in the minuet movement of a symphony.

The slow movement of this symphony is a particularly lovely largo, which Mr. Koussevitzky chose to take with great deliberation. Often this practice can spoil the classical slow movements, but in this case we felt that the conductor was completely justified by the results he obtained. On the other hand there was not the same excuse for the frenzied speed with which he whipped along the finale. Yes, the orchestra can play it thus and still maintain clarity; but it is not an artistic way of treating it.

Mr. Castelnuovo-Tedesco was in the audiance yesterday to acknowledge the cordial applause for his orchestrated piano piece, "Cipressi." The piece is a charming, if not particularly original, work. It is rather on the lush side and in that vein is certainly effective. One can readily see how it would be successful as a piano piece, and the composer has also brilliantly succeeded in this, his second orchestration of it.

It is quite incredible that Chabrier's Bourree Fantasque has not been played at these concerts in fifteen years. Unaccountably, too, it is not often heard at piano recitals; nor is the composer's Valse-Scherzo, a grand piece for a virtuoso. Felix Mottl has made a splendidly exciting piece for orchestral display, of which, needless to say, Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage. It is a vastly attractive work, one that requires to be played with the last word in orchestral polish. You want, and we in fact got, a performance of glittering precision and a good dash of worldliness. Most conductors are so concerned with finding spiritual values in music that they are unwilling to show a cloven hoof. Mr. Koussevitzky, fortunately, had no qualms about doing the Bourree Fantasque up brown.

While we are on the subject, is it not time for reviving the same composer's "Espana"? Possibly some will object that the piece is heard too often over the radio. But we are not all radio addicts, and besides the Boston Symphony would play it so well. Moreover, Chabrier's 100th anniversary in January, 1941, would provide the occasion. Mr. Koussevitzky might also repeat the Bourree, for we do not always have so much fun at a concert.

Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" wears better than we had thought it would. Looking up our report of it in these columns three years ago we find that we had placed it midway in Strauss's tone poems between the best and the worst and had objected that it was too similar to and not as good as "Zarathustra." On the basis of yesterday's remarkably eloquent performance we should amend that opinion. The work has more unity in conveying its spiritual mood than we had given it credit for. The "program," if taken very generally, becomes strangely moving. Even the prolonged apotheosis has point and is not as tedious as we remember it to have been. Can it be that, after many years and much ink of protest, we are about to be converted to Strauss? But no; we shall buy records of the "Heldenleben" and the "Domestica" and hold the fort a while yet!

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct Beethoven's 3rd "Leonore" Overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade;" and Arthur Shepherd will conduct his own 2nd Symphony in D minor.

SYMPHONY IN SHORT PIECES

List Played One of Violent Contrasts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert was one of violent contrasts. First, Haydn's generally sprightly Symphony in G major, No. 88, a pleasant novelty from Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco, "Cipressi" (Cypresses) and the gay and witty Bouree Fantasque of Chabrier, as orchestrated by Mottl, and then, in a preternaturally solemn performance, the "Death and Transfiguration" of Strauss.

Many conductors nowadays are bolstering up a languishing repertory with transcriptions of short piano pieces. Not so Dr. Koussevitzky, who as a rule ignores such tidbits. Yesterday, however, there were two, since Mr. Castelnuovo-Tedesco's piece was his own orchestrated and then reorchestrated version of a piano composition that has enjoyed considerable vogue in its own right. The reorchestration, and a luscious one it is, was heard yesterday for the first time and with the composer, who now makes his home in Larchmont, N. Y., in attendance.

At Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation the distinguished visitor left his seat and walked down the centre aisle to the stage, where he shook hands with conductor and concert master, congratulated the richly deserving orchestra and modestly acknowledged the applause of his fellow auditors. Pleasant piece; pleasant occasion.

While on the matter of applause, the unmistakable enthusiasm aroused by Haydn's Symphony suggested a reversal of values. As time goes on, Haydn's symphonies gain rather than lose in appeal. Can as much honestly be said for the more imposing symphonies of Mozart and Beethoven? This No. 88 is one of the most delightful, and boasts withal the finest slow movement of any 18th century symphony. There are, nevertheless, many other charming symphonies of Haydn which are not heard at Symphony Hall today. Surely two or three a year would not be too many.

According to the individual listener's response Dr. Koussevitzky's underscoring of "Tod und Verklaerung," his abnormally slow tempo at the beginning, his very deliberate unfolding of the close made the music more impressive, or less impressive, than it might have been in a more straightforward, less artfully contrived presentation. The general verdict was plainly one of complete and emphatic approval.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 23 1940

21

Veteran of First Concert Recalls Early Days of Boston Symphony

Daniel Kuntz, 80, in First Violin Section 59 Years Ago in Hub Music Hall; Saw Wagner's Library at Bayreuth in 1892

By G. Y. Loveridge

Daniel Kuntz is only 80, looks more like recent 65. But he can remember a great many pleasant things and amusing things, most of which have to do with music.

He was sitting in a little room under the Metropolitan Theatre stage last night, among steam pipes and boilers, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiddlers tuning up on all sides, and the bassoonists burping, and the flute players giving forth elegant trills that seemed a little odd among the cement floors and iron staircases under the stage. Daniel Kuntz, sitting on a chair that had no back and clasping his hands about a cane that is more an ornament than a necessity, began to remember.

Fifty-nine years ago, precisely, he had been on the stage of the Boston Music Hall, waiting for Georg Henschel to give the sign that would start the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its first concert. Young Daniel was in the first violin section. At that moment he wasn't a particularly good violinist, but he got to be. He played with the symphony until 1914. He played at a Bayreuth festival once, and talked to Siegfried Wagner, who showed him Richard Wagner's library. He learned to know and love the great classics under the baton of leaders like Gericke and Muck.

He remembers when the men in the orchestra used to put their fiddles on their knees and laugh at the stupid stuff that a fellow named Richard Strauss had written and that they had been asked to play. They learned to appreciate Strauss, and even Debussy and Ravel.

"That's where I stopped," Mr. Kuntz smiled. "I don't know anything about the moderns."

He guardedly found the Shostakovitch fifth, on last night's program, "interesting," but Beethoven was another matter.

"I have played and listened to his symphonies [illegible] many times," he said, his blue eyes alight "and they are as fresh and new to me now as when I first heard them. I heard the seventh on the radio last Sunday. It was beautiful. But some of these new men try to impose their own personalities on Beethoven. That does not do for men who learned Beethoven from Gericke and Muck."

He remembers Gericke particularly, who used to say, "When I stand up here at rehearsal, I have no friends in the orchestra. But after rehearsal I like you all."

And so he did like them all. If they complained that their hotel rooms were not satisfactory, he inspected them himself and saw to it that they were well accommodated.

"We had a famous horn player, Xavier Reiter," Mr. Kuntz said. "He got a beautiful tone. He had long hair down to here, down to his shoulders. Sometimes when he had played a fine passage, he would raise the horn above his head and twirl it around, like this, right in the concert."

"Well, one night he was standing on the station platform and saying out loud, 'Look at Gericke. He has the only good stateroom, And I? What do I have? Does Gericke have to play horn tomorrow? No, but I do.'

"Gericke overheard him, He came out and invited Reiter into his stateroom. And Reiter slept there all night, and Gericke sat up in the smoking-car with the men all night from Portland to Boston."

It was in 1892 that he played at Bayreuth. He met Siegfried Wagner at a reception in the home of Madame Wagner.

"The young Siegfried came up to me and said, in English, 'You are from America?' And he took me to his father's library and showed me his scores and books, and he said, 'Do you know what composers my father liked best? Gluck, Weber, and Auber.' He showed me the scores."

When Mr. Kuntz was complimented on his vigor at four-score, he laughed and remarked that his father, when 78, had appeared before five physicians, none of whom took him to be older than 65.

"They asked him what he did to live so long, and he said, 'Gentlemen, when I am hungry I eat, and when I am thirsty, I drink.' And I do the same. My father lived to be 85. I remember I sent him a five dollar bill once when the depression was on in Germany, and he got fi[illegible] million marks for it. But he could[illegible] buy breakfast with that. He wrote to me and said, 'I have lived a long time, but this is the first time I have been a millionaire.'"

As it was now about time for the concert to begin, Mr. Kuntz went upstairs to have his picture taken with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, when the conductor should come from his dressing room. He had to wait a minute or two. He began talking to the younger men of the orchestra, who were standing about.

Quietly he reached out and took a fiddle and a bow from one of them. He put the fiddle under his chin. He began to draw the bow across the strings. The jolly face began to grin. The stocky body danced without moving.

He remembered.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 27 1940

A capacity audience of society people greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Metropolitan Theatre Tuesday evening when it presented the first concert of its season under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

A number of dinner parties were given before the concert.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
OCT 23 1940

They Attended Opening Concert of Symphony

PHOTOGRAPHED LAST EVENING as they arrived at the Metropolitan Theatre to attend the opening concert of the 60th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city were (above) Mr. and Mrs. Ashbell T. Wall, Jr., and (left photo) Mrs. Louis M. Ream and her daughter, Miss Janet Thresher.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
OCT 29 1940

Boston to Hear Dr. Shepherd's Work Friday

DR. ARTHUR SHEPHERD, distinguished composer and musician, head of the division of music at Western Reserve University, will direct his Second Symphony in D Minor as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

DR. ARTHUR SHEPHERD

Dr. Shepherd thus achieves a goal that long has been his ambition. He was brought up musically in the effulgent glow of this great Koussevitzky instrumental group. He received his early training at the New England Conservatory in Boston, where later he became a [illegible]

Now he has been invited by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky to direct the Shepherd Second Symphony with the Boston Symphony Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. This notable modern score was given its premiere by the Cleveland Orchestra in Severance Hall last March, with Dr. Shepherd driecting.

Dr. Koussevitzky will open the Boston program with the Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3 and close it with the Rimsky-Korsakoff "Scheherezade" suite. The Cleveland Orchestra has performed half a dozen or more of Dr. Shepherd's compositions, including the premiere of his First Symphony, "Horizons," tonal pictures of the West.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

ROCKLAND, ME
COURIER
10/29/40

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

OCTOBER 23, 1940

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Oscar Levant in his "Smattering of Ignorance" terms as the greatest orchestra in the world today, opened its 6th season on Oct. 11, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. A handsome brochure used for the occasion commemorated these six decades of continuous activity, and recalled the days of 1881 when Boston citizens waited all night in a long queue for their season tickets, and season tickets were auctioned to the highest bidder. A facsimile of the dedicatory program of Symphony Hall on the evening of Oct. 15, 1900, when Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was performed under the baton of Wilhelm Gericke, was also of documentary interest.

In observance of the orchestra's 60th birthday, there is an exhibition on view in the First Balcony Gallery of Symphony Hall, which presents a graphic review of the history of the orchestra. The 60 years of the organization's growth is traced through photographs, programs, and newspaper clippings, beginning with a complete picture of the original group of players under George Henschel set against the heroic statue of Beethoven and the huge organ of the old Music Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who now enters his 17th consecutive season, promises a number of revivals pertinent to the anniversary season, as well as new music of significance in addition to the more familiar classics in the orchestral repertoire. Among the composers whose new works will be heard are Roy Harris, Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky, and Benjamin Britten. While the list of soloists is still incomplete, it is known that Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, will return after an absence of ten years, to be heard in the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto which marked his Boston debut with the orchestra. The 60th season extends from Oct. 11 to May 3—or 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons, two Pension Fund Concerts, and six Youth Concerts. Many out-of-town concerts are also scheduled. This season Mr. Vondrak of the contra-bass section since 1925 has resigned, and Willis Page has joined that section. The name of Paul Tortelliet is also absent from the list of 'cello players. When last heard from he was in France for military duty. Otherwise the orchestra begins its season with ranks intact.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
10/31/40

Sketch Of Koussevitzky In "Current Biography"

Among the celebrities discussed in the November issue of "Current Biography," monthly publication of the H. W. Wilson Company, is Serge Koussevitzky of Brookline, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and widely-known leader in the musical world. The article gives a complete sketch of his life and work and characterizes him as "the number one full-time conductor in the United States and a champion of modern music who has brought to the American public favorites about whom little was known." The magazine is devoted to biographies of outstanding men and women all over the world and copies are available at the Public Library.

Boston Symphony Celebrates Its 59th Birthday

Only Living Member, Daniel Kuntz, Recalls First Concert in 1881

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was 59 years old yesterday. While there was no birthday cake, conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 players observed the occasion on the stage of Symphony Hall at the morning rehearsal.

When Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to begin work on this week's program he was accompanied by a short, white-haired and smiling man who probably has the best memory of all the years of the orchestra. That man is Daniel Kuntz, the only surviving member of the original Boston Symphony, for 33 years a violinist until he retired in 1914. Mr. Kuntz remembers well the first Boston Symphony concert in the now-vanished Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Oct. 22, 1881.

Mr. Kuntz was introduced to the orchestra by Mr. Koussevitzky, applauded by all, and then made a little speech. Then all stood for a moment of silence in memory of the orchestra's beneficent founder, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson.

More celebration came during the rehearsal's intermission. The whole cast of "Life With Father" came over from the Repertory Theatre across the street, dressed in the costumes of the 1880's which they wear in the Clarence Day play. Father (Louis Calhern), Mother (Dorothy Gish) and the whole red-headed family were there, down to little Harlan (Richard Tyler Howell), with his fiddle case tucked under his arm.

Up to the conductor's room they marched, to have pictures taken with Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Kuntz. Then out to the balcony where they listened to part of the rehearsal.

Back in 1881 the first audiences to hear the Boston Symphony must have looked a good deal like this "family," with its bonnets, bustles, top hats and frock coats.

Cast of "Father" at Symphony Rehearsal

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, Dorothy Gish, Louis Calhern, and the cast of "Life With Father" attended a rehearsal of the orchestra at Symphony hall yesterday morning.

The atmosphere of Boston's first symphony concert, 60 years ago, was recreated at Symphony hall by the "Life With Father" folk in their costumes of the 1880's. The occasion was the 60th anniversary of America's most famous musical organization.

Present also, and perhaps the most attentive listener among the guests, was Daniel Kuntz, a member of the original orchestra which played at the opening concert, back in the days when Father really lived and roared in his brownstone mansion on Madison Avenue.

Compliments will be returned on Thursday evening when Dr. Koussevitsky plans to attend "Life With Father" at the Civic Repertory Theater across the street from Symphony hall.

Herald Oct

'Life With Father' Stars at Symphony's Birthday

Globe

COSTUMES REMINISCENT OF FIRST PERFORMANCE IN 1881

Left to Right—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Dorothy Gish, Richard Tyler Howell and Louis Calhern of "Life With Father" cast, and Daniel Kuntz, only living member of original Boston Symphony.

Herald Oct 29

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Monday Concert

The first concert of the Monday series was given last night in Symphony hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitsky, conducting. The program was as follows:

Gluck.....Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis
Haydn.....Symuhony in G major, No. 88
Williams.....A London Symphony

It's a far cry to the days when the first hearers of Vaughan Williams' "London" symphony found it inexplicably and unbearably gloomy. It is all that now, and more. Even its gay tinsel, at first considered amusingly banal, has now an air of effable sadness, and Vaughan Williams' symphony speaks at least to its audience. Far from an emotional viewpoint—and last night's audience was anything if not emotional—the symphony is crushingly relevant. We are not sure if all of it is anything more.

Perhaps it is a small matter to be concerned, at a time when the symphony does leave such a telling effect, with an attempt to place everything in its category. Yet it seems to us that the two inner movements contain the heart and soul of this work, for all the effectiveness and impact of the final movement. Nor can we refrain from pointing to the many moments of tedium. Nevertheless, under Mr. Koussevitsky's almost devout approach, which in itself could convince us that "Tiger Rag" is a sublime composition, the symphony rose to expressive heights quite beyond the powers of description. One does, in fact, feel almost conscience stricken even remotely to suggest that he was not quite swept away by the symphony.

On the other hand performance of the Haydn symphony so perfectly achieved that happy state that virtually any composition coming after would be an anti-climax. A miracle of grace and clarity, of flawless taste and accomplishment, it emerged as a monument to the conductor's interpretative art. The symphony itself is certainly one of Haydn's loveliest; one could almost welcome being tossed into the nearest gutter if shouting approval between movements would bring repetition.

The Gluck overture was a happy choice to begin the concert. Familiar, yet not by any means overdone, it is a serenely beautiful composition. Although considerable controversy has arisen in recent times over Wagner's tampering with Gluck's opera, his coda to the overture is inspired. This concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 P. M.

R. F. E., Jr.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCKLAND, ME
COURIER
10/29/40

REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

OCTOBER 23, 1940

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Oscar Levant in his "Smattering of Ignorance" terms as the greatest orchestra in the world today, opened its 60th season on Oct. 11, with Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting. A handsome brochure used for the occasion commemorated these six decades of continuous activity, and recalled the days of 1881 when Boston citizens waited all night in a long queue for their season tickets, and season tickets were auctioned to the highest bidder. A facsimile of the dedicatory program of Symphony Hall on the evening of Oct. 15, 1900, when Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" was performed under the baton of Wilhelm Gericke, was also of documentary interest.

In observance of the orchestra's 60th birthday, there is an exhibition on view in the First Balcony Gallery of Symphony Hall, which presents a graphic review of the history of the orchestra. The 60 years of the organization's growth is traced through photographs, programs, and newspaper clippings, beginning with a complete picture of the original group of players under George Henschel set against the heroic statue of Beethoven and the huge organ of the old Music Hall.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who now enters his 17th consecutive season, promises a number of revivals pertinent to the anniversary season, as well as new music of significance in addition to the more familiar classics in the orchestral repertoire. Among the composers whose new works will be heard are Roy Harris, Paul Hindemith, Igor Stravinsky, and Benjamin Britten. While the list of soloists is still incomplete, it is known that Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, will return after an absence of ten years, to be heard in the Rachmaninoff Third Piano Concerto which marked his Boston debut with the orchestra. The 60th season extends from Oct. 11 to May 2—or 24 Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts, six Monday evenings and Tuesday afternoons, two Pension Fund Concerts, and six Youth Concerts. Many out-of-town concerts are also scheduled. This season Mr. Vondrak of the contra-bass section since 1925 has resigned, and Willis Page has joined that section. The name of Paul Tortelliet is also absent from the list of 'cello players. When last heard from he was in France for military duty. Otherwise the orchestra begins its season with ranks intact.

Boston Symphony Celebrates Its 59th Birthday

Only Living Member, Daniel Kuntz, Recalls First Concert in 1881

The Boston Symphony Orchestra was 59 years old yesterday. While there was no birthday cake, conductor Serge Koussevitzky and the 110 players observed the occasion on the stage of Symphony Hall at the morning rehearsal.

When Mr. Koussevitzky appeared to begin work on this week's program he was accompanied by a short, white-haired and smiling man who probably has the best memory of all the years of the orchestra. That man is Daniel Kuntz, the only surviving member of the original Boston Symphony, for 33 years a violinist until he retired in 1914. Mr. Kuntz remembers well the first Boston Symphony concert in the now-vanished Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Oct. 22, 1881.

Mr. Kuntz was introduced to the orchestra by Mr. Koussevitzky, applauded by all, and then made a little speech. Then all stood for a moment of silence in memory of the orchestra's beneficent founder, Maj. Henry Lee Higginson.

More celebration came during the rehearsal's intermission. The whole cast of "Life With Father" came over from the Repertory Theatre across the street, dressed in the costumes of the 1880's which they wear in the Clarence Day play. Father (Louis Calhern), Mother (Dorothy Gish) and the whole red-headed family were there, down to little Harlan (Richard Tyler Howell), with his fiddle case tucked under his arm.

Up to the conductor's room they marched, to have pictures taken with Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Kuntz. Then out to the balcony where they listened to part of the rehearsal.

Back in 1881 the first audience to hear the Boston Symphony must have looked a good deal like this "family," with its bonnets, bustles, top hats and frock coats.

'Life With Father' Stars at Symphony's Birthday

COSTUMES REMINISCENT OF FIRST PERFORMANCE IN 1881

Left to Right—Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Dorothy Gish, Richard Tyler Howell and Louis Calhern of "Life With Father" cast, and Daniel Kuntz, only living member of original Boston Symphony.

Cast of "Father" at Symphony Rehearsal

At the invitation of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony, Dorothy Gish, Louis Calhern, and the cast of "Life With Father" attended a rehearsal of the orchestra at Symphony hall yesterday morning.

The atmosphere of Boston's first symphony concert, 60 years ago, was recreated at Symphony hall by the "Life With Father" folk in their costumes of the 1880's. The occasion was the 60th anniversary of America's most famous musical organization.

Present also, and perhaps the most attentive listener among the guests, was Daniel Kuntz, a member of the original orchestra which played at the opening concert, back in the days when Father really lived and roared in his brownstone mansion on Madison Avenue.

Compliments will be returned on Thursday evening when Dr. Koussevitsky plans to attend "Life With Father" at the Civic Repertory Theater across the street from Symphony hall.

Herald Oct. 23

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
10/31/40

Sketch Of Koussevitzky In "Current Biography"

Among the celebrities discussed in the November issue of "Current Biography," monthly publication of the H. W. Wilson Company, is Serge Koussevitzky of Brookline, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and widely-known leader in the musical world. The article gives a complete sketch of his life and work and characterizes him as "the number one full-time conductor in the United States and a champion of modern music who has brought to the American public favorites about whom little was known." The magazine is devoted to biographies of outstanding men and women all over the world and copies are available at the Public Library.

Herald Oct 29

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Monday Concert

The first concert of the Monday series was given last night in Symphony hall by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conducting. The program was as follows:

Gluck.....Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis
Haydn.....Symphony in G major, No. 88
Williams.....A London Symphony

It's a far cry to the days when the first hearers of Vaughan Williams' "London" symphony found it inexplicably and unbearably gloomy. It is all that now, and more. Even its gay tinsel, at first considered amusingly banal, has now an air of effable sadness, and Vaughan Williams' symphony speaks at least to its audience. Far from an emotional viewpoint—and last night's audience was anything if not emotional—the symphony is crushingly relevant. We are not sure if all of it is anything more.

Perhaps it is a small matter to be concerned, at a time when the symphony does leave such a telling effect, with an attempt to place everything in its category. Yet it seems to us that the two inner movements contain the heart and soul of this work, for all the effectiveness and impact of the final movement. Nor can we refrain from pointing to the many moments of tedium. Nevertheless, under Mr. Koussevitsky's almost devout approach, which in itself could convince us that "Tiger Rag" is a sublime composition, the symphony rose to expressive heights quite beyond the powers of description. One does, in fact, feel almost conscience stricken even remotely to suggest that he was not quite swept away by the symphony.

On the other hand performance of the Haydn symphony so perfectly achieved that happy state that virtually any composition coming after would be an anti-climax. A miracle of grace and clarity, of flawless taste and accomplishment, it emerged as a monument to the conductor's interpretative art. The symphony itself is certainly one of Haydn's loveliest; one could almost welcome being tossed into the nearest gutter if shouting approval between movements would bring repetition.

The Gluck overture was a happy choice to begin the concert. Familiar, yet not by any means overdone, it is a serenely beautiful composition. Although considerable controversy has arisen in recent times over Wagner's tampering with Gluck's opera, his coda to the overture is inspired. This concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 P. M.

R. F. K., Jr.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
OCT 27 1940

Boston Symphony Founded in 1881

Anniversary Booklet Briefly Reviews Development of Orchestra Since Organization by Henry L. Higginson in March, 1881 — Notes 'General Disruptive Conditions' Threatening Pursuit of Music

WITH THE approach of the 60th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra's founding (March, 1881), a modest booklet describing the evolution of the orchestra into a world-famous musical organization has been issued.

If the founder, Henry L. Higginson, were living today, the booklet suggests, he would recognize the orchestra as fundamentally his own, "as the consistent outgrowth of his early imaginings and his long endeavors."

There is no direct reference to the threats of James Petrillo, president of the A. F. L. musicians' union, to put the Boston Symphony "out of business." It is stated, however, that the determination of Boston citizens of 1881 "who waited all night in a queue for their season tickets" to "experience beauty at its highest" is still strong in spite of "general disruptive conditions" that "threaten the peaceable pursuit of music." That is the only portion which may be remotely considered to refer to union difficulties. It may also, of course, refer to the second World war.

Reviewing briefly the history of the orchestra, the booklet relates how Mr Higginson as a music student in Vienna in 1860 was impressed with the beauty of Beethoven, Schubert or Haydn as performed by a highly expert orchestra. Later when he had achieved business success, he organized and established a symphony orchestra in Boston. Georg Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor, was brought from England.

Two years later, Wilhelm Gericke, "meticulous and exacting," became the leader. Then came Arthur Nikisch at the age of 34, "a Hungarian whose conducting at Leipzig had been attracting attention." He found the orchestra a highly expert instrument ready for rhapsodic uses. Emil Paur, successor of Nikisch at the Opera in Leipzig, succeeded him as conductor of the Boston Symphony. His five years in Boston were notable for a successful promotion of such new and debatable composers as Richard Strauss.

Mr Gericke returned in 1898 and a critic observed, "It is still Mr Gericke's orchestra." When he left in 1906 a new Symphony hall had been built and the orchestra had "reached an impressive degree of proficiency."

Mr Higginson secured Karl Muck, conductor at the Royal Opera in Berlin but he was recalled after two years and from 1908 to 1912 the orchestra was conducted by Max Fiedler. Dr Muck, however, was permitted by his government to return.

In 1918, Mr Higginson asked Judge Frederick P. Cabot, as president of the board of trustees, to assume responsibility of the orchestra and a relatively small number of patrons began to contribute toward maintenance. The organization of the Friends of the Orchestra has placed that charge in the hands of a large and growing portion of those who attend the concerts and consider them indispensable.

The trustees engaged Henri Rabaud, distinguished Parisian composer. Then Pierre Monteux of the Metropolitan Opera company came to Boston to become the orchestra's second French conductor.

In 1924 Serge Koussevitzky, the present leader who has brought the orchestra to new musical hights, came to America. At his first concerts, he manifested his "extraordinary courage and brilliance," revealed that he was a "musician of sensitive sympathy and emotional penetration."

"The Russian composer has become an American composer and while identifying himself with an orchestra such as he had never had before, he has realized the most illustrious years of his career. While bringing a new eloquence to the classical portion of the repertory, he has enlarged it as well. The musical trends of our own time he has so closely and sympathetically followed that the concerts have become the point of those 'first performances' which have since proved really important."

The booklet concludes, "It is not enough that Koussevitzky has brought the orchestra to a tonal richness, a brilliance of virtuosity and a warmth of response quite beyond compare. Koussevitzky looks always to a more complete capturing of beauty. To a great artist in the fullness of his day, his art is always an adventure, a new testing."

Prelude to Organization

Limitation of space prevented this memorial pamphlet from paying full tribute to the organizational genius and high purpose of Henry L. Higginson, the founder. To appreciate his accomplishment in giving Boston an orchestra that is now one of the world's greatest, it must be remembered that Boston in the first half of the 19th century was a barren field as far as music was concerned. M. S. DeWolfe Howe in his study of the orchestra on the occasion of its 50th anniversary cites the formation of the Handel and Haydn society in 1851, the Musical Institute of Boston in 1837 and the Boston Academy of Music in 1840.

In a program note written toward the close of the century William F. Apthorp recalled: "At one of the public afternoon rehearsals (during his boyhood), all seats on the floor of the Music hall had been taken up and the small audience occupied the galleries. There used to be no printed programs but Bergmann, leader of the Germanians, would announce the several numbers viva voce—often in the most remarkable English. One of the numbers on the occasion I now speak of was the 'Railway Galop' — composer forgotten — during the playing of which a little mock steam-engine kept scooting about on the floor of the hall with black cotton wool smoke coming out of the funnel."

The Music hall had been built in 1852 and Musical Fund society concerts continued to 1855. In 1856 Philharmonic society concerts began and after the Civil war the Harvard Musical association inaugurated a series of concerts that did not end until the Boston Symphony concerts had been firmly established.

The beginnings of the Boston Symphony can, in a way, be traced to the failure of Mr Higginson's eyesight during his freshman year at Harvard. He was forced to leave the university and chose travel. He eventually arrived in Vienna and stayed there for four years, studying music.

"What he brought back with him," observes Mr Howe, from whose book this material has been taken, "cannot well be measured in concrete terms." It was not the technical mastery of voice, piano or composition which might have served as a starting point of a professional career in music. It was rather the broader apprehension of what music might mean to an individual and to a community, even to a nation. It was also an intense patriotism nourished as patriotism often is by absence from home and a strong sense of the responsibility resting upon every one to give what he best can to the world in which he lives."

In his own statement of his purpose in bringing the orchestra into being, Mr Higginson wrote: "My original scheme was this: To hire an orchestra of 60 men and a conductor, paying them all by the year, reserving to myself the right to all their time needed for rehearsals and for concerts and allowing them to give lessons when they had time; to give in Boston as many serious concerts of classical music as were wanted and also give at other times and more especially in the summer, concerts of a lighter kind of music, in which should be included good dance music; to do the same in neighboring towns and cities as far as is practicable but certainly to give Harvard university all she needs in this line; to keep the prices low always and especially where lighter concerts are in question, because to them may come the poorer people, 50 cents and 25 cents being the measure of the prices. Such was the aim and the cost presented itself thus: Sixty men at $1500 plus $3000 for the conductor and $7000 for other men equaling $100,000."

On March 30, 1881, Mr Higginson announced the formation of the orchestra in a carefully worded statement that began: "Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never yet possessed a full permanent orchestra offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all the large European cities or even in the smaller musical centers of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours are necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere."

The newspapers were not entirely convinced that a permanent organization could be effected in view of past failures and musicians rebelled against the idea of playing under only one conductor. But on Saturday, October 22, 1881, the first concert was presented with Georg Henschel conducting. The program: Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House," by Beethoven; Air (Orpheus) by Gluck; Symphony in B flat by Haydn; Ballet Music (Rosamunde) by Schubert; Scena (Odysseus) by Max Bruch and Festival Overture by Weber. The soloist was Miss Annie Louise Cary.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRIDGEPORT, CONN
POST
10/30/40

Harold Bauer, Pianist, to Play For Danbury Music Club Nov. 6

HAROLD BAUER

British-Born Artist Began Concert Career as Violinist.

The Danbury Music club will present Harold Bauer, gifted pianist, in a concert in Danbury next Wednesday evening. The concert will be the first of a series of four, to which holders of Wednesday Afternoon Musical club series tickets have been invited through a reciprocity agreement between the two clubs.

Mr. Bauer was born into an intensely musical English family, of which each member played some instrument. When he was five, he entered upon his musical career, dividing his enthusiasm between piano and violin. He was a child prodigy and at ten, he made his debut with an orchestra. Later he tourned England as a violin virtuoso.

Accepting a call for a tour of Russia as assisting violinist to a singer changed the course of Mr. Bauer's musical career. When the little concert company arrived in St. Petersburg, the death of the Czar threw the court into mourning, and no concerts were allowed in the principal cities. They had to fall back on the small towns, where no accompanist was available, making it necessary for Mr. Bauer to fill out the program with piano solos. At the end of the tour he found it difficult to persuade people that he was not a pianist. Even Paderewski told him he was one.

Gives Up Violin

Mr. Bauer set himself to serious study, giving himself three years in which to attain his purpose. His two appearances with orchestra in Madrid just before the three years were up reassured him. He was acclaimed as a pianist and the violin was laid aside.

His first appearance in America was in 1900, when at the invitation of Wilhelm Gericke, conductor of the Boston Symphony, he came to this country to appear as soloist with that orchestra. Every two years thereafter until his world tour in 1914, he toured this country. Eventually he made his home in New York and in 1921 became an American citizen. In 1918, he founded the Beethoven association.

The dates of the other three concerts which may be heard in Danbury by subscribers to the Wednesday Afternoon Musical Club as follows:

Dec. 8 ..... Don Cossack Chorus
March 12 ..... Nino Martini
April 23 ..... Maria Gamparelli

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series of six concerts by the Boston Symphony began last night at Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted Gluck's grave, majestic Overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis"; Haydn's pert Symphony in G Major, No. 88, and the descriptive "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams.

A near capacity audience was obviously deeply impressed by the "London Symphony" which closed the program. After the last faint note subsided, there followed an awed, momentarily complete silence —and then a torrent of applause.

Under the inspired, probing baton of Dr. Koussevitzky, the tragic proportions of the symphony were raised to full height. The music penetrated, sounding like a prophetic elegy for a great city whose throbbing soul is laid bare.

There are pages of this work where the tragedy seems excessive, lachrymose and burdening. But they are few. The allegro of the first movement is robust with teeming life and the hurly-burly of the city. And the second (lento) is foggy and melancholy as only London can be. The fleeting images, the musical vignettes inherent in the third movement (scherzo) are not easily remembered. But the listener is left with the definite impression that he has heard music of consequence. Then the symphony ends on the tragic note so powerful as to be overwhelming.

The Gluck Overture, with the ending devised by Richard Wagner (since it originally led immediately into the first act of the opera), began the program on a serious plane. The reading was exact, though weighty.

The evening's humorous note was to be found in the delightful Haydn Symphony. Brisk, precise and bracing, it was varied in temper and light but not flippant. The second movement was gorgeously rich while the minuetto reminded one of a stately dowager dancing with a twinkle in her eye. The main theme of the finale was, as Sir Donald Tovey described it, an "exquisitely bred kitten."

The next two concerts in this series will be given Dec. 2 and 3, when Paul Makovsky will be violin sololist.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
OCT 30 1940

Boston Symphony Tuesday Concert

Program Assembled From This Season's Works Polished for Commutors

The first of the monthly paired Monday evening, Tuesday afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra offered this week Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88 and Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony." The program was assembled from preceding Friday-Saturday concerts and the Cambridge Thursday of this season. It is considered that the audiences for these monthly programs hear the Boston Symphony at its best, since it has had opportunity to polish its performances to the demanding objectives of Dr. Koussevitzky.

Originally leading immediately into the opera, the Gluck overture, which we are told was completed for concert use by Richard Wagner, showed no trace of his style. The great music drama composer exercised taste and discretion in following Gluck's ideas.

This classical work based on Racine's drama has a simplicity in its structure that gives it nobility. We are chiefly stimulated by the knowledge, derived from Mr. Burk's estimable notes, that Marie Antoinette, a pupil in her native Vienna of Gluck, gave the opera the cachet of her approval from her box at the opening performance in Paris.

Less severe, more naive than the Greek story, the Haydn charmed by its Allegro that ran the gamut of joy up and down, in varying approach, breaking out even into one delicious passage on Mr. Laurent's flute. The churchly Largo, the interesting trio to the Menuetto and the brilliant speed of the final Allegro came in unbuttoned contrast.

Hearing the "London Symphony" again within two weeks, one is inclined to agree with the general trend of Boston critics, during its present tenure at Symphony Hall, that fancy or sympathetic reaction may freely be exercised. The Thames in a quiet hour is there, the bustle and the atmosphere of districts, vagrant characteristics and the stroke of Big Ben on harp or glockenspiel. But though one music reviewer may express dislike of the alla marcia, it may seem to another that this section perfectly conveys the frustration of a multitude of tramping, weary feet on the London pave. The great confusions of the last movement one in the audience was heard to say made her sad. In this monstrous stir one could read the bombing of today, were it not that Vaughan Williams wrote before the earlier World War. However, we accept his tone poem of London because of its rare restraint in modern idiom, its fine tonal effects. As when hearing Richard Strauss, one can conclude, "Never mind what he is telling us; the tonal web is gracious, moving and absorbing."

In passing comment, it was noted that there were a number of seats available in the back row side of the first balcony, desirable for transient patrons we would be happy to see from this city, for our support should go to the great orchestra so near at hand. Tuesday afternoon they call Commuters' Day. It was way back in 1881 that Mrs. Jack Gardner made the front pages (as per exhibit in the foyer cases) by paying between three and four hundred dollars for her seat. In humbler way, there is now eager interest in the Boston Symphony. Two school teachers from Fairhaven, unable by the N. Y., N. H. and H. recent curtailment of passenger service, to attend the Monday evening concerts by train either way, have arranged to give a local musician what would have been their railroad fare; from this sum the musician has secured an inexpensive seat for the concerts and will drive them for this season.

A. C. B.

Symphonic Novelty for Week-End Concerts—

Arthur Shepherd to Direct His Symphony in D Minor

By Winthrop P. Tryon

There goes before the Boston Symphony public for judgment this week Arthur Shepherd's Symphony No. 2 in D minor, with Mr. Shepherd himself conducting. It is the story, familiar in Symphony Hall, of a music instructor coming out of the classroom and presenting himself in the character of composer; and unless matters take a different course from the usual one, he will be found by many of his hearers a man of scholarship whose work bears the academic mark. That, by testimony of Daniel Gregory Mason, another professor who composes, is an inevitable outcome. A pedagogue, in other words, cannot, according to a certain run of corridor opinion, be a showman; he may know all about counterpoint, but he wants the knack of preparing an exhibition for the orchestral platform.

That there is nothing whatever in the charge appears the moment we consider the careers of composers, most of whom, first or last, have taught in school or in studio, and who invariably have strong academic associations and predilections; for otherwise they would not be composers at all.

* * *

Again, when a composer takes the baton and directs a performance of his own music, he is found by a listener here and another there to be unequal to the task. Yet when that happens, it is most likely not because he is a composer, but because he has not given himself over to the career of conducting and necessarily evinces lack of skill in comparison with the man who has.

As for Mr. Shepherd, composing, indeed, has been an essential element of his activity; and if the quantity of his output measures up rather small, the quality of it gives no impression of mere casualness. His composing is an essential part of him, rather than something incidental to other pursuits. Conducting, too, is right in his line; for he has assisted at concerts of the Cleveland Orchestra as conductor, and he has made a record well enough known as leader of choral performances in Boston.

One thing about this Symphony in D minor of his, which even a hurried look at the manuscript score discloses, is that it stands on a secure foundation of string harmony; and not only on the support of sound, but also on that of character of the parts. First violins, second violins, violas, and celli all have individual roles, and they possess an interest for the players as well as an appeal to listeners. A firm "quartet" underlies the symphony. Then, the overlay of brasses and woods, by clear evidence of the score, calls out the best powers of the executants, without putting them to technical confusion.

* * *

A symphony, take it as a whole, consists of endless bowings and fingerings, blowings, tappings, and pluckings. And still, in the face of so much, there can stick out a single note, an uncommon tone relation, an ear-arresting sound, that will make the piece in which it occurs memorable to a listener over years. Such a note occurs in the midst of this revelation of Mr. Shepherd's talent. Nor, as chances, does Mr. Shepherd himself invent the note; for by his own avowal he borrows it. In the Scherzo of the symphony, which is the third movement, he introduces a cowboy tune, a melody of the "vaquero" order, which he picked up out West. This is no matter, mind you, of a scholar's summer vacation research. The boy, Arthur Shepherd, was brought up in Idaho, and he remembers songs he heard in his early association with cattlemen. This particular air, like many things sung on the range, is really nothing in particular at all except for this one note; and that, not in name but in effect, is very particular indeed. The time starts and goes on in a commonplace way and in the very commonplace key of F, until it strikes a point where the singer seems to think he has made a mistake; and he violently, on an accent, changes A to A flat, converting major to minor.

That is nothing at all as a musical device; but here it is something else than a device. It is a inspiration, or perhaps a fancy, a freak.

Or is it a pistol shot? It is anything you please, but it makes an impression in this work. It could reasonably enough make an audience want to have the whole symphony repeated some day.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE

NOV 3 - 1940

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony orchestra opened the new season recently under its renowned conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, offering on the first program Ralph Vaughan Williams' "London" Symphony and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. During the season Dr. Koussevitzky will be relieved by two guest conductors, Igor Stravinsky and Desire Defauw, now a refugee from Belgium. Three composers will appear on as many programs to direct performances of their own works: Darius Milhaud, Arthur Shepherd, and Eugene Goossens. Boston will hear for the first time Roy Harris' new "Folk Song" Symphony, both a new symphony and a cello concerto by Paul Hindemith and Villa-Lobos' Choros 10. Dr. Koussevitzky will revive several compositions for his audiences, notably Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, Gustav Mahler's Second, Schumann's "Rhenish" Symphony, Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, Bruckner's Eighth, and Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" Symphony. He will also conduct for the first time in Boston Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony.

Boston Symphony Concert

C.S.M. Nov 2

The Arts in Boston

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is honoring at this week's pair of concerts a distinguished American musician, Arthur Shepherd, by presenting, under the baton of the composer, his Symphony No. 2 in D minor.

Mr. Shepherd was born in Idaho, musically educated in Boston, where he has also taught, was for some years assistant conductor of the Cleveland Symphony Orchestra, and is presently head of the music division of Western Reserve University, in Cleveland. A prolific composer, Mr. Shepherd has been represented previously on the Boston Symphony programs only by his Fantasy for piano and orchestra, introduced by Pierre Monteux in 1921, with Heinrich Gebhard as soloist.

This Symphony in D minor is a scholarly work which reveals its author's mastery of classical form, his familiarity with orchestral sonorities, and his ability to write a complex score transparently. On a first hearing, the most immediately effective section seemed to be the Scherzo, which abounds in lively rhythms and musical wit. The theme of the Trio, said to be a Mexican cowboy song, is of an odd and not very appealing shape. There is an interesting and well worked-out fugal section in the Finale. The composer conducted unobtrusively but effectively. The work was cordially received by the Friday afternoon audience.

The other items of the program were Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture, which received under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction the usual highly dramatic performance, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" Suite.

L. A. S.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
DAILY RECORD
NOV 1 - 1940

Maestro 'Sneaks' In

Though it was advertised that only a small group of Boston Symphony orchestra musicians would appear with Lily Pons in a benefit concert for four French war societies, in Boston, the entire 110-man orchestra answered the curtain—plus an extra man. He was Pop Concert Conductor Arthur Fiedler, former orchestra member, who said he "sneaked in to do my bit on the viola."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
FLINT, MICH.
JOURNAL

NOV 3 - 1940

Tickets Go Quickly

The Berkshire Symphonic festival already has received more than 1,000 subscriptions for the nine concerts to be given at Stockbridge next August by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky. Subscription sales will continue until June 30, or until such time before then that 5,400 subscriptions have been received. After that, tickets for single performances will be on sale. Attendance for the 1940 festival totalled 68,839.

THIS CLIPPING FROM STILLWATER, OKLA.
PRESS

NOV 3 - 1940

This Clipping From
WHEELING, W. VA.
NEWS-REGISTER
NOV 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM MIDDLETOWN, CONN.
PRESS

NOV 2 - 1940

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES

NOV 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM TAMPA BULLETIN
TAMPA, FLA
11/2/40

In Toronto, Miss Ford heard the music of scores of famous singers and players, among whom was Dorothy Maynor, brilliant Negro coloratura soprano, who was discovered by Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony orchestra. She frequently heard programs played by internationally-known symphony orchestras.

This Clipping From
BILLINGS, MONT.
MORNING GAZETTE

NOV 3 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
OBSERVER & BUDGET
NOV 3 - 1940

This Clipping From
SOUTH BEND, IND.
TRIBUNE
NOV 3 - 1940

This Clipping From MUNCIE, IND.
STAR

NOV 3 - 1940

This Clipping From
DAVENPORT, IA.
DEMOCRAT-LEADER

NOV 3 - 1940

This Clipping From
BEAUMONT, TEX.
JOURNAL

NOV 1 - 1940

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRADFORD, PA.
STAR RECORD

NOV 1 - 1940

This Clipping From
GALVESTON, TEX.
TRIBUNE

NOV 1 - 1940

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

NOV 2 - 1940

Desire Defauw, eminent Belgian musician, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its next concert here, Nov. 26 in Metropolitan Theatre.

The program:

Franck—Le Chasseur Maudit," Symphonic Poem

Gretry—Suite from the Ballet, "Cephale et Procris"

I. Tambourin
II. Menuet ("The Numphs of Diana")
III. Gigue

deFalla—Dances from the Ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos"

I. The Neighbors
II. Dance of the Miller
III. Finale Dance

Beethoven—Symphony No. 7 in A-major, Opus 92

TOP O' THE MORNING

By GEORGE RYAN

Ever the Same

El conductors are being instructed in how to pronounce distinctly and correctly all the station names in the new Huntington avenue subway.—News Item.

Yes, let enunciation sound
Receive indorsement underground,
For oftentimes its niceties
Are subject to neglect;
And let no tonal faults distress
Our minds with verbal sloppiness.
Let's have one place where all the rules
Are treated with respect.

And where's a better spot to teach
The excellence of dulcet speech
Than there beneath that hallowed shrine
Where Music holds her sway?
So, there, let syllables ring out
In harmony that brooks no doubt,
But, oh, thereafter let it go
At that, I humbly pray.

And let us, as we stroll above,
Be loyal to an ancient love
And use the good, old, homespun term,
Endeared beyond recall
By custom and the weight of years
To Boston and to Boston ears,
And let unpolished tongues acclaim
Our dear, old Simpney Hall!

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3 Op. 72 ..... Beethoven
Symphony No. 2 in D minor ..... Shepherd
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade" Op. 35 ..... Rimsky-Korsakov

We fear that the cause of the American composer has been dealt a grievous blow by the performance yesterday of Arthur Shepherd's singularly uninteresting symphony. Correct, but tedious to a degree, it may make the public shy away from other American works. Doubtless the score looks well, with no uncouth errors or untidy details. The proper forms are there for all to see and study. It might, indeed, be a model of what a symphony should look like on paper. But as sound in the concert hall it is just plain dull.

During the intermission a friend reminded us of Roy Campbell's epigram on certain South African poets, which exactly applies to symphonies of this type:

"You praise the firm restraint with which they write.
I'm with you there of course.
They use the bridle and the curb all right;
But where's the bloody horse?"

Now there is not much for criticism to do about such music except, rather unkindly, to hit it over the head. You cannot criticize academic music any more than you can get up a violent literary discussion over a text-book of geometry. In the class-room though, this symphony might serve some purpose of analysis. There was just one movement which emerged for a moment from the uniform surroundings of the whole work. The scherzo started off well, and our hopes were raised—only to be dashed by the trio and its common little "Mexican cowboy song."

Mr. Shepherd doctored this wretched tune with all his might by the accepted methods of augmentation, diminution and inversion. (Or so it seemed.) But in the end you could only see that he was making a mountain out of a molehill. This symphony had better have been left in the library.

Two magnificent performances preceded and followed the new composition. Beethoven's third "Lenore" Overture was superbly read by Mr. Koussevitzky. It was dramatic, but never hysterical. We can hardly remember a more beautiful performance.

Fully as astonishing in its interpretation was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." This is a work in which the virtuosity of the orchestral soloists is put to a fearful test. The greatest conductors with a less than perfect orchestra could not make it go; and hence do all musicians shudder when, perchance, they have to hear it in the ballet. Yesterday, it came off splendidly. It was, in fact, a breath-taking performance. Mr. Burgin handled the solo violin part with his customary skill. Among all the other soloists we should like at least to call attention to Mr. Allard's marvelous playing of the bassoon part.

We wish that it were the custom to hear "Scheherazade" without the handicap of even the program on the title page. It is enough to know that this is an oriental tale. With that in mind we can take pleasure in the wonderful orchestration, the luscious harmonic effects, the ingenuity with which Rimsky-Korsakov has given variety to so little thematic material. "Scheherazade" in an interpretation such as Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra brought to it yesterday is one of the listening experiences of a life-time.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Arthur Shepherd conducted the first Boston performance of his Second Symphony at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon. The remainder of the program was conducted by Serge Koussevitzky; it began with the "Leonore" Overture No. 3 of Beethoven, and ended with the symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Mr. Shepherd's rather weighty and academic work was composed two years ago, and was first presented, under his direction, at Cleveland last March. It is the second of his compositions to be heard at Boston Symphony concerts, his Fantasy for piano and orchestra having been done by Mr. Monteux back in 1921.

So far as idiom and sheer sound go, the Second Symphony is pleasant enough. It is big and it is also long, probably too long for the average listener. The first movement starts off in arresting fashion, and for a time is both interesting and absorbing. Yet the repetition in all four movements, the uniform heaviness of the orchestration, leave on the whole an impression of dullness. If the score were to be shortened, more contrast of color and dynamics provided, the Symphony would probably be much improved.

Mr. Shepherd's idiom leans to conservatism, and at the same time shows its contemporary origin in certain harmonic modernities. Like other composers of the day, Mr. Shepherd has evidently been influenced by Sibelius—particularly the short, staccato, reiterated figures for the woodwind instruments that are an important part of the Finnish composer's way of writing. This is not, however, to call the Shepherd work unoriginal, because certain pages suggest, in a way elusive of description, that their creator is American. Conversely, the score is definitely eclectic. Mr. Shepherd was well received, but exceptional enthusiasm cannot be claimed either for performance or work.

Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation—and it was a brilliant, personal interpretation—of Beethoven's great Overture, was very exciting. By taking the first part very slowly and softly he builds up a feeling of tension that must find release by means of a formidably swift pace and overwhelming sonorities at the end. Those who wish may differ about the classical accuracy of such a reading. But only pedants will deny its vivid effect.

"Scheherazade" was equally thrilling in those pages where the Sultana is telling of grandiose adventure, as when the ship founders upon the rock. Elsewhere the feeling of Oriental fantasy and romance was admirably sustained.

Mr. Koussevitzky has made this work particularly his own. Is there any other conductor who could do it with so much poetry and magnificence? In view of this triumphant mastery, it is not difficult to overlook the fact that some pages were noisier and faster than they needed to be. What one remembers most was the coruscating tone, the magically exact and spectacular playing of a great orchestra guided by one whose re-creative powers are a form of genius. C. W. D.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN. COURANT
NOV 7 - 1940

Paderewski Arrives, Met by Fr. Bojnowski

New York, Nov. 6.—(AP.)—Ignace Jan Paderewski, at 80, has left Europe because "I simply could not stand it any more."

The white-haired pianist who was president of Poland that came into being after the first World War arrived today on the American Export Liner Excambion.

"All my life I lived as a free man," said Paderewski, on his return to this country, where he has had 19 triumphal tours.

"I was used to giving a frank expression of my art, to my thoughts and to my feelings. I considered it as my right and as my duty. Not desiring that anybody deprive me of my rights, or interfere with my duty, I decided to leave Europe."

Paderewski is president of the Council of the Polish Government in exile. He has lived in Switzerland in recent years, when not on tour.

The pianist was met by a group of prominent Polish-Americans, including the Rt. Rev. Monsignors Joseph Dworzak of Yonkers, N. Y., and Lucyan Bojnowski of New Britain, Conn.; and Dr. B. L. Smykowski of Bridgeport, Conn.

Another passenger was Nadia Boulanger, noted French musical conductor, the first woman to lead the London Philharmonic and Boston Symphony orchestras, who was on her way from Vichy to teach at the Long School of Music in Cambridge.

NEW MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Shepherd's Work in D Minor Given Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The past fared better than the present at yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, in which Arthur Shepherd's Symphony in D minor came between Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scherezarade." Returning to the city that knew him for many years as teacher, Mr. Shepherd conducted this local premiere of his latest score.

With due respect to the shining exceptions, it may be suggested that the chief enemy of the American symphonic composer is not the cruel conductor who refuses to give him a chance, but the American composer who when he gets that chance, fails to merit the praise we are only too ready to bestow upon him. First he presents himself as a rough diamond, sadly in need of polish; then as a vendor of platitudes, and then as an academician, competent, sincere, idealistic and high-minded but essentially uninspired.

It is in this last class that one must place Mr. Shepherd, as his Symphony of yesterday represented him. The first of the four movements began promisingly and fulfilled that promise through most of its length. The slow movement, dignified and often impressive, fell a little short of truly emotional utterance. The Scherzo proved leaden-footed and the finale came near to falling of its own weight. Only a spurt of energy, a flash of brilliance at the end, saved it from so doing.

Taken as a whole, Mr. Shepherd's Symphony suffers from thickness of texture and drabness of color. Most of the time there is too much going on and there are few highlights or deep shadows. By a narrow margin, perhaps, it misses being an important contribution to the fast growing list of native symphonies. Nevertheless, it commends itself to our sympathies more than some works that have received such rating.

Dr. Koussevitzky's almost sensational treatment of "Sherezarade" aroused the expected, the inevitable enthusiasm. No doubt this shopworn music needs such external aids, but one seems to recall more genuinely, truly satisfying performances under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction.

Symphony Concert

By LEO GAFFNEY

THE KOUSSEVITZKY touch on an orchestra, noted wherever good music is made and studied, was never more apparent, never more needed than in the Boston Symphony concerts over the weekend.

There were but two numbers to prove it, Beethoven's No. 3 "Leonore" overture and the "Scheherazade" Symphonic Suite of Rimsky-Korsakov—both good war-horses of standard repertory, but both still kicking the stars when there's a Koussevitzky to give the urge.

Where the Koussevitzky touch was missing came in the middle. In that uncomfortable spot—a tough spot for anyone—stood the American composer Arthur Shepherd conducting his own new Second Symphony.

Comparisons are odorous, as Mrs. Malaprop says, but so also is Mr. Shepherd's Second Symphony. In all conscience, there is no better way of reporting such an over-long, unlovely piece of work. To add to the boredom there was no program clue to indicate what the composer might be driving at.

Perhaps least said, soonest mended.

To get the unkindly comparisons over with, there was the case of the "Leonore" Overture. We had it last February at the hands of the distinguished young Finnish conductor, Hannikainen, and we heard a most musicianly, meticulous reading. But when Koussevitzky got his hands on it over the weekend it was something else again.

It was the master touch, imparting fluency, elegance, style—conveying, too, something of the pain of the composer over the years in which he labored and suffered with the score of his only opera.

If Koussevitzky spurred the imagination in the Beethoven, he fairly cudgeled it in the Rimsky-Korsakov. There again was that compelling whine of the narrating violin, the rolled chords of the harp, the high color of one of the greatest orchestral virtuosi—and the vivid images of the Thousand and One Nights, all expressed in bedazzling brilliance.

The Koussevitzky touch!

Symphony Concert

Beethoven Overture Brilliantly Performed —Arthur Sheperd's Symphony in D Minor

Yesterday's extraordinary concert of the Boston Symphony opened with the greatest performance this writer has been privileged to hear of Beethoven's third "Leonore" Overture. It closed with the intoxicating opulence of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade." But in between these two performance there was heard a work so amazingly platitudinous that listeners asked themselves what it was that had momentarily paralyzed Dr. Koussevitzky's usual happy flair for program building. Platitudinous it was: less, perhaps, in the themes themselves than in their working out—in its whole style and substance.

This pale, unhappy piece of music was the Second Symphony in D minor by a respected musician, formerly of this city: Arthur Sheperd. In fairness to Mr. Sheperd it should be pointed out that his symphony had to compete with some of the most inspired and most effective music in the entire symphonic repertoire; further, that it suffered from the disadvantage of not being conducted by Koussevitzky. Mr. Sheperd himself conducted it. And though no one would question his authority, Mr. Sheperd is not a conductor born.

Would it be unkind to say that his conducting sounded very like his music? Highly respectable, academically competent, rather like a textbook illustration of how a symphony should sound according to the schoolmasters; but pallid and bloodless, without musical goal and hence without real drive. The form is strictly orthodox, and even the use of a Mexican cowboy song has its precedent in Haydn's use of folk-song. There is nothing amateurish about this music, no calf love, no enthusiastic bungling. It is an apotheosis of the uninteresting.

Symphonic Drama

Koussevitzky's Olympian conception of the third "Leonore" Overture, the tonal splendor and the immaculate execution of the Boston Symphony, resulted in a performance that was little short of miraculous. The Overture itself is a concentrate of the greatest elements of "Fidelio," for which it was written. Nothing in that opera is more dramatic than the trumpet call of the last act, which, penetrating to the dungeon of an innocent man about to be murdered, announces that salvation has arrived. Nothing in the opera is more touching than the hesitating murmur of the orchestra following the trumpet signal—speechless moments during which Florestan's mind gropes slowly to the fact that he is saved.

Symphonically speaking, that trumpet call becomes a symbol of deliverance from evil and as such it builds the climax of Beethoven's overture. The high ethical force which underlies all of Beethoven's creative work is here dramatized with overwhelming effect. The murmuring of the orchestra swells to jubilation and, under Koussevitzky's baton, the rejoicing becomes as Beethoven intended it should, truly cosmic exultation. It was as if an entire world had been freed from evil, a blinding light of triumph.

This was recreation in the highest and completest sense of the word.

It is four seasons since the pageantry of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Scheherezade" was last unfolded at these concerts. Interpretations of such magnificence as Koussevitzky and his men give us would justify more frequent hearings. Aside from certain climactic passages where the brasses badly outbalanced the rest of the orchestra, it was a performance of exhilarating virtuosity and vitality.

When "Sheherezade" was first performed by the Boston Symphony, shortly before 1900, a Boston critic said that it was "in music very much like a Turner painting of the last period is in its own domain of art. It presents few ideas, but an overwhelming glow of color; as a lesson in tone coloring of the most modern sort it is very interesting and should be given again soon, for no one can digest its strange effects on a first hearing." Today, the "strange effects" no longer puzzle us, but the "glow of color" has not faded with the years. E. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ANNISTON, ALA.
STAR
NOV 6 - 1940

THOUGHTS ON THE MUSIC OF SIBELIUS

Sibelius as a national composer has been a subject of interest to many, and his "nationalism" has been misunderstood. Finlandia, for example, is not filled with Finnish folksongs. In fact, he does not consciously use the folk idiom of his land in any of his music. Another misconception so ably refuted by Cecil Gray in his biography of Sibelius is the fact that Finland is not a desolate wilderness inhabited by a primitive race, but a highly civilized country of cultured people, up-to-date ideas, and important sociological, scientific, and artistic achievements. Therefore, the idea that Sibelius's music is of primitive nature is false.

It has a primeval quality, of the grandeur and austerity of the great forests, and the composer once wrote in a letter quoted in the program book of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (November 17, 1932): "It is true I am a dreamer and a poet of nature. I love the mysterious sounds of the fields and forest, waters and mountains. . . . It pleases me greatly to be called an artist of nature, for nature has truly the book of books for me." . . .

To those who know Sibelius only as the composer of Valse Triste, Finlandia, and some of the inferior piano pieces, I would say that they know him not at all, because it is almost inconceivable that these compositions could have been written by the composer of the Fourth Symphony, or even the delightful incidental music to Strindberg's play Swan White. — From "Twentieth Century Music," by Marion Bauer. (New York: Putnam.)

Berezowsky's Third Symphony Has Merited Performance

Herald Nov 9

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloists were Abram Chasins and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianists. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 3 Op. 21 ..... Berezowsky
Concerto in C minor for two pianos No. 1 Bach
Concerto in C major for two pianos No. 2 Bach
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg" ..... Wagner

This was a very odd concert, and the best way to review it probably is to take up the program piece by piece. Three years ago we felt that Mr. Berezowsky's Third Symphony was a fine work, and our opinion has not altered in the interval. We had then some reservations about the finale, which were banished as we listened to it yesterday. The composer was in the audience and must have rejoiced at the sympathetic performance which his music received from the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky.

Mr. Berezowsky is not one of those composers who write well but have nothing of importance to say. This Symphony is an original work in the happiest sense of that much abused word. The scherzo, for example, is freakish without being silly and it makes an exceedingly interesting contrast with the first movement and the finale. The introduction to the first movement is idyllically tranquil, a mood which the ensuing music abruptly banishes. Yet the movement as a whole hangs together and has point.

In the finale Mr. Berezowsky has written with what seems to us as the most personal emotion, the most subjective feeling, of the Symphony. It is not particularly cheerful and is strangely moving. The concluding pages are beautifully wrought. Considered by many a significant work at its first hearing, this Symphony richly deserves reviving, and we venture to say that it will continue to merit it in the future.

The C major Concerto for two claviers and strings of Bach is, as all the authorities have agreed, much the best of the three. The fugue, for instance, is splendid music. The C minor Concerto, on the other hand, with the exception of the jolly finale, is only routine Bach. The machine functions perfectly smoothly, of course, but not very entertainingly.

Both of these concertos would sound a great deal better if they were played on harpsichords. There is no more deadly sound invented by man for his own musical pleasure than two pianos. They are good fun to play for one's own amusement; and an expert team in the concert hall gives one the same kind of stimulus to be had from watching a spirited athletic contest. But as sound, pure and simple, two pianos are horrid.

Two harpsichordists, accompanied by a small string orchestra in a small hall, would give a lot of pleasure to an audience in these concertos. But it is really a waste of the Boston Symphony's and Mr. Koussevitzky's time to play them at a symphony concert. After all, it is the orchestra that we have come to hear; and for fully half yesterday's concert it was of no importance whatever. Consequently we may properly ask if we were not symphonically cheated yesterday, whatever the increase in our musical experience. Mr. Chasins and Mr. Sanroma played skillfully and artistically, and we are bound to say that there was plenty of evidence of public enthusiasm. Possibly the foregoing criticism has been a little too academic!

Mr. Koussevitzky's Wagner is usually stirring, even if it shocks the echt-Wagnerians. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" should, if we interpret the latters' notions correctly, be rather beery. Whereas Mr. Koussevitzky's reading was heady, savoring of champagne or even vodka. At any rate the audience seemed to find the brew to its liking.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program lists Samuel Barber's Overture, "The School for Scandal," Debussy's Two Nocturnes; Hindemith's Konzertmusik for strings and brass; Brahms' Second Symphony.

Globe Nov 9

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

One's last memory of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert yesterday is of an exciting performance of the Prelude to Wagner's comedy-in-music, "The Maestersingers of Nuremberg." This miniature masterpiece really took but the last few minutes of an absorbing afternoon. During that time the audience heard a sort of revelation: a performance so intense yet well-proportioned that you forgot how many times you had heard the same tunes before.

All this happens but occasionally to familiar pieces, but when it does the music seems to have new life, and presently you find yourself sitting up straight, thrilled alike by the rich tone of a great orchestra, and by the genius that created such an incredibly beautiful work of art. A performance does not need to be perfect to have this effect. Like yesterday's, it may be more intense than contrapuntally clear, but the result is nevertheless a revelation.

Serge Koussevitzky had begun the afternoon by conducting novelties of Berezowsky and Bach. Nicolai Berezowsky's Third Symphony had been introduced here by the composer more than three years ago, and the age of Johann Sebastian Bach's Concertos in C minor and C major, for two pianos, is 200 years. But all were sufficiently unfamiliar to be novel. The two Concertos had never been played by the Boston Symphony before.

Mr. Berezowsky will probably agree that Mr. Koussevitzky brought out more from his music than he did himself. As a rule composers are not the best conductors of their own works. It follows that one found striking details yesterday not remembered from the first performance.

Under Mr. Koussevitzky the music was far more emotional and clear, most of all the ruggedly masculine first movement and the finale, both of which work into big climaxes. Shortcomings of structure cannot be concealed, however, by even the finest performances, and here the weakness of the Third Symphony is still plain. The first movement is the best of the three in that respect, proceeding as it does without hesitation.

Perhaps humor was intended at the beginning of the second movement, when staccato chords rush in complicated succession from one group of instruments to another. If such was Mr. Berebowsky's wish he was not quite successful. The second movement and also the third are inclined to be diffuse.

Berezowsky's definite merits are his excellent use of the orchestra, a harmonic style that is not conservative, yet avoids experiments with dissonance just for the sake of experiment. Rhythmically, something is always going on in his scores. He was well received when he appeared on the stage at Mr. Koussevitzky's request.

Jesus Maria Sanroma and Abram Chasins were able soloists for the Bach Concertos. The latter is an American pianist remembered for an appearance at one of the two pre-season concerts of American music by the Boston Symphony last year. The polish and crispness of Mr. Sanroma and Mr. Chasins were so marked as to make one almost think they had been working together for some time as a two-piano team. They won cordial and merited applause.

Bach wrote three Concertos for strings and two claviers, ancestor of the modern piano. Perhaps rewrote is more accurate for the first and third Concertos of the set, both of which are in C minor. Albert Schweitzer, the Bach scholar, is convinced these were derived, without much alteration, from Concertos for violin. The second, in C major, was original in its present form. Nos. 1 and 2 are played this week.

Without knowledge of the two scores, it would be reasonably easy to guess that Bach used a different style in the solo parts. Those of No. 2 are substantially more complex than those for No. 1 Mr. Koussevitzky secured nice balance of tone by using a reduced number of the Boston Symphony strings.

C. W. D.

SYMPHONY IN TWO CONCERTOS

Post Nov 9

Bach Numbers by Soloists Chasins and Sanroma

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Time was when the soloist at a Symphony Concert was the bait on the hook, but since the advent of Dr. Koussevitzky the assisting artist has been summoned less for himself (or herself) than for the music he played. This was well illustrated yesterday when the season's first soloists, Abram Chasins and Jesus Maria Sanroma, were heard in two concertos by Bach for two pianos and string orchestra.

Placed one before, one after the intermission, these concertos served to put at a comfortable distance from each other the Third Symphony of Nicolai Berezowsky and the "Meistersinger" prelude of Wagner. Although they had been heard at Bernard Zighera's chamber orchestra concerts, these concertos were new to Symphony Hall. The first, in C minor, is a rewriting of the celebrated concerto in D minor for two violins, and its chief glory is its slow movement. The other, in C major, was designed for its particular medium, and shows it. Here the final fugue is the principal attraction, though taken by and large, the two pieces were a joy to hear. And this goes also for the performances of them at the hands of soloists, conductor and orchestra.

Played here in 1937 with the composer conducting (he was in the audience yesterday), Mr. Berezowsky's symphony is a work which, viewed as a whole, must be damned with faint praise. It begins promisingly. The second movement is not without charm and interest, and the slow introduction to the finale has a pleasing richness and warmth. After that the descent is marked. Mr. Berezowsky is a well-equipped musician; he has engaging ideas, perhaps a superabundance of them in each work. But after the performance of one of his compositions the listener is moved to remark, "What's the use?" The outstanding exception to this rule, thus far, has been the Toccata, variations and finale for string quartet and orchestra of two years ago.

It was a happy idea of Dr. Koussevitzky's to follow Bach with the "Meistersinger" prelude, in which the great contrapuntist is born again in 19th century guise. Would that the performance itself had been as happy. As with Beethoven, Strauss and Rimsky-Korsakov already this season, Dr. Koussevitzky displayed a tendency "to gild refined gold, to paint the lily, to throw a perfume on the violet." The final climax was over-broad and over-brazen. In endeavoring to give the inner voices their due the conductor occasionally overdid them, while more than once the important melodic thread was lost in the contrapuntal tangle. But the splendor of the music cannot be dimmed, and yesterday it provoked a storm of applause.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

NOV 9 - 1940

MAHLER TO DIRECT MUSIC

Heads Classical Department of NYA Workshop and Orchestra

Fritz Mahler has been appointed director of the Classical Music Department of the NYA Radio Workshop and conductor of the NYA Symphony Orchestra, it was announced by Stanley L. Stevens, director of the Radio Workshop. Mr. Mahler will make his first appearance as regular conductor of the NYA Symphony Orchestra on a Radio Workshop broadcast on Sunday, Nov. 17.

Mr. Mahler, whose grandfather was an uncle of Gustav Mahler, the renowned composer and conductor, started his career on the podium eighteen years ago with the Vienna Volksoper. He made his American debut in 1936, shortly after arriving in this country from Austria.

For several seasons he was the permanent conductor of the Copenhagen Symphony Orchestra before coming to America and appeared as guest conductor with many important orchestras in Germany. In the United States he has had guest appearances with the Columbia Broadcasting System, Mutual Broadcasting System, Boston Symphony, Denver Symphony and other orchestras.

Bach at the Symphony

C.S.M. Nov 9

The Arts in Boston

For the fifth symphony pair of the season (Nov. 8-9) Dr. Koussevitzky fixed on these works: Berezowsky, Symphony No. 3; Bach, two concertos for two pianos, No. 1 in C minor, No. 2 in C major; Wagner, Prelude to "Meistersinger." The soloists were Abram Chasins and Jesús María Sanromá

Although the Bach concertos had been played at concerts of Bernard Zighera's Chamber Orchestra, with Ethel Bartlett and Rae Robertson assisting, they were heard yesterday afternoon for the first time at a Boston Symphony concert. The works were written for two claviers and string quartet. For the spaces of Symphony Hall, they were played on two grand pianos accompanied by a string orchestra built up on four doublebasses.

The result was one of the most exciting and most treasurable musical experiences within long memory. Most musicians will admit to an ultimate preference for the music of Johann Sebastian, as the purest musical expression. It is primarily music of line, classical music. One tires sooner or later of lush harmonies, of violent accent, of shattering sound. These are really appeals to, or assaults upon, the senses. One does not tire of beauty that grows out of line, form, proportion, mass, balance, unity in multiplicity. These qualities appeal to aesthetic, not physical emotion.

Now Bach is not the only composer who has written in this style; there have been many honored names in the classical tradition. Why is it then that musicians and music lovers so often turn at last back to Bach? Bach apparently does the same things that many other composers have done; and yet while other composers in the same style may lose their savor, Bach never does. Why? Who shall say? Why is there in a Bach slow movement an ineffable beauty that is to be found nowhere else in music? Nearly everybody with experience of music will agree that it is there, but nobody has analyzed it. You do not analyze genius.

The performance yesterday was of that extraordinary quality which is worthy of Bach's music. Soloists, conductor, and orchestra were as one in their understanding and revelation of these two scores. With reason, they were all applauded long and heartily after both performances.

The Berezowsky Symphony No. 3 was first played here three years ago under the direction of the composer. Yesterday Dr. Koussevitzky conducted it. There was inevitably an improvement in the performance which made the music sound, without doubt, its best. It contains some very tricky rhythms, which are perhaps its most interesting feature; but it is lacking in musical ideas of importance. L. A. S.

Symphony Concerts

Adv. Nov 10

IT IS customary and sometimes permissible for the reviewer, whenever confronted by new music, to take refuge in the old cliche, "It is all so new and complex that only on second hearing is it possible to pass judgment."

Well, we got our second hearing of Nicolai Berezowsky's Third Symphony in the Boston Symphony concerts over the week-end and the verdict is inescapable.

Since music is not always "the food of love," as Shakespeare's badly smitten Duke Orsino is went to speculate in "Twelfth Night," it is not requisite that it overtake the ear like "the sweet sound that breathes upon a bank of violets."

At least it isn't in this chromium-plated age. Music can breathe upon a bank of violets, or upon just a bank, or a blast furnace. And since Mr. Berezowsky supplies no program clues for his Third Symphony, invokes no image, he leaves us no choice. We can go only by the sound. And it is not our fault—though it may be his—if the blast furnace comes most readily in mind.

Let's hold out for the violets.

It is remarkable that the Boston Symphony still can find works of J. S. Bach to present "for the first time at these concerts." Yet there they were, the two Concerti for two pianos, the C minor No. 1 and the C major No. 2.

The two pianists were Chasins and Sanroma, and it is but routine to report that they, together with Dr. Koussevitzky and the stringed accompaniment, brought us all back to sanity and fresh air. In this case we could do without the violets.

The atmosphere was further purified and the spirit expanded by the Prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," brought to electrifying performance for the concerts' finale.

Dr. Koussevitsky, it appears, never fails in the homestretch.

Novelties From Bach—Paderewski Honored

Two Concertos for Two Pianos Listed for Symphony Concerts

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Comes something new from eighteenth-century Bach to the Boston Symphony Concerts this week—a couple of pieces described as concertos for two pianos; and they are billed to be presented with Abram Chasins and Jesús María Sanromá as soloists. They bear the designations, Concerto No. 1 in C minor and Concerto No. 2 in C major; but it is not to be supposed that they are the sort of compositions usually named concertos. For if they were, it is unlikely that they would have waited these 59 years for admission into the B. S. O. repertory. Really, they are a couple of antique curios, made available for modern performance by force of a certain amount of adaptation.

To take them as they open out in their volume amongst Bach's collected works, they are designed for two cembalos, accompanied by a string quartet; or, to be exact, by first and second violins, viola, and continuo, this last meaning violoncello or some bass equivalent. Now the pair of cembalos (call them claviers, if you prefer) could not have been anything to compare with two grand pianos such as Messrs. Chasins and Sanromá will sit up to. They were pretty small articles of furniture, to begin with; and they gave out what a listener nowadays would deem rather small sound. Nor could they have had much, if any, appreciable gradation of tone. As for the accompanying string quartet, that was precisely the combination of four instruments that audiences at chamber music performances have always taken pleasure in. To change to methods of modern orchestral presentation, the quartet may be magnified to a string orchestra, whereby it will match the sonority of a concert grand piano, though Bach ought not to suffer too much for that.

* * *

A look at the music as it appears on the printed page shows Concerto No. 1 to run in three movements—Allegro, Adagio, and Allegro. Concerto No. 2, regarded in the large, might be classified as a prelude and fugue, which is Bach's own form, the one he so masters that he exhausts all but its secondary possibilities. No. 2 may be accounted, nevertheless, a three-movement study, if anyone so prefers, comprising an opening allegro in C major, an adagio interlude in A minor, and a fugal finale in C major.

If the layout of the B. S. O. program means anything, subscribers will have good opportunity to compare the two items, C minor Concerto No. 1 having place immediately before the intermission, and C major No. 2 taking its turn immediately after. Should remark be made, "I don't care much for the first one." reply can be given, "Wait till you hear the second." Indeed, the difference in mood and manner between the two is marked. Traditional criticism seems to rate the second above the first. Then, too, the intermission allows the soloists a moment of relaxation and time for temperamental shaking down.

There is no telling just how historic the interpreters will try to be. They will hardly overdo tricks in this regard, because the B. S. O. is not, after all, a society of ancient instruments; nor does it go in for pretentious cultivation of quaintness. Suppose, however, the performers do in the main attempt to carry out Bach's purposes, one thing will become evident at the outset in Concerto No. 1; and that is Bach's intention to make the accompanying strings do for the keyboard instrument what in his day it could not do for itself. The strings, in brief, will furnish an alternation of energetic and relaxed effect—full tone, followed at regular periods by light tones, which will cause an illusion of pianoforte capability in the cembalos. Thus the music becomes a prophecy of the nineteenth-century loud and soft pedal.

* * *

Another way of speaking, musician here points the way for mechanician. Bach acts the part of idea man for coming generations of piano builders. Again, the soloists, if they follow the composer with fidelity, will prove execution to be of the finger rather than of the hand, unless they use a much-edited score. Beside a modern concerto, this one is as point lace to tapestry.

In the C major Concerto No. 2, restrictions of plan that characterize No. 1 are thrown off. The strings are still used for pianoforte emphasis and contrast, but the two claviers begin to act independently of each other. They are at times like instruments in duet, though they lapse back soon enough to the effect of a single instrument, four hands. A fragment of tune in the opening movement takes treatment which predicts Beethoven's handling of a short melody in his sonatas and symphonies. Did not J. Fred Wolle, the Bethlehem, Pa., Bach Choir director of other days, declare that Bach set going everything Beethoven practiced in the way of developing themes? Much exchange of the little strain of a half-dozen notes goes on between the cembalos, and some swapping arises also between first violin and the keyboards. For variety, the composer lets the solo instruments go a short spell without accompaniment of the strings. A contrast of figuration between the keyboard pair is momentarily accomplished, such that a keen listener might pick out the which-is-which of the episode without watching the artists.

To turn the leaves back, the interesting trait of Concerto No. 1 is the pizzicati of the strings against the cembalos, in the Adagio. This is a decided foreshadowing of today's devices of instrumentation. The glory of Concerto No. 2 is the concluding fugue.

Youth Concert

Daniel Gregory Mason's orchestral pieces, "Arise, Arise," and "The Rambling Sailor," based on song themes, were presented at the second Youth Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wheeler Beckett conducting, in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Mason, a professor of music who has a zeal for composing and a way of persuading conductors to perform his works, is an American figure for young folks interested in the tone art to know. Better acquaintance can be made with him, perhaps, as writer than as maker of things for concert presentation. His expression of himself in language is always pleasing and instructive. His expression of himself in music notes, for that matter, is pleasing, though not in every case exciting. His recent autobiography is a volume for students to read, if they want to get "inside" American musical ways and doings.

To mention another item on the program, Wagner's "Lohengrin" Prelude, Mr. Beckett spoke of it in his remarks to the young people as incorporated in a regrettable way into the music of a certain film now enjoying popularity. More to the moment, he called attention to the use of the high strings in the opening and closing measures of the piece and remarked that it was an indication of Wagner's originality and greatness.

If Mr. Beckett did not stir his hearers particularly with the Mason novelties, he put a jump into them with the finale of Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4, with which he concluded the afternoon. To record other items that he made a go of, there was Weber's "Oberon" Overture, the opener; and the Scherzo from the Seventh Symphony of Bruckner, the big job before intermission.

W. P. T.

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra at its sixth pair of concerts of the season in Symphony Hall next Friday and Saturday, will play Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal"; Debussy's Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fêtes"; Hindemith's Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments, and the Second Symphony of Brahms in D major. The music of Mr. Barber will then make its first appearance on the programs of this orchestra. Hindemith's orchestral concerto was composed for the orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary ten years ago, and then first performed. Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct in Cambridge Thursday evening the Symphony of Haydn in G major, No. 88; Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

* * *

Nanny Fisher will be heard in

DOROTHY MAYNOR RECITAL DEBUT---CURRENT MUSICAL COMMENT

60th Season

A Glance at the Illustrious Past of Boston's Great Symphony Orchestra

By EDWARD DOWNES

"OH! for a few such men in our midst!" wrote a San Francisco newspaper when Henry L. Higginson's proposal for a Boston Symphony Orchestra was published in this city 60 seasons ago. The envy of San Francisco was justified. For Mr. Higginson's "proposal" of March, 1881, was less of a suggestion for the future than it was an announcement of a fait accompli. Georg Henschel had been engaged as the orchestra's first conductor, a season of 20 concerts scheduled, and details, down to the price of tickets determined. The entire responsibility for the orchestra, including an expected $50,000 yearly deficit, had been shouldered by Mr. Higginson alone. Thus, as became a democracy, this great artistic institution was not the concession of a princely ruler to the masses, but the unostentatious gift of one citizen to his fellow citizens. One man with a compelling sense of social responsibility and a love of music made this magnificent contribution to his community: an orchestra which within two decades was to be the equal of any in this country or Europe, and in another decade acknowledged the finest in the world.

There is a tendency today among Europeans and among most Americans as well to think of the United States as a very young country, intellectually, artistically, politically. It comes as a shock, even to ourselves to realize that we have here the oldest written form of government in the world. And it is scarcely less surprising that not only the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (now in its 99th season) but the Boston Symphony too, is as old or older than many famous European orchestras.

The Berlin Philharmonic and the Vienna Philharmonic, before the war the finest orchestras in Europe, are respectively one year younger and one year older than the Boston Symphony. The Hamburg Philharmonic (Karl Muck's orchestra) was founded 15 years after the Boston Symphony and Munich's chief orchestra was not founded until 1911. The famous Paris Concerts of the Conservatory are over a hundred years old, but they no longer play a leading role. The London Philharmonic goes back to 1813. Of course all these capitals have an older orchestral history, but that is true of Boston as well.

Native Repertory

When Gericke came to Boston in 1884, he found the young Boston Symphony below Viennese standards, but the repertory which had been familiar to Boston audiences, even before the Boston Symphony was founded, far richer than what he was used to in Vienna. "I am completely dumfounded!" he said. "I do not see what there is left for me to do here. You seem to have had everything already: more, much more than we ever had in Vienna!" And we may take Gericke at his word, for he was not given to flattery.

It was typical of the Boston Symphony that its very first season, under Henschel, featured all nine of the Beethoven Symphonies, presented in chronological order. "It is entirely safe to assert that no citizen of Boston ever matured a plan for the advantage of his fellows with less ostentation than Mr. Higginson in this affair," wrote a local paper, "and the practical benefit to Boston can hardly be overestimated. No program will be presented until the orchestra has had it in ample rehearsal, and no pecuniary considerations will hamper the conductor in this careful preparation for each performance."

The twenty concerts of the first season were given on Saturday evenings, but there were also public rehearsals on Friday afternoon, to which a general admission fee of 25 cents was charged. Eventually these public rehearsals became the fashionable Friday matinee subscription series, but in the early days of the orchestra, Henschel would frequently stop, go back and work over a passage, to the delight of the large audiences.

Henschel's Popularity

Henschel himself, though a great and versatile musician, was not primarily a conductor. It was largely his musical temperament that carried the day while his band was technically immature. His fire was new and fascinating to the Boston public, though it led one critic to remark: "Not that we object to fire, but we would rather be warmed by it than roasted in a furious conflagration."

Bostonians were dazzled by the versatility of their conductor and Louis Elson, critic of the Boston Courier and the Boston Advertiser, wrote of a coming concert that there be "a good deal of Henschel in the program. That gentleman will appear as pianist, composer and conductor, and he has already appeared as a singer in the series. That is a good deal for one man to do. But he will do it all with satisfaction to the public, which seems to entirely captivated by him. The only thing he cannot do is to appear as a string quartet, or sing duets with himself."

When, in the second season Higginson started to limit the interference of outside activities of the symphony men, the Transcript roundly condemned the "extraordinary stipulation that all the players shall bind themselves by contract to give him their whole time for four consecutive days of every week. . . . He thus 'makes a corner' in orchestral players, and monopolizes them for his own concerts and those of the Handel and Haydn Society. . . . Mr. Higginson's gift becomes an imposition, it is something that we must receive, or else look musical starvation in the face. It is as if a man should make a poor friend a present of several baskets of champagne, and, at the same time cut off his whole water supply."

But the raising of the symphony standard continued, just the same.

During the second and third seasons under Henschel, as the concerts improved people would say to Mr. Higginson: "Isn't the orchestra splendid?" To which Higginson replied: "It is not. It is learning, and will be good by and by."

Enormous technical progress was made under Wilhelm Gericke, who reigned from 1884-89. He not only disciplined and drilled the members as they had never been drilled before, but in his second season he replaced 20 players with men from Europe, including Kneisel and Adamowski. "We are thankful that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson," wrote a contemporary wag. "We are thankful that one or two Americans are still left in our symphony orchestra, so that the United States language may be preserved from oblivion."

The First Pops

Under the Gericke, the second half of the Boston Symphony programs, which had heretofore consisted of light classics, was made as serious as the first. For the first time programs were hazarded without the drawing power of a soloist. It was under the Gericke too that the tradition of the Pops seasons was established. From its very first seasons the symphony had visited near-by New England towns and cities, and the six traditional concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, are as old as the orchestra. But it was not until Gericke's time that the orchestra visited New York. This was an extremely important trip to the young band, and Gericke postponed it once at great expense to Mr. Higginson, because he had decided his men were not yet ready for the test. His decision was vindicated when the New York concert finally took place with sensational success.

What H. T. Parker of the Transcript dubbed the romantic period of the Boston Symphony began in 1889 with the tenure of Artur Nikisch. When Karl Muck conducted his first concert in the autumn of 1906, as a compliment to the Boston Symphony and to show his confidence in the players, he laid down his baton in the middle of a Beethoven Symphony and let the orchestra play on by itself. The orchestra now became the greatest in the world.

With the entrance of the United States into the World War came the arrest of Muck under circumstances later regretted by everyone concerned, the retirement of Mr. Higginson as sole backer of the orchestra, the incorporation of the orchestra with a board of trustees, and a difficult period of adjustment and readjustment.

Under Serge Koussevitzky the Boston Symphony has been restored to its former prestige. Technically and artistically it stands today, in its 60th season, at the peak of American orchestras.

Georg Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he looked when he took up his duties in this city 60 seasons ago. Singer, composer, pianist and conductor, he was highly regarded for his versatile musicianship and the warmth of his interpretive temperament. Above: Serge Koussevitzky, who has wielded the baton of the Boston Symphony longer than any other conductor and restored the orchestra to its pre-war brilliance and prestige.

Week of Music

Tonight

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, Abram Chasins and Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianists, Symphony Hall, 8.15. Berezowsky: Third Symphony; Bach: Concerto in C minor for two pianos, Concerto in C major for two pianos; Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger."

Ballet Russe, Boston Opera House, 8.30. Swan Lake, Serenade, The New Yorker, Vienna 1814.

Bach at Symphony

Sanroma, Chasins, Soloists in Two-Piano Concertos—Berezowsky Third Symphony

What a tragedy Bach did not write for symphony orchestra! In most of Bach's creations, such as the two Concertos for Two Harpsichords played at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert, he relegates his orchestra to the role of musical underpinning. Of course, there are occasions (the Passions or the B minor Mass) when he uses a vaster and richer orchestral apparatus. But it remains accompaniment—never the protagonist. Bach real instrumental ensembles on the other hand are essentially chamber ensembles, and would be distorted out of recognition by a full sized modern symphony orchestra. And so to hear the greatest of all composers at a symphony concert we have to depend on transcriptions of variable taste and skill, or on such interesting experiments as that of yesterday afternoon.

The two works in question are the C minor Concerto for Two Harpsichords, No. 1 and the C major Concerto, No. 2. The solo parts were played to two modern pianos by Jesus Maria Sanroma, official pianist of the Boston Symphony, and Abram Chasins, composer, pianist and lecturer at the Berkshire Music Center. The program opened with Nicalai Berezowski's ingenious Third Symphony and closed with the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger."

The C major Concerto and the last movement of the C minor are Bach in his happiest most expansive mood. If there were moments earlier in the C minor Concerto when the great Leipzig cantor appeared to nod, this was partly due to the performance. For though Messrs. Sanroma and Chasins drew out the line of Bach's counterpoint with commendable clarity and grace, their performance often lacked the commanding breadth and rhythmic vitality which save the lesser Bach from being a periwigged bore.

Question of Balance

Perhaps also the fact that the two pianos were not always allowed to dominate the ensemble threw the music out of kilter. For as Schweizer says in a passage quoted by Mr. Burke's instructive program notes, the C major Concerto "is not an orchestral concerto with two solo harpsichords, but a concerto for two solo claviers with orchestral accompaniment." And Spitta remarks that the orchestra could quite well be dispensed with altogether, so unimportant is it from either the harmonic or thematic point of view.

Purists in the audience lamented that the Concertos had not been played on harpsichords as Bach directed. But there is the unfortunate practical fact that a harpsichord does not sound in Symphony Hall. Two harpsichords probably wouldn't be much better. True, there is today a sort of harpsichord piano, which has been aptly described as a piano with tacks in it, but this instrument is scarcely a solution of the problem. Dr. Koussevitzky undoubtedly has found the best balance between artistic and practical necessity, and a hearty vote of thanks is due him for introducing these two delightful works to symphony audiences.

Berezowsky Third

Mr. Berezowsky himself conducted the first Boston performance of his Third Symphony at the symphony concerts in 1937. It is obviously the work of a richly endowed and highly skilled musician. Written in a rather nervous, at times almost disjointed vein, it abounds in passage of great beauty and still greater ingenuity. But on initial acquaintance it lacks cohesion or unity. Indeed, the very abundance of ideas as they come tumbling from the composer's brain, seems to prevent the organic growth and exfoliation of any one group of themes. There is material there for several symphonies to which we look forward as the architectural side of Mr. Berezowsky's gifts grows.

The program closed with a brilliant but curiously ungermanic performance of the Overture to "Die Meistersinger." E. D.

Dorothy Maynor

Negro soprano who sings in Symphony Hall Nov. 27.

Brilliant Conductor Dies

HARTFORD, CONN. COURANT

NOV 10 1940

Tradition Is Continued By Koussevitzky

DOROTHY MAYNOR RECITAL DEBUT---CURRENT MU

60th Season

A Glance at the Illustrious Past of Boston's Great Symphony Orchestra

By EDWARD DOWNES

"OH! for a few such men in our midst!" wrote a San Francisco newspaper when Henry L. Higginson's proposal for a Boston Symphony Orchestra was published in this city 60 seasons ago. The envy of San Francisco was justified. For Mr. Higginson's "proposal" of March, 1881, was less of a suggestion for the future than it was an announcement of a fait accompli. Georg Henschel had been engaged as the orchestra's first conductor, a season of 20 concerts scheduled, and details, down to the price of tickets determined. The entire responsibility for the orchestra, including an expected $56,000 yearly deficit, had been shouldered by Mr. Higginson alone. Thus, as became a democracy, this great artistic institution was not the concession of a princely ruler to the masses, but the unostentatious gift of one citizen to his fellow citizens. One man with a compelling sense of social responsibility and a love of music made this magnificent contribution to his community: an orchestra which within two decades was to be the equal of any in this country or Europe, and in another decade acknowledged the finest in the world.

There is a tendency today among Europeans and among most Americans as well to think of the United States as a very young country, intellectually, artistically, politically. It comes as a shock, even to ourselves to realize that we have here the oldest written form of government in the world. And it is scarcely less surprising that not only the New York Philharmonic-Symphony (now in its 99th season) but the Boston Symphony too, is as old or older than many famous European orchestras.

The Berlin Philharmonic and the Vienna Philharmonic, before the war the finest orchestras in Europe, are respectively one year younger and one year older than the Boston Symphony. The Hamburg Philharmonic (Karl Muck's orchestra) was founded 15 years after the Boston Symphony and Munich's chief orchestra was not founded until 1911. The famous Paris Concerts of the Conservatory are over a hundred years old, but they no longer play a leading role. The London Philharmonic goes back to 1813. Of course all these capitals have an older orchestral history, but that is true of Boston as well.

Native Repertory

When Gericke came to Boston in 1884, he found the young Boston Symphony below Viennese standards, but the repertory which had been familiar to Boston audiences, even before the Boston Symphony was founded, far richer than what he was used to in Vienna. "I am completely dumfounded!" he said. "I do not see what there is left for me to do here. You seem to have had everything already: more, much more than we ever had in Vienna!" And we may take Gericke at his word, for he was not given to flattery.

It was typical of the Boston Symphony that its very first season, under Henschel, featured all nine of the Beethoven Symphonies, presented in chronological order. "It is entirely safe to assert that no citizen of Boston ever matured a plan for the advantage of his fellows with less ostentation than Mr. Higginson in this affair," wrote a local paper, "and the practical benefit to Boston can hardly be overestimated. No passage will thus 'make a corner' in orchestral players, and monopolizes them for his own concerts and those of the Handel and Haydn Society. . . . Mr. Higginson's gift becomes an imposition, it is something that we must receive, or else look musical starvation in the face. It is as if a man should make a poor friend a present of several baskets of champagne, and, at the same time cut off his whole water supply."

But the raising of the symphony standard continued, just the same.

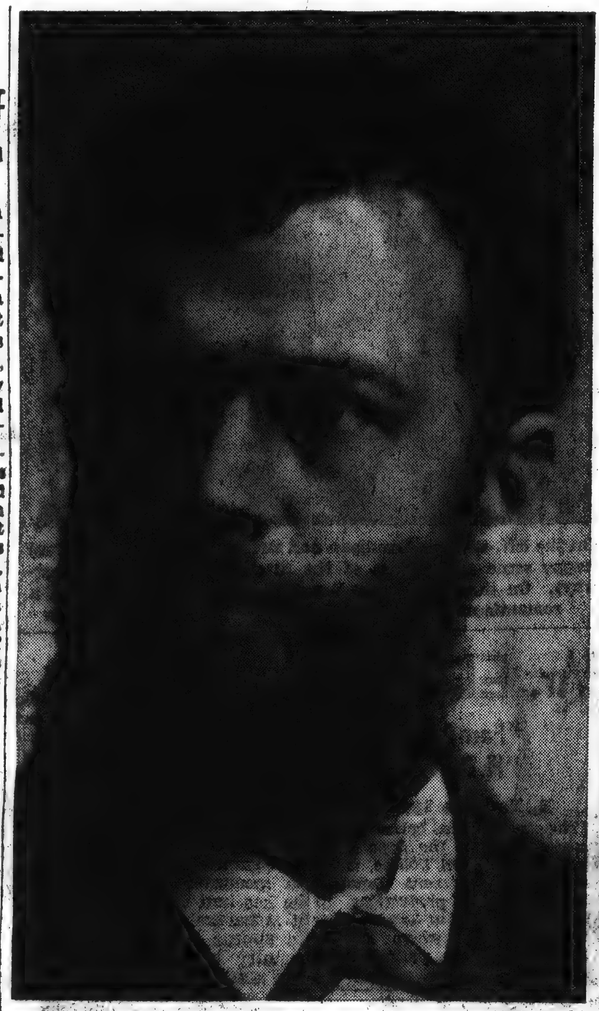
During the second and third seasons under Henschel, as the concerts improved people would say to Mr. Higginson: "Isn't the orchestra splendid?" To which Higginson replied: "It is not. It is learning, and will be good by and by."

Enormous technical progress was made under Wilhelm Gericke, who reigned from 1884-89. He not only disciplined and drilled the members as they had never been drilled before, but in his second season he replaced 20 players with men from Europe, including Kneisel and Adamowski. "We are thankful that Mr. Gericke, in his sweeping discharges, did not discharge Mr. Higginson," wrote a contemporary wag. "We are thankful that one or two Americans are still left in our symphony orchestra, so that the United States language may be preserved from oblivion."

The First Pops

Under the Gericke, the second half of the Boston Symphony programs, which had heretofore consisted of light classics, was made as serious as the first. For the first time programs were hazarded without the drawing power of a soloist. It was under the Gericke too that the tradition of the Pops seasons was established. From its very first seasons the Symphony had visited near-by New England towns and cities, and the six traditional concerts in Sanders Theater, Cambridge, are as old as the orchestra. But it was not until Gericke's time that the orchestra visited New York. This was an extremely important trip to the young band, and Gericke postponed it once at great expense to Mr. Higginson, because he had decided his men were not yet ready for the test. His decision was vindicated when the New York concert finally took place with sensational success.

What H. T. Parker of the Transcript dubbed the romantic period of the Boston Symphony began in 1889 with the tenure of Artur Nikisch. When Karl Muck conducted his first concert in the autumn of 1906, as a compliment to the Boston Symphony and to show his confidence in the players, he laid down his



Georg Henschel, first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as he looked when he took up his duties in this city 60 seasons ago. Singer, composer, pianist and conductor, he was highly regarded for his versatile musicianship and the warmth of his interpretive temp vitzky, who has wielded the b longer than any other conducte its pre-war brilliance and prest

vitzky had pioneered for Brahms. It remained for him to introduce the Fourth Symphony to Paris only a few seasons ago. He recalls his surprise at finding equally recently that the Germans still pronounce Brahms of questionable worth. The supposedly ancient feud of the Wagnerians against the Brahmsians still flames.

In Russia, the way was hard for Koussevitzky with the introduction of music by Richard Strauss. In this he repeated the experiences of Gericke with "From Italy" in 1888, and Emil Paur with "Till Eulanspiegel" in 1896.

Another striking point in this theme of continuity is that Artur Nikisch, model of conducting for the young Koussevitzky in Berlin, fellow protagonist of Brahms and Tschaikowsky in Europe, was likewise one of his predecessors in

Odd Items

Sundry Matters in

That would be Ray Milland and Claudette Colbert just above, in the Met's new and romantic comedy, "Arise My Love."

The Playbill

Continued from Page 4

ter of the Fifteen. At the Peabody Playhouse. Final performance tonight.

OPENING MONDAY

"Sim Sala Bim," a mystery show starring Dante, the eminent magician, direct from a recent Broadway engagement. A company of 35 support him in a program of 50 illusion numbers. At the Shubert. Matinees Wednesday and Saturday. Closes Nov. 23.

OMMENT

mphony

s, Soloists in Two-Piano
ezowsky Third Symphony

write for symphony orchestra as the two Concertos for Two
's Boston Symphony concert, he le of musical underpinning. Of Passions or the B minor Mass)
r orchestral apparatus. But it the protagonist. Bach real in-hand are essentially chamber ed out of recognition by a full
. And so to hear the greatest

It is true that the Nazis will e over again tomorrow night—nd the night after that—and very night. They will drop housands of bombs, and they'll estroy hundreds of buildings, nd they'll kill thousands of peo-
le—but a bomb has its limitaions! It can only destroy build-ngs and kill people. It cannot ill the unconquerable spirit and ourage of the people of London.
London can take it!

Dorothy Maynor

Negro soprano who sings in Symphony Hall Nov. 27.

The Hartford Times
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 10 1940

Tradition Is Continued By Koussevitzky

Brilliant Conductor Preserves and Enhances Flavor of Boston Symphony

A cherished attribute of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which opens the Bushnell Memorial's Symphony Series on Tuesday evening, November 19, is the persistence of its individual identity. Despite its span of 59 seasons, extending beyond the human limitations of the musical careers of players successively joining its ranks, certain identifiable characteristics endure. How account for this immunity to time? One may find the answer in striking elements of continuity woven themselves into the fabric of the orchestra's history at each juncture where a break in continuity threatened.

With the arrival of Serge Koussevitzky in 1924, a strong veering of the orchestra's course into "ultra-modern" music was hoped for by one faction of the public, and feared by another. The truth was, that with the new conductor multiple elements of continuity were brought to the orchestra. Although he placed on his first program an "ultra-modern" mechanistic inspiration, the "locomotive rhapsody" of his friend, Honegger, entitled "Pacific 231," Mr. Koussevitzky also had known Tschaikowsky, and had been his champion when the symphonies of that "modern" were still a shaky cause, requiring vivid interpretation.

Brahms was a subject of still sharper conflict. He was introduced by his "Tragic" overture in the very first season of this orchestra, and his First Symphony shortly followed. These performances were not the result of public interest, but of the acquaintanceship between Brahms and Georg Henschel, the conductor. Public and critics were either apathetic to this music, or downright hostile. Three years later, hundreds in the audience quit the hall during a performance of Brahms's Third Symphony.

Taking up the thread which Henschel had inserted in the history of the orchestra's first years, Koussevitzky carried it forward into a great Brahms Festival in 1930. Again illustrating in himself an element of continuity with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Koussevitzky had pioneered for Brahms. It remained for him to introduce the Fourth Symphony to Paris only a few seasons ago. He recalls his surprise at finding equally recently that the Germans still pronounce Brahms of questionable worth. The supposedly ancient feud of the Wagnerians against the Brahmsians still flames.

In Russia, the way was hard for Koussevitzky with the introduction of music by Richard Strauss. In this he repeated the experiences of Gericke with "From Italy" in 1888, and Emil Paur with "Till Eulanspiegel" in 1896.

Another striking point in this theme of continuity is that Artur Nikisch, model of conducting for the young Koussevitzky in Berlin, fellow protagonist of Brahms and Tschaikowsky in Europe, was likewise one of his predecessors in

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 10 1940

Guest With Bostonians

Desire Defauw, noted Belgian conductor, will take the place of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the next Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday night, Nov. 26. On his program will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the "Dance Symphony;" Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit;" Suite from the ballet, "Cephale et Procris," Gretry, and dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos," by deFalla.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

NOV 10 1940

Boston Symphony to Play Overture by Samuel Barber

Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," will have its first performance in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home series next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. This was introduced to New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on March 30, 1938, and has also been played by the National Orchestral Association.

Serge Koussevitsky's program also includes Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for string and brass instruments, Op. 50. This had its American premiere on Feb. 10, 1927, in a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Otto Klemperer. Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and Brahms's second symphony complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN

NOV 11 1940

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival already has received more than 1,000 subscriptions for the nine concerts to be given at Stockbridge next August by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky.

Subscription sales will continue until June 30, or until such time before then that 5,400 subscriptions have been received. After that, tickets for single performances will be on sale. Attendance for the 1940 festival totalled 68,839.

* * *

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK

NOV 14 1940

Stokowski to Mutual

By the middle 1920s, the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting System had turned their attention from the jazz that monopolized the air waves in radio's early days to the fine music that has now become a tradition on their networks.

Last week Mutual's hat rolled into the big-time music ring. In a surprise move, the youthful broadcasting system sewed up the Philadelphia Orchestra for a weekly series beginning this Friday at 3:15 p.m., with Eugene Ormandy and Leopold Stokowski conducting. Still missing from the air among the nation's symphony orchestras is the Boston Symphony, a condition not likely to be remedied soon, for the Boston group is nonunion, and any network or station broadcasting its music would risk reprisals by James C. Petrillo's all-powerful American Federation of Musicians.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

NOV 14 1940

STANLEY CHAPPLE SPEAKS

Tells Schubert Club How Harmony Has Been Used By Composers.

The manner in which harmony has been used by the great composers was discussed by Stanley Chapple, English conductor and lecturer, at a meeting of the Schubert Club last night at the Music Mansion.

Mr. Chapple, who will conduct a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra here later in the season, played selections to illustrate his points. He was introduced by Elizabeth Hope Higgins, president.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 11 1940

Koussevitzky Started with Double Bass

Soon Wanted Full Orchestra; Opens Bushnell Course

Some years ago, in the Conservatory at Moscow, a pupil named Serge Koussevitzky astonished everyone by his skill upon the double bass. He had chosen this unusual instrument because every student in the orchestral class was required to specialize in either a brass instrument—or the double bass.

It was not long before the young man was coaxing from his great lumbering instrument a tone, a dignity and grace that no one had dreamed the double bass could possess. That this giant violin had immense, awkward intervals, that it had to be bowed at arm's length, with a stoop, and its bow grasped fistwise like a hack saw, seemed to bother its young master not in the least.

Soon the name of Serge Koussevitzky became known across Europe as a double bass virtuoso to whom no one in the present or past could be compared. He made his instrument discourse divinely, as if it were a 'cello of marvelously deepened and enriched tone.

Yet the artist Koussevitzky could not long have been satisfied with such a limited medium of expression. He inevitably sought that most expressive of instruments—the full symphony orchestra. As a conductor, Koussevitzky again showed Europe new unprecedented beauties in musical performance. In Russia, in Paris or London, the "Koussevitzky concerts" became electric with the command of this extraordinary artist.

In 1924, Koussevitzky came to America, and had for the first time a great orchestra to do his bidding. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for many years reputed the finest organization of its kind in the world, actually reached new heights of perfection under the extraordinary Russian leader. This is the orchestra which opens the Bushnell Memorial symphony series on Tuesday, Nov. 19.

It has thus been more than once demonstrated that Koussevitzky's genius is the sort that begins where another leaves off. Whether it is a solo instrument or an orchestra before him, a splended technical achievement is but the starting point towards still subtler beauties and a still deeper significance.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 13 1940

Boston Programs.

Novelty on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Samuel Barber's Overture to "School for Scandal" which will be played for the first time at these concerts. Supplementing this will be Nuages and Fetes, Debussy; Kozertmusik for Strings and Brass, Hindemith and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

MUSIC

B. S. O. in Cambridge

Nov 14

Epochal Performance of Beethoven 'Leonore,' Music of the Ancien and Communist Regintes

By EDWARD DOWNES

The second concert of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series was given last night in Sanders Theater under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program consisted of works already presented this season at the regular Symphony Hall concerts: Haydn's Symphony No. 88 in G major, composed for the Loge Olympique in Paris, Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture and the Fifth Symphony of the Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovitch.

In Sanders Theater, even more than Symphony Hall, listeners wished it had been possible to hear Koussevitzky's brilliant interpretation of the Haydn Symphony with a reduced orchestra. In Symphony Hall a large orchestra may perhaps be justified by the large auditorium. But Sanders Theater, which comes nearer to the accoustical conditions under which the Haydn symphonies were originally heard, would have been an ideal place in which to use an orchestra of the size which Haydn knew, and for which he wrote.

All the wonderful crisp precision of which the Boston Symphony is capable, the sparkle and sheen, the robust sonorities when needed, were governed by Koussevitzky's uncanny mastery of Haydn style and spirit. So complete was his identification with composer that even the precipitate tour de force which he makes of the symphony's final rondo did not seem too badly out of place. One had a sneaking feeling that if Haydn had had such a magnificent instrument as the Boston Symphony in his hands he would have been tempted to do with it as Koussevitzky does.

Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony appeared, as before, a mixture of inspired imagination and sheer banality. The decisive fact is that the inspiration is strong enough, the symphonic structure is firm enough to carry off successfully even such a gradiose platitude as the final coda. Nor should the young Soviet's biting wit and satire be forgoten.

For one listener, the climax of the evening came with the heroic drama of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. It was a performance of titanic proportions, with an intensity and sweep beyond the reach of the purple phrase. It was the greatest interpretation of this compact symphonic poem we have heard. Long and loud was the applause which Koussevitzky shared with his men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot

NOV 14 1940

Program Given By Symphony Draws Crowd

Musicians Show Skill in Interpretation of Orchestral Numbers

At the auditorium last evening, the Walker Free Lecture series presented The Little Symphony of Boston in a short but interesting program of modern orchestral music.

There was a capacity audience present with many standing in the rear of the hall. To those who are unacquainted with The Little Symphony it might be interesting to note that these men are all members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was unfortunate that Mr. Theodorowicz, the conductor of this group, could not be present as illness kept him from his post. However, the group was conducted very ably by Mr. Gundersen, a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony.

Rhapsody In Blue

The orchestra began with a Deer Dance and War Dance by Skelton. This was followed with a flute solo by Walter Knight. The Woodland Sketches of MacDowell were perfectly balanced and beautifully played. Then came the popular Rhapsody in Blue of George Gershwin. The solo piano was expertly played by Leo Litwin who has done this work many times with the Boston Symphony Pops under Arthur Fiedler.

The program ended with the Victor Herbert favorites which everybody enjoyed, because the music of Herbert is heard so often. The encore number was a Scotch Poem by MacDowell and featured Louis Speyer as oboe soloist. Mr. Speyer occupies first chair in the oboe section of the Boston Symphony. This composition was most effective for the solo oboe was heard behind the stage and produced an effect against an orchestral background. This brought another encore, the Tango by Garde, a familiar Spanish Dance This brought the concert to a close and the members of the orchestra arose from their chairs in acknowledgement of the splendid applause. — Herbert J. Hooper.

Barber's 'School for Scandal' Overture for the Symphony

C. S. M. Nov 14

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Pop" style seizes hold for a moment at the Boston Symphony Concerts this week, Samuel Barber's "School for Scandal" Overture starting off the program for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Thus native composing, thanks to the favor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, enjoys a moment of notice, and thus, too, native listening has opportunity to measure its tolerance and appreciation of the American idea.

The Overture is a brief study, a hint of design, rather than a completely organized picture and painting in tone. It may have a great deal to do with its subject, though that scarcely appears from evidence of the written music. The title, in respect of both its technical designation of Overture, and its illustrative tag, "School for Scandal," seems to serve as a printer's and showman's convenience chiefly, having little obvious bearing on the work itself. The composer, by appearances, has something to say through the agency of orchestral instruments which he sets down in notes; and once said finally said. By ordinary method, he would make statement, development and recapitulation of his remarks, and so would produce the usual type of overture. His plain purpose, however, takes another direction; and what we have, as far as form goes, is but a sketch.

* * *

On the descriptive side, search through the few pages that comprise the full score reveals scant attestation of drama; much less anything directly representing character or action in the eighteenth-century play, "The School for Scandal." There pervades Mr. Barber's measures, nevertheless, a most genial and even exquisite mood of fun. The opening is all chatter, and catchingly in the vein of comedy, even if it bears no especial relation to Sheridan's Daughters of Calumny.

More appropriately than Overture, the work might carry the designation, Scherzo, unless that word still lies outside the general music vocabulary. But to turn the leaves of the book over, the sprightly opening gives way presently to something on the romantic order, something that might pass for a scherzo's trio section; and this proceeds not far when along comes the finale—a lively outburst, and little enough like the return and repeat that would satisfy classic expectation.

* * *

To take a hasty second glance at the inside episode, what have we but a passage for the English horn in the style of a folk song? A good fancy like that might be told twice, were it the composer's way so to do. Away, then, with the English horn, and give the solo clarinet a chance; and now a sweeter tune still arises, and again of the old ballad type. This assures pleasure, indeed, when the hour for listening strikes. But where are the variations on these delightful strains?

They do not materialize. Where does the screen scene, which has kept "The School for Scandal" alive for 150 years and more, find representation?

No answer to that, either. After the clarinet, the flute claims attention, with a jolly sort of melody, staccato. Thereafter, some moments of heavy orchestration, and the wind-up arrives. The piece has a future in the popular repertory, surely, and a fair chance, without doubt, in the regular one.

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra next week will make its first visit of the season to New York and other cities. Its next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 29 and 30, with Désiré Defauw as guest conductor. Mr. Defauw has been for years the leading conductor at Brussels. Previously he was known as a virtuoso of the violin and was also active in quartet performances. He came to America for a brief period last season. He was in Europe when, in the spring, his country was invaded, and succeeded with difficulty in moving his family to Paris and to England by way of Bordeaux. His concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will constitute his first appearances in the United States at a public concert. Mr. Defauw announces the following program: César Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit"; the Suite from Grétry's ballet, "Céphale et Procris," edited by Felix Mottl; Falla's three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

* * *

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 10 1940

Guest With Bostonians

Desire Defauw, noted Belgian conductor, will take the place of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the next Providence concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Tuesday night, Nov. 26. On his program will be Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the "Dance Symphony;" Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit;" Suite from the ballet, "Cephale et Procris," Gretry, and dances from the ballet "El Sombrero de tres picos," by deFalla.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 10 1940

Boston Symphony to Play
...ure by Samuel Barber

Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," will have its first performance in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home series next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall. This was introduced to New York by the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra on March 30, 1933, and has also been played by the National Orchestral Association.

Serge Koussevitsky's program also includes Paul Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for string and brass instruments, Op. 50. This had its American premiere on Feb. 10, 1927, in a concert of the New York Symphony Orchestra under Otto Klemperer. Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fêtes" and Brahms's second symphony complete the program.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WAUKESHA, WIS.
FREEMAN
NOV 11 1940

The Berkshire Symphonic Festival already has received more than 1,000 subscriptions for the nine concerts to be given at Stockbridge next August by the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky.

Subscription sales will continue until June 30, or until such time before then that 5,400 subscriptions have been received. After that, tickets for single performances will be on sale. Attendance for the 1940 festival totalled 68,839.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DAYTON, O.
NEWS WEEK
NOV 11 1940

Stokowski to Mutual

By the middle 1920s, the National Broadcasting Co. and the Columbia Broadcasting System had turned their attention from the jazz that monopolized the air waves in radio's early days to the fine music that has now become a tradition on their networks.

Last week Mutual's hat rolled into the big-time music ring. In a surprise move, the youthful broadcasting system sewed up the Philadelphia Orchestra for a weekly series beginning this Friday at 3:15 p.m., with Eugene Ormandy and Leopold Stokowski conducting. Still missing from the air among the nation's symphony orchestras is the Boston Symphony, a condition not likely to be remedied soon, for the Boston group is nonunion, and any network or station broadcasting its music would risk reprisals by James C. Petrillo's all-powerful American Federation of Musicians.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 14 1940

STANLEY CHAPPLE SPEAKS

Tells Schubert Club How Harmony Has Been Used By Composers.

The manner in which harmony has been used by the great composers was discussed by Stanley Chapple, English conductor and lecturer, at a meeting of the Schubert Club last night at the Music Mansion.

Mr. Chapple, who will conduct a concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra here later in the season, played selections to illustrate his ... introduced by Eliza... Higgins, president.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 11 1940

Koussevitzky Started with Double Bass

Soon Wanted Full Orchestra; Opens Bushnell Course

Some years ago, in the Conservatory at Moscow, a pupil named Serge Koussevitzky astonished everyone by his skill upon the double bass. He had chosen this unusual instrument because every student in the orchestral class was required to specialize in either a brass instrument—or the double bass.

It was not long before the young man was coaxing from his great lumbering instrument a tone, a dignity and grace that no one had dreamed the double bass could possess. That this giant violin had immense, awkward intervals, that it had to be bowed at arm's length, with a stoop, and its bow grasped fistwise like a hack saw, seemed to bother its young master not in the least.

Soon the name of Serge Koussevitzky became known across Europe as a double bass virtuoso to whom no one in the present or past could be compared. He made his instrument discourse divinely, as if it were a 'cello of marvelously deepened and enriched tone.

Yet the artist Koussevitzky could not long have been satisfied with such a limited medium of expression. He inevitably sought that most expressive of instruments—the full symphony orchestra. As a conductor, Koussevitzky again showed Europe new unprecedented beauties in musical performance. In Russia, in Paris or London, the "Koussevitzky concerts" became electric with the command of this extraordinary artist.

In 1924, Koussevitzky came to America, and had for the first time a great orchestra to do his bidding. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, for many years reputed the finest organization of its kind in the world, actually reached new heights of perfection under the extraordinary Russian leader. This is the orchestra which opens the Bushnell Memorial symphony series on Tuesday, Nov. 19.

It has thus been more than once demonstrated that Koussevitzky's genius is the sort that begins where another leaves off. Whether it is a solo instrument or an orchestra before him, a splended technical achievement is but the starting point towards still subtler beauties and a still deeper significance.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
NOV 13 1940

Boston Programs.

Novelty on the programs of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week will be Samuel Barber's Overture to "School for Scandal" which will be played for the first time at these concerts. Supplementing this will be Nuages and Fetes, Debussy; Kozertmusik for Strings and Brass, Hindemith and the Second Symphony of Brahms.

MUSIC

B. S. O. in Cambridge

Nov 14

Epochal Performance of Beethoven 'Leonore,' Music of the Ancien and Communist Regimes

By EDWARD DOWNES

The second concert of the Boston Symphony's Cambridge series was given last night in Sanders Theater under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky. The program consisted of works already presented this season at the regular Symphony Hall concerts: Haydn's Symphony No. 88 in G major, composed for the Loge Olympique in Paris, Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture and the Fifth Symphony of the Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovitch.

In Sanders Theater, even more than Symphony Hall, listeners wished it had been possible to hear Koussevitzky's brilliant interpretation of the Haydn Symphony with a reduced orchestra. In Symphony Hall a large orchestra may perhaps be justified by the large auditorium. But Sanders Theater, which comes nearer to the accoustical conditions under which the Haydn symphonies were originally heard, would have been an ideal place in which to use an orchestra of the size which Haydn knew, and for which he wrote.

All the wonderful crisp precision of which the Boston Symphony is capable, the sparkle and sheen, the robust sonorities when needed, were governed by Koussevitzky's uncanny mastery of Haydn style and spirit. So complete was his identification with composer that even the precipitate tour de force which he makes of the symphony's final rondo did not seem too badly out of place. One had a sneaking feeling that if Haydn had had such a magnificent instrument as the Boston Symphony in his hands he would have been tempted to do with it as Koussevitzky does.

Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony appeared, as before, a mixture of inspired imagination and sheer banality. The decisive fact is that the inspiration is strong enough, the symphonic structure is firm enough to carry off successfully even such a gradiose platitude as the final coda. Nor should the young Soviet's biting wit and satire be forgoten.

For one listener, the climax of the evening came with the heroic drama of Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture. It was a performance of titanic proportions, with an intensity and sweep beyond the reach of the purple phrase. It was the greatest interpretation of this compact symphonic poem we have heard. Long and loud was the applause which Koussevitzky shared with his men.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CONCORD, N. H.
Monitor & N. H. Patriot
NOV 14 1940

Program Given By Symphony Draws Crowd

Musicians Show Skill in Interpretation of Orchestral Numbers

At the auditorium last evening, the Walker Free Lecture series presented The Little Symphony of Boston in a short but interesting program of modern orchestral music.

There was a capacity audience present with many standing in the rear of the hall. To those who are unacquainted with The Little Symphony it might be interesting to note that these men are all members of the Boston Symphony orchestra. It was unfortunate that Mr. Theodorowicz, the conductor of this group, could not be present as illness kept him from his post. However, the group was conducted very ably by Mr. Gundersen, a member of the first violin section of the Boston Symphony.

Rhapsody In Blue

The orchestra began with a Deer Dance and War Dance by Skelton. This was followed with a flute solo by Walter Knight. The Woodland Sketches of MacDowell were perfectly balanced and beautifully played. Then came the popular Rhapsody in Blue of George Gershwin. The solo piano was expertly played by Leo Litwin who has done this work many times with the Boston Symphony Pops under Arthur ...

Barber's 'School for Scandal' Overture for the Symphony

C.S.M. Nov 14

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"Pop" style seizes hold for a moment at the Boston Symphony Concerts this week, Samuel Barber's "School for Scandal" Overture starting off the program for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Thus native composing, thanks to the favor of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the conductor, enjoys a moment of notice, and thus, too, native listening has opportunity to measure its tolerance and appreciation of the American idea.

The Overture is a brief study, a hint of design, rather than a completely organized picture and painting in tone. It may have a great deal to do with its subject, though that scarcely appears from evidence of the written music. The title, in respect of both its technical designation of Overture, and its illustrative tag, "School for Scandal," seems to serve as a printer's and showman's convenience chiefly, having little obvious bearing on the work itself. The composer, by appearances, has something to say through the agency of orchestral instruments which he sets down in notes; and once said finally said. By ordinary method, he would make statement, development and recapitulation of his remarks, and so would produce the usual type of overture. His plain purpose, however, takes another direction; and what we have, as far as form goes, is but a sketch.

* * *

On the descriptive side, search through the few pages that comprise the full score reveals scant attestation of drama; much less anything directly representing character or action in the eighteenth-century play, "The School for Scandal." There pervades Mr. Barber's measures, nevertheless, a most genial and even exquisite mood of fun. The opening is all chatter, and catchingly in the vein of comedy, even if it bears no especial relation to Sheridan's Daughters of Calumny.

More appropriately than Overture, the work might carry the designation, Scherzo, unless that word still lies outside the general music vocabulary. But to turn the leaves of the book over, the sprightly opening gives way presently to something on the romantic order, something that might pass for a scherzo's trio section; and this proceeds not far when along comes the finale—a lively outburst, and little enough like the return and repeat that would satisfy classic expectation.

* * *

To take a hasty second glance at the inside episode, what have we but a passage for the English horn in the style of a folk song? A good fancy like that might be told twice, were it the composer's way so to do. Away, then, with the English horn, and give the solo clarinet a chance; and now a sweeter tune still arises, and again of the old ballad type. This assures pleasure, indeed, when the hour for listening strikes. But where are the variations on these delightful strains?

They do not materialize. Where does the screen scene, which has kept "The School for Scandal" alive for 150 years and more, find representation?

No answer to that, either. After the clarinet, the flute claims attention, with a jolly sort of melody, staccato. Thereafter, some moments of heavy orchestration, and the wind-up arrives. The piece has a future in the popular repertory, surely, and a fair chance, without doubt, in the regular one.

Music Notes

The Boston Symphony Orchestra next week will make its first visit of the season to New York and other cities. Its next pair of concerts in Symphony Hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Nov. 29 and 30, with Désiré Defauw as guest conductor. Mr. Defauw has been for years the leading conductor at Brussels. Previously he was known as a virtuoso of the violin and was also active in quartet performances. He came to America for a brief period last season. He was in Europe when, in the spring, his country was invaded, and succeeded with difficulty in moving his family to Paris and to England by way of Bordeaux. His concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra will constitute his first appearances in the United States at a public concert. Mr. Defauw announces the following program: César Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit"; the Suite from Grétry's ballet, "Céphale et Procris," edited by Felix Mottl; Falla's three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

* * *

The program ended with the Victor Herbert favorites which everybody enjoyed, because the music of Herbert is heard so often. The encore number was a Scotch Poem by MacDowell and featured Louis Speyer as oboe soloist. Mr. Speyer occupies first chair in the oboe section of the Boston Symphony. This composition was most effective for the solo oboe was heard behind the stage and produced an effect against an orchestral background. This brought another encore, the Tango by Garde, a familiar Spanish Dance This brought the concert to a close and the members of the orchestra arose from their chairs in acknowledgement of the splendid applause. — Herbert J. Hooper.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
NOV 15 1940

Festival Promotes Entire New England, Says Edman

Provides Leadership in Musical Art at a Time When Cultural Values Are Being Destroyed

Special to THE EAGLE

BOSTON—The Berkshire Symphonic Festival, which is helping rehabilitate economically "an important part of New England" does more. It is promoting the entire region through publicity and advertising, as well as to provide leadership in musical art when cultural values are being destroyed in other parts of the world, as told before the 16th New England Conference session on recreational industry this morning by George W. Edman, clerk of the Festival corporation and managing editor of The Berkshire Eagle at Pittsfield.

He said the attraction of a great orchestra and conductor in idyllic surroundings has radiated to the far corners of the continent; that a large proportion of the thousands who arrive to attend this event at the "western gateway of New England" travel on to the Cape, the mountains and other points before their return home. Thus the Festival is importat to all New England.

Mr. Edman's Address

Mr. Edman said in part:

The Association of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at a place called Tanglewood, constitutes a unique partnership. This partnership is working in a number of ways to promote the welfare of the community. It is helping to bring about economic rehabilitation of an important part of New England. Through advertising and publicity, it is helping to promote New England in a desirable way. Through its work with schools and adult groups it is stimulating appreciation of music. Lastly and most important, it is responding to the need of the times by providing leadership in musical art. This leadership is significant of a way of life still preserved in a world where brute force has destroyed cultural values.

Last summer the official attendance at the nine Festival concerts was 68,839. This figure does not include the more than 9000 members and children who attended the three Saturday morning rehearsals. Thanks to the co-operation of the Berkshire Hills Conference and the Berkshire Innkeepers Association, we were able to take care of this great influx of people. Through an accommodations bureau established by these groups at the Festival office, 4000 people were helped to find rooms. The bureau estimated that these people represented 30,000-nights use of rooms and translated in cash $50,000 to $60,000 for rooms alone. Every hotel in the county was filled during week ends and hotels turned hundreds of people away.

The overflow was placed by the bureau in private homes and rooming houses. Many home owners in the towns near Tanglewood were able to pay their taxes through revenue resulting from the Festival.

Attendance Figures

A breakdown of our attendance indicated that 30 per cent of it came from the Berkshires. Thirty per cent came from outside New England, from every state in the Union, from Canada, the West Indies and Europe. Indications point to fully as good attendance in 1941.

People attracted to the Berkshires are buying and renting real estate. They are helping to swell the patronage of our other cultural centers. Their presence, as indicated by increased bank deposits during the Festival period, has affected the butcher, the baker, the merchant, and the gasoline stations.

We consider the Berkshires the Western gateway to New England. Thousands of people come to us for the Festival but we know also, that from the Berkshires they go to the Cape, the North Shore, the Green Mountains, Maine and New Hampshire. That is where New England benefits economically from what we are doing.

The accomplishments of the Festival have been significant. They have been possible because all kinds of people have worked together for the community. We believe the future will be great because the Festival does not depend on fashion, or snobbery, or sensational publicity. A great orchestra, a great conductor, remain the supreme attraction in idyllic surroundings. From Tanglewood there is radiating to the far corners of the continent the attraction of a great musical event that may be the experience of everyone who cares to attend.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERTOWN, MASS
TRIBUNE
11/15/40

Boston Conservatory Open Evenings

Because of the increased registration of evening students, Albert Alphin, President of the Boston Conservatory of Music, 26 Fenway, announces that the school will be open every week day evening until nine o'clock. Instruction in all subjects including vocal, instrumental, and theoretical will be available evenings under regular faculty members. The teaching staff of the Boston Conservatory is comprised of forty distinguished musicians and teachers, and includes several members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Students may enter for a single subject or pursue a course leading to the bachelor of music degree, diploma, or certificate. Upon recommendation of their teachers, evening students are accorded the privilege of participating in recitals and may be admitted the choral and orchestral training classes. Whether one wants to make music a profession or an avocation he will find the friendly atmosphere and cultural advantages at the Boston Conservatory of Music unsurpassed.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
NOV 16 1940

Koussevitsky to Offer Two-Symphony Concert In Series Debut, Friday

Boston Orchestra Will Play Vaughan Williams "London," Beethoven's Fifth

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first concert of the current Brooklyn season next Friday evening at 8:30 o'clock. The performance will be held in the Opera House of the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will be given over to two symphonies: A London Symphony, by the celebrated contemporary composer, Vaughan Williams, and the Symphony No. 5 in C minor, by Ludwig van Beethoven.

As in previous seasons, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has scheduled five concerts for its Brooklyn series. The remaining performances will be held on Friday evening, Jan. 10; Thursday evening, Feb. 13; Friday evenings, March 14 and April 4. The series is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

It is announced that the Brooklyn concerts for the current season are nearly sold out on subscription. Non-subscribers who wish to attend Friday evening's concert should communicate with the Institute box office in the Brooklyn Academy of Music as soon as possible.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
NEWS
NOV 15 1940

29

Berkshire Symphonic Festival Boon to New England, Edman Says

Pittsfield Newspaperman, Trustee of Tanglewood, Tells N. E. Council of Widespread Benefits; Praises Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Orchestra

Boston, Nov. 15—How a small community project grew until it became a notable contribution to the cultural and economic life of all New England was related today by George W. Edman, managing editor of the Berkshire Eagle, in describing the development of the Berkshire Symphonic festival to New England resort and travel leaders, gathered here in the recreational session of the 16th New England conference.

The conference is convened annually at the Hotel Statler by the New England council in cooperation with the six New England governors for consideration of problems relating to New England's economic welfare and progress. Presiding at the recreational session was Glenwood J. Sherrard, chairman of the New England council's recreational development committee, and prominent New England hotel man.

"The union of the Berkshire Symphonic festival and the Boston Symphony orchestra has worked in a number of ways to promote the welfare of the region and the entire community," said Edman, who is a trustee of the festival. "This partnership is bringing about economic rehabilitation to an important part of New England. Through advertising and publicity, it is helping to promote all of New England in a desirable way. Through its work with schools and adult groups, it is stimulating the appreciation of music. Lastly and most important, it is responding to the need of the times by providing leadership in musical art. This leadership is significant of a way of life still preserved here in a world where brute force has destroyed cultural values.

"That the festival exerts an economic influence on all of the Berkshires is reflected in the attitude of wholesale houses in Pittsfield, increased attendance at our summer theater, increased patronage at our museums and many other cultural and recreational centers. Bank deposits certainly are an indication of increased business. One small bank reports that its Monday deposits during the festival period are often more than $20,000 above the average. Recreational business in the Berkshires this past season showed a 10-per cent increase which businessmen are frank to concede was due in large measure to the festival.

"Thanks to the fine cooperation given us by the Berkshire Hills conference and the Berkshire Innkeepers' association we were able to take care of this great influx of visitors. An accommodations bureau was set up in our Stockbridge office. Through that bureau, 4000 people were helped to find rooms. The bureau estimated that these people represented 30,000 nights' use of rooms. Translated into cash, this means $50,000 to $60,000 for rooms alone. All the hotels in the Berkshires were filled over the weekends and they sent away thousands of people who in turn found accommodations in small rooming houses and private homes. In the towns nearest Tanglewood, it was impossible to find rooms of any kind during the weekends of the festival. It was here that the accommodations bureau stepped in to place people in towns 10 to 15 miles away.

Visitors Travel Far

"A breakdown of the attendance showed that 30 per cent of it came from the Berkshires. Approximately 30 per cent came from outside New England and from every state in the Union, Canada, the West Indies, Latin America and Europe. Indications now point to just as good attendance in 1941, although we cannot know what effect the war will have.

"The real estate market in the Berkshires, particularly in towns near Tanglewood, has quickened. People are buying or renting places that have been vacant or on the market for years. This is important in an era where in years past, many people have been dependent on large estates for employment."

Lauds Koussevitzky

That the popularity of the Berkshire festival helps the prosperity of all New England was pointed out by Edman. "When we publicize the festival," he said, "we publicize the Berkshires, but we do more than that. After all, the Boston Symphony orchestra is New England's orchestra. Our festival is not duplicated anywhere in its appeal. Here in New England we have established something unique that has appealed to music lovers, the press and others. We consider the Berkshires the western gateway to New England. Many of the 69,000 persons who attended this summer's concerts continue on to other sections of New England. This is how New England benefits economically from what we are doing."

Edman paid tribute to Dr Serge Koussevitzky whose long-cherished ambition to establish a great music center in America has been a driving force in the festival's success. "When we engaged the Boston Symphony orchestra, we had not reckoned with the imagination, vision and dynamic personality of its conductor," the speaker said. "He unfolded his plans to us, urged us to go forward, not to be content with a series of local concerts. If we were willing to expend our energies, why not direct them toward something great? It was a startling thought to a community apt to be more New England in its conservative outlook than New England itself."

Herald MUSIC Nov 16

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Overture, "The School for Scandal" ..... Barber
Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" ..... Debussy
Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments Op. 50 ..... Hindemith
Symphony No. 2 in D major Op. 73 ..... Brahms

All in all this was the best concert so far of the season. The program was nicely balanced between the familiar and the strange, and the playing was superb. The audience as a whole only realized what a fine concert it had been after the Brahms symphony, but we trust that they then recalled with renewed pleasure the first half of the program as well.

Mr. Barber's Overture is a delightful work and would be even if we did not have the delicious reminder of Sheridan to guide us. It is a formal overture in construction, and its manners are always polite. There are irresistible reminiscences of Lady Sneerwell's drawing-room, with its malicious flow of gossip. We should have to have further hearings—and we hope we shall—to catch more of the wrath of Sir Peter Teazle or the unctuousness of Joseph Surface.

But we have the composer's caution not to take "The School for Scandal," too seriously, for it is primarily as a man without a program that he wishes to be known. The Overture, then, as music is a very attractive and well wrought piece of work. As far as the Boston Symphony's season is concerned, it puts the American composer back on his feet again after having been knocked cold two weeks ago. Mr. Barber was in the audience and was cordially applauded.

Mr. Koussevitzky next offered us a searching performance of the first two of Debussy's Nocturnes. It is a thousand pities that Debussy required a women's chorus for the third, "Sirenes," for it is, if anything, the loveliest of the three. It is probably too much trouble to assemble and train a number of women and then bundle them on and off the stage for what is a short work. Besides, unfortunately, women's choruses have a way of frightening some of the subscribers, who stay away in droves when one is so much as mentioned.

The Philadelphia orchestra under the egregious Leopold has made a record of the Nocturnes, which is worth having for "Sirenes" alone. Mr. Stokowski's interpretation of "Nuages" cannot compare with Mr. Koussevitzky's, however. The former's is too gross, whereas the latter's is pure poetry. Yesterday we would only cavil at one detail. With his fine ear for sonorities, we marveled that Mr. Koussevitzky let the timpani come out so loud at the climax of the march in "Fetes" as practically to drown the brass.

Hindemith's Konzertmusik now emerges definitely as one of his best scores. It is a glorious work, full of beautiful melodies, impulsive rhythm and mastery of form and contrast. We have often had occasion to say that Hindemith's music needs only a little study to be understood—not much, really, just a modicum of sympathetic scrutiny. The fact that he appeals so strongly to young students is proof of his great vitality and the fertility of his invention.

The best way to get to know his music is to play something of his yourself, preferably a piece of chamber music. This teaches you the idiom and his very individual style. It thus prepares you for, some might say, inoculates you to, his symphonic scores. It enables you to state, without pose, that such a work as the Konzertmusik is glorious.

The last half of the concert brought a fine performance of what is probably Brahms' most popular symphony. Every one, though, has his own favorite from the four symphonies—ours is the fourth—and every one by now has the right to be his own critic of Brahms. We shall only say in passing that the coda to the first movement is surely one of the perfect things in all music.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. The concerts of Nov. 29 and 30 will be conducted by Desire Defauw and will consist of

MUSIC Nov 16
SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky conducted a notably enjoyable concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Without exception, the program was interesting and throughout the afternoon the orchestra played its best.

First item of the program was the concert Overture, "The School for Scandal," by 30-year-old Samuel Barber, a composer new to Boston Symphony concerts. Then came the two Nocturnes, "'Clouds" and "Festivals," by Debussy, the "Concert Music" for strings and brass by Hinemith, and Brahms' Second Symphony.

So far as local performances go, Bostonians have not heard much of Samuel Barber's music. To judge by the Overture, that has been our loss. Mr. Barber seems to be the sort of musician who has matured young, who at 30 has mastered not only orchestration and at least the overture form, but has worked out a style of his own. "The School for Scandal" Overture, not intended as music for actual performance of Sheridan's classic, but rather the composer's personal idea of the spirit of the play, is all in one piece, not too long or too short, written directly to the point in a cleverly modern idiom.

Barber's tart harmonies, his light, ingenious orchestration and the constant movement in the music all express, at least to this reviewer's satisfaction, an atmosphere of delightful indiscretion. Although, come to think of it, one didn't observe any touch of betrayed confidence indicating Sir Peter's discovery of Lady Teazle behind the screen. Nor is it perhaps possible to delineate such an outrageous hypocrite and snob as Joseph Surface. But Charles Surface that honest and lovable jackanapes, is much on hand.

The Friday audience seemed to like Mr. Barber's work, and twice called him to the stage. After this pleasant introduction, why not more of his music?

Hindemith's "Concert Music," composed for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season a decade ago, is truly one of the great contemporary masterpieces. It is this sort of music that embarrasses both those who insist that intellect is the most important thing in composition, and the people who demand nothing more than to be stirred emotionally. The "Concert Music," illustrating the axiom that the greatest masterpieces have something of each, manages to be motional and at the same time is as austerely logical a work as ever was written.

The massive structure Hindemith built up from themes not very striking by themselves, is an evidence of pure genius. So is the way he succeeded in varying and contrasting the sound of strings and brass, two heavily compact groupings of instruments when massed together and therefore limited in color.

The counter-point is a bit vinegary until you get used to it, but thereafter "Concert Music" is more fascinating at every performance. One ventures a prediction that 50 years from now the score will be found to have been an extension of the rugged, classic German line that began with Bach and continued through Beethoven and Brahms.

Debussy's gossamer "Clouds" and fairy-tale "Festivals" were the right choice to balance Hindemith and Brahms. Their performance was magical as the music, culminating in an almost incredibly silken pianissimo from the three trumpets at the beginning of the distant procession. Brahms was served equally well, and the finale was the climax of the afternoon.

There will be no Symphony concerts here next week. The orchestra makes its first tour to New York. A fortnight hence will bring the first of the season's guest conductors, Desire Defauw, C. W. D.

LATER MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

Barber's Overture Given First Performance

Nov 18

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

From first to last yesterday's was an inspiriting Symphony Concert, the keynote of which was set immediately by the local premiere of Samuel Barber's Overture to Sheridan's comedy, "The School for Scandal." Debussy's "Clouds" and "Festivals" then made a suitable buffer between this orchestral exuberance and that contemporary masterpiece, Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" for strings and brass, while Brahms' Second Symphony provided a satisfying and invigorating conclusion.

The third composer to listen to his music at Symphony Hall this season, Mr. Barber, whose appearance is no less likable than his music, was brought to the stage to acknowledge the unaffectedly hearty applause bestowed upon his brilliant and engaging score. Not before had Boston made Mr. Barber's acquaintance, and to judge by this Overture, it is well worth cultivating.

Since the Debussy Nocturnes have color as their long suit and since Dr. Koussevitzky's forte is tone, music and conductor were here, as many times before, in singularly happy conjunction. Yet the utterly different music of Hindemith received a no less sympathetic and discerning presentation.

If Hindemith has gone back to Bach he has also salvaged much that was valuable along the way. There is no dearth of romantic melody here and no disregard of effect, though effect may be a secondary, not a primary consideration, while the music's contrapuntal strength and rhythmic vitality set the blood a-coursing.

Should this reviewer be charged with the awful responsibility of saving just one of the Brahms Symphonies from oblivion, he could not bear to see this Second perish, whatever the merits of its three companions. For the composer of this D major is the most reassuring as well as the most gracious of modern symphonists. He does not remind us of man's infirmities and tribulations, like Mahler and Tchaikovsky, nor bid us battle with the elements, like Sibelius. He does not speak to us with the tongues of angels, like Bruckner, nor disturb us, like Franck, by confusing the flesh and the spirit. What he does give us—and though it is not everything it is a great deal—is the feeling that the earth is warm and friendly and that life is good. And for a time we can almost believe it.

Of late certain classics have tempted Dr. Koussevitzky to virtuoso feats of reanimation, but Brahms can still speak quite eloquently for himself. Yesterday's performance of the Second Symphony may not have been exactly in the elder tradition. Yet save for an occasional bit of over-emphasis in the brass section one would not have had it in any way different.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
NOV 17 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL PLAY FRIDAY

Koussevitzky Will Lead Its First Concert of Season at the Brooklyn Academy

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, will give its first concert of the Brooklyn season Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, it was announced yesterday. The program will consist of A London Symphony by Vaughan Williams, contemporary composer, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 5 in C minor.

The Brooklyn series of five concerts is under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is executive chairman of the Brooklyn committee, which includes Adrian Van Sinderen, chairman; Mrs. Edward C. Blum and Mrs. William H. Good, vice chairmen; Mrs. M. Preston Goodfellow, chairman of membership, and Mrs. Marion P. North, chairman of the Junior League committee.

Mrs. Walter Truslow, chairman of boxes, announced the following list of boxholders: Mrs. Good, Mrs. Blum, Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Frank E. Simmons, Mrs. Frederick D. Mackay, Mrs. Dean C. Osborn, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Women's Club, Adelphi Academy Alumnae Association, Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale, the Army and Navy, Mrs. James Fee, Mrs. Laird C. Dinsmore, Lionel R. Bauman, Miss Mary E. Mills, Miss Dorothy B. Forman, Miss Lilian Randall, Brooklyn Friends School and Packer Collegiate Institute.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 16 1940

Belgian To Direct Boston Symphony

Desire Defauw, eminent Belgian musician, is announced as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for three concerts. The second visit of the orchestra to Providence on Tuesday, Nov. 26, and the concerts in Boston on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. These will be the first appearances of Mr. Defauw on a public platform in the United States. Mr. Defauw has been for years the leading conductor at Brussels in his native Belgium. Previously he was well known as a virtuoso of the violin and was also active in quartet performances. He came to America for a brief period last season.

Mr. Defauw announces the following program for his concert at the Metropolitan Theatre: Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit"; the suite from Gretry's ballet, "Cephale et Procris," edited by Felix Mottl; de Falla's three dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat"; and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 17 1940

Koussevitzky Opens Series This Tuesday

Will Lead Boston Symphony in First Event of Bushnell Memorial Course

The "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams and the Brahms "Symphony No. 2" are the works to be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial this Tuesday evening in the opening program of the Bushnell Symphony Series. This concert, which is scheduled to start at 8:15 o'clock, will be conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

In January Dr. Koussevitzky and his distinguished orchestra will return for another program in the series, which consists of six concerts by five major orchestras. The other concerts will be given by the National Symphony, Cleveland Orchestra, Philadelphia Orchestra and New York Philharmonic-Symphony.

The nature of the Vaughan Williams symphony is revealed in the following excerpt from a review in the Boston Evening Transcript.

Born of Indian Summer.

"This pastoral symphony seems born of the English summer on the English countryside; in both is drenched. In an objective music its calm, its quiet—its drowsiness, if the reader will; its gentleness and its everlastingness—to use a clumsy word—are all incarnate in sound; its homeliness and familiarity withal. The transitions are the image of this gentleness. In the undulating rhythm, seldom broken, abides the calm. Out of the changeless, ceaseless flow—the lack of plasticity and of dynamics as the reproachful call it—rises the everlastingness. From the ancient model idiom seeps the color. In the very flatness, beside modern harmonic coloring, dwells the charm.

"Before this countryside, when the magic of summer is upon it, sits Vaughan Williams in contemplation rapt. By the responsive magic of musical imagination, by matter and means markedly and insidiously his own, he evokes this stillness, this remoteness, this pathos of distance, this silence out of sound. Only once does he break rising climax, midway in the final movement, release, as it seems, his own particular rapture. Elsewhere a nature-music at present unspotted with the egotisms, unflawed by the passions of us mortal men. Monotonous if the listener will—but nature itself is oftenest monotonous on the English countryside. Brief withal in the musical expression. Among modern symphonies few are shorter than the Pastoral of Vaughan Williams."

Fine Brahms Work.

Of the Brahms work Charles O'Connell in the Victor Book of the Symphony writes:

"The Second Symphony is perhaps the best introduction to the orchestral music of Brahms. Its content is full and rich enough for the most exigent, but its structure is very clear, its moods not too subtle or exacting. Though not without moments of somberness, it is generally lyric and sunny; occasionally even playful. Melodies in profusion sing through these measures and remain unforgettably in mind, while to satisfy those for whom music must produce a thrill by rhythmic and dynamic power, there is the brilliant fourth movement."

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 17 1940

Composer Paul Hindemith To Be Honored At Concert

Making the first of its two annual appearances here the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will come to Woolsey Hall on Wednesday evening. The concert will mark the opening of the 1940-41 Woolsey Hall series. It will also be the occasion for the presentation of the Howland Memorial Prize to Paul Hindemith, composer. The Howland Prize awarded by Yale University may be given to a citizen of any country in recognition of distinguished achievement in the field of literature, the arts and the science of government. Mr. Hindemith is visiting professor of the theory of music at Yale. President Charles Seymour of Yale University is to make the presentation, following the performance by the orchestra of Mr. Hindemith's Concerto for violin and orchestra, in which Miss Ruth Posselt will appear as soloist.

PAUL HINDEMITH

The prize was established in 1915 in memory of Henry Elias Howland of the Yale class of 1854 by the gifts of his daughter, Frances L. Howland, and his sons, Charles P. Howland, '91, and John Howland, '94. The following have been recipients of the award:

1916—Rupert Brooke, English poet.

1918—Jean Julien Lemordant, French artist.

1924—Gustav Holst, English composer.

1926—Robert Edmond Jones, American artist.

1928— ir James Arthur Salter, English statesman.

1930—Regnar Ostberg, Swedish architect.

1934—Philip J. Noel Baker, English statesman.

1936—Salvador de Madariaga, Spanish statesman.

1938—John Bell Condliffe, English economist.

Paul Hindemith, German composer, was born in Hannau, November 16, 1895. He began his musical studies at the age of 11 by studying the violin and viola. Later he attended a conservatory in Frankfort-on-Main, where he studied under Bernhard Sekles and made his first entry into the musical world as a violinist, securing a position in the Frankfurt Opera orchestra. Later he became its concertmaster and finally its conductor. Then he founded the Amar String Quartet, in which he played viola, and the quartet made many concert tours.

As a composer, his early works suggest the trend of his later compositions, and although they are youthful and tentative, they disclose a fertile imagination and a remarkable grasp of technique. He essayed the composition of chamber music for odd combinations, orchestral works, and opera, and all contain the germ of his future radical style. By 1921 he was attracting considerable attention in Germany and his name appeared frequently on the programs of the Donauschingen and the Salzburg festivals. His "Kammermusick" was played at the Venice festival of the International Society of Contemporary Music, in which work he openly abandoned standard tonal principals in favor of the new atonality. The composition caused much discussion not without publicity value for the composer, and Hindemith loomed as a fiery protagonist of modernism. Hindemith's string quartets are among the outstanding examples of this music, and his operas have been well received, particularly "Cardillas" and "Neues vom Tage", which were considered sensational successes. Guido Pannain says that the former contains all the good and bad features of Hindemith's temperament, and that the music leads the action by the hand without succeeding in creating a formal, autonomous and exhaustive construction, because it cannot rid itself of the action, the cause of its whole existence.

Hindemith's works include, besides those previously mentioned, another opera, orchestral works, four string quartets, a clarinet quintet, three choral works, songs and instrumental pieces. His new book on composition, "Unterweisung in Tonsatz" (The Craft of Musical Composition) elucidates and confirms the results of his experience in theory and composition, and brings the solution of questions which can no longer be answered by existing theories of harmony.

Dr. Koussevitzky, in arranging the program for the forthcoming concert, has surrounded the brilliant Hindemith compoistion with two famous symphonies. The evening of fine music will commence with Haydn's Symphony in G major, and conclude with the Beethoven Symphony No. 5.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 17 1940

Koussevitzky Conducts Friday

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its first concert of the current Brooklyn season on Friday evening, in the opera house of the Academy of Music at 8:30. The program will be given over to two works: A London Symphony, by the celebrated contemporary composer, Vaughan Williams; and the Symphony No. 5 in C minor, by Ludwig van Beethoven.

As in previous seasons, the Boston Symphony Orchestra has scheduled five concerts for its Brooklyn series. The remaining performances will be held on Friday evening, Jan. 10; Thursday evening, Feb. 13; Friday evenings, March 14 and April 4. It is announced that the series is nearly sold out on subscription. Non-subscribers who wish to attend Friday evening's concert should communicate with the Institute box office as soon as possible.

Percy Grainger will be heard in his only metropolitan recital of the season at the Academy of Music, Tuesday evening. He will inaugurate the Great Piano Classics, a series held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, in co-operation with Albert Morini, concert manager of New York.

Mr. Grainger's program, devoted to music of the seventeenth and eighteenth century masters, will include, in addition to the works of Johann Sebastian Bach, Purcell, Scarlatti and Paradisi, a group of folk songs and popular songs of the eighteenth century.

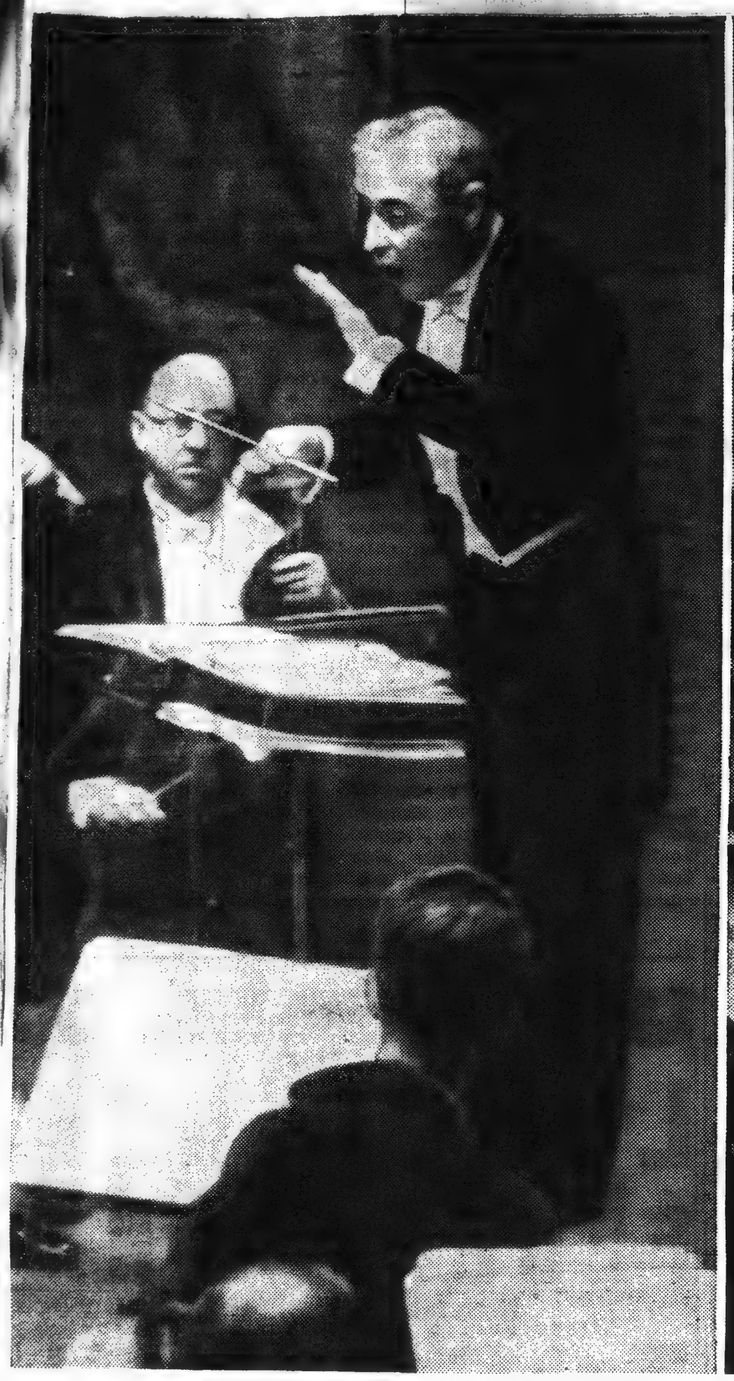
The first of a series of three chamber music recitals for piano duet will be given next Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24, at 3 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The performing artists are Angela Weschler and Felix Guenther. Their recital is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The program will consist primarily of original works for four hands, but will also include several concert transcriptions.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 18 1940

—[Photo by Bachrach

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, distinguished conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will open the new Bushnell Symphony Series at the Memorial Tuesday at 8:15 p. m. The program includes the Vaughan Williams London Symphony and the Brahms Symphony No. 2.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 1 7 1940



M. Robert Rogers from European

Serge Koussevitzky, who, of course, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it pays its first call of the season here this week.

Arturo Toscanini begins his season with the NBC Symphony this year at Carnegie Hall, directing the Verdi Requiem Saturday.

Frederick Stock leads his Chicago Orchestra into town for one of its rare visits in these parts. It is the orchestra's golden jubilee year.

Herald Nov. 19

Chicagoans to Play Here

When the Chicago Symphony Orchestra plays in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Boston should certainly give it a rousing welcome. The orchestra, whose first conductor was the great Theodore Thomas, is currently celebrating its 50th anniversary, even as the Boston symphony had its golden jubilee ten years ago.

It may be conjectured that the present tour by the Chicagoans, which is much farther afield than their usual expeditions, is designed as a tribute to Frederick Stock. Mr. Stock has been the conductor of the Chicago orchestra for the past 35 years and has been associated with it since 1895. If any single man deserves credit for maintaining the musical standards of the middle West it is he. It is an extraordinary record of achievement.

For this reason alone the orchestra deserves a cordial welcome in Boston. In addition Chicago has been most hospitable to the Boston symphony in its visits there in recent years, and the Chicago orchestra has not been here since 1921. We ought, then, to turn out in force to assist our visitors in celebrating such an auspicious anniversary.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 1 8 1940

Boston Symphony Starting Series Tuesday Evening

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Opening Event of Bushnell Course

The beautiful "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams and the well-loved "Second Symphony" of Brahms make up the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening in a program scheduled to begin at 8:15 o'clock.

This concert, which will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, dean of Bushnell conductors, is the opening event of the Bushnell Symphony Series of 1940-1941. In January the Boston Symphony will return here for another program in the Bushnell course.

The series comprises six concerts by major symphony orchestras, scheduled from November to April inclusive. In addition to the Boston Orchestra, the following will be heard here in the course:

Cleveland Orchestra, Arthur Rodzinski, conductor; National Symphony, Dr. Hans Kindler, conductor; Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor; New York Philharmonic-Symphony, John Barbirolli, conductor.

The Bushnell Symphony Series is considered to be the most varied and important course of its kind presented anywhere in the world. Once again, the Bushnell management reports, a capacity audience is assured for the entire series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
DAILY RECORD
NOV 1 8 1940

Stanley Chapple In Concert Here

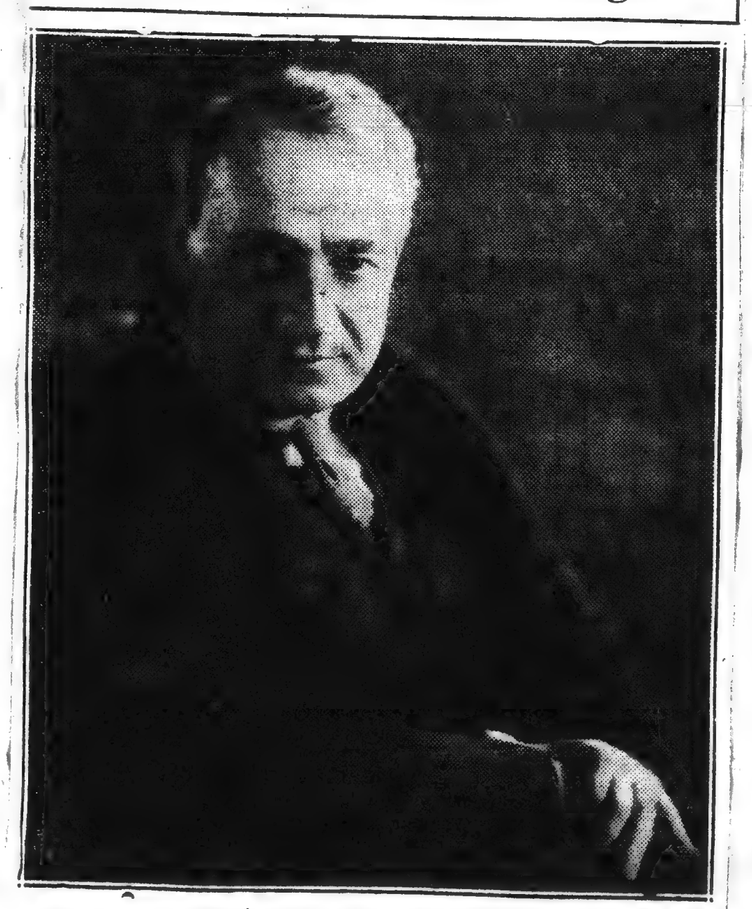
An enthusiastic audience gathered in the Morristown Library yesterday afternoon to hear Stanley Chapple, noted English musician recently appointed assistant director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who lectured on Johann Sebastian Bach. The lecture was sponsored by the Bach Society of New Jersey and the Friends of the Morristown Library as a prelude to the presentation of "The Magnificant" and other work of Bach in St. Peter's Church on December 10 by the Morris County Unit of the Bach Society of New Jersey.

Mr. Chapple described the manner in which Bach wrote and illustrated musical terms by playing bits on a piano. At the time Bach wrote, Mr. Chapple pointed out, there were no symphonies and many of the instruments now in use had not been created. Bach wrote music that could be adapted to the three or four musical instruments then available.

Mr. Chapple attained prominence in England as a regular conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, the London Philharmonic and the British Broadcasting Orchestra.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 1 9 1940

Leads Orchestra Here Tonight



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Dr. Koussevitzky, dean of the conductors of the Bushnell Symphony Series will [redacted]ston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight, starting at 8:15 o'clock, in the opening event of the Symphony Series of 1940-1941. Tonight's program includes two beautiful symphonies, the "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams, and the Brahms No. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
11/14/40

Dr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of Druce Street are to give a reception and tea in the exhibition room of Symphony Hall on the afternoon of the twenty-fourth in honor of Dr. Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra is coming to Boston for the first time in nearly two decades to give a concert at Symphony Hall that afternoon for the benefit of the British War Relief Society, Inc.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 1 9 1940

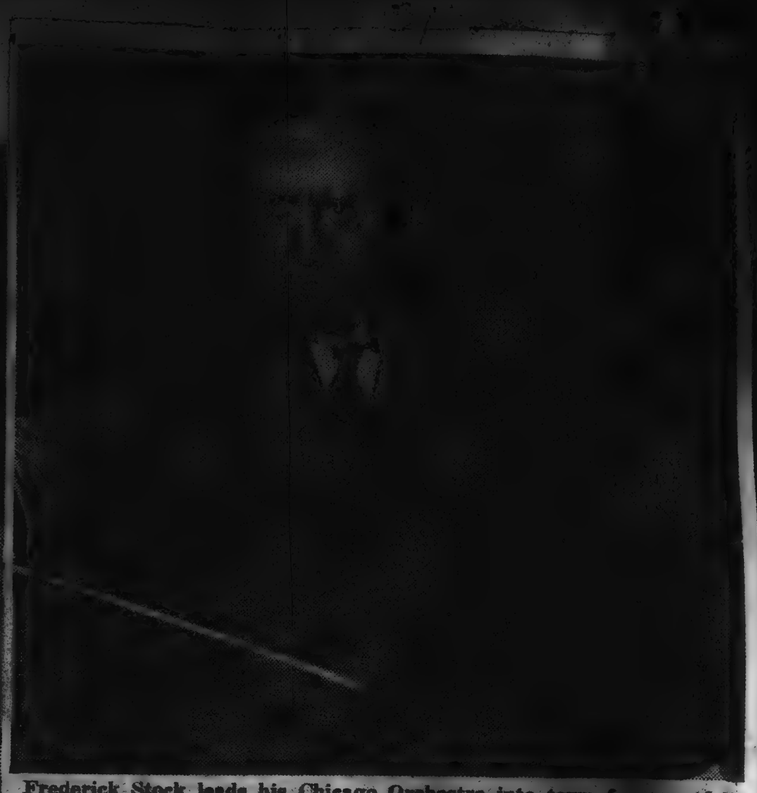
Koussevitzky Opens New Bushnell Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be presented at the Bushnell Memorial tonight in the first event of the Bushnell Symphony Series of 1940-41.

For this concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected two outstanding symphonies, "A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams and the Brahms Symphony No. 2.

The Bushnell Symphony Series includes five more concerts by major orchestras, scheduled through the season into April.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
NOV 17 1940



Frederick Stock leads his Chicago Orchestra into town for one of its rare visits in these parts. It is the orchestra's golden jubilee year.

M. Robert Rogers from European

Serge Koussevitzky, who, of course, will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra when it pays its first call of the season here this week.

Arturo Toscanini begins his season with the NBC Symphony this year at Carnegie Hall, directing the Verdi Requiem Saturday.

Herald Nov. 19

Chicagoans to Play Here

When the Chicago Symphony Orchestra plays in Symphony Hall next Sunday afternoon, Boston should certainly give it a rousing welcome. The orchestra, whose first conductor was the great Theodore Thomas, is currently celebrating its 50th anniversary, even as the Boston symphony had its golden jubilee ten years ago.

It may be conjectured that the present tour by the Chicagoans, which is much farther afield than their usual expeditions, is designed as a tribute to Frederick Stock. Mr. Stock has been the conductor of the Chicago orchestra for the past 35 years and has been associated with it since 1895. If any single man deserves credit for maintaining the musical standards of the middle West it is he. It is an extraordinary record of achievement.

For this reason alone the orchestra deserves a cordial welcome in Boston. In addition Chicago has been most hospitable to the Boston symphony in its visits there in recent years, and the Chicago orchestra has not been here since 1921. We ought, then, to turn out in force to assist our visitors in celebrating such an auspicious anniversary.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 18 1940

Boston Symphony Starting Series Tuesday Evening

Koussevitzky Will Conduct Opening Event of Bushnell Course

The beautiful "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams and the well-loved "Second Symphony" of Brahms make up the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at the Bushnell Memorial Tuesday evening in a program scheduled to begin at 8:15 o'clock.

This concert, which will be directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, dean of Bushnell conductors, is the opening event of the Bushnell Symphony Series of 1940-1941. In January the Boston Symphony will return here for another program in the Bushnell course.

The series comprises six concerts by major symphony orchestras, scheduled from November to April inclusive. In addition to the Boston Orchestra, the following will be heard here in the course:

Cleveland Orchestra, Arthur Rodzinski, conductor; National Symphony, Dr. Hans Kindler, conductor; Philadelphia Orchestra, Eugene Ormandy, conductor; New York Philharmonic-Symphony, John Barbirolli, conductor.

The Bushnell Symphony Series is considered to be the most varied and important course of its kind presented anywhere in the world. Once again, the Bushnell management reports, a capacity audience is assured for the entire series.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MORRISTOWN, N. J.
DAILY RECORD
NOV 18 1940

Stanley Chapple In Concert Here

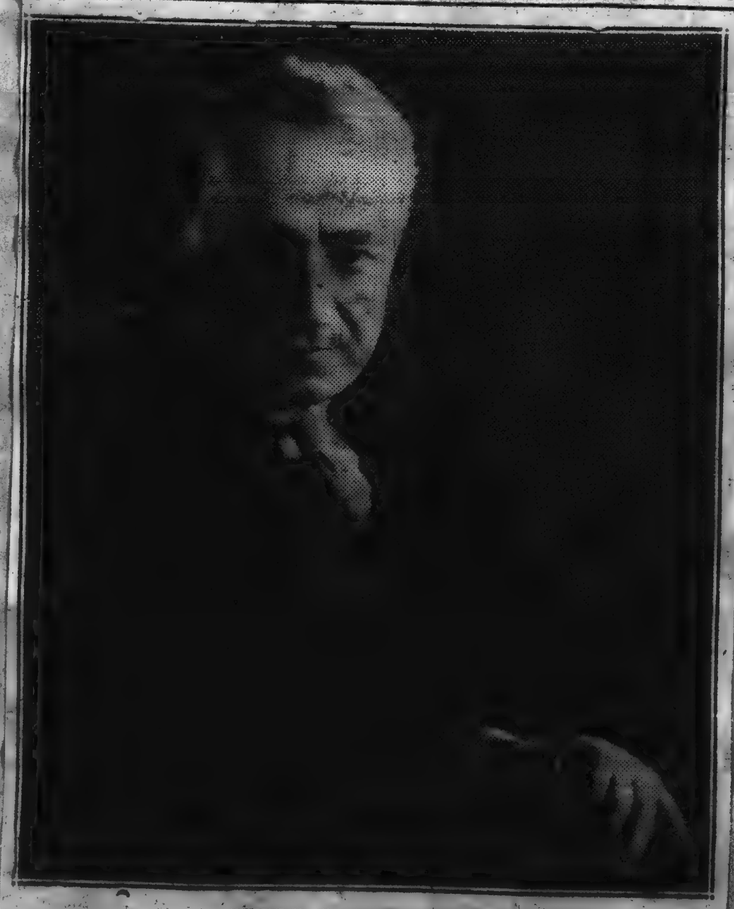
An enthusiastic audience gathered in the Morristown Library yesterday afternoon to hear Stanley Chapple, noted English musician recently appointed assistant director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who lectured on Johann Sebastian Bach. The lecture was sponsored by the Bach Society of New Jersey and the Friends of the Morristown Library as a prelude to the presentation of "The Magnificant" and other work of Bach in St. Peter's Church on December 10 by the Morris County Unit of the Bach Society of New Jersey.

Mr. Chapple described the manner in which Bach wrote and illustrated musical terms by playing bits on a piano. At the time Bach wrote, Mr. Chapple pointed out, there were no symphonies and many of the instruments now in use had not been created. Bach wrote music that could be adapted to the three or four musical instruments then available.

Mr. Chapple attained prominence in England as a regular conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra, the London Philharmonic and the British Broadcasting Orchestra.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
NOV 19 1940

Leads Orchestra Here Tonight



SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Dr. Koussevitzky, dean of the conductors of the Bushnell Symphony Series will direct the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight, starting at 8:15 o'clock, in the opening event of the Symphony Series of 1940-1941. Tonight's program includes two beautiful symphonies, the "London Symphony" of Vaughan Williams, and the Brahms No. 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM BROOKLINE, MASS
CHRONICLE
11/14/40

Dr. and Mrs. Serge Koussevitzky of Druce Street are to give a reception and tea in the exhibition room of Symphony Hall on the afternoon of the twenty-fourth in honor of Dr. Frederick Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. The orchestra is coming to Boston for the first time in nearly two decades to give a concert at Symphony Hall that afternoon for the benefit of the British War Relief Society, Inc.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 19 1940

Koussevitzky Opens New Bushnell Series

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be presented at the Bushnell Memorial tonight in the first event of the Bushnell Symphony Series of 1940-41.

For this concert, Dr. Koussevitzky has selected two outstanding symphonies, "A London Symphony" by Vaughan Williams and the Brahms Symphony No. 2.

The Bushnell Symphony Series includes five more concerts by major orchestras, scheduled through the season into April.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 17 1940

32

THE STOKOWSKI CASE

By VIRGIL THOMSON

LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI'S position in American musical life is a unique one. He has violated tradition and he has made tradition.

* * *

His Rise to Power

HIS first violation of tradition was to arrive at the top of the conducting profession by an unorthodox and improbable route. The best conductors have mostly learned their job in the theater. This is the classical European procedure. It is in the pits of provincial opera houses that nine out of ten Europeans learn to meet orchestral emergency with cool heads and effective hands. Muck, Messager, Monteux, Toscanini, Walter, all passed a similar apprenticeship. The leaders who know only the concert orchestra, or who have come to it through playing in quartets and other small ensembles, seldom arrive at the highest competence or glory. There are exceptions, I know. Georg Henschel had been a singer; but he never became a really first-class conductor, if memoirs of the period are to be believed. Hans von Bülow began life as a pianist; but he passed through operatic conducting, too, before he became the great figure he was in his later years.

In countries where good second-class opera houses do not abound musicians ambitious to conduct seldom master their art completely. Russia, for instance, with few musical theaters of this kind, has produced in the first class only Serge Koussevitzky. Spain, too, lacks provincial opera houses and first-[illegible] conductors. So also do England and the United States.

The Boston and Chicago opera companies used to use American conductors for minor performances; but their artistic standards were too high, their casts too full of stars to risk letting inexperienced local musicians conduct the repertory week in and week out. Provincial bands and symphony orchestras are frequently led by local musicians, but these ensembles do not seem to provide sufficient training to prepare a man for big time. Ossip Gabrilowitsch and Rudolf Ganz came from first-class piano playing to second-string orchestral big time in Detroit and St. Louis, succeeding not badly at all, but without ever equaling the brilliance of their pianistic careers.

Foundations like the National Orchestral Association have undertaken to train musicians for desk-playing in the symphony orchestras and have succeeded pretty well. These organizations have not yet produced a star conductor, however.

As a result of the lack of proper training facilities here, the tradition has grown up that conductors must train in Europe and be hired from there, be sprung thus upon us full-fledged, as from Minerva's brow. A parallel tradition exists in our opera houses that star singers (even though American by birth) must come to us full-fashioned from abroad.

Mr. Stokowski did not follow either the operatic or the European training-pattern. He came from the Royal College of Music to St. Bartholomew's Church as a perfectly good organist in the English style, no more. He went from there to conduct in Cincinnati, as Ganz and Gabrilowitsch went later to conduct orchestras of about the same category in St. Louis and Detroit. Stokowski did better than they (he was younger, too). He stepped up to Philadelphia and made colossally good.

* * *

How He Held Power

LACKING the schooled reflexes of an experienced theater man, lacking also the mature musical culture that enabled Gabrilowitsch to handle his orchestra without other preparation, Stokowski, being intelligent and ambitious, found himself obliged to think everything out in advance, both his interpretations and his technique of making them into sound. He was never the creature of passion, musically speaking, that he posed as on a platform. His was as premeditated, as cerebral a mastery of the wow-technique as Mary Garden's; and he missed fire about as seldom.

His ambition to shine and his lack of a sound musical culture have led him often into distorted interpretations and into lapses of musical taste that have enraged musicians on three continents. The same circumstance and motivation, however, have led him to train his own beat and its orchestral response completely, accurately, effectively.

His whole performance is a violation of musical tradition and taste the more surprising in that he has always managed to remain high in his profession notwithstanding. At the same time, the musical charlatanism that he has always subjected his public to, we must remember, has been animating force behind his acquisition of a sure method for pro- desired effects. Not in spite of his musical deviations, rather be- them, Leopold Stokowski has made himself, has had to make him- ster of orchestral technique. I am not sure he isn't the greatest re more musical, more delicate, more authoritative, more sub- objective in their interpretations of music. None will have n our musical life as he has done. The most beautiful the world is only another version of a classic text. A o, a smooth, deep unity of string tone, a really well are contributions to the musical wealth of nations; que for producing them is a contribution to music itself.

* * *

chievement

ozart and Haydn there was a famous orchestra at e were famous orchestras elsewhere, too, notably in chestra in Mannheim is famous to this day, and much in the history books. Not because of its tempi and is water long ago gone over the dam. But because it n a way previously unknown, not by asking the strings but by adding under the strings the wood and brass wind e by one.

crescendo technique revolutionized composition. Beethoven might got on without it, if he'd had to. It would have been impossible for chard Wagner to have written music anything like the music he did write without the concept of the scored crescendo, which constitutes about 75 per cent of his concept of thematic development, which in turn constitutes almost the whole of his concept of sustained composition.

I do not think Mr. Stokowski ever made, through his Philadelphia Orchestra, any such radically useful discovery as that of the scored crescendo, though I must say his constant experiments with seating and with many another less visible change in orchestral routine have left the arts of orchestral writing and of orchestral conducting richer in resource. (I do not refer to his own orchestral arrangements of classic pieces, which fall rather into the obvious as understanding, into the somewhat coarse as tonal texture. Even at their best, they contain no contributions to technique.)

* * *

His Musico-Scientific Achievements

I FANCY his most useful work of all may be what he has done and what he has forced commercial organizations to do with the recording and transmission techniques.

As I remarked last Thursday in reviewing Walt Disney's "Fantasia," "Alone among successful symphonic conductors, he has given himself the trouble to find out something about musical reproduction techniques and adapt these to the problems of orchestral execution. Alone among the famous musicians who have worked in films, he has forced the spending of money and serious thought by film producers and their engineers toward the achievement of a result in auditive photography comparable in excellence to the results that the expenditure of money and thought have produced in visual photography."

* * *

His Unique Role in Our Musical Destiny

THE technique of musical composition has made little advance, if any, in the last twenty-five years; and it is not easy to account for that stagnation, in view of the copious opportunities there are for performance, for recording, for dramatic experiment and for functional use of music in the cinema. It is my guess that composers are marking time while science and society make up their minds about the conditions of musical usage and execution. It is taking society a full-fledged war to make up its mind about social conditions; and not until that mind is made up shall we know what the set-up is going to be for music, which is just one social activity. But science is quite busy these days providing means to transmit music from any place to any other, according to whatever usage and function society cares to decide upon.

It is advantageous that a musical technician should be involved in this radical transformation of our musical materials. It is advantageous to all that this should be a first-class musical technician. It is equally advantageous that he should be a good musician as to taste and tradition, though not perhaps too good a one. Mr. Stokowski seems destined to play in these transitory times a rôle ideally suited to his high intellectual capacities and his broad musical experience, a rôle in which his world-wide prestige, his ambition, his reputation for successful mountebankery, even the far from unpremeditated glamour of his personality, will all contribute toward an accomplishment that will be as useful as it is spectacular.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
NOV 18 1940

Music:

Koussevitzky to Bring A Symphony of a City

By Carl E. Lindstrom

It is rather obvious to credit Serge Koussevitzky with a strong sense of the dramatic; we all know that he has it. It is apparent in his manner on the platform and in his interpretation of whatever music he chooses to recreate with his brilliant and responsive Boston Orchestra.

Perhaps it is merely to say the same thing in another way to credit him with a deep sensitivity to not only the things about him but to the world at large. It will be remembered that one of his concerts last year coincided with the Russo-Finnish War and on that occasion he programmed the Second Symphony of Sibelius, giving it such a vivid performance that it will ever stand out as one of the symphonic highlights in Bushnell history. It is no secret that the spectacular Allied Relief Concert at Tanglewood last summer grew out of the heart and mind of Koussevitzky; it was his concert.

He comes to us now in the first concert of the current Bushnell Series with Ralph Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony." It was this work with which he opened his own season at Symphony Hall. A more fitting tribute to the agonies of the British capital could not be paid at this time for the Vaughan Williams work is the very soul and life blood of London.

* * *

Cities have been memorialized in music before. Vienna has its Strauss waltzes; Paris its "Louise" and "La Boheme"; Nuremburg its "Meistersinger" and New York—well, hasn't the New York legend been told over and over again in music, whether by Gershwin, or Ellington, or Carpenter?

But while the ballroom is not all of Vienna, nor the garrets and Latin quarter all of Paris, and while as it is impossible to say anything comprehensive about New York in music, it seems that Vaughan Williams has been completely successful in capturing the whole heart of London in a single symphony. If that is not true then, it errs only on the side of emphasizing the more pathetic human side of the picture.

The Thames is there, dominating the whole scene, the ground tone for the city's symphony. Big Ben is heard and the early turmoil and bustle of the Strand; there is Bloomsbury in the damp November twilight with its cry of the lavender seller; the Temple Embankment and Waterloo Bridge; sounds out of the fog, from the slums, and in the final movement the sinister bitterness of the Hunger Marchers.

It is not, of course, the wartime London, and its composer could not foresee the missiles of hell, now wreaking destruction upon this historic and affecting scene. Such a symphony as this reduces to understandable human terms the starkly objective and laconic war communiques.

* * *

This picture could be painted only by a man who greatly loves his London. The city must fill a large place in the heart of Vaughan Williams and it is easy to detect that he holds for the metropolis the kind of affection that only the country boy can have. Your born and bred city man very seldom gets sentimental about the urban scene.

Vaughan Williams quite early in life steeped himself in the lore of the country-side.

While yet a music student the rustic dances of old England captured his imagination and he made exhaustive researches into the field with the result that his first compositions clearly show the influences of English folk song in their modal and rhythmic aspects. This is particularly true of "Linden Lee," "Norfolk Rhapsodies," and "In the Fen Country."

He was much interested in Housman and came to write a song cycle "On Wenlock Edge" which is based on "A Shropshire Lad." This takes us back to the dedication of "A London Symphony." It is inscribed "To the memory of George Butterworth." Butterworth was an extremely gifted music student who went as a boy to Eton and later Trinity College, Oxford. His compositions received performance while he was still at Eton. The war interrupted his studies at the Royal College of Music and he joined the British forces in France, received a commission, and was killed in the trenches on Aug. 5, 1916. Butterworth, too, wrote a number of songs based on "A Shropshire Lad," and also composed for orchestra "Shropshire Rhapsodies."

Also in common with Butterworth, Vaughan Williams studied at the Royal College of Music where his masters were Wood, Parry, Stanford and Gray. Later he went to Cambridge. He studied composition under Max Bruch in Berlin and later spent three years in London as an organist, composing the while.

* * *

"A London Symphony" was composed in 1913 and first performed at Queen's Hall, London, at a concert given by F. B. Ellis. It then took an hour's time to play, and the composer subsequently made a revision which was played under the direction of Adrian Boult. Other changes followed and a third and final revision was presented at one of the British Music Society's concerts given by the London Symphony Orchestra May 4, 1920.

It was Coates who first brought the work to America, programming it at a concert of the New York Symphony Society, Dec. 30 and 31, 1920, and repeating it the following month. This is undoubtedly to be the first Hartford performance, although I think his "Fantasia on a theme by Thomas Tallis" has been presented here. The work to be heard tomorrow is probably the best known of Vaughan Williams, although the "Sea Symphony" brought him much fame upon its performance at the Leeds Festival in 1907.

* * *

One of the most important of Vaughan Williams' work to be heard in this country was that presented by Barbirolli and the Philharmonic a few seasons ago, called "Job: A Masque for Dancing." This extraordinary work is in nine musical scenes, founded on William Blake's illustrations to the Book of Job.

Vaughan Williams served with the British Forces throughout the war and afterwards took a professorship at the Royal College. He also became conductor of the London Bach Choir. He has an opera to his credit, "Hugh the Drover," first performed at Covent Garden in 1924.

This Bushnell concert brings to Hartford one of the great modern symphonies which at the hands of a surpassing interpreter should be a dramatic and enkindling experience.

* * *

Another soprano, whose fame is already assured, namely, Dorothy Maynor, will be heard at Symphony Hall this afternoon in her first Boston recital. Her only previous appearance here was at a Symphony Orchestra pension fund concert last season when she scored an artistic triumph. Her programme for this afternoon consists of the conventional miscellany of songs in various languages and the expected Negro spirituals.

Yet another soprano, Esther-May Barrett, will give a recital at Jordan Hall on Monday evening. Her list of songs includes five by Schubert and three by Strauss.

Manfred Malkin, pianist, will offer an all-Chopin programme at Steinert Hall on Friday evening.

CHICAGO'S ORCHESTRA COMING

Post Nov 17

Famous Group, One of the Big Four, Is 50 Years Old

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

NEXT Sunday afternoon will bring the season's first clash of musical interests, a conflict of events the more regrettable when so many evenings and afternoons are still concertless. At Jordan Hall, Kerstin Thorborg, notable mezzo-soprano of the Metropolitan Opera Company, will make her first recital appearance here outside the Statler Musicales, which are not accessible to the general public. And at Symphony Hall the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will be heard there for the first time in some 20 years. On that afternoon there will be many who would like to be twins.

When the Boston Symphony reached its 50th season 10 years ago, Dr. Koussevitzky, who had then completed six years of service, was its ninth regular conductor. This present is the Chicago orchestra's golden jubilee season and its leader, Dr. Frederick August Stock, took over that post in 1905, as the successor of Theodore Thomas, by whom the orchestra was founded. So long a term of service is without parallel in American orchestral annals. Yet, from all accounts, the Chicago public is still devoted to Dr. Stock.

* * * *

The Chicago leader is not a conductor of the "prima donna" variety, but he has kept his orchestra to the standard established by his great predecessor. Today it is one of the top four in America. Once nearly all American conductors were German-born. In this year of 1940 Dr. Stock is one of the very few who can be so classified. He first saw the light of day in little-known Juelich, on Nov. 11, 1872. He studied with his father, a bandmaster, graduated from the Cologne Conservatory as a violinist, and then studied theory and composition under Humperdinck and others. After five years as violinist in the Cologne orchestra, he came to the United States in 1895, to fill a similar position under Theodore Thomas at Chicago. He became assistant conductor of the Chicago orchestra in 1899 and from 1903 he conducted its out-of-town concerts. During the season of 1918-19 he was temporarily supplanted while awaiting his American citizenship papers.

Unlike most of his colleagues in America, Dr. Stock is also a composer. Among his works are two symphonies, a violin concerto, a symphonic poem, "Life," overtures and other short orchestral works, chamber music, violin pieces, piano pieces and songs. His knowledge of music other than his own is enormous. Almost, if not quite as assiduous as Dr. Koussevitzky in the presenting of contemporary novelties, he ranges far more widely among the established composers than any other American conductor, thus assuring his audiences a more varied diet than is the lot of many.

For this 50th season the Chicago Symphony Orchestra has commissioned works by 10 living composers besides instituting a competition in which 150 American scores have been submitted. One of the commissioned works, a symphony in one movement by John Alden Carpenter, will be heard at Symphony Hall next Sunday. As one who spends his summers on our north shore, the Chicago composer is half a Bostonian. The rest of Dr. Stock's programme is conservative, though its first number, Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," has not been played by the Boston Symphony since 1929. The two remaining items are the Third Symphony of Brahms and Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

* * * *

When that promising soprano, Eleanor Steber, sings with the Women's Symphony Orchestra at Jordan Hall next Thursday evening, she will be returning to the scene of her studies and her first successes. As one of the two winners of last season's Metropolitan Opera audition, she has now been enrolled as a member of that company. What roles or what kind of roles will be assigned to her remains to be seen. Her actual operatic debut was made in Boston, while she was still a student at the New England Conservatory, in the part of Senta in a WPA performance of Wagner's "The Flying Dutchman." Later she sang, under the same auspices, in Eugene Gruenberg's "Jack and the Beanstalk."

In Thursday evening's concert Miss Steber will be heard in airs from "Louise" and "Don Giovanni" and in a song by Hageman. The orchestra, under the direction of Alexander Thiede, will play Daniel Gregory Mason's Suite on English Folk Songs and the Symphony of Leon Boellmann.

Anniversary Tour of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

"The Chicago Symphony orchestra and its conductor, Frederick Stock, were warmly welcomed in Symphony Hall last night." Do not too hastily think that we are trying to do next Sunday's work ahead of time. No, that simple statement comes from Philip Hale's review in The Herald of Jan. 25, 1921; and it goes on to say: "They are not strangers. The orchestra had before this proved its worth and the ability of Mr. Stock had been fully recognized. Then there is always the name of Theodore Thomas to be associated with this orchestra. Boston, as cities throughout the land, must for years to come hold him in grateful remembrance. Nor should it be forgotten when at one time he was urged to become the conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra he refused, saying that he owed lyoalty to the Chicago orchestra and the city that had supported it. The years go by; but his influence will live not only in the city that was proud of him as a musician and a man, but in all cities where music is cherished, for it was he that made audiences in this country possible for the orchestras following in the path that he had blazed."

So could Philip Hale write in 1921 and so could a criticism begin after next Sunday's concert. The Chicago Symphony orchestra is currently celebrating its 50th anniversary and for the first time in many years is making a tour farther than usual away from its home territory. In the course of it they come to Symphony Hall on the afternoon of Nov. 24. There are more reasons, besides the fact that the orchestra has not been here for 20 years, why Boston should give them a warm welcome. For one thing the Chicagoans have in recent years been most hospitable to our own orchestra, and we should at least pay back the compliment by filling the house for them. Secondly, Mr. Stock has been with the Chicago Symphony since 1895 and has been its conductor since the death of Theodore Thomas in January 1905. As a personal tribute, then, he deserves a great popular success on this tour.

Still another reason for turning out to welcome the Chicago ensemble in force is that its policy has been the same as the Boston Symphony's and the results it has obtained as creditable. Mr. Henry E. Voegeli, the manager of the Chicago orchestra, writes to this department: "I think the Boston and Chicago orchestras are probably the outstanding examples of the permanent conductor plan. Our record is that in 50 years we have had but two conductors—Theodore Thomas the first 14 years and Frederick Stock the remaining 36. I believe also that Boston and Chicago, when compared, will show very much alike in their record of acceptance of contemporary music and the advancement of the cause of American composers. I doubt if any other orchestra in the country can surpass the records of these two."

The latter part of this opinion is substantiated by the list of repertoire which will be published in the orchestra's year book next fall. Glancing through it you will find that almost all new works of importance that were played here have also turned up n Chicago, and that in the face of Mr. Koussevitzky's great reputation as a modernist. But we doubt if the records of the New York Philharmonic, for example, would show anything comparable. The one difference in the Chicago and Boston repertoires that we noticed hurriedly was that the former has been remarkably devoted to the works of Miaskovsky, which we have largely passed over. We, on the other hand, have given much of Roussel, a composer whom Chicago has not done a great deal about.

In looking up Mr. Hale's notice of 1921 we came across one or two points of comparative interest. The program on that occasion consisted of Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Rachmaninov's Second Symphony; Arnold Bax's Symphonic Poem, "The Garden of Fand"; and the Prelude and Liebestod from "Tristan." The program next Sunday lists Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; Brahms's Symphony No. 3; John Alden Carpenter's Symphony (written especially for this anniversary) and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

The reviewers for the newspapers must have had rather a busy time that Monday night. Not only was there this concert to be covered, but there were Galsworthy's "Strife" at the Copley, a musical comedy at the Shubert, a revue at the Wilbur, Ed Wynn's Carnival at the Colonial and David Warfield's revival of "The Return of Peter Grimm" at the Tremont, all of which had to be reviewed and all of which were.

There has been great change in the theatrical world since then, but musical conditions remain very nearly the same. The comparison of the tours and programs of the Chicago orchestra then and now is proof enough. In extending a cordial welcome to the Chicago orchestra we can do no better than conclude with a quotation from its prospectus: "The orchestra was founded out of pure idealism back in 1891. The original trustees (one of whom, by the way, was C. Norman Fay now resident in Cambridge) set an example of loyalty to the public good which their successors in office have continued to reflect. Theodore Thomas, called to Chicago as the orchestra's first conductor, had witnessed in New York the painful and deflating results of petty rivalry in a musical life which often was ruled by clannishness and self-seeking instead of by co-operative artistic aspiration. In the pioneer city of Chicago he saw an opportunity to build a musical institution of great educational and spiritual value, and to the realization of his vision he gave the full devotion of his declining years.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

NOV 20 1940

Boston Programs.

This week the Boston Symphony Orchestra is on tour [illegible] to the scheduled concerts in New York on Thursday evening and Saturday afternoon and in Brooklyn on Friday evening. The visit coincides with that of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky will feature the Lodong Symphony of Vaughn Williams. The Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony along with classics by Beethoven and Haydn.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 20 1940

Hindemith to Receive Howland Prize at Yale

New Haven— (UP) — Yale's Howland Memorial Prize will be awarded tonight to Paul Hindemith, German composer.

The presentation will be made by President Charles Seymour during the intermission of the Boston Symphony concern at Woolsey Hall. Hindemith's concerto for violin and orchestra closes the first half of the concert.

The prize is awarded each year to a citizen of any country for distinguished achievement in the field of literature, the arts, or the science of government.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

NOV 20 1940

Koussevitzky Binds His Spell With Saga of London Town

Vaughan Williams and Brahms Open Bushnell Season

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

An issue or two ago the subject of Serge Koussevitzky's dramatic sensibilities came up in these columns and the thought that perhaps the matter was overaccented gave pause.

Could music have any particular dramatic significance apart from the management of its artistic elements anyhow? If, for instance, Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony" had been called merely Symphony No. 1, would there have been a different spirit about it in the opening concert of the Bushnell Series last night? Even if the harp tones spelling out the Westminster chimes had not proved a leading motive, as it were, the question would still not be academic for the plain reason that the Brahms D major Symphony unexpectedly threw the whole issue into bold relief. Of that more later.

An Intent Audience

It so happens that the Vaughan Williams work did have a connotative title and because London has been more in the collective American mind than any other spot of geography on the face of the globe, it was listened to with more concentrated and sympathetic attention than any symphony of comparable unfamiliarity that has ever been heard in Bushnell. The desire to understand was a palpable substance in the air; you could almost run your hand through it.

And a great many people must have realized for the first time that music can be reasonable, intelligible, graphic, stimulating and communicative beyond the power of words. Only self-imposed habit prevented a burst of applause at the end of the first movement in token to Koussevitzky that he and the composer had been thoroughly understood.

Picture, if you have not already done so, the typical symphony program 50 years hence. To imagine that any great number of the compositions by our best known contemporaries, who now make the grade with flattering regularity, will be on that program is the height of fatuity. Even Dr. Koussevitzky, who quite rightly gives every promising newcomer a chance, does not think so. That "A London Symphony" will be an established item isn't even a betting proposition. Almost all of it would have been easily digested 50 years ago.

Always a London

Which is to argue its timelessness. The subject requires that quality and the motto of the Symphony might well have been: There has always been a London.

In spite of the obvious pleasure of listening for the literal appurtenances such as the cry of the lavendar seller, the hurdy-gurdy and the chimes—which by the way strikes me as an ineffectual, early-Hollywood gesture toward cyclic unity—the spirit of this magnificent symphony is far deeper than the externals. The music speaks more eloquently of a city's stains and its scars; and fingers the pulse of its ancient civic person without forgetting the throb of its people.

The orchestra got into the heart of this misty, torrential, carolling, tramping music. There were string tones of unbelievable ostinato tension against brass dissonances in the last movement, exquisitely modelled solo passages and throughout the whole corps a masterly play of timbres. But "A London Symphony" could be a virtuoso piece only to those, if there were any, who could listen to it calmly.

Great Facade.

Mr. Vaughn Williams has made us a handsome piece of writing here, distinguished in its great, springing architecture as St. Paul's itself, lying over the orchestra with huge skill and poise, and using orchestra's and composition's every possibility. Essentially traditional in form despite its length and Pro Tem acrid, modern inflections, it is always dramatic at least in facade, and spirited enough for two. For near an hour it roars past you or looms over you, and whatever you may conclude is really inside it, you must admit there was nothing stingy in the material or ambition with which Mr. Williams set about it.

For my part, setting aside its accomplished exterior for a moment, I did not find it as communicative as one might expect, with all the endeavor that went into it. Some of the slower sections lapped around the heart, but by and large the symphony seemed emotionally empty.

Personally I was bothered by the continual admixture of program and abstract ideas and intents, and annoyed by such bits as the "Big Ben" chime, especially offstage at the end, like the close of a radio broadcast. It was the same confusion you feel in the early Sibelius symphonies — and incidentally, there were many hints of the Finnish composer, particularly in the Swan of Tuonela swimming under London Bridge in the second section.

Altogether the "London Symphony" on first hearing leaves an impression of solid writing mixed with stuffing, of drama and fustian, oratory and poetry, fine sense and poor taste. There is no doubt about it's being imposing to ear and almost to the eye. I only wish as in the case of St. Saens, Mr. Williams had better things to say, because he can say them so well.

Resplendent Performance.

But in any event, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave it a simply huge and resplendent performance. It didn't take a second hearing to indicate that. Dr. Koussevitzky had so obviously seized it and brought it completely under his dominion, he so forcefully built in on Mr. Williams's blueprints in performance, and his orchestra laid hold of it with such plain skill, it sounded titanic anyway.

To this [illegible] experience there was benison in the Brahms symphony. But just as the Williams picture was the conscious evocation of a spirit, just so did the familiar D major unconsciously betray its origin.

Truly without guile it voiced its Gemütlichkeit in unmistakable umlauts and gutterals. Could one forget that its creator was born just across the Channel in the Lithmarsh country at the mouth of the Elbe? Why forget it? There is no reason to suppose that the magisterial Dr. Koussevitzky could not at one glance see both the slums of London and the hells of Hamburg where at No. 60 Specksgang was reared a blue-eyed, yellow-haired boy who grew up to compose the D major Symphony out of German sunshine and love of his fellow man.

If you are not going to stay with me in this fancy about a dramatic juxtaposition of two great symphonies, the only remaining basis for rationalizing them is the belief that Koussevitzky blandly dealt out with even hand a helping of the relatively unfamiliar with a helping of the tried and true as a laboratory tested diet designed to suit the taste of Bushnell patrons. This I do not believe.

If This Be Routine—

It would have been just as well, though, not to watch the players in the second work. To see, while the cellos took the first phrase, Mr. Theodorowicz nonchalantly pull a loose hair out of his bow, to note Mr. Burgin with the cushions of his fingers testing the pitch of his strings, inaudibly to all but to himself, and to mark that Mr. Bedetti did not once consult his score might lead to the conclusion that it was dull routine to them. Perhaps so. But routine to an artist is beyond the comprehension of ordinary men. Undoubtedly these players are tolerably familiar with the Brahms Second; familiar to them also is exactly what Dr. Koussevitzky expects them to do with it.

For the sake of the record, let it be stated that this performance was the most limpid, transparent and lyrical that your reviewer has ever heard, a judgment that he will maintain with eyes either open or closed. Koussevitzky's interpretation was benign; the horn tones just before the coda of the first movement beyond description.

At the moment of going to press, music is the only thing that is the same in 1940 as it was in 1939. Which is reason for being grateful that another Bushnell season is on. And so—until we meet in the catacombs—God bless Bushnell!

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT

NOV 20 1940

Koussevitzky Nobly Opens Concert Year

Boston Orchestra in Superlative Performance of Two Symphonies at Bushnell

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitsky, was heard in the first of the Bushnell Series at the memorial auditorium, Tuesday night. The program:

London Symphony .. Vaughn Williams
Symphony No. 2 in D Major .. Brahms

Impelled by the august Doctor and the incomparable Boston orchestra, another symphony season spread noble pinions at the Bushnell Memorial last night.

It was an event of superlative achievement and augury, musically, and it was met with a do of brave dimension on the other side of the footlights. For the first time this year, the taxi tides washed against the stern and rockbound coasts of the auditorium, black and white ties set off the manly chin, the new silhouette for madame was to be seen in every aisle, and the attar of mink fresh out of summers mothballs, was heady on the air.

Nothing was more elegant than to see the imperial Dr. Koussevitsky as he once more molded by hand two hours of massive music. No other conductor can rival the way in which he seizes each phrase, pits it and pats it and marks it with "T," as the old rhyme goes. His fine Roman countenance flushed with exertion and tension, his head tilted to one side in a kind of private exaltation, his lips silently singing every note, he spurs or subdues his men with frowns, with tender smiles, with imperious wheelings and gestures—and altogether contrives, with their aid of course, to make the most Olympian music.

It was the first time I recall a program here made up only of two symphonies, without let or interlude of bonbonnerie anywhere around. It was certainly the first time that the "London Symhony" had been unrolled, 10 sections, 45 minutes and all, in our midst.

The playing of the "London Symphony" as prophetic of the power and brilliance to come in the Brahms. The D. Major has been performed of late with the same persistence with which Maxine Sullivan's recording of "Loch Lomond" was ground out in suburban diners last winter. Within a week, three various orchestras have done it up. Nor is it any novelty with the Boston, as history commemorates. But I will say this, that if Dr. Koussevitzky will conduct it with the burning fervors that caused every instrumentalist to rock where he sat ast night, the sultriness, the incanlescence, I'll listen every day and wice on Sundays. In two spots sections of the orchestra missed step—I can only believe the players were agitated by their own intensity and excitement. It was a marvelous performance and reading, and altogether part of a great orchestral evening.

—T. H. P.

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

NOV 20 1940

Yale Will Honor German Composer

At the intermission of the Boston Symphony concert this evening in Woolsey Hall, New Haven, President Charles Seymour of Yale will present the Howland Memorial prize to Paul Hindemith, German composer, whose Concerto for Violin and Orchestra closes the first half of the concert. The prize is awarded by Yale to a citizen of any country for distinguished achievement in the field of literature, the arts, or the science of government.

Mr. Hindemith, whose better known compositions include Mathis der Maler, the Ballet of St. Francis of Assisi, and a large amount of chamber music, is a visiting professor this year at Yale, where he is giving advanced courses in the theory of music.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

NOV 21 1940

34

Music

SYMPHONY SERIES ENJOYS OPENING OF BRILLIANCE

The brilliance of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening may not be unparalleled in the history of its more than 50 years of regular visits to New Haven, but so thrilling an impression was conveyed that its remembrance will not soon be effaced. The long awaited opening of the Woolsey Series took place before an audience which taxed every available space and found in the program a combination of works favorite the world over, and of a contemporary work whose merits quite surpass those of novelty. Dr. Koussevitsky revived the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Paul Hindemith to meet New Haven's special condition, since the distinguished composer is now associated with Yale University. Ruth Posselt was the soloist.

The Hindemith work well merits the Howland award for idealistic thinking in one of the several arts or (as the case may be, according to the terms of the establishing parties) in government. President Seymour bestowed the medal in the presence of the composer and of Dr. Koussevitsky, making a graceful tribute while the audience showed its vigorous satisfaction on the basis of a highly favorable first impression of the Concerto. Some may have recalled with like pleasure the brilliant performance of his "Mathis der Maler" by the same orchestra last season.

Mr. Hindemith's Concerto is a readily comprehensible work, in the sense that it gives unstinted pleasure on first hearing. While no work worth its salt can be completely assimilated immediately there is that ring of the true metal here which the experienced observer recognizes with satisfaction. Most of the great works of art came into being with an audience presentation in mind; the composer does not create for his own amusement, since any idea of truth is universal in its adaptation and bestowals. This Concerto has an exciting quality about it, built up on a series of long lines such as mark a preference in recent years, following a decade wherein short, scrappy phrases were preferred as structural materials. The assertion made by an earlier reviewer that this is a work of stature comparable to the Tryptich referred to appears to be justified by the impression made after this performance. Not only is the total effect one of fine exhileration, but the 'slow' movement maintains a truly lofty sense with its finely pathetic strain, furthered by the most attractive and individual orchestral colorings in the wood winds.

Notable Debut

One might write of this concert from several points of view. For instance, the playing of Miss Posselt might readily call forth the top-flight adjectives reserved for the more elect of the artistic fraternity. Making due allowance for the composer's kind understanding of the soloist's right to shine, Miss Posselt grasped every opportunity by playing with an expansive style, utilizing a broad, rich tone to deliver the long flowing structural lines. Here was playing in the grand manner, forthrightly and with abundant temperament. When the work was performed in Boston and New York, it was Mr. Burgin who soloed it. Miss Posselt and Mr. Burgin now wed doubtless find the Hindemith Concerto domestic property.

The epoch-making advances signalized by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are not by any means confined to the first or second movements which have become so popular. For inherent musical value as well as tradition-shattering structure the last two movements are the most eloquent. The ultimately triumphant motive of the entire work finds its triumph in the transcendant coda where the downward urge, having gradually risen to middle ground in the Scherzo, finally breakes into resplendent freedom as a declatation of that faith which overcomes all things. How great is the contrast between the despairing opening of the work and the unparalleled glory of its close! Thoreau, whose thought was close to nature's wrote. "With all your science can you tell how it is, and whence it is, that light comes into the soul?" But the light is here, triumphantly shining, through the secret which both men shared and of which we catch an illuminating vision.

Preceding the Concerto there was a happy performance of Haydn's Paris Symphony No. 88, with all the alternating moods from A to B, reflecting the serene and mannered graciousness of Haydn's gentle life. Dr. Koussevitsky's unrepentant insistence on whirling minuets and lightening rondos finds many a champion. Haydn's Esterhaz orchestra assuredly couldn't do that, but the Boston Symphony can.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PALISADES PARK, N.J
BERGEN INDEPENDENT
11/22/40

Dorothy Maynor, Negro Singer, In Concert Dec. 2

The feeling of "discovery" may be experienced in Newark on December 2 when Dorothy Maynor, new Negro soprano whose New York debut last year caused a sensation in the music world, makes her first appearance at the Mosque Theater under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation for the benefit of the New Jersey Urban League. It is the beginning of the singer's first year on a full concert schedule.

A little over a year ago in the summer of 1939 the great singer was first discovered by Koussevitsky at the Berkshire Festival. Miss Maynor had gone to the Festival to listen to the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two enthusiastic people, a personal friend and a music patron, persuaded the conductor to grant her an audition. He finally did during a morning rehearsal, and musical history was made. Koussevitzky immediately became enthused, praised her voice in the highest terms, and invited her to sing the next day at the picnic which he gives each year for members of his orchestra. Before an audience of 200 musicians, critics and a group of music lovers, the young singer started with the difficult classic arias by Handel and Mozart, then sang a group of German lieder, ending with the Wagnerian "Ho-Yo-To" from "Die Walkuere." The gilt-edged professional audience marveled at her versatility and tremendous range, and was unanimous in the opinion that her voice was one of the finest in a generation.

A brilliant New York debut followed a few months later, in which critics gave the verdict "One of the outstanding voices of the day." Engagements with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, Chicago and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras, as well as successful recitals throughout the East, started her first season.

Dorothy Maynor

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES

NOV 22 1940

Boston Symphony Opens N. Y. Series

Feature Of Orchestra's 60th Birthday; Plays In Brooklyn Today

NEW YORK (AP) — The Boston Symphony last night opened its 55th series of concerts in New York as one feature of the celebration of the famous orchestra's 60th anniversary.

In the 55 years the Boston orchestra has been playing in New York it has never missed a concert, and has postponed only one. That was when, in 1888, its train stuck in a snowdrift and could not be pulled out in time.

Since its establishment in 1881 through the efforts of Major Henry Lee Higginson, it has grown from a body of 60 players to its present size of 107. Its season, originally 20 weeks, is now the longest of any American orchestra—46 weeks.

For 37 years, Major Higginson paid all the deficit. But in 1918 the orchestra was incorporated, and since that time the financial burden has fallen on the trustees. Only one important hold-over from the Higginson period remains (excepting the world-famous quality of performance). The orchestra is still non-union.

For his first concert Serge Koussevitzky made a program of two symphonies—and nothing else. The first was Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," and the second Brahms' D Major Symphony. The orchestra plays today in Brooklyn, and Saturday it is heard again in Carnegie Hall.

Next Sunday's Concert

Of double significance is next Sunday's concert at Symphony Hall by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. First, it is sponsored by the British War Relief Society which is raising funds to ship rolling food kitchens to England. Proceeds from this concert will be used for this purpose.

Then, the great Chicago Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance here since 1921, is currently celebrating its 50th anniversary. Conducting the orchestra will be Frederick Stock, who has acted in this capacity for 35 years. It is due to his guidance that the orchestra has maintained a high level of excellence.

Boston music lovers will be well repaid for attending a concert that promises to be outstanding.

Chicago Symphony Here Sunday

Traveler

On Sunday afternoon at 3:30, Dr. Frederick A. Stock will conduct the Chicago Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall in connection with a tour celebrating its near completion of 50 years of activity. Theodore Thomas, father of American symphony orchestras, founded the Chicago organization in 1891. On his death in 1905 his associate conductor, Frederick Stock, was appointed conductor. This post he has filled with distinction ever since, with the exception of one season. Sunday's program, which will benefit the British War Relief Society, is as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 3 in F major.....Brahms
Symphony.....John Alden Carpenter
(Dedicated to the Chicago Symphony orchestra and written for its golden jubilee season)
Forest Murmurs and Rhine Journey.Wagner

CONDUCTOR—Dr. Frederick A. Stock, who will conduct the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in a golden jubilee program Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The performance will benefit the British War Relief Society.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN

NOV 22 1940

TWO ORCHESTRAS HEARD AS VISITORS

Bostonians Begin Series—Stock Brings New Work.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

On Thanksgiving Eve the Chicago Symphony paid its first visit to New York in twenty-one years. On Thanksgiving night the Boston Symphony opened its fifty-fifth season in Manhattan. If this wasn't turkey for the symphonic gourmet he must have been, in all that the Gilbertian phrase implies, "a dainty man to please."

Last night's concert by the Bostonians, inaugurating their new series of ten in Carnegie Hall, was replete with splendid playing. Indeed, there need be no hesitation in saying that it was the most splendid so far of the season, though, for this reviewer, Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Brahms second symphony suffered from an excess of zeal and nervous excitement. The sheen of it was magnificent. But there was vodka where even the epicure looks for beer.

It may be questioned whether we have heard the "London" symphony of Vaughan Williams so beautifully and expressively presented. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance was the last word in polish, the while it seemed to sing from out the heart of the great city, now so grievously stricken. The symphony wears well, irrespective of its program. There is good reason to regard it as the most rewarding symphony yet composed by an Englishman.

Stock Plays New Harris Work.

A warm welcome awaited Frederick Stock and the orchestra he has conducted in Chicago for thirty-five years. It is an orchestra of the first rank, if not quite the virtuoso ensemble of the three great orchestras of the Atlantic seaboard. The tone quality is vital and unpampered. The strings sing in forthright fashion. The other choirs have a clean, essentially normal utterance. With a minimum of fuss, Mr. Stock exacts a maximum of precision. All this and more was to be admired in Wednesday night's performances of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms's third symphony and the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel."

But it was in the first performance locally of Roy Harris's "American Creed," a work written for and dedicated to the Chicago orchestra in its golden jubilee year, that expertness and devotion served a particular cause. Mr. Harris, who took his bows with becoming sobriety, had reason for thanksgiving. His work, however, merited the care and the enthusiasm lavished upon it by conductor and orchestra. With or without the Whitmanesque designations given its two movements, "Free to Dream" and "Free to Build," here was a composition bold and sure of facture, suggesting at first hearing both muscularity and a plenitude of red blood. Parallels may be sought in the music of Sibelius and others, but "American Creed" is not derivative. It may lack spontaneity, as on first acquaintance it lacked

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

NOV 22 1940

Boston Symphony Opens Its 55th Series in N. Y.

NEW YORK, Nov. 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony tonight opened its 55th series of concerts in New York as one feature of the celebration of the famous orchestra's 60th anniversary.

In the 55 years the Boston orchestra has been playing in New York it has never missed a concert, and has postponed only one. That was when, in 1888, its train stuck in a snowdrift and could not be pulled out in time.

Since its establishment in 1881 through the effort of Major Henry Lee Higginson, it has grown from a body of 60 players to its present size of 107. Its season, originally 20 weeks, is now the longest of any American orchesra—46 weeks.

For 37 years, Major Higginson paid all the deficit. But in 1918 the orchestra was incorporated, and since that time the financial burden has fallen on the trustees. Only one important hold-over from the Higginson period remains (excepting the world fam-

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
NOV 21 1940

Music

SYMPHONY SERIES ENJOYS OPENING OF BRILLIANCE

The brilliance of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening [illegible] unparalleled in the history of its more than 50 years of regular visits to New Haven, but so thrilling an impression was conveyed that its remembrance will not soon be effaced. The long awaited opening of the Woolsey Series took place before an audience which taxed every available space and found in the program a combination of works favorite the world over, and of a contemporary work whose merits quite surpass those of novelty. Dr. Koussevitsky revived the Concerto for Violin and Orchestra by Paul Hindemith to meet New Haven's special condition, since the distinguished composer is now associated with Yale University. Ruth Posselt was the soloist.

The Hindemith work well merits the Howland award for idealistic thinking in one of the several arts or (as the case may be, according to the terms of the establishing parties) in government. President Seymour bestowed the medal in the presence of the composer and of Dr. Koussevitsky, making a graceful tribute while the audience showed its vigorous satisfaction on the basis of a highly favorable first impression of the Concerto. Some may have recalled with like pleasure the brilliant performance of his "Mathis der Maler" by the same orchestra last season.

Mr. Hindemith's Concerto is a readily comprehensible work, in the sense that it gives unstinted pleasure on first hearing. While no work worth its salt can be completely assimilated immediately there is that ring of the true metal here which the experienced observer recognizes with satisfaction. Most of the great works of art came into being with an audience presentation in mind; the composer does not create for his own amusement, since any idea of truth is universal in its adaptation and bestowals. This Concerto has an exciting quality about it, built up on a series of long lines such as mark a preference in recent years, following a decade wherein short, scrappy phrases were preferred as structural materials. The assertion made by an earlier reviewer that this is a work of stature comparable to the Tryptich referred to appears to be justified by the impression made after this performance. Not only is the total effect one of fine exhileration, but the 'slow' movement maintains a truly lofty sense with its finely pathetic strain, furthered by the most attractive and individual orchestral colorings in the wood winds.

Notable Debut

One might write of this concert from several points of view. For instance, the playing of Miss Posselt might readily call forth the top-flight adjectives reserved for the more elect of the artistic fraternity. Making due allowance for the composer's kind understanding of the soloist's right to shine, Miss Posselt grasped every opportunity by playing with an expansive style, utilizing a broad, rich tone to deliver the long flowing structural lines. Here was playing in the grand manner, forthrightly and with abundant temperament. When the work was performed in Boston and New York, it was Mr. Burgin who eloed it. Miss Posselt and Mr. Burgin, now wed doubtless find the Hindemith Concerto domestic property.

The epoch-making advances signalized by Beethoven's Fifth Symphony are not by any means confined to the first or second movements which have become so popular. For inherent musical value as well as tradition-shattering structure the last two movements are the most eloquent. The ultimately triumphant motive of the entire work finds its triumph in the transcendant coda where the downward urge, having gradually risen to middle ground in the Scherzo, finally breakes into resplendent freedom as a declatation of that faith which overcomes all things. How great is the contrast between the despairing opening of the work and the unparalleled glory of its close! Thoreau, whose thought was close to nature's wrote. "With all your science can you tell how it is, and whence it is, that light comes into the soul?" But the light is here, triumphantly shining, through the secret which both men shared and of which we catch an illuminating vision.

Preceding the Concerto there was a happy performance of Haydn's Paris Symphony No. 88, with all the alternating moods from A to B, reflecting the serene and mannered graciousness of Haydn's gentle life. Dr. Koussevitsky's unrepentant insistence on whirling minuets and lightening rondos finds many a champion. Haydn's Esterhaz orchestra assuredly couldn't do that, but the Boston Symphony can.

H. EARLE JOHNSON.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PALISADES PARK, N.J.
BERGEN INDEPENDENT
11/22/40

Dorothy Maynor, Negro Singer, In Concert Dec. 2

The feeling of "discovery" may be experienced in Newark on December 2 when Dorothy Maynor, new Negro soprano whose New York debut last year caused a sensation in the music world, makes her first appearance at the Mosque Theater under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation for the benefit of the New Jersey Urban League. It is the beginning of the singer's first year on a full concert schedule.

A little over a year ago in the summer of 1939 the great singer was first discovered by Koussevitsky at the Berkshire Festival. Miss Maynor had gone to the Festival to listen to the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two enthusiastic people, a personal friend and a music patron, persuaded the conductor to grant her an audition. He finally did during a morning rehearsal, and musical history was made. Koussevitzky immediately became enthused, praised her voice in the highest terms, and invited her to sing the next day at the picnic which he gives each year for members of his orchestra. Before an audience of 200 musicians, critics and a group of music lovers, the young singer started with the difficult classic arias by Handel and Mozart, then sang a group of German lieder, ending with the Wagnerian "Ho-Yo-To" from "Die Walkuere." The gilt-edged professional audience marveled at her versatility and tremendous range, and was unanimous in the opinion that her voice was one of the finest in a generation.

A brilliant New York debut followed a few months later, in

Dorothy Maynor

which critics gave the verdict "One of the outstanding voices of the day." Engagements with the Boston Symphony, the New York Philharmonic, Chicago and Philadelphia Symphony Orchestras, as well as successful recitals throughout the East, started her first season.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
NOV 22 1940

Boston Symphony Opens N. Y. Series

Feature Of Orchestra's 60th Birthday; Plays In Brooklyn Today

NEW YORK (AP) — The Boston Symphony last night opened its 55th series of concerts in New York as one feature of the celebration of the famous orchestra's 60th anniversary.

In the 55 years the Boston orchestra has been playing in New York it has never missed a concert, and has postponed only one. That was when, in 1888, its train stuck in a snowdrift and could not be pulled out in time.

Since its establishment in 1881 through the efforts of Major Henry Lee Higginson, it has grown from a body of 60 players to its present size of 107. Its season, originally 20 weeks, is now the longest of any American orchestra—46 weeks.

For 37 years, Major Higginson paid all the deficit. But in 1918 the orchestra was incorporated, and since that time the financial burden has fallen on the trustees. Only one important hold-over from the Higginson period remains (excepting the world-famous quality of performance). The orchestra is still non-union.

For his first concert Serge Koussevitzky made a program of two symphonies—and nothing else. The first was Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony," and the second Brahms' D Major Symphony. The orchestra plays today in Brooklyn, and Saturday it is heard again in Carnegie Hall.

Next Sunday's Concert

Of double significance is next Sunday's concert at Symphony Hall by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. First, it is sponsored by the British War Relief Society which is raising funds to ship rolling food kitchens to England. Proceeds from this concert will be used for this purpose.

Then, the great Chicago Symphony Orchestra, making its first appearance here since 1921, is currently celebrating its 50th anniversary. Conducting the orchestra will be Frederick Stock, who has acted in this capacity for 35 years. It is due to his guidance that the orchestra has maintained a high level of excellence.

Boston music lovers will be well repaid for attending a concert that promises to be outstanding.

Chicago Symphony Here Sunday

Traveler

On Sunday afternoon at 3:30, Dr. Frederick A. Stock will conduct the Chicago Symphony orchestra in Symphony Hall in connection with a tour celebrating its near completion of 50 years of activity. Theodore Thomas, father of American symphony orchestras, founded the Chicago organization in 1891. On his death in 1905 his associate conductor, Frederick Stock, was appointed conductor. This post he has filled with distinction ever since, with the exception of one season. Sunday's program, which will benefit the British War Relief Society, is as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 3 in F major.....Brahms
Symphony.....John Alden Carpenter
(Dedicated to the Chicago Symphony orchestra and written for its golden jubilee season)
Forest Murmurs and Rhine Journey.Wagner

CONDUCTOR—Dr. Frederick A. Stock, who will conduct the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in a golden jubilee program Sunday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The performance will benefit the British War Relief Society.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 22 1940

TWO ORCHESTRAS HEARD AS VISITORS

Bostonians Begin Series—Stock Brings New Work.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

On Thanksgiving Eve the Chicago Symphony paid its first visit to New York in twenty-one years. On Thanksgiving night the Boston Symphony opened its fifty-fifth season in Manhattan. If this wasn't turkey for the symphonic gourmet he must have been, in all that the Gilbertian phrase implies, "a dainty man to please."

Last night's concert by the Bostonians, inaugurating their new series of ten in Carnegie Hall, was replete with splendid playing. Indeed, there need be no hesitation in saying that it was the most splendid so far of the season, though, for this reviewer, Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the Brahms second symphony suffered from an excess of zeal and nervous excitement. The sheen of it was magnificent. But there was vodka where even the epicure looks for beer.

It may be questioned whether we have heard the "London" symphony of Vaughan Williams so beautifully and expressively presented. Mr. Koussevitzky's performance was the last word in polish, the while it seemed to sing from out the heart of the great city, now so grievously stricken. The symphony wears well, irrespective of its program. There is good reason to regard it as the most rewarding symphony yet composed by an Englishman.

Stock Plays New Harris Work.

A warm welcome awaited Frederick Stock and the orchestra he has conducted in Chicago for thirty-five years. It is an orchestra of the first rank, if not quite the virtuoso ensemble of the three great orchestras of the Atlantic seaboard. The tone quality is vital and unpampered. The strings sing in forthright fashion. The other choirs have a clean, essentially normal utterance. With a minimum of fuss, Mr. Stock exacts a maximum of precision. All this and more was to be admired in Wednesday night's performances of Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms's third symphony and the Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel."

But it was in the first performance locally of Roy Harris's "American Creed," a work written for and dedicated to the Chicago orchestra in its golden jubilee year, that expertness and devotion served a particular cause. Mr. Harris, who took his bows with becoming sobriety, had reason for thanksgiving. His work, however, merited the care and the enthusiasm lavished upon it by conductor and orchestra. With or without the Whitmanesque designations given its two movements, "Free to Dream" and "Free to Build," here was a composition bold and sure of facture, suggesting at first hearing both muscularity and a plenitude of red blood. Parallels may be sought in the music of Sibelius and others, but "American Creed" is not derivative. It may lack spontaneity, as on first acquaintance it lacked

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
NOV 22 1940

Boston Symphony Opens Its 55th Series in N. Y.

NEW YORK, Nov. 21 (AP)—The Boston Symphony tonight opened its 55th series of concerts in New York as one feature of the celebration of the famous orchestra's 60th anniversary.

In the 55 years the Boston orchestra has been playing in New York it has never missed a concert, and has postponed only one. That was when, in 1888, its train stuck in a snowdrift and could not be pulled out in time.

Since its establishment in 1881 through the effort of Major Henry Lee Higginson, it has grown from a body of 60 players to its present size of 107. Its season, originally 20 weeks, is now the longest of any American orchestra—46 weeks.

For 37 years, Major Higginson paid all the deficit. But in 1918 the orchestra was incorporated, and since that time the financial burden has fallen on the trustees. Only one important hold-over from the Higginson period remains (excepting the world fam-

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 23 1940

The Orchestral Big Five

Distinctions Prompted by the Playing of Ensembles Heard in Current Season.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

Four of America's major orchestras have played in Carnegie Hall since the season's beginning, a little more than two months ago. A fifth, active so far primarily as a broadcasting unit, comes before the paying public this evening as the instrumental ensemble of a benefit performance of Verdi's "Requiem." America has other first-rank orchestras but certainly none more representative than the big five New York has been hearing.

In the order of their first appearance, these have been the resident Philharmonic-Symphony, the Philadelphia Orchestra, the Chicago Symphony and the Boston Symphony, with the NBC Symphony now about to leave the studio for one of its infrequent sallies into the competitive field where admittance is by ticket rather than by invitation. To rank these five orchestras in this same order would be to stir up not one but at least four hornets' nests, since all have their zealous partisans.

Conceivably, if any attempt were made to award the palm to any one of this group each should be judged in its own habitat, though the NBC orchestra sounds better in a concert hall, or for that matter over the air, than it does in its specially constructed broadcasting chamber. In this connection it has been contended that our concert halls are over-resonant and that what we should hear is more nearly the sound that the studio favors. But it is not likely that at this late date audiences will willingly forego a more brilliant sound for a less brilliant one, or a richer quality for one less rich.

When Ears Disagree.

Brilliance and richness of tone are represented, with the accent varying as between one attribute and the other, in the playing of each of the orchestras of the big five. Drawing distinctions between them has been a popular pursuit, with some measure of agreement resulting. At its peak under Stokowski, the Philadelphia Orchestra has been quite generally conceded a richer tone than any of the other ensembles. In contradistinction the tone of the Boston Symphony under Koussevitzky has been commonly regarded as an essentially brilliant one. But there is no such thing as unanimity in such matters. The writer happens to know that one of the city's most eminent musical authorities takes precisely the opposite view. For him the Boston Symphony's tone is deep and rich, the Philadelphia Orchestra's bright and glittering.

If, after all the years in which comparisons have been possible by reason of the periodical visits to Manhattan of these two orchestras, different pairs of trained ears can hear the fundamental tone of these ensembles so differently, it is scarcely to be expected that there will be complete agreement among musicians, laymen and critics about the tone of a less familiar orchestra. The Chicago Symphony, visiting New York on its golden jubilee tour has presented a case in point. The prevailing opinion, shared by this writer, would appear to be that the tone heard at the orchestra's Wednesday night and Friday afternoon concerts in Carnegie Hall was on the brilliant, rather than the rich side. Yet one experienced listener was heard to remark at the Wednesday concert that he found the tone dark and opaque. Whose ears are right?

There can be disagreement, of course, about every detail of orchestral performances, as about singing or playing the piano or the violin. But questions of precision, unity, clarity, balances and the technical address are not quite so dependent on the particular aural apparatus of the particular listener. Given much the same training, experience and alertness, two ordinarily competent music lovers should be in agreement about the roughness or raggedness of an attack or the manner in which parts of the music, sufficiently known to them, were obscured by thick or poorly articulated playing. So, too, anything that pertained to distortion, over-emphasis or under-emphasis, awkwardness or angularity of phrase. But questions of interpretation as well as of technical proficiency aside, these fine distinctions of sound remain precariously individual.

The Test of the Unseen.

There is the old question as to whether the trained listener could distinguish between one great orchestra and another if the playing was done behind a screen. Doubtless there are many individuals who are convinced that they would not confuse the Philadelphians with the Bostonians in performances of the same works under this arrangement. The writer has heard of tests with recordings, in which listeners did succeed in guessing rightly as between one orchestra and another, when the same work was played by two or more. But into such guesses could have entered much more than recognition of the fundamental ensemble tone. The playing style of a great orchestra, particularly if it has been for a long period under the dominating personality of a highly individual conductor, is perhaps a more readily recognizable hallmark than the basic tone. At least it would seem less subject to idiosyncrasies of the listening ear. The personality of the conductor often becomes the personality of the orchestra. His tempi, his rhythms, his way of treating inner voices, his stresses inevitably are associated with the ensemble. The playing of individual members of an orchestra when called upon to trace solo passages often would be a give-away for listeners who otherwise might have been in doubt. The writer believes he would know the sound of Mr. Kincaid's flute from that of Mr. Amans under any conditions; likewise, that of the oboe of Mr. Tabuteau from that of Mr. Labate.

By extension, this piecemeal sort of identification might be based on the playing of a particular choir, such as the Philharmonic brass section under Toscanini. It had then a luminosity that it has not since possessed in equal measure and which, as a matter of individual opinion, no brass choir in the rival orchestras could boast.

The Philadelphia woodwinds have been as pre-eminent as the Philharmonic brass and might be granted the edge over their fellows. But one wonders how widely divergent opinions about the relative merits of the string sections would be resolved if these sections could be heard separately without being seen.

The Ear Versus the Eye.

Many musicians have objected to the lack of uniformity in the bowing of the Philadelphia players. In Boston there has been particularly adverse comment on the Philadelphia procedure of letting every fiddler go at the bowing in his own sweet way. But if the eye were not on the job would the ear detect a difference? And if it did, would the difference be discoverable in the quality of section's mass tone so much as in matters of unity within the phrase? The musical personality of the conductor, as reflected in his preferences, might be identifiable in a lighter and brighter or heavier and darker collective sound. For some of us the Philharmonic strings had a peculiarly disembodied quality—an etherealized tone—in the Toscanini period that they do not possess today. Nor is it to be found in the NBC strings under his leadership. The famous strings of the Boston Symphony — again speaking for some of us—have a very different sheen, whereas those of the Philadelphians have retained a lushness that is the opposite of the "ethereal."

Neither is "ethereal" a term to be applied to the Chicago strings. They are full-bodied and assertive in quality, meaty and edged. For one listener they suggested a certain "normalcy" from which the other string sections have departed in the interests of some more individualized quality. They had bite and they were musical, but they did not possess the degree of personality that the strings of some other orchestras under certain of their conductors have developed as something peculiar to them.

All these fine differentiations between the orchestras remain of vastly less importance than the qualities they share among them. It is their similarities, not their differences, that have most enriched America's musical life, because these similarities have embraced the prime virtues of orchestral playing, as distinct from the particular fetishes of conductors. It was not of one great ensemble, but of our symphonic bodies generally, that Wilhelm Furtwaengler spoke when he said derisively that American orchestras were "luxushunde." The sneer would not have been wasted on inferior organizations. And it had to do with not one, but a group of orchestras.

SYMPHONY ACTIVITY GREAT

Post Nov 24

Three Orchestras, Four Conductors to Play Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

BETWEEN now and Wednesday of next week three orchestras and four conductors will be on display at Symphony Hall, which must constitute some kind of record. To take them chronologically, this afternoon's concert will be that of the Chicago Orchestra under Dr. Frederick Stock. Next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the Boston Symphony will be directed by the Belgian Desire Defauw, who will then make his first appearance in this city. On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon of next week Dr. Koussevitzky will lead the orchestra through the second pair of concerts of the supplementary series. And finally, on Wednesday evening the New York Philharmonic Symphony, under John Barbirolli, will pay us its annual visit.

Not Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel," as stated here last Sunday, but two Wagnerian excerpts, the "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried" and the "Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung," will conclude Dr. Stock's programme. The other numbers remain as first announced: Weber's "Euryanthe" Overture, Brahms' Third Symphony and the new symphony of John Alden Carpenter, composed for this, the Chicago Orchestra's 50th season.

* * * *

While on the matter of programmes, and it is an important matter, since conductor and orchestra are not the whole of any concert, the other impending lists are herewith set forth. Mr. Defauw will begin with two numbers by eminent fellow-countrymen, both unfamiliar to present-day audiences, Franck's tone poem, "The Mad Huntsman" and a suite from Gretry's ballet, "Cephalis and Procris," as arranged by Mottl. His other numbers are the dances from Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat" and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Dr. Koussevitzky's Monday-Tuesday list embraces Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, the Brahms' Violin Concerto, with Paul Makovsky as soloist and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch. Another Brahms' Concerto, that for the piano in B-flat, will be offered by the Gothamites. With Rudolf Serkin as pianist. Mr. Barbirolli's other items are his own arrangement of a Chaccone by Purcell and the C major Symphony of Schubert.

When the German blitzkrieg hit Belgium last May Mr. Defauw was in Italy, where he had gone to conduct a series of concerts. As soon as he learned his homeland had been invaded he departed by train to Brussels, finding himself on arrival in the midst of a terrific bombardment, and not too cheerful over the fact that his house was situated near an airport. With all speed he collected his wife, son and daughter-in-law and a few belongings, including his valuable Stradivarius. In the family's two cars the party embarked on what proved to be a slow and perilous journey across Europe. They had to travel mostly by night and one of the cars was machine-gunned.

Although a newcomer to Boston, Mr. Defauw is no stranger to the American public. Last year he conducted two of the concerts of the NBC-Symphony Orchestra.

* * * *

This, the season's busiest music-week, offers four recitals. While the Chicagoans are holding forth at Symphony Hall, Kerstin Thorborg, eminent contralto of the Metropolitan, will be singing, in Jordan Hall, a programme of songs and operatic airs.

Tomorrow Norma Farber, soprano, will make her Boston debut, assisted by the Stradivarius Quartet and George Reeves, pianist. Miss Farber's numbers with strings will be four Elizabethan Songs, arranged by Peter Warlock and songs by Jongen and Chausson.

Wednesday morning brings the second of the season's Musicales at the Statler, with Vitya Vronsky and Victor Babin, duo-pianists, presenting an uncommonly attractive programme.

The first personal appearance of Jeannette MacDonald on a concert stage in Boston will take place at Symphony Hall on Friday evening, when the famous screen star will be heard in a recital. No programme has been announced.

On Sunday afternoon next Sergei Rachmaninoff will give his annual recital at Symphony Hall.

The success of Wheeler Beckett's Youth Concerts at Symphony Hall had led to the establishment of a series of six Children's Concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, the first of which will be given on Wednesday afternoon of next week. Mr. Beckett will conduct an orchestra of 32 Symphony men in works by Mozart, Haydn and Prokofieff ("Peter and the Wolf").

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
NOV 24 1940

MONDAY-TUESDAY PROGRAM

On Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 2 and 3, in Symphony hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of its shorter series under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist will be Paul Makovsky, the brilliant young European violinist who is then to make his Boston debut. Mr. Makovsky will appear with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Brahms, in D major. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, and close it with the Fifth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, the talented composer of Soviet Russia. This symphony has figured importantly in the orchestra's present season, having been presented in Boston and New York.

Paul Makovsky made his American debut in New York when he came to this country shortly after the outbreak of the war in Europe. His European career has been considerable for a musician of his years, for the young man began as a child prodigy. He was born in Sweden of Russian parentage, and educated in Paris. He made his first public appearance at the Salle Gaveau at the age of 8. He has since performed with the principal orchestras of Europe, and in many recitals. It was in January of the present year that he came to this country.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
NOV 24 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS DEFAUW, GUEST CONDUCTOR

For the first time in its sixty years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by a Belgian when Desire Defauw makes his concert debut in the United States as guest conductor of this orchestra in the week to come. Mr. Defauw has long held a reputation among the first conductors of Europe, having been the leader of the Société des Concerts Defauw, and the Royal Conservatory Orchestra at Brussels before the war put an end to orchestral concerts in that city. His earlier career was that of a violin virtuoso, and as the first violin of a quartet which he organized. He first came to America a year ago when he conducted four broadcast concerts from New York. Returning to this country from Europe in the present autumn, he has had notable success as guest conductor of the orchestra of Montreal.

The programme in which he is to be heard at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, opens with two numbers by Belgian composers, each of which has not been performed for a considerable time at these concerts: César Franck's symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter" ("Le Chasseur Maudit"); and a suite of dances from Grétry's "Cephale et Procris," as edited by Felix Mottl. The programme will continue with three dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat"; and conclude with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

Chicago's Orchestra

THE Golden Jubilee concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which its distinguished leader, Dr. Frederick A. Stock, will conduct in Symphony Hall on this afternoon, is a rare event in Boston's musical calendar. This famous member of "The Big Four" among American symphony orchestras is not given to travel, usually limiting itself to annual visits to Milwaukee.

With all his reverence for the music of the accepted composers of the past, it was Stock who was in the vanguard of new movements developing in the past 25 years. Precisely that length of time ago, he enlivened a program and incurred blame mingled with praise, with the first performance of a composition inspired by a cartoonist — "Adventures in a Perambulator," John Alden Carpenter's musical version of the comic pictures by Peter Newell.

In 1921, when Carpenter again recognized the cartoonist as a factor in Americanism, Stock led the Chicago orchestra in the first concert version of the ballet, "Krazy Kat."

Stock's program this afternoon is: Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe"; the Third Symphony of Brahms in F major; a new Symphony by John Alden Carpenter, especially composed for the Chicago Orchestra in its 50th year; and two numbers from Richard Wagner, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Gotterdammerung."

FOR the first time in its 60 years, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be conducted by a Belgian when Desiry Defauw makes his concert debut in the United States as guest conductor of this orchestra in the ensuing week. Mr. Defauw has long held a reputation among the first conductors of Europe, having been the leader of the Societe des Concerts Defauw, and the Royal Conservatory Orchestra at Brussels before the war put an end to orchestral concerts in that city.

The program in which Defauw is to be heard at the Boston Symphony concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, in Symphony Hall, opens with two numbers by Belgian composers, each of which has not been performed for a considerable time at these concerts: Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter" ("Le Chausseur Maudit"); and a suite of dances from Gretry's "Cephale et Procris," as edited by Felix Mottl. The program will continue with three dances from de Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat"; and conclude with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony in A major.

ON Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, Dec. 2 and 3, in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the second pair of concerts of its shorter series under the leadership of Serge Koussevitzky. The soloist will be Paul Makovsky, the brilliant young European violinist who is then to make his Boston debut.

Mr. Makovsky will appear with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Brahms in D major. Serge Koussevitzky will open the program with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, and close it with the Fifth Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch.

The New York Philharmonic Orchestra will visit Boston for a concert under its conductor, John Barbirolli, in Symphony Hall, on Wednesday evening, Dec. 4, at 8:15.

The soloist will be Rudolf Serkin, famous pianist. Mr. Serkin will appear with the orchestra in the Second Pianoforte Concerto of Brahms in B-flat major.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
NOV 24 1940

36

Noted Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is the distinguished conductor of the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra, which will appear in concert in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Thursday evening, Dec. 12, as the museum's annual concert complimentary to museum members.

Boston Symphony Plays Here Dec. 12

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has been chosen to present the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art on Thursday evening, Dec. 12.

After a season's absence from Toledo, the appearance of this world famous organization under the direction of its distinguished conductor, will be eagerly awaited as the outstanding concert event to be held in the peristyle this season.

Receive Invitations

Invitations to museum members and to musicians who have recently participated in peristyle concerts were received yesterday. Each member and each musician are entitled to receive two complimentary tickets and may purchase extra tickets for guests. There will be no public sale of seats.

Museum memberships are open to every interested person. Regular membership is available to teachers, musicians, artists, and members of the clergy at $5. Advantages of membership are numerous. Each museum member receives the weekly bulletin of museum activities, the Quarterly Museum News, and first preference on all museum announcements.

Free Admission

In addition, members are entitled to free admission to any special exhibitions such as the Masterpieces of Art exhibition now showing in the museum galleries; receive invitations to all previews of special exhibitions; are admitted free to many participating museums throughout the country; and each year receive two complimentary tickets to the concert arranged especially for museum members. Inquiries regarding membership may be addressed to the Membership Secretary, the Toledo Museum of Art.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1940

THE ORCHESTRAS

IN CONTRAST with the intense local orchestral activity of the last few days, the coming week's schedule offers only one strictly symphonic event at Carnegie Hall, the opening concert of the National Orchestral Association's Gabrilowitsch Memorial series at Carnegie Hall.

All five programs in this series will be devoted to Brahms. Leonard Shure, thirty-year-old American pianist, will be the soloist in the D minor concerto, and the Academic Festival Overture and first symphony will complete the program under Leon Barzin's direction. On Saturday night the National Youth Administration's Symphony Orchestra will make its Carnegie Hall debut under Fritz Mahler's direction in a program shared with the People's Philharmonic Choral Society under Max Helfman. The principal number will be William Schuman's cantata "This Is Our Time," first performed at the Lewisohn Stadium on July 4. On the same evening Arturo Toscanini will conduct the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in its regular weekly broadcast from Studio 8-H, Radio City.

New Shostakovitch Symphony

In the Philadelphia Orchestra's home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Leopold Stokowski will conduct the first performances of Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony to be given outside of Russia. This will be broadcast on Friday at 3:15 over the Mutual System's stations, and will also be heard in New York on Tuesday night, Dec. 3, when Mr. Stokowski makes his only Carnegie Hall appearance of the season with this orchestra.

"In his fifth symphony," writes Mr. Stokowski, "Shostakovitch painted in tone the inner and outer experiences of an artist's life, sometimes expressing the boisterous humor of crowds in the street, as in the fourth part; sometimes painting with ironic splashes of color a gamin-like humor, as in the second part, and sometimes telling us by the simplest orchestral means the innermost reveries of his spirit in dark and melancholy coloring, or rising to sublime heights of ecstasy, as in the third part.

"In his fifth symphony Shostakovitch has composed music in the usual sequence of symphonic form, but in his sixth he has become more individualistic. It is in three parts, instead of four, and the first part is the slow movement, the second the scherzo, and the third has more the character of the usual first movement. These three parts are strongly contrasted and are remarkable for the firmness of their melodic outline, rhythm and musical character. In each symphony Shostakovitch shows himself to be more of a master—ever growing, ever expanding—in his imagination and musical consciousness."

Philharmonic Travels

The Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra will be heard over the air today at 3 o'clock, broadcasting from the Hill Auditorium in Ann Arbor, Mich. The second week of its tour under John Barbirolli's direction begins tomorrow at Saginaw, Mich. On Tuesday the orchestra will appear in Lansing, on Wednesday in Fort Wayne, Thursday in Cincinnati, Friday in Columbus and Saturday in Pittsburgh. Next Sunday afternoon's concert will be broadcast from Constitution Hall, in Washington. The orchestra will then go to New England to play in Providence Dec. 3, Boston, Dec. 4 and Springfield, Dec. 5, and will resume its New York schedule with the Carnegie Hall concert of Saturday night, Dec. 7.

Out of Town

Kirsten Flagstad will sing with the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington this afternoon, with Edwin McArthur as guest conductor, offering Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah, perfido"; Strauss songs, and Wagnerian excerpts from "Tannhäuser" and "Die Walküre." In this afternoon's concert in Washington, Hans Kindler's program includes arrangements of two Scriabin etudes made by the Washington composer, LaSalle Spier.

Back from the tour which brought it to New York last week, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will resume its home series under Frederick Stock next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, playing Georg Schumann's "Liebesfrühling" overture, Mr. Stock's transcription of Tchaikovsky's A minor Trio, Beethoven's fourth symphony and the polka from Weinberger's "Schwanda." Roy Harris's "American Creed" and Percy Grainger's "Harvest Hymn" will both be repeated Saturday night.

The Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will make its last appearance of the season with the Cleveland Orchestra this afternoon. In the next pair of regular concerts in Severance Hall under Artur Rodzinski's direction, a suite from Walter Piston's ballet, "The Incredible Flutist," will have its Cleveland premiere. The symphony is Beethoven's familiar Fifth. Rudolph Ringwall will conduct a familiar program for the season's third Twilight Concert next Sunday at 5 o'clock.

Resuming its home concerts after a week of travel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Carnegie Hall under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in a program including Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit," Mottl's suite of music from Gretry's ballet, "Cephale et Procris," dances from Manuel de Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Theodore Thomas, father of American symphony orchestras, founded the Chicago organization in 1891. On his death in 1905, his associate conductor, the former viola player, Frederick Stock, was appointed conductor. This post he has filled with distinction ever since, with the exception of one season. Today's program, which will benefit the British War Relief Society, is as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Brahms
Symphony .....John Alden Carpenter
(Dedicated to the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and written for its Golden Jubilee season.)
Forest Murmurs, and Rhine Journey, Wagner

RARE CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

Chicago Orchestra's First Visit in 20 Years

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To celebrate its 50th season, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra is now making one of its infrequent tours of the East. Yesterday afternoon it was heard in Symphony Hall under the baton of its veteran conductor, Frederick Stock, and for the first time in some 20 years. The concert was given for the benefit of the British War Relief Society, Inc., and it was attended by a tremendously enthusiastic audience which did not quite fill the hall.

The period since the last war has seen many changes in American orchestras. The once all-prevalent Germanic tradition has largely disappeared. But not entirely. One still senses it in the playing of the Chicago orchestra: sound, solid, substantial, clear, well-balanced, unhysterical, undistorted, untroubled by personal interpretations. For those who prize these virtues, and they are not to be sniffed at, Dr. Stock and his Chicagoans have them to offer.

As this reviewer heard it, yesterday's concert had the curious effect of setting the clock back, not 20 years, but 30. This was the music we used to hear; this was the way we used to hear it. Even the one novelty on the programme, John Alden Carpenter's Symphony in one movement, written for the Chicago Orchestra's Golden Jubilee season and dedicated to Dr. Stock and his stalwart musicians, would not have sounded particularly novel in 1910. Even then, indeed, it would have had a conservative ring to it. Music of such harmonic innocence is rarely come by today, even though most contemporary composers are eschewing the unbridled dissonance of a decade ago.

However, an audience would be likely to enjoy Mr. Carpenter's smooth, sonorous, well-made score. Yesterday's audience plainly liked it a great deal and vociferously applauded its composer when he was brought to the stage.

To return to Dr. Stock's programme. It began with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" (which received the most striking performance of anything on the programme), and the other numbers were Brahms' Third Symphony and those familiar Wagnerian excerpts, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung." In these last the orchestra's splendid brass section was heard to excellent advantage.

W YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1940.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Conducts the Boston Symphony in the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, capped its resplendent performances yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a most searching unfoldment of the Fifth symphony by Shostakovich. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the work by his youthful compatriot was so deeply sympathetic, intense and vital, that it laid bare the complete message of a composition which henceforth must be recognized as one of the outstanding orchestral creations of the present time.

Shostakovish's Fifth symphony received its fourth presentation in the city at this concert. It was first heard here on April 9, 1938, on a program of the NBC Symphony Orchestra directed by Artur Rodzinski. The other previous hearings were provided by Leopold Stokowski, under whose baton the work was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on March 28, 1939, and by the All American Youth Orchestra, Sept. 17, of the present year, in the same auditorium.

Premier Three Years Ago

When this symphony received its world première three years ago in Leningrad, it immediately reinstated its composer in the good graces of the Soviet Government, which had definitely turned against him because of the characteristics of his Second ("October") and Third ("May Day") symphonies and of his opera "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." In his earnest attempt to bring himself in line with the desires of the Soviet officials, who had found the three compositions mentionad too formal in structure and content and too bourgeois and removed from "Soviet reality" for their taste, Shostakovich changed his style radically in the Fifth symphony.

Compared to the widely known First symphony, written when 18, which is the only other one of the series familiar here to date, the Fifth displays far more profundity and attains its ends in a much simpler manner. The fact that in its pages Shostakovich was trying to say something that would please those in power in his country did not happen to constrict his powers of expression, but because of the sincere desire to voice the longings and aspirations of his people, lent his symphony a universal appeal.

That the allegretto with its waltz-like strains is built up on cheap thematic material does not throw this second movement of the symphony out of gear with the significant music of the only wrought opening division, the brooding and deeply felt largo, or the joyous finale. It is purposely banal, reflecting the folk spirit in all its outward crudeness, in contradistinction to the inner depts of feeling revealed elsewhere in the symphony.

Melodic Line Sustained

If the composition is consciously tawdry in this scherzo section it is elsewhere almost unique among present-day works in the modern idiom for sustained melodic line, emotional power and architectural patterning. It boasts, moreover, an amazing wealth of orchestral coloring of a decidedly original and impressive nature, especially in the first movement and the hauntingly imaginative and soul-stirring largo, in which new and effective combinations of solo instruments are pitted against richer sonorities with magic skill.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed this masterpiece with such compelling virtuosity and impressiveness that it scored a big ovation for them, leaving no doubt that the symphony had finally succeeded in making its real virtues apparent.

The rest of the program was devoted to Haydn's symphony in G major—the seventh of the series written for Paris—and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Both of these classics were presented with remarkable rhythmic verve, absolute comprehension of their needs in every regard, and they were invested as well with unsurpassable beauty and blending of immaculate tone.

N. S.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
NOV 24 1940

36

Noted Conductor Serge Koussevitzky is the distinguished conductor of the world-famous Boston Symphony orchestra, which will appear in concert in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle Thursday evening, Dec. 12, as the museum's annual concert complimentary to museum members.

Boston Symphony Plays Here Dec. 12

THE Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, has been chosen to present the annual concert complimentary to members of the Toledo Museum of Art on Thursday evening, Dec. 12.

After a season's absence from Toledo, the appearance of this world famous organization under the direction of its distinguished conductor, will be eagerly awaited as the outstanding concert event to be held in the peristyle this season.

Receive Invitations

Invitations to museum members and to musicians who have recently participated in peristyle concerts were received yesterday. Each member and each musician are entitled to receive two complimentary tickets and may purchase extra tickets for guests. There will be no public sale of seats.

Museum memberships are open to every interested person. Regular membership is available to teachers, musicians, artists, and members of the clergy at $5. Advantages of membership are numerous. Each museum member receives the weekly bulletin of museum activities, the Quarterly Museum News, and first preference on all museum announcements.

Free Admission

In addition, members are entitled to free admission to any special exhibitions such as the Masterpieces of Art exhibition now showing in the museum galleries; receive invitations to all previews of special exhibitions; are admitted free to many participating museums throughout the country; and each year receive two complimentary tickets to the concert arranged especially for museum members. Inquiries regarding membership may be addressed to the Membership Secretary, the Toledo Museum of Art.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1940

THE ORCHESTRAS

IN CONTRAST with the intense local orchestral activity of the last few days, the coming week's schedule offers only one strictly symphonic event at Carnegie Hall, the opening concert of the National Orchestral Association's Gabrilowitsch Memorial series at Carnegie Hall.

All five programs in this series will be devoted to Brahms. Leonard Shure, thirty-year-old American pianist, will be the soloist in the D minor concerto, and the Academic Festival Overture and first symphony will complete the program under Leon Barzin's direction. On Saturday night the National Youth Administration's Symphony Orchestra will make its Carnegie Hall debut under Fritz Mahler's direction in a program shared with the People's Philharmonic Choral Society under Max Helfman. The principal number will be William Schuman's cantata "This Is Our Time," first performed at the Lewisohn Stadium on July 4. On the same evening Arturo Toscanini will conduct the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra in its regular weekly broadcast from Studio 8-H, Radio City.

New Shostakovitch Symphony

In the Philadelphia Orchestra's home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Leopold Stokowski will conduct the first performances of Dmitri Shostakovitch's fifth symphony to be given outside of Russia. This will be broadcast on Friday at 3:15 over the Mutual System's stations, and will also be heard in New York on Tuesday night, Dec. 3, when Mr. Stokowski makes his only Carnegie Hall appearance of the season with this orchestra.

"In his fifth symphony," writes Mr. Stokowski, "Shostakovitch painted in tone the inner and outer experiences of an artist's life, sometimes expressing the boisterous humor of crowds in the street, as in the fourth part; sometimes painting with ironic splashes of color a gamin-like humor, as in the second part, and sometimes telling us by the simplest orchestral means the innermost reveries of his spirit in dark and melancholy coloring, or rising to sublime heights of ecstasy, as in the third part.

"In his fifth symphony Shostakovitch has written a work which is the result of a mature artist's reflection on life, a work which is optimistic in its conception and which has been hailed by the Russian people as a true answer to just criticism."

The Philadelphia Orchestra will go to New England to play in Providence Dec. 3, Boston, Dec. 4 and Springfield, Dec. 5, and will resume its New York schedule with the Carnegie Hall concert of Saturday night, Dec. 7.

Out of Town

Kirsten Flagstad will sing with the National Symphony Orchestra in Washington this afternoon, with Edwin McArthur as guest conductor, offering Beethoven's scena and aria, "Ah, perfido"; Strauss songs, and Wagnerian excerpts from "Tannhäuser" and "Die Walküre." In this afternoon's concert in Washington, Hans Kindler's program includes arrangements of two Scriabin etudes made by the Washington composer, LaSalle Spier.

Back from the tour which brought it to New York last week, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra will resume its home series under Frederick Stock next Thursday night and Friday afternoon, playing Georg Schumann's "Liebesfrühling" overture, Mr. Stock's transcription of Tchaikovsky's A minor Trio, Beethoven's fourth symphony and the polka from Weinberger's "Schwanda." Roy Harris's "American Creed" and Percy Grainger's "Harvest Hymn" will both be repeated Saturday night.

The Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will make its last appearance of the season with the Cleveland Orchestra this afternoon. In the next pair of regular concerts in Severance Hall under Artur Rodzinski's direction, a suite from Walter Piston's ballet, "The Incredible Flutist," will have its Cleveland premiere. The symphony is Beethoven's familiar Fifth. Rudolph Ringwall will conduct a familiar program for the season's third Twilight Concert next Sunday at 5 o'clock.

Resuming its home concerts after a week of travel, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Carnegie Hall under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in a program including Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit," Mottl's suite of music from Gretry's ballet, "Cephale et Procris," dances from Manuel de Falla's "Three Cornered Hat" and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

'Kind Lady' to Florida

William A. Brady has received a guaranteed dates for Grace George in "Kind Lady," all of which are to be played in Florida. These dates would follow the Chicago engagement. Commencing with a full week at Miami, Feb. 17, Palm Beach, Jacksonville and Winter Park would all the second week, with St. Petersburg and Tampa splitting the third and final week.

Dr. Stock's Programs Include Many First Performances

The Golden Jubilee concert of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which its distinguished leader, Dr. Frederick A. Stock, will conduct in Symphony Hall this afternoon, is a rare event in Boston's musical calendar. This famous member of "the big four" among American symphony orchestras is not given to travel, usually limiting itself to annual series of visits to Milwaukee.

Since the achievements of Dr. Stock are less familiar in detail hereabouts than through the Mid-West, some random highlights may not be amiss.

With all his reverence for the music of the accepted composers of the past, it was Stock who was in the vanguard of new movements developing in the past 25 years. Precisely that length of time ago, he enlivened a program and incurred blame mingled with praise, with the first performance of a composition inspired by a cartoonist—"Adventures in a Perambulator," John Alden Carpenter's musical version of the comic pictures by Peter Newell. This afternoon, Stock will introduce to Boston the new symphony dedicated by Carpenter to the Chicago orchestra, and written for its Golden Jubilee season.

Theodore Thomas, father of American symphony orchestras, founded the Chicago organization in 1891. On his death in 1905, his associate conductor, the former viola player, Frederick Stock, was appointed conductor. This post he has filled with distinction ever since, with the exception of one season. Today's program, which will benefit the British War Relief Society, is as follows:

Overture to "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony No. 3, in F major.....Brahms
Symphony .....John Alden Carpenter
(Dedicated to the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, and written for its Golden Jubilee season.)
Forest Murmurs, and Rhine Journey, Wagner

RARE CONCERT AT SYMPHONY

Chicago Orchestra's First Visit in 20 Years

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To celebrate its 50th season, the Chicago Symphony Orchestra is now making one of its infrequent tours of the East. Yesterday afternoon it was heard in Symphony Hall under the baton of its veteran conductor, Frederick Stock, and for the first time in some 20 years. The concert was given for the benefit of the British War Relief Society, Inc., and it was attended by a tremendously enthusiastic audience which did not quite fill the hall.

The period since the last war has seen many changes in American orchestras. The once all-prevalent Germanic tradition has largely disappeared. But not entirely. One still senses it in the playing of the Chicago orchestra: sound, solid, substantial, clear, well-balanced, unhysterical, undistorted, untroubled by personal interpretations. For those who prize these virtues, and they are not to be sniffed at, Dr. Stock and his Chicagoans have them to offer.

As this reviewer heard it, yesterday's concert had the curious effect of setting the clock back, not 20 years, but 30. This was the music we used to hear; this was the way we used to hear it. Even the one novelty on the programme, John Alden Carpenter's Symphony in one movement, written for the Chicago Orchestra's Golden Jubilee season and dedicated to Dr. Stock and his stalwart musicians, would not have sounded particularly novel in 1910. Even then, indeed, it would have had a conservative ring to it. Music of such harmonic innocence is rarely come by today, even though most contemporary composers are eschewing the unbridled dissonance of a decade ago.

However, an audience would be likely to enjoy Mr. Carpenter's smooth, sonorous, well-made score. Yesterday's audience plainly liked it a great deal and vociferously applauded its composer when he was brought to the stage.

To return to Dr. Stock's programme, it began with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe" (which received the most striking performance of anything on the programme), and the other numbers were Brahms' Third Symphony and those familiar Wagnerian excerpts, the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried" and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" from "Goetterdaemmerung." In these last the orchestra's splendid brass section was heard to excellent advantage.

W YORK TIMES, SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 24, 1940.

MUSIC IN REVIEW

Koussevitzky Conducts the Boston Symphony in the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, capped its resplendent performances yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a most searching unfoldment of the Fifth symphony by Shostakovich. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the work by his youthful compatriot was so deeply sympathetic, intense and vital, that it laid bare the complete message of a composition which henceforth must be recognized as one of the outstanding orchestral creations of the present time.

Shostakovish's Fifth symphony received its fourth presentation in the city at this concert. It was first heard here on April 9, 1938, on a program of the NBC Symphony Orchestra directed by Artur Rodzinski. The other previous hearings were provided by Leopold Stokowski, under whose baton the work was played by the Philadelphia Orchestra in Carnegie Hall on March 28, 1939, and by the All American Youth Orchestra, Sept. 17, of the present year, in the same auditorium.

Premier Three Years Ago

When this symphony received its world première three years ago in Leningrad, it immediately reinstated its composer in the good graces of the Soviet Government, which had definitely turned against him because of the characteristics of his Second ("October") and Third ("May Day") symphonies and of his opera "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk." In his earnest attempt to bring himself in line with the desires of the Soviet officials, who had found the three compositions mentionad too formal in structure and content and too bourgeois and removed from "Soviet reality" for their taste, Shostakovich changed his style radically in the Fifth symphony.

Compared to the widely known First symphony, written when 18, which is the only other one of the series familiar here to date, the Fifth displays far more profundity and attains its ends in a much simpler manner. The fact that in its pages Shostakovich was trying to say something that would please those in power in his country did not happen to constrict his powers of expression, but because of the sincere desire to voice the longings and aspirations of his people, lent his symphony a universal appeal.

That the allegretto with its waltz-like strains is built up on cheap thematic material does not throw this second movement of the symphony out of gear with the significant music of the only wrought opening division, the brooding and deeply felt largo, or the joyous finale. It is purposely banal, reflecting the folk spirit in all its outward crudeness, in contradistinction to the inner depts of feeling revealed elsewhere in the symphony.

Melodic Line Sustained

If the composition is consciously tawdry in this scherzo section it is elsewhere almost unique among present-day works in the modern idiom for sustained melodic line, emotional power and architectural patterning. It boasts, moreover, an amazing wealth of orchestral coloring of a decidedly original and impressive nature, especially in the first movement and the hauntingly imaginative and soul-stirring largo, in which new and effective combinations of solo instruments are pitted against richer sonorities with magic skill.

Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed this masterpiece with such compelling virtuosity and impressiveness that it scored a big ovation for them, leaving no doubt that the symphony had finally succeeded in making its real virtues apparent.

The rest of the program was devoted to Haydn's symphony in G major—the seventh of the series written for Paris—and Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3. Both of these classics were presented with remarkable rhythmic verve, absolute comprehension of their needs in every regard, and they were invested as well with unsurpassable beauty and blending of immaculate tone.

N. S.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 2 4 1940

37

Musical Life: Defauw Bombed, Stock Bouqueted

Belgian Will Conduct Boston Symphony Here

BEFORE the German army silenced the music of his country, they called Desire Defauw "the musical dictator of Belgium." He held most of the important jobs in and out of Brussels and appeared frequently elsewhere on the continent.

Now the dapper, 55-year-old "dictator" is in America, the victim of a less benevolent dictatorship, to put it mildly, but he remains one of the most energetic conductors in captivity.

Providence will see him for the first time on Tuesday night in Metropolitan Theatre when he conducts the Boston Symphony in its second concert of the season here. Last week, Defauw conducted several programs for the Concerts Symphoniques de Montreal; he is currently doing a spell of guest conducting for Dr. Koussevitzky; later on he will probably appear with the NBC Symphony again.

Began as Violinist

Yes, Defauw is busy again and he loves it. His active life began as a violinist, a pupil of Johan Smit, with tours of the continent and Europe when he was still a young man. Then he formed the "Allied Quartet" during the first World War. Later on he became professor at the Royal Conservatory, Antwerp, and directed the concerts at the Theatre des Marais, Brussels.

He left Brussels last May 2 to conduct in Italy. Nobody thought of invasion then. Before he had laid down the baton at the end of his first concert in Bologna, May 9, his country was at war, but he knew nothing of it until the following noon.

The struggle for escape began, as it was beginning for people all over the troubled face of Western Europe. Defauw caught the first train for Switzerland, took another for Paris and made it in a nerve-wracked 24 hours, took still another for Brussels and sat up all night on his luggage in a crowded coach.

DESIRE DEFAUW

Saved His Strad

He reached Brussels in the midst of a tremendous bombardment. At his home, dangerously near an airport, he loaded his wife, son, daughter-in-law, his 1729 Stradivarius, termed "one of the finest fiddles existing," and other belongings into his two automobiles.

At last they reached Bayonne, near the Spanish border, and here his son, Jean, escaped into Spain with his American-born wife, the former Gladys Timmerman of Memphis. Defauw and his wife could not follow because their passports were not in order. The Germans came ever closer.

With 30 other people, the Defauws descended on a small, ancient Belgian freighter which lay in port and the conductor bribed the pilot with his own automobile to take them to England. They cleared the harbor two hours ahead of the Germans.

In London, after a four-day-three-nights trip across the Channel, the indomitable Defauw went right to work and conducted a concert of the BBC Orchestra before his old friend. Toscanini, arranged the necessary papers for return to America last August.

J. T.

Chicagoan Directs His Orchestra in Its 50th Season

FREDERICK A. STOCK sat in the green-papered conductor's room at Carnegie Hall, New York. He leaned forward in the brown easy chair where so many other famous maestri have rested their artistic bones during intermission and began to talk. Dr. Stock talks the way he conducts the Chicago Symphony: straightforward, to the point, concisely and with polish.

"You may begin, gentlemen," he said. "Who is going to ask the questions?"

"Everybody has some questions," said one man diplomatically, and the half-dozen interviewers present gathered around.

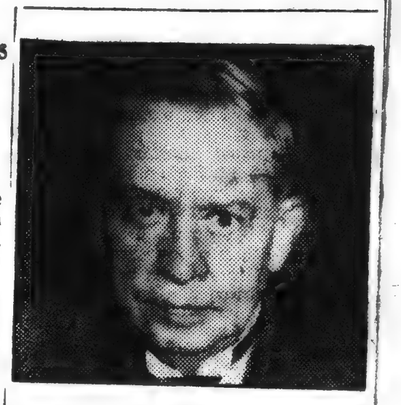
At this point, composer Roy Harris dashed in with the enormous conductor's score of "American Creed" tucked under his arm. Mr. Harris looked very midwestern and folksy, like someone you'd see at a Chamber of Commerce luncheon. He is, to coin a phrase, a swell guy.

Composer and conductor posed for the photographers looking over the score. When it was over, Mr. Harris departed with a remark, grinning: "I've got another joke for you, Dr. Stock." Dr. Stock chuckled in anticipation. Then he began talking.

Young Composers Improving

"I think American music will bulk larger and larger on concert programs." (It already bulks larger in the Chicago Symphony repertoire than in most other major orchestras.) "In the contest for American composition we have held in connection with our Golden Jubilee year, I was gratified to see how the young composers had improved so greatly in technique and orchestration.

"I think a regional musical literature is bound to come in this country. We have come away from the European tradition. Twenty-five years ago, composers studied in Europe—in every country except Russia, where it would have done them the most good. Now they study here.



FREDERICK A. STOCK

"Our composers will, in fact they are, discovering their own musical heritage. American music will one day have as definite atmosphere as 'Fingal's Cave,' for instance. It has already begun very encouragingly in that direction."

There were a few more questions. Then the ruddy-cheeked, stocky Dr. Stock, that grand old man who gave Chicago its musical life, stood up, shook hands all around and bustled down to the stage for a rehearsal of the orchestra he has conducted since 1905. He did not look his 68 years because Dr. Stock is a young man in heart. Music keeps him that way.

The night before, in Pittsburgh, they had called him back to the stage again and again. "Like the 'pops' concert back home," he chuckled, obviously touched by it, just the same. "They wouldn't go home. I had to do as I do in Chicago, say to them, let's go home or go to a night club."

Frederick Stock, the dean of American conductors, is a beloved man at home and abroad. Any bouquets thrown to him on the tour, which ends today in Boston, are well deserved. He has given his life to music in America and to American music. The debt can never be repaid.

J. T.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Chicago Orchestra

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock conductor, gave an interesting and enjoyable concert at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Mr. Stock and his players, who last visited us 19 years ago, had a very warm reception from a capacity audience. The concert was one of a tour which the Chicago Symphony is making in observance of the 50th anniversary of its founding, and benefited the British War Relief Society, Inc. There was an imposing list of patrons.

A link with the early days of the orchestra was the presence yesterday of Charles Norman Fay, now living in Cambridge, who in 1891 was the leading spirit in founding the Chicago Orchestral Association.

Mr. Stock conducted a program of familiar numbers, apart from the new Symphony by the Chicago composer, John Alden Carpenter, which was heard for the first time in Boston. The afternoon began with Weber's Overture to "Euryanthe," included the Third Symphony of Brahms, and ended with two excerpts from Wagner's "Nibelungen Ring," "Forest Murmurs" from "Siegfried," and "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" out of "The Dusk of the Gods."

Hearing different orchestras on one's home ground is always a rewarding experience. After listening to the well-disciplined Chicago organization, one could only regret that they do not come here oftener.

Mr. Stock has built up a balanced, and responsive orchestra. They play cleanly, with a firm, transparent tone. The strings are founded upon a solid bass section; cellos, violas and violins are light, clear and soft where the Bostonian strings are intense and rich.

Any orchestra is the image of its conductor. The personality of Mr. Stock is reflected in the tone he obtains just as it is in the balance of sections in tutti passages, and the prevailing simplicity with which they play. Mr. Stock as interpreter is of the elder school of conductors whose aim is impersonal recreation of the music at hand.

Brahms' F Major Symphony was, accordingly, done in a forthright, unadorned manner. Mr. Stock's tempi were inclined to be slower than Bostonians are accustomed to, though when he chose to hasten the pace, his direct beat was commensurately faster.

Weber's Overture was spiritedly done, as were the Wagnerian excerpts. Mr. Carpenter's new Symphony, dedicated to Mr. Stock and the Chicago Orchestra and composed for the Golden Jubilee, received a clear, revealing performance. Based upon a theme which Mr. Carpenter had used in an earlier score, the Symphony runs in four compact movements that are heard without pause. The Symphony is less complex than one would expect from Mr. Carpenter. It is inclined to gayety, particularly in the matter of instrumental color, which made on think of Respighi as well as the modern French manner. Mr. Carpenter was cordially applauded as he bowed from the stage.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST
NOV 2 4 1940

Humanizing of Music Most Promising Sign In Arts at Present

Even Boston's Koussevitzky Seems to Have Caught Feeling That Great Public Is 'In' on Symphony

By HUBERT ROUSSEL

WHILE war seeks to de-humanize the population of Europe, thus making America the custodian of most of the world's art, it seems that occult and providential developments are conspiring to humanize music in this country as never before. Here is something for those who want to see good working from evil. I don't know whether the war is responsible for this burgeoning of a new spirit in music in the United States, or whether it was just naturally due this year as an evolution in our own cultural history. Whatever the case, it seems to me one of the most significant changes in the status of a great art that any of us now living have witnessed.

ROUSSEL

Some fresh and remarkable evidence was delivered a few minutes ago in a series of news pictures from Boston. Breaking a 60-year tradition of the Boston Symphony orchestra and his own 17-year personal ban, Conductor Serge Koussevitzky gave a special concert the other evening for the Associated Press, at which photographers were permitted the unprecedented privilege of shooting pictures of the doctor and his ensemble in action. That wasn't all, however. When the concert ended, instead of bowing and walking quickly from the stage as usual, Dr. Koussevitzky, a musical martinet, astonished listeners and players by calmly plopping down on the podium, folding his arms and looking out with a grin, half mocking, half cherubic, as though to ask this startled assembly: "Well, boys, what do you think of our racket?"

✦✦✦

Heresy Based on Common Sense

YOU would need to have spent a little time around Boston to realize what a mountain of formality fell with that hardly spectacular gesture. If there were ladies present who had grown old in the polite frigidity of Symphony Hall, it is possible a few faintings occurred. But if the plaster cracked or the spirit of Henry Lee Higginson rushed in with flaming sword to avenge a sacrilege in the institution he founded, the Associated Press failed to report it.

This naturally doesn't mean that after every concert in the future Koussevitzky will repeat his comedy drop and perhaps pass a wisecrack to the audience. I think it does mean that as a great and wise student and leader of music, he has sensed the breaking down of those bars that once made symphony concerts an exclusive and somewhat stuffy amusement. This may have been Koussevitzky's way of acknowledging that he recognizes everybody is now in.

There can be no doubt that great masses of the public have discovered lately that music is intended to be fun and not something you take in the manner of spinach or a periodical dental examination for the good of your system. You feel this all over the country. The audience grows, is oblivious to conventions erected without proper regard for common sense and comfort, and insists upon having a very good time indeed. This new and relaxed spirit is transmitted to the stage and is felt there in a more flexible attitude on the part of performers.

✦✦✦

BOSTON HERALD, MONDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1

Hails Chicago Sy

MUSIC

Chicago Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra, Frederick Stock, conductor, gave a concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The British War Relief Society sponsored it; the program was as follows:

Weber.....Overture to "Euryanthe"
Brahms.....Symphony No. 3 in F major Op. 90
Carpenter.....Symphony, in one movement
Wagner.....Voices of the Forest from "Siegfried"
Wagner...Siegfried's Rhine Journey from "Goetterdaemmerung"

The Chicago Symphony Orchestra's eastern tour, which ended yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall, was designed both to celebrate the 50th anniversary of the orchestra and to give its veteran conductor, Frederick Stock, a personal tribute. The orchestra has not been here since 1921, which is too long a time considering how the Boston Symphony has been welcomed in Chicago. It is now a matter of news that the tour has been a resounding success, and the pleasant duty of criticism is simply to say that this has been richly deserved.

Praise in its own home from its loyal supporters is doubtless sweet to the Chicago Symphony, but there comes a time when it is only human to wish to hear those praises from other lips and preferably in places where there already exist orchestras of equal reputation. New York, Philadelphia and Boston are, then, the obvious cities for such an organization to visit, and it has been in these that the Chicago Symphony has reaped its expected reward.

In recent years here we have heard the archestras, of New York, both the Philharmonic and the NBC, of Philadelphia, Cleveland and Washington. The Chicago Symphony is fully entitled to rank with the best of these. In fact yesterday's was the best all-round concert by a visiting orchestra since the last time that the Philharmonic came here under Toscanini.

The fact that it is a first class orchestra and maintains a high standard of repertoire and performance is due to Mr. Stock. He has conducted it for the past 35 years and therefore properly comes in for the largest share of the praise. He is a thorough musician, unassuming and yet able to get just what he want from his men. The tone and bal ance of the orchestra are admirable and for these, too, he is ultimatel responsible. Small wonder, then that he was cordially received yes terday.

Of all the performances the mos completely satisfying was the second Wagner item. It breathed the essence of the "Ring" music. The Brahms 3d Symphony was also convincingly played, with solidity and a certain majestic emphasis. Yet the tone was not too heavy. The opening performance of the Weber overture likewise caught the spirit of the music.

The only unfamiliar music on the program was John Alden Carpenter's Symphony, which was composed for the anniversary of the Chicago Symphony. Mr. Carpenter is a native of Chicago and a summer resident of Massachusetts, so that it was appropriate that his new work should have had the honor of being on yesterday's program. He was in the audience and came forward to acknowledge the applause.

The new symphony is concise, as its one-movement form would lead one to suppose. The melodic invention is its chief distinction and is charming. The music is also effective, that is to say that it is never boring. In many ways it is one of the best things he has written. But he is up to his old bad tricks in the conclusion, which is both pointless and rather cheap. You would think that even in California, where he wrote it, he would have had enough self-criticism to alter that ending and the ill-timed intrusion of the vibraphone. At least when he got back to Chicago he should have come to his senses and seen how it spoils a good work.

The Chicago Symphony and Mr. Stock now return to their own city, and they can rest assured that they carry with them the best wishes of Boston.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT

DEFAUW TO LEAD SYMPHONY:

Belgian Conductor

Desire Defauw, Back From Montreal, Chats About Music

By EDWARD DOWNES

"WHAT we like about you, is that you make us so nervous." This was the remarkable tribute paid after a concert to Desire Defauw by a member of the orchestra he had been conducting. There are orchestras which make conductors nervous. And there are conductors who make orchestras nervous. The kind of nervousness the player meant was the intense alertness, the powerful tension and concentration which must take possession of an orchestral musician for him to give his best in performance. Without that nervousness any interpretation lacks edge and sharp emotional impact. With it an orchestra can be surprised into feats, technical and artistic, which no one, least of all the men themselves, believed them capable of performing.

But having made his instrumentalists sufficiently nervous, a conductor must also be able to give them confidence in themselves. Holding the fine balance between this nervousness and confidence is, Mr. Defauw believes, one of the most important arts of the orchestral leader. Mr. Defauw, who is to conduct the Boston Symphony the coming Friday and Saturday in a program listed elsewhere on this page, returned to Boston this week from Montreal where he has just conducted three concerts of the famous Concerts Symphoniques de Montreal. There he had the experience, according to local critics, of doing the kind of surprising of which we speak above. Of a concert which included the first performance in Montreal of Stravinsky's "Oiseau de Feu," Marcel Valois writes: "He let us hear such horns, trombones and trumpets as we did not know we possessed. There was not a man among the instrumentalists yesterday, who was not equal to the pages, extremely difficult technically and interpretatively, which he had before him."

Enthusiasm for B. S. O.

It is safe to say there will be rather less surprising to be done with the Boston Symphony, which is already at a peak of development unsurpassed here or abroad. Mr. Defauw appears to share the exalted opinion most of his confreres have of our orchestra. On his way to Montreal some weeks ago he had an opportunity to hear the Boston Symphony rehearsing under Koussevitzky and he found it a dazzling experience. So enthusiastic was he over the rehearsal of the Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovitch, that he is making a special trip to New York this week-end to hear Koussevitzky perform it there.

Mr. Defauw's enthusiasm is contagious, almost Latin-seeming. But his blood is not French. It is Flemish—Flemish of the race which has produced many of the world's greatest musicians from Orlando Lasso to Cesar Franck, and more than its share of the greatest painters. His home is Brussels where, until the outbreak of the war he was something like a musical dictator—a benevelent one, to be sure. He led the Conservatory Concerts, was director of the radio, and conductor of the Orchestre Nationale de Belgique, whose concerts were named after him, the Concerts Defauw.

He began his musical studies early and upon graduating from the Conservatory at the age of 14 with a first prize in violin, he nearly made his first visit to America. It happened that an American impresario was in the auditorium when the young Defauw took his examination, and was so impressed that he offered the astonished parents 35,000 francs for an American tour by their son. That was a small fortune. Mr. Defauw, senior, wisely refused it.

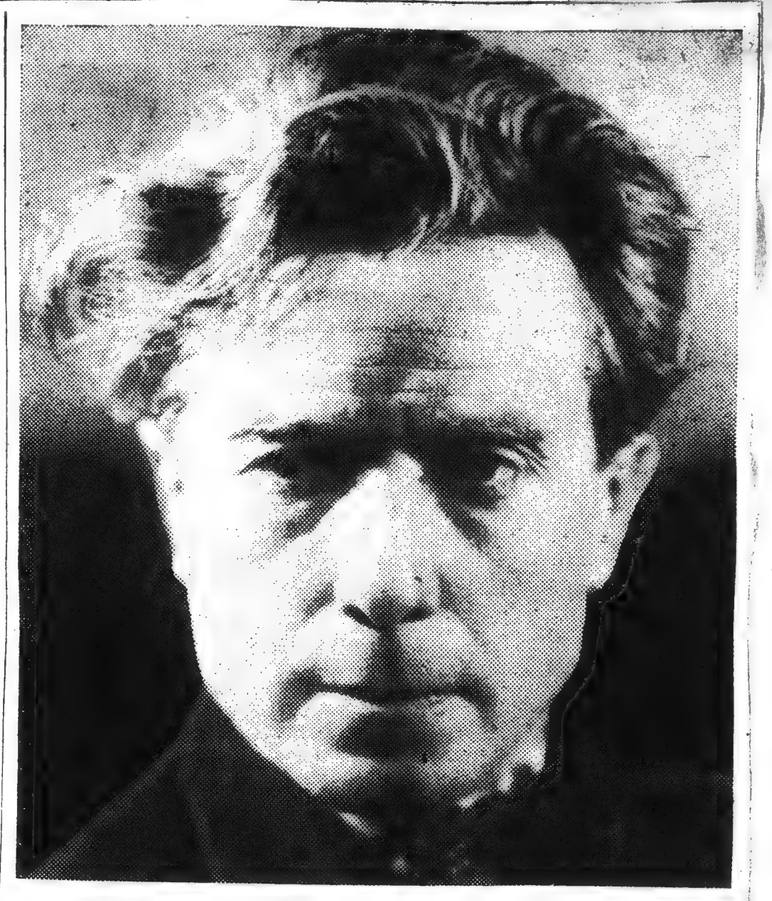
His judgment was borne out. Before the age of 30 his son was regular conductor of the Symphonic Orchestra of London. In 1925 his career as a conductor in his homeland began with the Brussels Conservatory Orchestra.

And the War

After a series of hair-raising adventures on land and on sea, Defauw escaped before the German attack from Brussels to London. In England he conducted while the air war was in progress, but now he and his family are here for the duration. Perhaps for longer. He has taken out his first papers.

In this country he is enormously impressed by the great upward surge in musical activity, by the importance of young people's interest in music and the infinite possibilities for development which still exist. He has already been invited to conduct the entire season of Montreal's Concerts Symphoniques next year, but because of existing engagements in this country will be unable to conduct more than seven or ten concerts in Canada.

While he was at Montreal, Mr. Defauw received one of the fantastic sort of letters you hear of occasionally. It came from a friend in France, who did not know his exact whereabouts, and was addressed: "Desire Defauw, U. S. A." It arrived, via New York with only two days' delay.



Desire Defauw, who conducts the Boston Symphony next week. He has programmed work of Gretry, Franck, Falla and Beethoven

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
NOV 25 1940

Shostakovitch Symphony Given by Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzky Rings the Bell.

Surpassingly brilliant performances characterized Saturday afternoon's concert of the Boston Symphony in Carnegie Hall. So settled is the place occupied by Haydn's G major symphony (No. 7 of the Paris series) and Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture, No. 3, that the virtuosity lavished upon these works was something to rejoice the audience rather than to alter any musical perspectives. But with Shostakovitch's fifth ysmphony there was perhaps reason to be on one's guard, since the splendor of the playing was such as to invest the work with an excitement that Shostakovitch's fifth symphony have not served to justify on the basis of its musical quality. Much of it is circussy and banal. The rather tawdry scherzo is by no means the only place where the brass band goes to town. There are some long-drawn themes that can be viewed as possessing a measure of rather chilly beauty, but one can scarcely credit the symphony as a whole with significant basic material. Technic there is, in abundance, and a Mahleresque eye to effect. The orchestral sound is often stirring, and climaxes are plentiful. But what it is that this symphony has to communicate to human kind, and where the heart in it is to be found, this reviewer frankly is unable to say. O. T.

England Carries On

Myra Hess Says B. S. O. Gift Has Saved National Gallery Concerts—Music Publishing Continues

The many friends and admirers of Myra Hess here in Boston who have wondered where she is and what she is doing are having the opportunity in this column to share the news which her friend and New England manager, Mrs. Anita Davis-Chase receives from her at surprisingly regular intervals. Mrs. Chase feels that she would like to share parts of recent letters with Myra Hess's Boston admirers. The following was written from London on October 25th:

"My darling Anita, never having time to write to you gets on my nerves much more than this Blitzkrieg!! I cannot catch up with myself these days with all the work and driving hither and thither, and endless correspondence to deal with and still five concerts a week to organize for The National Gallery. I thank Heaven every day though that I have so much to do for if one had time to think, one's heart would break. It is strange and sometimes impossible to sit down and practice in the middle of all this but if we music-makers and music-lovers in a small community can sustain a thread of sanity we can still show the way to indestructible truth and beauty. When each day dawns one is thankful to be well, to hear that one's best beloved is safe and sound. We are all certain of the ultimate victory. Only through such fire shall we know how to build a new world of cleanliness and a new order of things human.

"I have so much to tell you but it must all wait and because I cannot write you a real letter yet, I am sending you some account of what we are doing. The gift from the Allied Relief Fund from Dr. Koussevitzky's Festival at Stockbridge, came straight from Heaven and has relieved me from financial worries at the National Gallery for the moment. I could not believe my eyes when I read the letter. Funds will be distributed to several societies who look after musicians in need, but still there will be enough to keep us going for the present.

"I am afraid you did not hear me when I spoke to you and played my little piece. I shall try to let you know when I broadcast again. I think of you constantly. . . . Your devoted Myra."

The following enclosure is from the London Times:

"Miss Myra Hess can boast that she has been able to provide London with its daily bread of music throughout one year of war. The National Gallery Concerts were begun on Oct. 10, 1939, and celebrated their anniversary yesterday, for which the basement room of The National Gallery was crowded to the doors.

"The audience had had its music and Sir Hugh Walpole had offered thanks to Miss Hess and to all concerned when Miss Hess stood up to say something which proved to be more than a graceful conclusion of the ceremonies.

"'The banishment to the shelter in the basement has caused great financial anxieties. The days when thousands of pounds could be turned over for the Musicians Benevolent Fund came to an end with that necessary banishment. Friends have made voluntary contributions in order to carry on the only series of concerts which London now possesses but still anxieties remain. But,' said Miss Hess, 'I have had a birthday present from America.' She could not say the exact amount but she could say that 'it secures the continuance of the concerts through the winter. Dr. Koussevitzky and The Boston Symphony Orchestra who have recently held a successful festival of music, are the benefactors.'"

"As she made this reassuring announcement, the sirens sounded 'all clear.'"

—

The English are not allowing the war to put an end to their artistic and intellectual life. Word reaches us of concerts still being held regularly and new books still coming from the presses of the famous London publishing houses. W. Heffer & Sons, Ltd., of Cambridge have under way a venture rather perilous in the most peaceful of times. They have launched a new quarterly of musical interest with Geoffrey Sharp as editor and have called it "The Music Review."

So far only the first issue has reached us. Volume I number 1 was published in February. It contains seven articles on subjects ranging in time from Mozart to Bloch and in space from four to 24 pages. Significantly enough, three of the contributors are refugees from Nazi Germany. Germany's loss is the gain of the civilized world.

Egon Wellesz offers a style-critical analysis of Mahler's symphonies. Cecil Gray discusses the life, works and significance of Pietro Raimondi (1786-1853). Otto Erich Deutsch writes a well-documented factual account of the history of Franz Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony." Paul Hirsch contributes descriptions of seven early Mozart editions not in the Koechel-Einstein catalog. W. J. Turner writes on "Artistic Direction." The editor analyzes Bloch's Violin Concerto.

Among the interesting announcements for later issues are "Fingering the Recorder" by Adam Carse and "Four Hands, One Piano" by Alec Rowley (May); "The First Editions of Brahms" by Otto Erich Deutsch (May-August); "The Technique of Strict Counterpoint" by Edward J. Dent (August) and "The Symphonies of Johann Stamitz" by Peter Gradenwitz and last but by no means least Alfred Einstein's sixty page supplement to his third edition of the Koechel catalog of the works of Mozart (November).

The publishers caution those who wish to subscribe that, "Owing to the need for economy in the use of paper, the number of copies available will be strictly limited. Orders will be accepted in rotation, and early application is advised." The price of an annual subscription is sixteen shilling, post free.

The full page advertisement of the London publishers Boosey & Hawkes, Ltd., seems to be a typical example of the state of mind of those in the music business in England today. "'Nothing to report?'—On the contrary. We are glad to announce that, in spite of war conditions, our publications schedule for 1940 is lengthy and varied and includes a number of works by composers whose names are known throughout the world of music." This, surely, does not come from a country in ruins. L. B.

LITCHFIELD, CONN
ENQUIRER
11/28/40

AMUSEMENTS

Hartford

The stage of the Bushnell Memorial has been given over virtually for the entire week to the new musical comedy, "Hi Ya, Gentlemen", which will have its world premiere there Friday evening, with additional performances on Saturday afternoon and evening. The presentation, to open later at the Alvin Theatre in New York City, has a fine cast headed by former heavyweight boxing champion, Max Baer, Audrey Christine, Sid Silvers, Ella Logan, Erik Rhodes and Christina Lind.

Next Sunday afternoon lovely Jeanette MacDonald, singing star of the stage and screen, will give a recital for the benefit of the Hartford Junior College. Miss MacDonald was very popular on her concert tour last season and seems destined to continue her record this year.

H. G. Wells, world famous English writer, will give a lecture, "Two Hemispheres or One World — The Immediate Future of Mankind", at the Bushnell next Monday evening, at eight-thirty, for the benefit of medical aid to China.

Dr. Hans Kindler will conduct the National Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell next Tuesday afternoon in the second event of the current Bushnell Symphony Series. The series was brilliantly opened on November 19th by the Boston Symphony under Serge Koussevitzky.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WOONSOCKET, R. I.
CALL
NOV 30 1940

Music Lovers' Treat In Store

Two Artists To Give Program Thursday For Beethoven Club

Music lovers may well look forward to a pleasant evening's entertainment at the guest-artist concert, which the Beethoven club, local music organization, will sponsor at the Hotel Blackstone's ballroom Thursday evening. Two artists of merit and high reputation will present a joint musicale under the club's auspices.

They are Cleora Wood, soprano opera singer and concert artist, and Jean Bedetti, well known solo 'cellist with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

Miss Wood, not content with the restricted life of an opera singer, gained a wide musical background in Germany and Italy where she concentrated on study of the music of those countries. Professional engagements followed in Holland, Belgium and England, where she added fresh laurels as a recitalist and guest artist with leading symphony orchestras. A call to return to America came to Miss Wood almost two years ago and her first appearance was in Boston with the Zighera chamber orchestra.

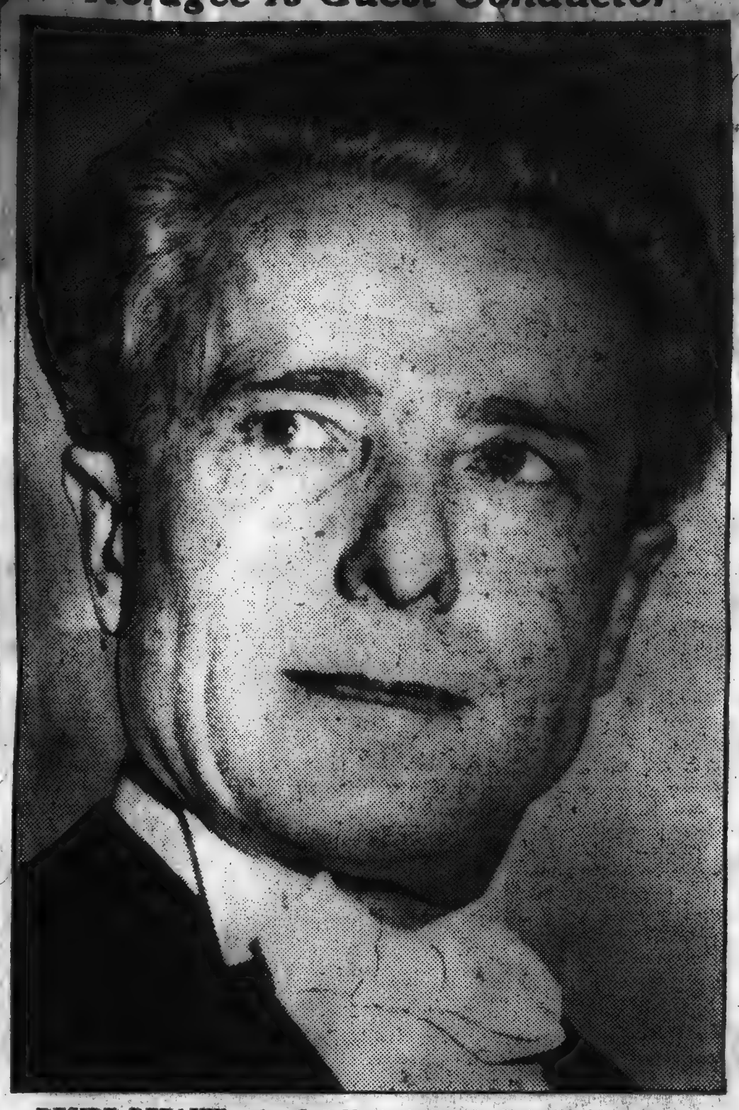
She captivated her audience and an engagement with the Boston Symphony orchestra under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky followed. A brilliant future is predicted for the young singer.

Bedetti is a native of France. He won the first prize at the Paris conservatoire when he graduated with highest honors. He came to this country in 1919 to occupy the post of first 'cellist with the Boston orchestra and has remained with that organization ever since. He is acknowledged to be a leading exponent of the instrument.

Adults and student tickets for the concert may be obtained by contacting Mrs. Horace St. Amant or any member of the Beethoven club.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 27 1940

Refugee Is Guest Conductor



DESIRE DEFAUW, who fled Nazi victory in Belgium, is photographed at the Metropolitan Theatre, where he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

MUSIC

Desire Defauw Conducts Boston Symphony at Concert Here

By G. Y. Loveridge

The ill wind of Naziism blew Desire Defauw out of Belgium, across the Atlantic, and, last night into the Metropolitan Theatre here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The adage still stands.

Mr. Defauw is about the size of a hand-grenade, but much more forceful. As he walked out onto the stage, one could scarcely see him above the seated musicians. One trembled for him, as one might tremble for a boy entering a cage of lions. Could this small person drive a hundred artists through the fiery hoop of Beethoven? He could. He did.

Mr. Defauw's authority spoke in every gesture and from every measure. He used no score, and did not even bother to leave the podium for a rest until intermission. Most of the time he stood erect and with heels together in military fashion, exercising an expressive and relentless beat, bringing in the individuals and the choirs infallibly, sometimes tossing his abundant grayish hair or emphasizing the meter with his foot, or perhaps standing almost without motion, except for a faint, sufficient nodding of the head. His left hand threatened or caressed the fiddles, quivered above his head for a drum-roll; the right hand motioned everybody to get into it, to give it power.

The program, after the opening "Le Chasseur Maudit," by Franck, was dance music of one sort or another, and Mr. Defauw seemed particularly happy with it. To the tone poem, which describes a Count who went hunting on the Sabbath and sounded his horn above the religious music and was eternally damned for it, Mr. Defauw gave a clear and energetic reading, to which the audience reacted with spontaneity.

Three dances from the ballet "Cephale et Procris," by the 18th century composer Gretry, were next, in an arrangement by Felix Mottl. The music has considerable charm, which was fully displayed by Mr. Defauw's sympathetic and polished directing and the orchestra's magnificent playing. "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller" and the "Final Dance," from de Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat," followed. It was so splendid a performance that one could not help wishing, like a youngster with a pint of ice cream gluttonously wishing for a quart, that Massine and the rest of them had been there too. What a marvel of sound and spectacle that would have been!

After intermission, Mr. Defauw lifted Beethoven's seventh symphony from the dust of at least local obscurity and demonstrated what mighty rhythmic surge and melodic beauty animates and clothes it. It was toward this, without question, that Mr. Defauw had been aiming all evening, and he spared neither the orchestra nor himself. At times a clean blade of sound leaped from the instruments, and again like a stream viewed distantly, some single voice of flute or clarinet meandered through a landscape of shadowy tone.

The rhythm never faltered. In the home stretch, Mr. Defauw drove the music like a jockey on a thoroughbred, and there was comparable excitement. The audience gave the conductor the ovation he had so well earned.

Among the interesting lesser features of the performance was the breaking of the top string on the string bass played by the leader of the section. He finished the game on three strings, which is a difficult trick.

Also the program contained a sort of threatening letter from the Bureau of Police and Fire, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Providence Community Concert Association, on the subject of smoking elsewhere than as provided by law. The letter was printed in red ink, and it appeared to have some effect.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 26 1940

Musician's Bomb Scare Dissolves After Ducking

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP)—Fearing that a small package he found in his hallway might be a bomb, Ernest Panenka, musician in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took it to a police station.

Lieutenant Leo C. J. Masuret dumped it in a bucket of water and then opened it. He and his colleagues ate the contents. It was a pint of watery ice cream.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 27 1940

Music

Desire Defauw, Belgian Refugee, Gives Dynamic Interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh as Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Metropolitan Theatre Concert.

By G. Y. Loveridge

The ill wind of Naziism blew Desire Defauw out of Belgium, across the Atlantic, and, last night into the Metropolitan Theatre here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The adage still stands.

Mr. Defauw is about the size of a hand-grenade, but much more forceful. As he walked out onto the stage, one could scarcely see him above the seated musicians. One trembled for him, as one might tremble for a boy entering a cage of lions. Could this small person drive a hundred artists through the fiery hoop of Beethoven? He could. He did.

Mr. Defauw's authority spoke in every gesture and from every measure. He used no score, and did not even bother to leave the podium for a rest until intermission. Most of the time he stood erect and with heels together in military fashion, exercising an expressive and relentless beat, bringing in the individuals and the choirs infallibly, sometimes tossing his abundant grayish hair or emphasizing the meter with his foot, or perhaps standing almost without motion, except for a faint, sufficient nodding of the head. His left hand threatened or caressed the fiddles, quivered above his head for a drum-roll; the right hand motioned everybody to get into it, to give it power.

The program, after the opening "Le Chasseur Maudit," by Franck, was dance music of one sort or another, and Mr. Defauw seemed particularly happy with it. To the tone poem, which describes a Count who went hunting on the Sabbath and sounded his horn above the religious music and was eternally damned for it, Mr. Defauw gave a clear and energetic reading, to which the audience reacted with spontaneity.

Three dances from the ballet "Cephale et Procris," by the 18th century composer Gretry, were next, in an arrangement by Felix Mottl. The music has considerable charm, which was fully displayed by Mr. Defauw's sympathetic and polished directing and the orchestra's magnificent playing. "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller" and the "Final Dance," from de Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat," followed. It was so splendid a performance that one could not help wishing, like a youngster with a pint of ice cream gluttonously wishing for a quart, that Massine and the rest of them had been there too. What a marvel of sound and spectacle that would have been!

After intermission, Mr. Defauw lifted Beethoven's seventh symphony from the dust of at least local obscurity and demonstrated what mighty rhythmic surge and melodic beauty animates and clothes it. It was toward this, without question, that Mr. Defauw had been aiming all evening, and he spared neither the orchestra nor himself. At times a clean blade of sound leaped from the instruments, and again like a stream viewed distantly, some single voice of flute or clarinet meandered through a landscape of shadowy tone.

The rhythm never faltered. In the home stretch, Mr. Defauw drove the music like a jockey on a thoroughbred, and there was comparable excitement. The audience gave the conductor the ovation he had so well earned.

Among the interesting lesser features of the performance was the breaking of the top string on the string bass played by the leader of the section. He finished the game on three strings, which is a difficult trick.

Also the program contained a sort of threatening letter from the Bureau of Police and Fire, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Providence Community Concert Association, on the subject of smoking elsewhere than as provided by law. The letter was printed in red ink, and it appeared to have some effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RIDGEFIELD PARK, N.J
BULLETIN
11/29/40

MUSIC MUSINGS

By Frederic C. Weidling

The feeling of "discovery" may be experienced in Newark on Monday evening, December 2, when Dorothy Maynor, new Negro soprano whose New York debut last year caused a sensation in the music world, makes her first appearance at the Mosque Theater under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation for the benefit of the New Jersey Urban League.

A little over a year ago in the summer of 1939 the great singer was first discovered by Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Festival. Miss Maynor had gone to the festival to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two enthusiastic people persuaded the conductor to grant her an audition. Serge Koussevitzky heard the singer and musical history was made. A brilliant New York debut followed a few months later in which critics gave the verdict "One of the outstanding voices of the day."

39

DEFAUW LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Belgian Conductor Creates Fine Impression

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With due apologies to those who deplore alliteration, Desire Defauw, who conducted yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, as he will that of this evening, may be described as diminutive and dynamic. Or, if you prefer, little but oh, my!

The Belgian leader, who came here last summer after a hairbreadth escape from Europe, made last Tuesday evening, when he conducted the Symphony Orchestra in Providence, his first concert appearance in this country, though his American debut was really made a year ago, as conductor of the orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company. A substantial reputation preceded him.

Patriotically-minded, Mr. Defauw began the afternoon with works by two Belgians (who are generally thought of as French), Franck and Gretry. The former was represented by his tone poem, "The Mad Huntsman," the latter by the delightful Suite which Felix Mottl has arranged from the ballet, "Cephalus and Procris." Curiously enough, both pieces were last heard in Symphony Hall in 1922. The familiar dances from Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" completed the first part of the programme and the still more familiar Seventh Symphony of Beethoven followed the intermission.

Save for the music of Franck, pleasantly or excitingly pictorial in the manner of so many 19th century programmatic works, Mr. Defauw's chosen pieces tended toward the terpsichorean; for did not Wagner dub the Seventh Symphony "the apotheosis of the dance?" Therefore, what he might do in music calling for a display of sentiment, or for depth of feeling was not disclosed yesterday. A second programme might come nearer giving us his full measure as conductor. But we are not to hear him again, at least this season.

On the basis of yesterday's concert, then, it may be set down that Mr. Defauw is an admirable director of music that makes no great emotional demands but which calls rather for a fine rhythmic sense, for the deft turning of a phrase and for a nice disposition of orchestral sonorities. His severest test came, of course, in Beethoven's Symphony, and he met it with entire success. Though he tended to play the Symphony for all it is worth, particularly in the finale, he nevertheless did not at any time overstep the bounds of good taste. His reception by the audience was cordial to a degree.

For the benefit of those interested in such details, it must be added that Mr. Defauw conducted from memory, though he did not dispense with the baton. At times, however, especially in the Beethoven Symphony his signs to the orchestra were almost nil. At other times he conducted with a vigorous, sweeping stroke of the stick.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, O.
POST
NOV 27 1940

Paul Kennedy

Battle of Music Goes on As Little Giant Wins 1st Round

THE PUBLIC isn't entirely aware of it but as matters stand just now one man has the power to knock existing broadcasting schedules sky high and put the lights out on every musical concert. That powerful gent is James Petrillo, president of American Federation of Musicians.

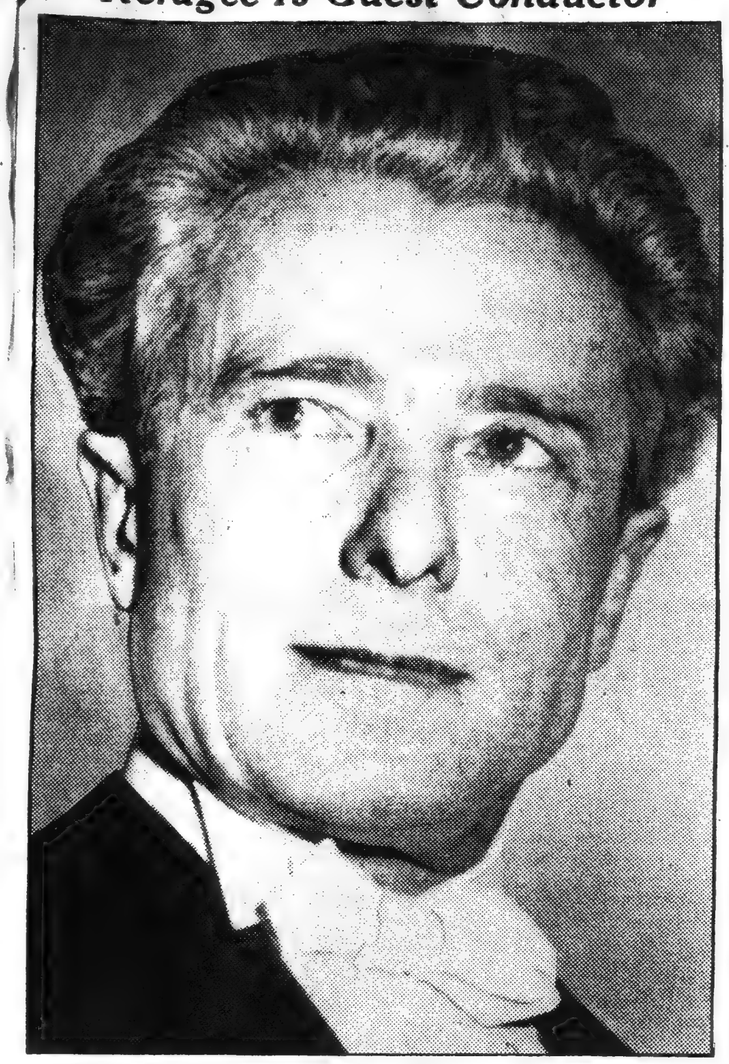
* * *

As it invariably is in such matters, this one is highly complicated, but here's an idea of how it goes: Concert artists generally belong to an organization known as AGMA (American Guild of Musical Artists). They are headed in this by Lawrence Tibbett and these include such notables as Zimbalis, Jaifetz, Lily Pons, John Charles Thomas, Kreisler and mobs of others. Petrillo recently ordered that these musical celebrities belong to his union and passed tentative orders that union musicians couldn't perform with AGMA members unless said members had joined AFM. AGMA sought an injunction to stop this action and the injunction was ruled out last week. That means that at this writing Petrillo could, if he wished, put the kibosh on practically every concert in the country simply by ordering the accompanying musicians to withdraw. All symphonies in the country with the exception of Boston, are solidly unionized.

L. Tibbett

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
NOV 27 1940

Refugee Is Guest Conductor



DESIRE DEFAUW, who fled Nazi victory in Belgium, is photographed at the Metropolitan Theatre, where he led the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night.

MUSIC

Desire Defauw Conducts Boston Symphony at Concert Here

By G. Y. Loveridge

The ill wind of Naziism blew Desire Defauw out of Belgium, across the Atlantic, and, last night into the Metropolitan Theatre here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The adage still stands.

Mr. Defauw is about the size of a hand-grenade, but much more forceful. As he walked out onto the stage, one could scarcely see him above the seated musicians. One trembled for him, as one might tremble for a boy entering a cage of lions. Could this small person drive a hundred artists through the fiery hoop of Beethoven? He could. He did.

Mr. Defauw's authority spoke in every gesture and from every measure. He used no score, and did not even bother to leave the podium for a rest until intermission. Most of the time he stood erect and with heels together in military fashion, exercising an expressive and relentless beat, bringing in the individuals and the choirs infallibly, sometimes tossing his abundant grayish hair or emphasizing the meter with his foot, or perhaps standing almost without motion, except for a faint, sufficient nodding of the head. His left hand threatened or caressed the fiddles, quivered above his head for a drum-roll; the right hand motioned everybody to get into it, to give it power.

The program, after the opening "Le Chasseur Maudit," by Franck, was dance music of one sort or another, and Mr. Defauw seemed particularly happy with it. To the tone poem, which describes a Count who went hunting on the Sabbath and sounded his horn above the religious music and was eternally damned for it, Mr. Defauw gave a clear and energetic reading, to which the audience reacted with spontaneity.

Three dances from the ballet "Cephale et Procris," by the 18th century composer Gretry, were next, in an arrangement by Felix Mottl. The music has considerable charm, which was fully displayed by Mr. Defauw's sympathetic and polished directing and the orchestra's magnificent playing. "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller" and the "Final Dance," from de Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat," followed. It was so splendid a performance that one could not help wishing, like a youngster with a pint of ice cream gluttonously wishing for a quart, that Massine and the rest of them had been there too. What a marvel of sound and spectacle that would have been!

After intermission, Mr. Defauw lifted Beethoven's seventh symphony from the dust of at least local obscurity and demonstrated what mighty rhythmic surge and melodic beauty animates and clothes it. It was toward this, without question, that Mr. Defauw had been aiming all evening, and he spared neither the orchestra nor himself. At times a clean blade of sound leaped from the instruments, and again like a stream viewed distantly, some single voice of flute or clarinet meandered through a landscape of shadowy tone.

The rhythm never faltered. In the home stretch, Mr. Defauw drove the music like a jockey on a thoroughbred, and there was comparable excitement. The audience gave the conductor the ovation he had so well earned.

Among the interesting lesser features of the performance was the breaking of the top string on the string bass played by the leader of the section. He finished the game on three strings, which is a difficult trick.

Also the program contained a sort of threatening letter from the Bureau of Police and Fire, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Providence Community Concert Association, on the subject of smoking elsewhere than as provided by law. The letter was printed in red ink, and it appeared to have some effect.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
NOV 26 1940

Musician's Bomb Scare Dissolves After Ducking

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP)—Fearing that a small package he found in his hallway might be a bomb, Ernest Panenka, musician in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took it to a police station.

Lieutenant Leo C. J. Masuret dumped it in a bucket of water and then opened it. He and his colleagues ate the contents. It was a pint of watery ice cream.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
NOV 27 1940

Music

Desire Defauw, Belgian Refugee, Gives Dynamic Interpretation of Beethoven's Seventh as Guest Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra at Metropolitan Theatre Concert.

By G. Y. Loveridge

The ill wind of Naziism blew Desire Defauw out of Belgium, across the Atlantic, and, last night into the Metropolitan Theatre here as guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The adage still stands.

Mr. Defauw is about the size of a hand-grenade, but much more forceful. As he walked out onto the stage, one could scarcely see him above the seated musicians. One trembled for him, as one might tremble for a boy entering a cage of lions. Could this small person drive a hundred artists through the fiery hoop of Beethoven? He could. He did.

Mr. Defauw's authority spoke in every gesture and from every measure. He used no score, and did not even bother to leave the podium for a rest until intermission. Most of the time he stood erect and with heels together in military fashion, exercising an expressive and relentless beat, bringing in the individuals and the choirs infallibly, sometimes tossing his abundant grayish hair or emphasizing the meter with his foot, or perhaps standing almost without motion, except for a faint, sufficient nodding of the head. His left hand threatened or caressed the fiddles, quivered above his head for a drum-roll; the right hand motioned everybody to get into it, to give it power.

The program, after the opening "Le Chasseur Maudit," by Franck, was dance music of one sort or another, and Mr. Defauw seemed particularly happy with it. To the tone poem, which describes a Count who went hunting on the Sabbath and sounded his horn above the religious music and was eternally damned for it, Mr. Defauw gave a clear and energetic reading, to which the audience reacted with spontaneity.

Three dances from the ballet "Cephale et Procris," by the 18th century composer Gretry, were next, in an arrangement by Felix Mottl. The music has considerable charm, which was fully displayed by Mr. Defauw's sympathetic and polished directing and the orchestra's magnificent playing. "The Neighbors," the "Dance of the Miller" and the "Final Dance," from de Falla's "The Three-Cornered Hat," followed. It was so splendid a performance that one could not help wishing, like a youngster with a pint of ice cream gluttonously wishing for a quart, that Massine and the rest of them had been there too. What a marvel of sound and spectacle that would have been!

After intermission, Mr. Defauw lifted Beethoven's seventh symphony from the dust of at least local obscurity and demonstrated what mighty rhythmic surge and melodic beauty animates and clothes it. It was toward this, without question, that Mr. Defauw had been aiming all evening, and he spared neither the orchestra nor himself. At times a clean blade of sound leaped from the instruments, and again like a stream viewed distantly, some single voice of flute or clarinet meandered through a landscape of shadowy tone.

The rhythm never faltered. In the home stretch, Mr. Defauw drove the music like a jockey on a thoroughbred, and there was comparable excitement. The audience gave the conductor the ovation he had so well earned.

Among the interesting lesser features of the performance was the breaking of the top string on the string bass played by the leader of the section. He finished the game on three strings, which is a difficult trick.

Also the program contained a sort of threatening letter from the Bureau of Police and Fire, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the Providence Community Concert Association, on the subject of smoking elsewhere than as provided by law. The letter was printed in red ink, and it appeared to have some effect.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
RIDGEFIELD PARK, N.J
BULLETIN
11/29/40

a very stunning
age in their ma-

The feeling of "discovery" may be experienced in Newark on Monday evening, December 2, when Dorothy Maynor, new Negro soprano whose New York debut last year caused a sensation in the music world, makes her first appearance at the Mosque Theater under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation for the benefit of the New Jersey Urban League.

A little over a year ago in the summer of 1939 the great singer was first discovered by Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Festival. Miss Maynor had gone to the festival to listen to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Two enthusiastic people persuaded the conductor to grant her an audition. Serge Koussevitzky heard the singer and musical history was made. A brilliant New York debut followed a few months later in which critics gave the verdict "One of the outstanding voices of the day."

39

DEFAUW LEADS THE SYMPHONY

Belgian Conductor Creates Fine Impression

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With due apologies to those who deplore alliteration, Desire Defauw, who conducted yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert, as he will that of this evening, may be described as diminutive and dynamic. Or, if you prefer, little but oh, my!

The Belgian leader, who came here last summer after a hairbreadth escape from Europe, made last Tuesday evening, when he conducted the Symphony Orchestra in Providence, his first concert appearance in this country, though his American debut was really made a year ago, as conductor of the orchestra of the National Broadcasting Company. A substantial reputation preceded him.

Patriotically-minded, Mr. Defauw began the afternoon with works by two Belgians (who are generally thought of as French), Franck and Gretry. The former was represented by his tone poem, "The Mad Huntsman," the latter by the delightful Suite which Felix Mottl has arranged from the ballet, "Cephalus and Procris." Curiously enough, both pieces were last heard in Symphony Hall in 1922. The familiar dances from Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat" completed the first part of the programme and the still more familiar Seventh Symphony of Beethoven followed the intermission.

Save for the music of Franck, pleasantly or excitingly pictorial in the manner of so many 19th century programmatic works, Mr. Defauw's chosen pieces tended toward the terpsichorean: for did not Wagner dub the Seventh Symphony "the apotheosis of the dance?" Therefore, what he might do in music calling for a display of sentiment, or for depth of feeling was not disclosed yesterday. A second programme might come nearer giving us his full measure as conductor. But we are not to hear him again, at least this season.

On the basis of yesterday's concert, then, it may be set down that Mr. Defauw is an admirable director of music that makes no great emotional demands but which calls rather for a fine rhythmic sense, for the deft turning of a phrase and for a nice disposition of orchestral sonorities. His severest test came, of course, in Beethoven's Symphony, and he met it with entire success. Though he tended to play the Symphony for all it is worth, particularly in the finale, he nevertheless did not at any time overstep the bounds of good taste. His reception by the audience was cordial to a degree.

For the benefit of those interested in such details, it must be added that Mr. Defauw conducted from memory, though he did not dispense with the baton. At times, however, especially in the Beethoven Symphony his signs to the orchestra were almost nil. At other times he conducted with a vigorous, sweeping stroke of the stick.

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, O.
POST
NOV 27 1940

Paul Kennedy

Battle of Music Goes on As Little Giant Wins 1st Round

THE PUBLIC isn't entirely aware of it but as matters stand just now one man has the power to knock existing broadcasting schedules sky high and put the lights out on every musical concert. That powerful gent is James Petrillo, president of American Federation of Musicians.

* * *

As it invariably is in such matters, this one is highly complicated but here's an idea of how it goes. Concert artists generally belong to an organization known as AGMA (American Guild of Musical Artists). They are headed in this by Lawrence Tibbett and these include such notables as Zimbalis, Jaifetz, Lily Pons, John Charles Thomas, Kreisler and mobs of others. Petrillo recently ordered that these musical celebrities belong to his union and passed tentative orders that union musicians couldn't perform with AGMA members unless said members had joined AFM. AGMA sought an injunction to stop this action and the injunction was ruled out last week. That means that at this writing Petrillo could, if he wished, put the kibosh on practically every concert in the country simply by ordering the accompanying musicians to withdraw. All symphonies in the country with the exception of Boston are solidly unionized.

L. Tibbett

Nov 30 1940

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The seventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Desire Defauw was the guest conductor. The program was as follows:

"Le chasseur maudit," symphonic poem ..... Franck
Suite from "Cephale et Procris," arranged by Felix Mottl ..... Gretry
Dances from the ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos" ..... Falla
Symphony No. 7 in A major Op. 92 ..... Beethoven

The concert yesterday was a great success both from the point of view of the audience and personally for Mr. Defauw. With such a program it could hardly have been anything else, and a very much less talented musician than Mr. Defauw would have emerged with popular honors. Our Belgian guest conductor, though, is a very able and spirited director in his own right. He had the orchestra on its mettle from the very start and maintained this brilliant level throughout.

Aside from the opening number, the program does not need much discussion. Franck's symphonic poem, "Le chasseur maudit," has not been done by the Boston Symphony since 1922, the centenary of the composer's birth. It has its impressive moments—the mysterious opening and the ominous moment when the curse is pronounced, for example. But as a whole the score strikes one as a touch naive.

Sometimes, with Franck, naivete has its own particular charm as a part of the composer's lovable nature. Some of his beatitudes are instances of this quality. But nowadays, through far too many performances of the Symphony and the violin and piano sonata, we know Franck's peculiarities of style too well. Those chromatic tricks and cyclical melodies are as familiar as the poor relations of old Wardle; and in this symphonic poem we should gladly do without them. Still, it was worth hearing "Le chasseur maudit" revived as a period piece. Mr. Defauw, moreover, undoubtedly projected it with remarkable fervor.

The Gretry suite, which Felix Mottl has arranged with considerable freedom, is charming light music. If it were not so delicate in large part, it would do very well at the Pops; but the rattle of glasses and hum of conversation would assuredly kill it there. It makes no demands whatever on the audience, we have only to sit and enjoy a straightforward, finely spun performance such as yesterday's.

Falla's dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" are well known both in the concert hall and as one of the best of all the Ballet Russe's repertoire. Naturally they sound in Symphony Hall as they never do in the Opera House, for the Boston Symphony can point up the brilliance of the orchestration. They sounded exceedingly well yesterday and won an ovation for orchestra and conductor.

Beethoven's 7th Symphony was read yesterday with great intensity of feeling by Mr. Defauw. He evidently belongs firmly to the school of interpretation that regards the allegretto as a genuine slow movement. Beethoven, himself, was said to have been in two minds about the proper tempo and to have thought afterwards he should have labelled it andante. Mr. Toscanini is the only conductor we have heard who holds to the faster reading. Even if it were called andante that would indicate more pace than Mr. Defauw was willing to accord it yesterday. His reading suffered from being almost static at times, whatever it may have gained in fastidious attention to detail. The rest of the symphony sounded as it should.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky is devoting his program to Sibelius —the 6th, 7th and 2d symphonies in that order.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 25 1940

New Fifth Symphony

Saturday appears to have been a day of miracles. Another was created by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon when he interpreted the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony as it has never been heard before in this city. What he did with the Boston Symphony, what he did for the composer, what he did for the listener cannot be over-emphasized.

Such sumptuousness of tone and such clarity of playing on the part of the musicians gave Koussevitzky full power to disclose the beauty of an imposing symphony, rightfully to be classed with others dubbed "The Fifth." This critic has spoken highly of this work since its first performance here; Koussevitzky's interpretation elevated that opinion.

That it should have remained for Koussevitzky to accomplish this notable performance is not surprising. He was in his element in this music; for whether with the official Soviet approval or not, this is a Russian work and thus a natural inspiration to the conductor.

The program began with a bow to the classical foundation of the symphony; Haydn's Symphony in G, No. 88. It was followed by the famous Beethoven Leonore Overture No. 3. The Haydn fared better than the Beethoven in performances characteristically Bostonian.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Desire Defauw conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week as the first of the season's guests. His first appearance in this city yesterday afternoon was a notable success; he was not only well received at the outset by the customarily cool Friday audience, but was recalled to the Symphony Hall stage and cordially applauded after each number.

The diminutive Belgian offered no new music, but the first half of the program was novel because each of the three pieces had not been heard at Boston Symphony concerts for some time. The symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter," by Cesar Franck, and three dances from the "Cephalus and Procris" ballet by Gretry (in the edition of Felix Mottl) were last done here in 1922, and the suite of three dances from Manuel De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," in 1933. After intermission came Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a test piece from the standard repertory for any orchestra and conductor.

Mr. Defauw speedily proved himself a first-rank conductor. His work is dynamic but not theatrical or spectacular; poised, honest and musicianly. He insists upon precision but he does not secure polish of detail at the expense of life in the score. As it happened, each of yesterday's four works demands buoyant rhythm sustained in a long line through the course of the music. This requirement Mr. Defauw met splendidly.

The orchestra was very responsive to him, and one sensed that he was commanding all the time. That is a vital test of a conductor, especially with a great and long-established orchestra. The Defauw gestures are simple and few. His long baton is swung in either a very narrow beat or one so broad that only Toscanini's may be compared with it. From time to time he will rest his stick in his left hand, while with the other he shapes a phrase or indicates how loud or soft a passage is to be played. Incidentally, he conducted the entire program from memory. There was no score in front of him.

The one defect of the afternoon was the prevailing loudness of tone, and that is no doubt attributable to unfamiliarity with the exceptionally bright acoustics of Symphony Hall. One is certain such was the case, because there is nothing emotionally forced in Mr. Defauw's interpretation. The Beethoven Seventh can be as many things as there are conductors to perform it. In all four movements it was a dance as Mr. Defauw conceived it, a dance gay, grave, whirling and Dionysiac by turn, but always clear of texture and never orgiastic. Truth to tell, the orchestra did not play Beethoven so faultlessly as what preceded: the strings did not always keep sharply together, and the horns had difficulties.

"The Accursed Hunter" sounds curiously unlike Franck except for isolated turns of melody and harmony. Beyond all question it is minor Franck, yet at the same time remarkably fantastic and quite well-preserved. There is no reason we should not hear second-rate works of first-rate or even lesser composers, from time to time. An orchestral repertory cannot consist entirely of masterpieces, and we do need variety.

Gretry's dances might not be easily recognizable to their composer in the form in which Felix Mottl left them for modern orchestra. They sound pretty "big" for the 18th Century. But how chic they are! The high-flavored Spanish dances of Manuel DeFalla are in the strongest possible contrast to Gretry, making their irresistible effect by vivid colors and frequent change of rhythm and pace. Mr. Defauw triumphed with both divergent styles.

Next week the Symphony concerts will do honor to Sibelius, who reaches his 75th birthday Dec. 8. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct three Sibelius symphonies—the Sixth, the Seventh, and the Second.—C. W. D.

Désiré Defauw Boston Guest

C. S. M.

By L. A. Sloper

Désiré Defauw, the distinguished Belgian conductor, now a resident of the United States, is the guest this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has made his first appearances in American concert halls, except for one concert in Montreal.

For the seventh symphony pair of the Boston season he chose a program which opened with music of two of his countrymen, Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" and a Suite from Grétry's ballet, "Céphale et Procris" (as arranged by Felix Mottl); continued with three dances from Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos," and concluded with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Evidently Mr. Defauw has an affection for music of the dance.

The visitor established himself at once as a thorough musician and the master of his music and his forces. He is singularly free from mannerisms and exaggerated movements. Conducting without a score, in the fashion of the day, he indicates his wishes to the orchestra with an economy of gesture that proves his work has been done in rehearsal. Clearly, he obtained from the orchestra precisely what he wanted.

Of course, he had under his hand an instrument of exceptional virtuosity which can respond with amazing flexibility to the demands of a conductor who is able to win the respect of the players. It was obvious in this instance that the regard of leader and players was mutual, and the musical results were admirable and often stirring.

It was interesting to hear again Franck's symphonic poem, which has been dropped for the most part from the symphonic repertory hereabouts, presumably as being outmoded. It had not been played at these concerts for 18 years—that is, since Mr. Monteux's day. Yet if the dress seems old-fashioned, the score came to vivid life under Mr. Defauw's baton.

The conductor's talents were revealed in another facet by the Grétry music, which was performed with a sensitive feeling for the style of its period. This is another work that has lain untouched upon the library shelves since Mr. Monteux was in command at Symphony Hall. It deserved its revival, for it has an engaging rhythmic liveliness and its Minuet is of a rare nostalgic charm.

Rhythmic vitality was again in evidence as the dominating quality of Falla's brilliant dances. What a pity it is that we cannot have such an orchestra—with such a conductor—to play for our ballet seasons

The symphony proved that the conductor is familiar with and sympathetic to the broad outlines of the traditional reading. There [illegible] individual ideas in tempi: the second movement, for example, was taken at so slow a pace that it lost some of its Allegretto character, and there might be differences of opinion as to the phrasing of the woodwind in the third movement; but the first movement was given its proper proportions and the Finale went with a fine gusto.

The audience responded warmly to the dynamic musical individuality of the conductor, and the plaudits were loud and long. Mr. Defauw graciously paid tribute to the co-operation of the players by sharing the applause generously with them.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1940

Koussevitzky Leads Work by Shostakovitch

Bostonians, in Carnegie Hall Program, Present Fifth Symphony by Russian

By Jerome D. Bohm

One of the most extraordinary interpretations of music that this reviewer has been privileged to hear more than a generation of concert-going was that accorded the fifth symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky's direction, in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. One can think of no other conductor who could have brought to this score the unswerving intensity, the enkindling imagination and the unfailing aural sensitivity essential to an exhaustive account of its contents. Such tonal gorgeousness, always kept within the bounds of a sonority which the human ear can absorb with pleasurable results, has been achieved by no other orchestral body known to this listener. And this is no simple matter in a work which makes full use of all of the resources of modern instrumentation.

Although this was the fifth unfolding this symphony had received hereabouts, it may be doubted whether so just an appraisal of its contents had previously been possible. It must be unquestionably included among the few contemporary products which deserve to and indubitably will endure.

Of the composers now writing, Shostakovitch alone is capable of conceiving a long-breathed melody of sustained beauty—a beauty which never descends to the sentimental depths explored by Shostakovitch's illustrious predecessor, Tchaikovsky. Nor is Shostakovitch's rich melodic vein employed to express such intensely personal reactions and introspections as was Tchaikovsky's. For although the thirty-four-year-old composer of this symphony, which was penned for the celebration of the twentieth anniversary of the Soviet Republic, is no less an individualist than the creator of the "Symphonie Pathetique," his approach to music is a more epic one and he is less concerned with exploiting his own misery than with the depiction of the emotions of mankind in general. In other words, his roots are more classic than romantic, although he does not discard entirely the methods of the romanticists.

The mood of the first movement, even in those portions which are martial in character, is prevailingly somber. It suggests the passionate protest of humanity against the evils of existence. The allegretto, a scherzo in the Mahlerian style, is consciously banal, quite cynical in its commentary on the common herd enjoying itself. The despairing, brooding atmosphere of the largo is brought to a poignant climax in which Shostakovitch employs a highly original and telling bit of instrumentation by which the searing plangency of the music is intensified by the doubling of the tones of the violins playing in their highest register with the penetrating, glassy tones of the xylophone.

The finale brings with it an atmosphere of wild exultation, which breaks out again triumphantly at the close after an interruption which seems philosophically questioning in intention. The ideational matter of this symphony, the mastery of architectonics disclosed therein and the astounding fertility of invention revealed in its orchestration entitle it to a permanent place in the repertoire. Not many composers can put forth a work requiring fifty minutes in the traversal which is so consistently arresting.

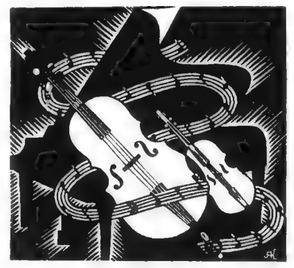
The first part of the program brought two familiar classics—Haydn's symphony No. 88 in G major and the third "Leonore" overture of Beethoven. Both were superbly conveyed.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
NOV 30 1940

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mostly at Carnegie

ONLY a glutton for conductors could complain of a lack of maestri around town lately. The Messrs. Stock, Koussevitzky, and Toscanini have been heard in Carnegie Hall. Arnold Schönberg has appeared as a director in Town Hall. Leopold Stokowski, of course, is available, bigger than life, on the screen at the Broadway Theatre, where "Fantasia" is showing.



Apparently it took the coincidental golden anniversaries of the Chicago Symphony and [illegible] back to ating its organ- with our a couple Chicago -seventh g of the as one of overture in a long tirely too since he erts four- itive and s perfor- citing as hearing, s not pos- hat some occasion, the sea- nd mel- alance in orchestra composi- cially for were in- erts: Roy a fantasy as rather lf into a phony by was skill- arpenter's because this music, which isn't a novelty, never seemed so directly eloquent as it did when Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it last week. A certain murkiness that had become practically a tradition in the performance of the music was cleared away, and one of the best symphonies of our time came completely into its own.

As for the orchestra, that remains one of the finest and most flexible instruments you can hear anywhere. If you want to hear it next time it plays in Carnegie Hall, take up the matter now with the box-office people, because the Boston band draws like a bank night with $1,000 in the kitty.

ARNOLD SCHÖNBERG's "Pierrot Lunaire" calls for only five instrumentalists and a vocalist, but it's such a delicately adjusted score that it also requires a conductor to develop its values. The composer, who directed it at one of the concerts of the New Friends of Music, made it clear and persuasive, and he had valuable coöperation from his players and from Mme. Erika Wagner-Stiedry, who was fascinating in her management of the difficult business of speaking or intoning the text.

Mr. Schönberg's services as a leader would have come in handy, too, for the Schubert F-major octet that occupied the first three-quarters of an hour or so in the concert, although he probably couldn't have done much about some of the off-key playing.

THE first visit here this season of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony was notable for the revelation of Vaughan Williams' "London" symphony. "Revelation" is the word,

Nov 30 MUSIC 1940

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The seventh concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Désiré Defauw was the guest conductor. The program was as follows:

"Le chasseur maudit," symphonic poem ..... Franck
Suite from "Cephale et Procris," arranged by Felix Mottl ..... Gretry
Dances from the ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos" ..... Falla
Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92 ..... Beethoven

The concert yesterday was a great success both from the point of view of the audience and personally for Mr. Defauw. With such a program it could hardly have been anything else, and a very much less talented musician than Mr. Defauw would have emerged with popular honors. Our Belgian guest conductor, though, is a very able and spirited director in his own right. He had the orchestra on its mettle from the very start and maintained this brilliant level throughout.

Aside from the opening number, the program does not need much discussion. Franck's symphonic poem, "Le chasseur maudit," has not been done by the Boston Symphony since 1922, the centenary of the composer's birth. It has its impressive moments—the mysterious opening and the ominous moment when the curse is pronounced, for example. But as a whole the score strikes one as a touch naive.

Sometimes, with Franck, naivete has its own particular charm as a part of the composer's lovable nature. Some of his beatitudes are instances of this quality. But nowadays, through far too many performances of the Symphony and the violin and piano sonata, we know Franck's peculiarities of style too well. Those chromatic tricks and cyclical melodies are as familiar as the poor relations of old Wardle; and in this symphonic poem we could gladly do without them. Still, it was worth hearing "Le chasseur maudit" revived as a period piece. Mr. Defauw, moreover, undoubtedly projected it with remarkable fervor.

The Gretry suite, which Felix Mottl has arranged with considerable freedom, is charming light music. If it were not so delicate in large part, it would do very well at the Pops; but the rattle of glasses and hum of conversation would assuredly kill it there. It makes no demands whatever on the audience, we have only to sit and enjoy a straightforward, finely spun performance such as yesterday's.

Falla's dances from "The Three-Cornered Hat" are well known both in the concert hall and as one of the best of all the Ballet Russe's repertoire. Naturally they sound in Symphony Hall as they never do in the Opera House, for the Boston Symphony can point up the brilliance of the orchestration. They sounded exceedingly well yesterday and won an ovation for orchestra and conductor.

Beethoven's 7th Symphony was [illegible] with great intensity of feeling by Mr. Defauw. He evidently belongs firmly to the school of interpretation that regards the Allegretto as a genuine slow movement. Beethoven, himself, was said to have been in two minds about the proper tempo and to have thought afterwards he should have labelled it andante. Mr. Toscanini is the only conductor we have heard who holds to the faster reading. Even if it were called andante that would indicate more pace than Mr. Defauw was willing to accord it yesterday. His reading suffered from being almost static at times, whatever it may have gained in fastidious attention to detail. The rest of the symphony sounded as it should.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky is devoting his program to Sibelius—the 6th, 7th and 2d symphonies in that order.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
NOV 25 1940

New Fifth Symphony

Saturday appears to have been a day of miracles. Another was created by Koussevitzky in Carnegie Hall in the afternoon when he interpreted the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony as it has never been heard before in this city. What he did with the Boston Symphony, what he did for the composer and what he did for the listener cannot be over-emphasized.

Such sumptuousness of tone and such clarity of playing on the part of the musicians gave Koussevitzky full power to disclose the beauty of an imposing symphony, rightfully to be classed with others dubbed "the Fifth." This critic has written highly of this work since its first performance here; Koussevitzky's interpretation elevated that opinion.

It should have remained for Koussevitzky to accomplish this. The performance is not surprising. He was in his element in this music, whether with the official approval or not, this is a great work and thus a natural challenge to the conductor.

[illegible] began with a bow to the foundation of the symphony, Haydn's Symphony in [illegible] followed by the Leonore Overture [illegible]

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Desire Defauw conducts the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week as the first of the season's guests. His first appearance in this city yesterday afternoon was a notable success; he was not only well received at the outset by the customarily cool Friday audience, but was recalled to the Symphony Hall stage and cordially applauded after each number.

The diminutive Belgian offered no new music, but the first half of the program was novel because each of the three pieces had not been heard at Boston Symphony concerts for some time. The symphonic poem, "The Accursed Hunter," by Cesar Franck, and three dances from the "Cephalus and Procris" ballet by Gretry (in the edition of Felix Mottl) were last done here in 1922, and the suite of three dances from Manuel De Falla's ballet, "The Three-Cornered Hat," in 1933. After intermission came Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, a test piece from the standard repertory for any orchestra and conductor.

Mr. Defauw speedily proved himself a first-rank conductor. His work is dynamic but not theatrical or spectacular; poised, honest and musicianly. He insists upon precision but he does not secure polish of detail at the expense of life in the score. As it happened, each of yesterday's four works demands buoyant rhythm sustained in a long line through the course of the music. This requirement Mr. Defauw met splendidly.

The orchestra was very responsive to him, and one sensed that he was commanding all the time. That is a vital test of a conductor, especially with a great and long-established orchestra. The Defauw gestures are simple and few. His long baton is swung in either a very narrow beat or one so broad that only Toscanini's may be compared with it. From time to time he will rest his stick in his left hand, while with the other he shapes a phrase or indicates how loud or soft a passage is to be played. Incidentally, he conducted the entire program from memory. There was no score in front of him.

The one defect of the afternoon was the prevailing loudness of tone, and that is no doubt attributable to unfamiliarity with the exceptionally bright acoustics of Symphony Hall. One is certain such was the case, because there is nothing emotionally forced in Mr. Defauw's interpretation. The Beethoven Seventh can be as many things as there are conductors to perform it. In all four movements it was a dance as Mr. Defauw conceived it, a dance gay, grave, whirling and Dionysiac by turn, but always clear of texture and never orgiastic. Truth to tell, the orchestra did not play Beethoven so faultlessly as what preceded: the strings did not always keep sharply together, and the horns had difficulties.

"The Accursed Hunter" sounds curiously unlike Franck except for isolated turns of melody and harmony. Beyond all question it is minor Franck, yet at the same time remarkably fantastic and quite well-preserved. There is no reason we should not hear second-rate works of first-rate or even lesser composers, from time to time. An orchestral repertory cannot consist entirely of masterpieces, and we do need variety.

Gretry's dances might not be easily recognizable to their composer in the form in which Felix Mottl left them for modern orchestra. They sound pretty "big" for the 18th Century. But how chic they are! The high-flavored Spanish dances of Manuel DeFalla are in the strongest possible contrast to Gretry, making their irresistible effect by vivid colors and frequent change of rhythm and pace. Mr. Defauw triumphed with both divergent styles.

Next week the Symphony concerts will do honor to Sibelius, who reaches his 75th birthday Dec. 8. Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct three Sibelius symphonies—the Sixth, the Seventh, and the Second.—C. W. D.

Désiré Defauw Boston Guest

C. S. M.

By L. A. Sloper

Désiré Defauw, the distinguished Belgian conductor, now a resident of the United States, is the guest this week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with which he has made his first appearances in American concert halls, except for one concert in Montreal.

For the seventh symphony pair of the Boston season he chose a program which opened with music of two of his countrymen, Franck's "Le Chasseur Maudit" and a Suite from Grétry's ballet, "Céphale et Procris" (as arranged by Felix Mottl); continued with three dances from Falla's ballet, "El Sombrero de tres picos," and concluded with Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Evidently Mr. Defauw has an affection for music of the dance.

The visitor established himself at once as a thorough musician and the master of his music and his forces. He is singularly free from mannerisms and exaggerated movements. Conducting without a score, in the fashion of the day, he indicates his wishes to the orchestra with an economy of gesture that proves his work has been done in rehearsal. Clearly, he obtained from the orchestra precisely what he wanted.

Of course, he had under his hand an instrument of exceptional virtuosity which can respond with amazing flexibility to the demands of a conductor who is able to win the respect of the players. It was obvious in this instance that the regard of leader and players was mutual, and the musical results were admirable and often stirring.

It was interesting to hear again Franck's symphonic poem, which has been dropped for the most part from the symphonic repertory hereabouts, presumably as being outmoded. It had not been played at these concerts for 18 years—that is, since Mr. Monteux's day. Yet if the dress seems old-fashioned, the score came to vivid life under Mr. Defauw's baton.

The conductor's talents were revealed in another facet by the Grétry music, which was performed with a sensitive feeling for the style of its period. This is another work that has lain untouched upon the library shelves since Mr. Monteux was in command at Symphony Hall. It deserved its revival, for it has an engaging rhythmic liveliness and its Minuet is of a rare nostalgic charm.

Rhythmic vitality was again in evidence as the dominating quality of Falla's brilliant dances. What a pity it is that we cannot have such an orchestra—with such a conductor—to play for our ballet seasons

The symphony proved that the conductor is familiar with and sympathetic to the broad outlines of the traditional reading. There [illegible] ideas in tempo, the second movement, for example, was taken at so slow a pace that it lost some of its Allegretto character, and there might be differences of opinion as to the phrasing of the woodwind in the third movement; but the first movement was given its proper proportions and the Finale went with a fine gusto.

The audience responded warmly to the dynamic musical individuality of the conductor, and the plaudits were loud and long. Mr. Defauw graciously paid tribute to the co-operation of the players by sharing the applause generously with them.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
NOV 24 1940

conceiving a long-breathed melody of sustained beauty—a beauty which never descends to the sentimental depths explored by Shostakovitch's illustrious predecessor, Tchaikovsky. Nor is Shostakovitch's rich melodic vein employed to express such intensely personal reactions and introspections as was Tchaikovsky's. For although the thirty-four-year-old composer of this symphony, which was penned for the celebration of the

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
NOV 30 1940

MUSICAL EVENTS

Mostly at Carnegie

ONLY a glutton for conductors could complain of a lack of maestri around town lately. The Messrs. Stock, Koussevitzky, and Toscanini have been heard in Carnegie Hall. Arnold Schönberg has appeared as a director in Town Hall. Leopold Stokowski, of course, is available, bigger than life, on the screen at the Broadway Theatre, where "Fantasia" is showing.

Apparently it took the coincidental golden anniversaries of the Chicago Symphony and Carnegie Hall to bring Dr. Stock and his orchestra back to this city. By way of celebrating its fiftieth season, the Chicago organization swapped auditoriums with our Philharmonic-Symphony for a couple of concerts, and the first Chicago Symphony session on Fifty-seventh Street began with the playing of the "Euryanthe" overture. It was one of the best performances of the overture that Carnegie Hall has heard in a long time.

Dr. Stock, who has been entirely too much of a rarity in New York since he conducted at the Stadium Concerts fourteen years ago, is still a sensitive and proficient music-maker. His performances weren't always so exciting as some we're accustomed to hearing, and his orchestra evidently does not possess the sheer tonal charm that some other ensembles produce on occasion, but Dr. Stock contributed to the season a welcome soundness and mellowness, and a fine sense of balance in his technical direction of the orchestra and in his presentations of the compositions.

Two works, written especially for the orchestra's Golden Jubilee, were introduced locally at these concerts: Roy Harris's "American Creed," a fantasy and double fugue which was rather austerely lyrical and built itself into a striking finale, and a short symphony by John Alden Carpenter, which was skillful and agreeable, as Mr. Carpenter's music always is.

THE first visit here this season of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony was notable for the revelation of Vaughan Williams' "London" symphony. "Revelation" is the word, because this music, which isn't a novelty, never seemed so directly eloquent as it did when Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it last week. A certain murkiness that had become practically a tradition in the performance of the music was cleared away, and one of the best symphonies of our time came completely into its own.

As for the orchestra, that remains one of the finest and most flexible instruments you can hear anywhere. If you want to hear it next time it plays in Carnegie Hall, take up the matter now with the box-office people, because the Boston band draws like a bank night with $1,000 in the kitty.

ARNOLD SCHÖNBERG's "Pierrot Lunaire" calls for only five instrumentalists and a vocalist, but it's such a delicately adjusted score that it also requires a conductor to develop its values. The composer, who directed it at one of the concerts of the New Friends of Music, made it clear and persuasive, and he had valuable coöperation from his players and from Mme. Erika Wagner-Stiedry, who was fascinating in her management of the difficult business of speaking or intoning the text.

Mr. Schönberg's services as a leader would have come in handy, too, for the Schubert F-major octet that occupied the first three-quarters of an hour or so in the concert, although he probably couldn't have done much about some of the off-key playing.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ROCKLAND, ME
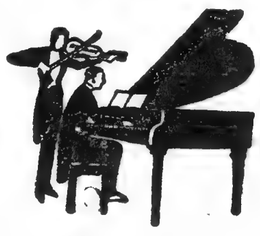
COURIER
11/30/40



REALM OF MUSIC

by Gladys St. Clair Heistad

At the first full rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as the 1940-41 season opened, Daniel Kuntz of Boston, who played in the first violin section under Conductor George Henschel at the first concert in Boston Oct. 21, 1881, was honored for his long time membership in the organization. As guest of Dr. Koussevitzky at Symphony Hall marking the 60th season of the famous orchestra, he was introduced to the players and personally congratulated by Dr. Koussevitzky on his long years of service in music. Mr. Kuntz in his gracious response paid tribute to the high standard of the orchestra maintained under Dr. Koussevitzky's baton. The orchestra rose on Mr. Kuntz' departure from the stage.

As Mr. Kuntz stood in the wings recalling his early days with the orchestra he told of that afternoon back in October, 1881, when half a house, "and mostly schoolgirls," giggled when the conductor stopped the musicians fully 10 times in the second movement of the First Symphony of Beethoven to correct ragged playing. Major Lee Higginson ,founder of the orchestra, finally sent word to the stage to make no further halts during the program. The musicians, Mr. Kuntz, said, were all skilled players but inexperienced in playing together and had little spirit of ensemble.

He spoke of the earlier conductors of the 80's and up to 1914, when he resigned. He recalled that the first program was played at a "public rehearsal," for which tickets were sold, on the afternoon of Oct. 21, 1881, in Music Hall, in Hamilton Place, off Tremont street. So well was this experimental orchestral of 60 men received that it was active there for 19 years, or up to 1900 when it moved into its permanent home in Symphony Hall. Speaking of former conductors, Mr. Kuntz said that Henschel though a fine musician, pianist, singer and composer, was not an experienced conductor. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor from 1884 to 1889, was a "drillmaster and a disciplinarian"; Arthur Nikisch (1889-1903), a poet. Of Nikisch he recalled this bit: Nikisch demurred when Kuntz asked permission to be absent from one Thursday rehearsal explaining that he planned to be married that day. "But promise me," the conductor said, "that it won't happen again." Mr. Kuntz also played under Max Fiedler, Emil Paur and Karl Muck. Mr. Kuntz was concertmaster of the "Promenades" in the old Music Hall downtown from May to September, 1886. These were the forerunner of the present-day "Pops". He was leader of the orchestra for 22 Summers at Poland Spring House; 17 Summers at the Lake Placid Club. He also conducted the orchestra at the Repertory Theatre under the direction of Henry Jewett.

* * * *

Martha Burnham A Visiting Conductor in Action

Désiré Defauw, Belgian guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at this week's concerts, sketched at rehearsal in Symphony Hall.

Desire Defauw

Transcript Nov 30/40

Boston Symphony's Seventh Concert Fair Directed by Eminent Belgian Conductor

By EDWARD DOWNES

AMONG the many gifts the European war has bestowed upon this country, the presence of Desire Defauw, who made his American concert debut with the Boston Symphony this week, is one to be thankful for. The Friday afternoon subscribers received him warmly at his first Symphony Hall appearance. His program, happily compounded of the unfamiliar and the familiar, embraced Cesar Franck's symphonic poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit," a suite which Felix Mottl arranged from the ballet music of Gretry's forgotten opera, "Cephale et Procris," three dances from Falla's "Three Cornered Hat," and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Furthermore, the program was singularly appropriate to the personality of the conductor. For Mr. Defauw comes to us trailing clouds of Belgian glory. He has, of course, conducted much outside his homeland, particularly in London. But for many years his chief activities have been in Brussels, where he not only conducted the concerts which bore his name, but the Conservatory concerts, and he directed the Belgian radio as well. In short, he appears before us as his country's premier musician.

Boston audiences would have been interested to hear from him samples of the modern school of Belgian composition, but failing this, there were the works of two older Flemish composers, Franck and Gretry. Beethoven himself was of course part Fleming. And there is perhaps a greater measure of Flemish zest, "unbuttoned" enjoyment of life in the Seventh than in any of Beethoven's other symphonies. If we accept Wagner's interpretation of the Seventh Symphony as an apotheosis of the dance, then we may go a step further and recall the boisterous humor of the dancing and carousal scenes of which the Flemish painters were so fond. Is there not, after all, a community of spirit here which reaches across the boundaries of the arts?

Speculation Aside

However that may be, Fleming or no Fleming, Mr. Defauw played the Seventh Symphony like a master. He did not attempt to draw from the players all the virtuosity and precision of which they are capable, but concentrated instead upon the broad phrases as a whole was what held his attention—with admirable results.

From beginning to end of the symphony, the dance element dominated. It infused even the languid pulse of the Allegretto with a restrained intensity and vitality. In the other movements, Mr. Defauw was dynamic without being theatrical. He did not exaggerate the humorous contrasts of the Scherzo, for he has no need of tricks to achieve his effect. This was simple, straightforward interpretation of the utmost effectiveness.

"Le Chasseur Maudit" is minor Franck, but of the most rewarding. Naive, certainly, but so is Schubert naive. Without approaching the terrors of the Wild Huntsmen in Weber's scene of the Wolf's Glen, it is picturesque and effective, and there are isolated moments of real dramatic power. Besides, why should we not hear minor works? Modern audiences are rapidly getting to know the Franck Symphony by heart. Mr. Defauw's skillful unfolding of the score made us regret that it is not more often performed.

Felix Mottl's dexterous arrangement of the dances from Gretry's "Cephale et Procris" is a very far cry from the original music, for he changed more than the instrumentation. It was presented with just the right light touch, but it is a pity Mr. Defauw himself has not undertaken new arrangements of the Gretry gems, more suited to modern taste and more in the spirit of Gretry.

The orchestral fireworks of the afternoon came with Falla's dances from the "Three Cornered Hat." The flash and excitement and garish color of this score revealed to us yet another facet of the conductor's versatile art. We should like to hear Mr. Defauw again. And so, to judge by the applause and cheers, would yesterday's audience.

42

GREEN MAGAZINE, Boston, Sunday, December 1, 1940

22 Symphony Concerts

By LEO GAFFNEY

WALT DISNEY could do quite a trick with Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Accursed Hunter"—if he had the Boston Symphony Orchestra at his disposal.

In the concerts over the week-end, conducted by the distinguished Belgian, Desire DeFauw, we had the legendary Hunter at his liveliest and most accursed.

Against a background of muttering violas, hurricanes howling in the celli and upper strings, the deep imprecations of the tubas conjured up a most scarifying picture of the wilful gentleman of old who lands most disastrously in a howling hell—for his sacrilegious Sabbath jaunt.

Mr. Disney's latest excursion into the field of visual music—it is known as "Fantasia" over in New York — would be well followed by "The Accursed Hunter." The "program" is perfect; the music even better than that.

This recommendation is for Mr. Disney for what it is worth.

THE rest of Mr. DeFauw's program, strange to relate, was just as exciting. Somehow, he had managed to infuse it with the spirit of the dance. After the galloping clip of the Hunter, there were three lively—and lovely—dances from the ballet "Cephale et Pocris," by the Belgian Andre Gretry.

Then three more dancs from De Falla's popular and earthy "Three Cornered Hat," and, to to finish off in the clouds, the most rhythmic of all Beethoven's syphonies, the immense Seventh.

This is Mr. DeFauw's first concert appearance in this country, whence he was forced to flee because of the war. Much could be written in praise of his brilliant musicianship, engaging manners, but it would all boil down to the succinct phrase of a Canadian reviewer, "Don't let DeFauw go."

And speaking of visiting conductors, reminder is hereby given of the Boston appearance in Symphony Hall on next Wednesday evening of John Barbirolli and the New York harmonic.

Paul Makovsk

PAUL MAKOVSKY, a violinist who has been one of the foremost virtu his generation, will app soloist at the second pair certs by the Boston Sy Orchestra in its shorter s be given on Monday eveni Tuesday afternoon next i phony Hall.

Paul Makovsky will appe the orchestra in the Violi certo of Johannes Brahms

ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT AND CHRONICLE, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1940

MUSICAL COMEDY

END OF A CONCERT. Photo of a recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that ended on an humorous note. Instead of following his usual custom of bowing and quickly leaving the stage, Dr. Koussevitzky suddenly wheeled around, and to the astonishment of orchestra and audience, sat down with a bump on the podium.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 1 - 1940

STAGING FOUR REVIVALS

Herbert Graf Tells of Production Plans For Metropolitan Season

By ROSS PARMENTER

THERE will probably be no actual sparks flying from the anvils of "Il Trovatore" this year at the Metropolitan, but there will be plenty of emotional sparks if even half of the scenic and dramatic effects in the mind of Herbert Graf are realized. The 37-year-old stage director, who is starting his fifth season with the company; excitedly expatiated on some of his ideas for his new productions last week.

His production of "Un Ballo in Maschera" is in traditional La Scala style with painted wings and big painted backdrops with realistic perspectives; he is going to do "Il Trovatore" with three Gothic arches of solid construction which will remain as a framework for all the sets; he is going to do Gluck's "Alceste" in a simple, heroic style with a few terra cotta unit elements of steps and pillars which will be used in different combinations against black backgrounds; and he is going to do "La Fille du Regiment" in the style and bright colors of a modern children's book with a chorus of twenty-four Rockette-like "lady soldiers" who will do military dance routines in red, white and blue uniforms. And he is going to vary the acting styles as much as the settings.

* * *

Mr. Graf's drab office on the second floor of the Opera House, with its roll-top desk, suggests a back office of a small-town insurance agent who is not doing very well. But as the young, black-haired Viennese director with the ready smile talked of his plans the office was filled with the clash of passions, with toy soldiers, Greek heroines, kings and courtiers, gypsies and romantic heroes, castles, market places and temples.

Mr. Graf is no idolater of opera, good or bad. He wants settings that will somehow convey the spirit of the operas, and he wants reasonable gestures from the actors; not "all sorts of seasickness movements."

He said that he aimed to get some of the primitive fire of the young and revolutionary Verdi in the "restudied" production of "Il Trovatore." The opera was good theatre, he said, with its primitive contrasts of gypsies and medieval robber knights, encampments and castles. He was not going to find too much realistic detail in it, he said, but he was going to contrast the followers of Manrico and those of Count di Luna by giving them different types of costumes and weapons.

Harry Horner of the Broadway Theatre has designed the settings and the three Gothic arches resemble flying buttresses, which will be shifted about, sometimes crisscrossing in the center. Behind them will be painted backdrops. Mr. Graf hopes that the contrast of the plastic arches and the romantic backdrops will convey the blend of the primitive and the romantic in Verdi's music.

His greatest innovation in staging will come in the final scene. He toyed with the idea of a revolving tower for some time, but that did not prove feasible, since the company has to take its productions on tour. He solved the problem in a simpler way. He wanted a scene whereby Manrico would actually see the flames being prepared for his mother. So great curtains of the prison will be opened, Manrico will step out onto the ramparts, he will see the fire in the valley below and the clouds will reflect the flames. With this staging Mr. Graf feels that Manrico will seem not just a tenor singing an aria, but a man so furious that he has to sing high C's.

* * *

"La Fille du Regiment" will be set in a red, white and blue picture frame. The dancing soldiers will be introduced because, in the words of Mr. Graf, "you cannot think of a regiment with Lily Pons in it without having more female soldiers."

The opera was originally written in French by Donizetti for the Opéra Comique in Paris. Mr. Graf will restore the intimate style which it has lost in subsequent productions in Italian. He will do this by dividing the opening and closing scenes in two. In order to preserve the intimacy of the action and duets of the start of each he will have a backdrop well to the front of the theatre. The first will show the inside of a barn and it will have an artificial horse which will kick its heels from time to time.

"Un Ballo in Maschera," as has already been announced, will be laid in the eighteenth century court of King Gustavus III of Sweden and not, as is usually the case, in Boston. In the throne room of the first scene there will be the blue and yellow national colors of Sweden. The third will be a snow scene. Mr. Graf said that he had obtained many ideas from the stage directions which Scribe wrote for his libretto of the opera, which, under the title of "Gustavus," was first set to music by Auber in 1837.

"The opera has been successful among musicians," he said. "But the public has found something somber in it. We hope to make it popular. With its rococo setting it will be much more spectacular. Also, it will have an air of more importance. Instead of being a story of a murder of a provincial Governor it will be the story of a murder of a king by the captain of the guard, his best friend. It will have significance, for it is laid in the time of the French Revolution, and that king was a known friend of the arts and of the people."

His problem in staging "Alceste," he said, was to devise a production which would be different from his other Gluck production in the repertoire, "Orfeo ed Euridice." He solved this by making "Alceste" a classic production, while "Orfeo" is a romantic one.

Mr. Graf was born in Vienna and got his first engagement as a stage director in Munster, Germany, when he was only 22. His first brief visit to this country was in 1930, when he was known as the youngest opera stage director in Europe. His second was in 1934, when he came to produce ten operas for the Philadelphia Opera Company. He has since taken out his first papers to become an American citizen, but he did not do so during his Philadelphia stay. With a wistful sigh he explained. "We were all so proud of being Viennese then."

42

GREEN MAGAZINE, Boston, Sunday, December 1, 1940

Symphony Concerts

By LEO GAFFNEY

WALT DISNEY could do quite a trick with Cesar Franck's Symphonic Poem, "The Accursed Hunter"—if he had the Boston Symphony Orchestra at his disposal.

In the concerts over the week-end, conducted by the distinguished Belgian, Desire DeFauw, we had the legendary Hunter at his liveliest and most accursed.

Against a background of muttering violas, hurricanes howling in the celli and upper strings, the deep imprecations of the tubas conjured up a most scarifying picture of the wilful gentleman of old who lands most disastrously in a howling hell—for his sacrilegious Sabbath jaunt.

Mr. Disney's latest excursion into the field of visual music—it is known as "Fantasia" over in New York — would be well followed by "The Accursed Hunter." The "program" is perfect; the music even better than that.

This recommendation is for Mr. Disney for what it is worth.

THE rest of Mr. DeFauw's program, strange to relate, was just as exciting. Somehow, he had managed to infuse it with the spirit of the dance. After the galloping clip of the Hunter, there were three lively—and lovely—dances from the ballet "Cephale et Pocris," by the Belgian Andre Gretry.

Then three more dances from De Falla's popular and earthy "Three Cornered Hat," and, to to finish off in the clouds, the most rhythmic of all Beethoven's syphonies, the immense Seventh.

This is Mr. DeFauw's first concert appearance in this country, whence he was forced to flee because of the war. Much could be written in praise of his brilliant musicianship, engaging manners, but it would all boil down to the succinct phrase of a Canadian reviewer, "Don't let DeFauw go."

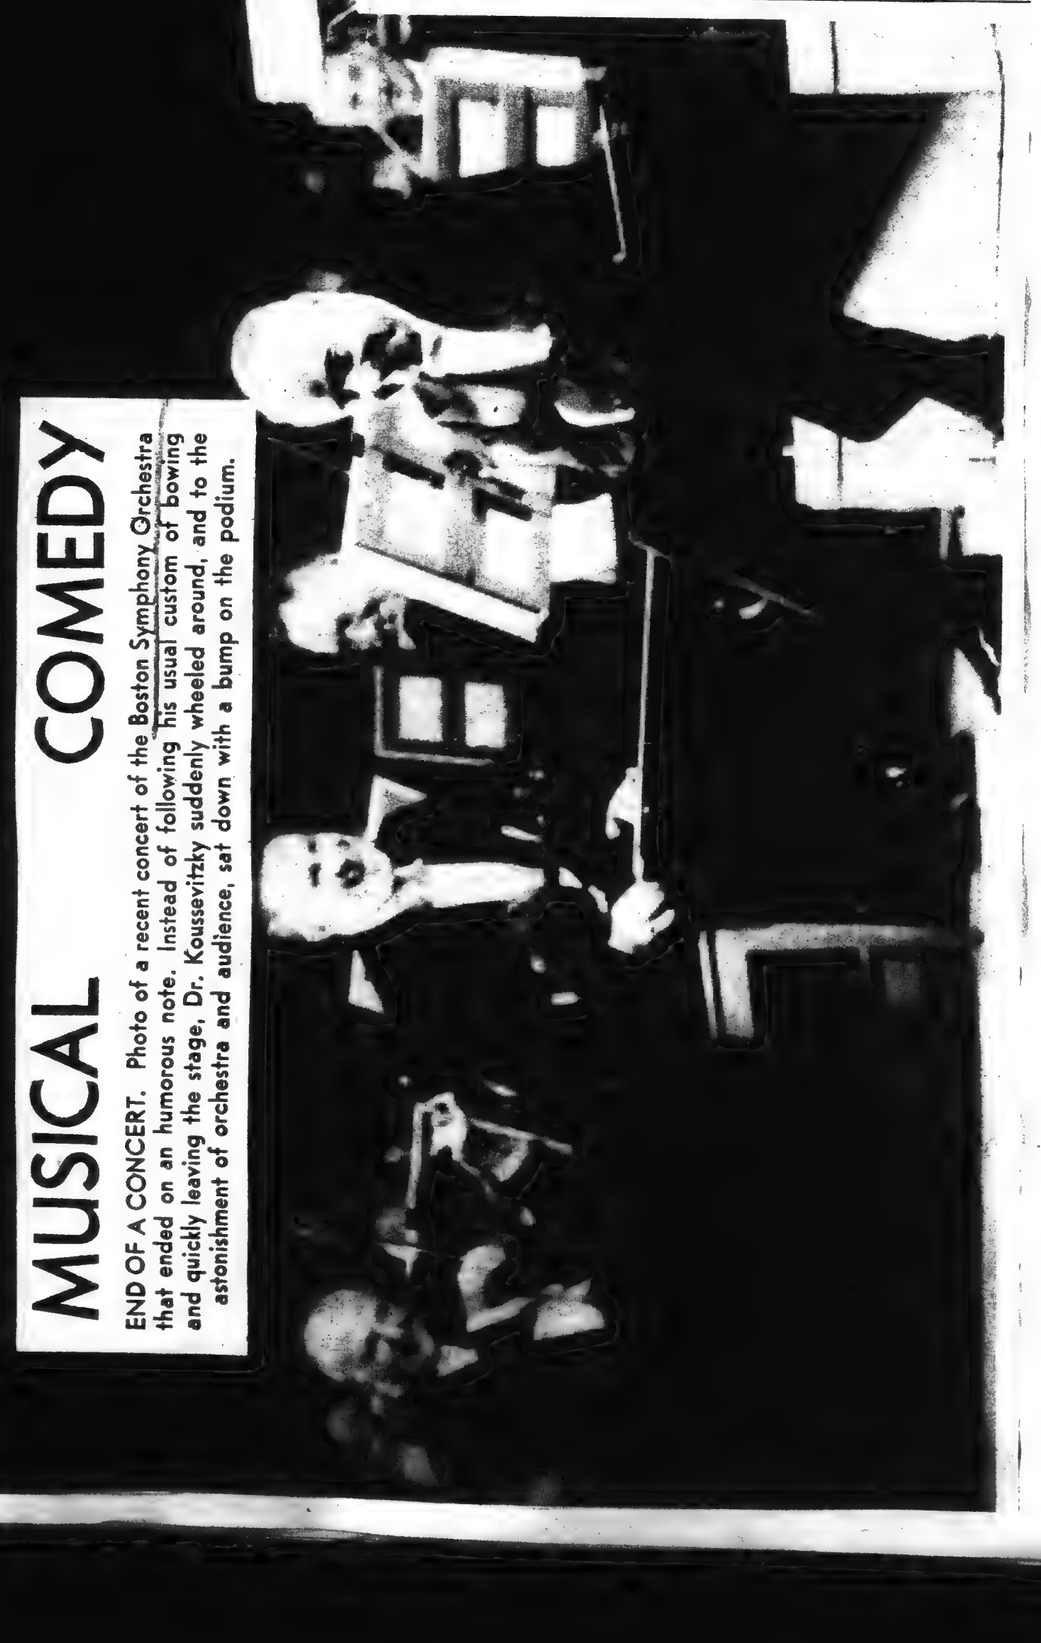
And speaking of visiting conductors, reminder is hereby given of the Boston appearance in Symphony Hall on next Wednesday evening of John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic.

Paul Makovsky

PAUL MAKOVSKY, a young violinist who has been counted one of the foremost virtuosos of his generation, will appear as soloist at the second pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its shorter series to be given on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon next in Symphony Hall.

Paul Makovsky will appear with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Johannes Brahms.

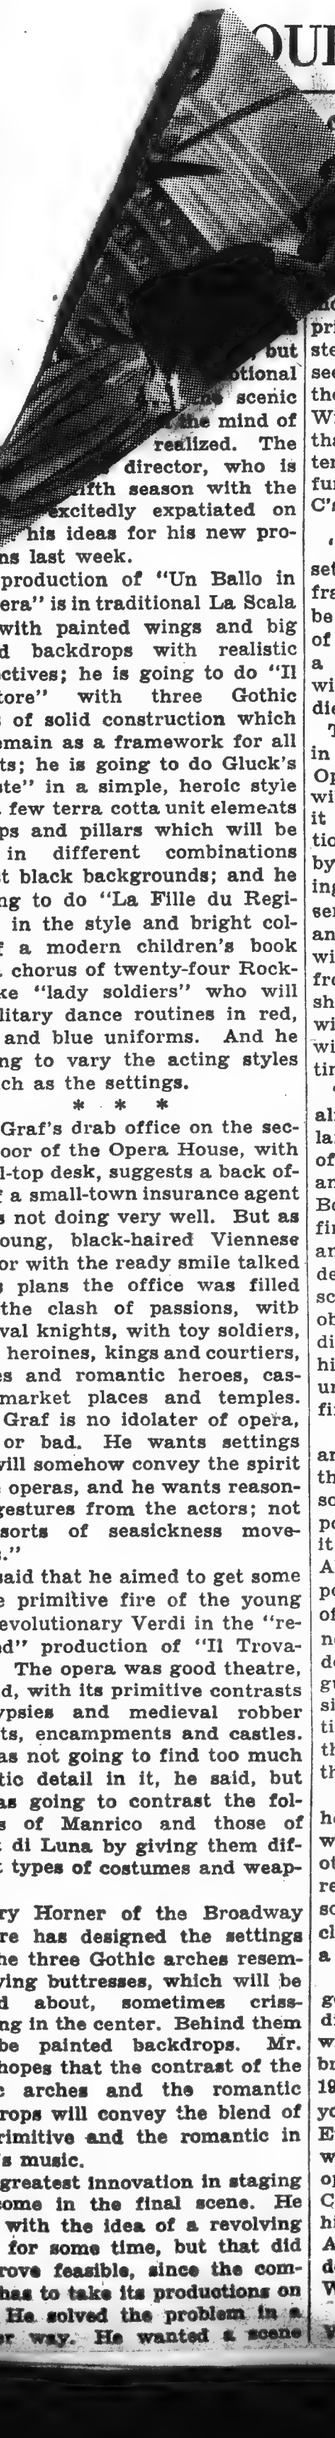
ROCHESTER DEMOCRAT AND CHRONICLE, SUNDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1940



MUSICAL COMEDY

END OF A CONCERT. Photo of a recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra that ended on an humorous note. Instead of following his usual custom of bowing and quickly leaving the stage, Dr. Koussevitzky suddenly wheeled around, and to the astonishment of orchestra and audience, sat down with a bump on the podium.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
DEMOCRAT-CHRONICLE
DEC 1 - 1940



OUR REVIVALS

Production Plans Season

Manrico would actually see flames being prepared for his mother. So great curtains of the prison will be opened, Manrico will step out onto the ramparts, he will see the fire in the valley below and the clouds will reflect the flames. With this staging Mr. Graf feels that Manrico will seem not just a tenor singing an aria, but a man so furious that he has to sing high C's.

* * *

"La Fille du Regiment" will be set in a red, white and blue picture frame. The dancing soldiers will be introduced because, in the words of Mr. Graf, "you cannot think of a regiment with Lily Pons in it without having more female soldiers."

The opera was originally written in French by Donizetti for the Opéra Comique in Paris. Mr. Graf will restore the intimate style which it has lost in subsequent productions in Italian. He will do this by dividing the opening and closing scenes in two. In order to preserve the intimacy of the action and duets of the start of each he will have a backdrop well to the front of the theatre. The first will show the inside of a barn and it will have an artificial horse which will kick its heels from time to time.

"Un Ballo in Maschera," as has already been announced, will be laid in the eighteenth century court of King Gustavus III of Sweden and not, as is usually the case, in Boston. In the throne room of the first scene there will be the blue and yellow national colors of Sweden. The third will be a snow scene. Mr. Graf said that he had obtained many ideas from the stage directions which Scribe wrote for his libretto of the opera, which, under the title of "Gustavus," was first set to music by Auber in 1837.

"The opera has been successful among musicians," he said. "But the public has found something somber in it. We hope to make it popular. With its rococo setting it will be much more spectacular. Also, it will have an air of more importance. Instead of being a story of a murder of a provincial Governor it will be the story of a murder of a king by the captain of the guard, his best friend. It will have significance, for it is laid in the time of the French Revolution, and that king was a known friend of the arts and of the people."

His problem in staging "Alceste," he said, was to devise a production which would be different from his other Gluck production in the repertoire, "Orfeo ed Euridice." He solved this by making "Alceste" a classic production, while "Orfeo" is a romantic one.

Mr. Graf was born in Vienna and got his first engagement as a stage director in Munster, Germany, when he was only 22. His first brief visit to this country was in 1930, when he was known as the youngest opera stage director in Europe. His second was in 1934, when he came to produce ten operas for the Philadelphia Opera Company. He has since taken out his first papers to become an American citizen, but he did not do so during his Philadelphia stay. With a wistful sigh he explained. "We were all so proud of being Viennese then."

* * *

Mr. Graf's drab office on the second floor of the Opera House, with its roll-top desk, suggests a back office of a small-town insurance agent who is not doing very well. But as the young, black-haired Viennese director with the ready smile talked of his plans the office was filled with the clash of passions, with medieval knights, with toy soldiers, Greek heroines, kings and courtiers, gypsies and romantic heroes, castles, market places and temples.

Mr. Graf is no idolater of opera, good or bad. He wants settings that will somehow convey the spirit of the operas, and he wants reasonable gestures from the actors; not "all sorts of seasickness movements."

He said that he aimed to get some of the primitive fire of the young and revolutionary Verdi in the "restudied" production of "Il Trovatore." The opera was good theatre, he said, with its primitive contrasts of gypsies and medieval robber knights, encampments and castles. He was not going to find too much realistic detail in it, he said, but he was going to contrast the followers of Manrico and those of Count di Luna by giving them different types of costumes and weapons.

Harry Horner of the Broadway Theatre has designed the settings and the three Gothic arches resemble flying buttresses, which will be shifted about, sometimes crisscrossing in the center. Behind them will be painted backdrops. Mr. Graf hopes that the contrast of the plastic arches and the romantic backdrops will convey the blend of the primitive and the romantic in Verdi's music.

His greatest innovation in staging will come in the final scene. He toyed with the idea of a revolving tower for some time, but that did not prove feasible, since the company has to take its productions on tour. He solved the problem in a simpler way. He wanted a scene

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 1 - 1940

CANDID CAMERA RECORDS UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB REHEARSAL

Above . . . PART OF BASS SECTION of local musical organization practicing one of numbers for concert which will be given December 13 in Memorial Hall of Rhode Island School of Design. Shown here, left to right, are: Alfred Buckley, John Hitch, Lawrence Gardner, Arthur Lemaire, Earl Dane and Alfred Corp.
—Journal photos, Williams

Above . . . ARTHUR FIEDLER, new director of the Club, pictured in action during rehearsal. Mr. Fiedler, famous conductor of Boston Symphony "Pops" and other concert groups, succeeds John B. Archer and is third director the organization has had since it was founded 30 years ago.

STUDY IN EXPRESSIONS as Arthur Sisson (left), club treasurer, and Judge Roscoe Dexter pay close attention to the musical score during weekly practice session attended by approximately seventy members.

OUNGER MEMBERS, left to right, Frederick rich, Stuart Campbell and Ross de Matteo und piano for informal songs after regular

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 1 - 1940

CANDID CAMERA RECORDS UNIVERSITY GLEE CLUB REHEARSAL

Above . . . PART OF BASS SECTION of local musical organization practicing one of numbers for concert which will be given December 13 in Memorial Hall of Rhode Island School of Design. Shown here, left to right, are: Alfred Buckley, John Hitch, Lawrence Gardner, Arthur Lemaire, Earl Dane and Alfred Corp.
—Journal photos, Williams

Above . . . ARTHUR FIEDLER, new director of the Club, pictured in action during rehearsal. Mr. Fiedler, famous conductor of Boston Symphony "Pops" and other concert groups, succeeds John B. Archer and is third director the organization has had since it was founded 30 years ago.

STUDY IN EXPRESSIONS as Arthur Sisson (left), club treasurer, and Judge Roscoe Dexter pay close attention to the musical score during weekly practice session attended by approximately seventy members.

OUNGER MEMBERS, left to right, Frederick
drich, Stuart Campbell and Ross de Matteo und piano for informal songs after regular

SIBELIUS TO CELEBRATE BIRTHDAY

Post Dec 1

Various Opinions of His Rank, at Age of Seventy-Five

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

FINLAND'S grand old man of music, Jan Sibelius, will be 75 years old next Sunday. In recognition of that important anniversary, Dr. Koussevitzky will offer at this week's Symphony Concerts his Sixth, Seventh and Second Symphonies.

The last few years have witnessed the growth in this country of a Sibelius cult that has finally resulted in the popular acceptance of him as not only the greatest living composer, but as the sole music-maker of our day who can be ranked with the giants of the past. So firmly implanted is this conviction that many would be surprised to learn that it is not general throughout the world or that there are dissenters in this very land, which have exalted Sibelius beyond any other save only Finland, itself, and possibly England.

The Latin peoples, for example, are almost unaware of his existence, and even in Germany, where his essentially Nordic music should find a ready response, there is, relatively speaking, little knowledge or understanding of it. Even the Scandinavians, we are told, are less Sibelius-conscious than ourselves.

The case for Sibelius has been most warmly stated by the English critic and historian, Cecil Gray, who places his symphonies beside (if not actually above) those of Beethoven. Ernest Newman is scarcely less ardent in his protestations of faith, and in America Sibelius has long been vigorously championed by Olin Downes, who has been honored by the Finnish government for his devotion.

Whether it is an instance of action and reaction or of distrust on the part of radical thinkers of any popular cause, the musical left-wingers in these United States are not sold on Sibelius. A perusal of the quarterly, Modern Music might give the Finn's fans something of a shock. As one who has read that provocative periodical quite conscientiously for the past few years, this reviewer cannot recall seeing in its pages a single really complimentary reference to their idol.

Not long ago Roger Sessions declared there that Sibelius' music had no message for the contemporary man and woman. And either he or a later contributor scouted the notion that Sibelius is a "second Beethoven," a "universal genius," and averred that a "second" Grieg or Smetana would be closer to the truth.

Last October Virgil Thomson, who collaborated with Gertrude Stein in the opera, "Four Saints in Three Acts," became music critic of the New York Herald Tribune and has since been throwing bombs into every camp, particularly that of the Sibelians. Hearing the Second and First Symphonies from Mr. Barbirolli and Mr. Ormany, respectively, Mr. Thomson dismissed them both as unworthy of serious attention, and his crowning jibe was that he had never encountered a professional musician who was a Sibelius enthusiast. Last season this column commented, and not with entire sympathy, on the chapter, "Sibelius, a Mind Two-dimensional" in Lazare Saminsky's "Music of Our Day." And Paul Rosenfeld, who wrote so eloquently of Sibelius in his "Musical Portraits," has lived to call him "an overstuffed bard."

But why go on? Sibelius' music, like that of any other composer, will live on or die, regardless of what is written about it. In the meantime, it has sounded a note of ruggedness and sincerity in a musical day not too conspicuous for those qualities, and it has been for many a source of satisfaction and inspiration. For that, if for naught else, we should respect it.

Paul Makovsky, violinist, acclaimed in Europe, plays the Brahms Concerto at the Symphony Concerts of tomorrow evening and Tuesday afternoon. Dr. Koussevitzky's other numbers will be the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

Three eminent pianists will be heard in Boston this week. This afternoon Sergei Rachmaninoff will appear in recital at Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin will play Brahms' Second Concerto, when John Barbirolli and the New York Philharmonic orchestra come to Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening. (The Concerto will be flanked by a Purcell Chaconne and the C major Symphony of Schubert.) And on Thursday evening George Copeland will play 18th century music, French and Spanish music at Jordan Hall.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Paul Makovsky, a young violinist who came to the United States this year from Europe, made his Boston debut at the second Monday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last night. He played one of the mightiest of all concertos for that instrument—the D major of Johannes Brahms. Serge Koussevitzky conducted, beginning the program with the "Classical" Symphony of Prokofieff, and ending with the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch.

One would judge Mr. Makovsky to be about 25. He is a technically well-equipped violinist, he produces a round tone and he plays like a true musician. He may have been nervous during the first movement, because his performance was too subdued both for the character of the music and for Mr. Koussevitsky's intense conceptions of the score. By the time he reached the cadenza, however, his manner had changed, and the slow movement and finale were a somewhat different story.

Mr. Makovsky does not seem at present to be a strongly emotional interpreter: as time goes on he will probably increase the stature of his work, and be capable of a "bigger" performance than he vouchsafed last night. The important thing about him, however, is his essential artistry and his obvious talent. He was most cordially applauded.

Mr. Koussevitzky thinks of the Brahms Concerto in heroic terms, and he is quite right. But it did seem that he demanded from the strings too emotional a tone, and in general transformed a classical masterpiece of epic proportions into an excessively romantic poem.

The "Classical" Symphony has always been a Koussevitzky miracle, simply astonishing by its jeweled glitter. Again it was virtuosity triumphant. If anyone can make the best of Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony, he is Mr. Koussevitzky.

His whole-hearted performance met the composer upon more than equal terms. The brilliance, the sheer beauty of sound in certain pages was as much attributable to conductor and orchestra as to the notes themselves. Yet while one may be alternately thrilled and enchanted by those pages, the Fifth Symphony unhappily remains for this chronicler a barren piece of music. Its outward aspect may occasionally be imposing, but within there is no spirit.

The program will be repeated at 3 today.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

DEC 3 - 1940

Q. Who owns Tanglewood, the estate where Nathan Hawthorne lived? S. T. J.

A. Tanglewood, the estate at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, where the author lived was deeded to the Boston Symphony as a permanent home several years ago. It is here that the annual Berkshire Symphonic Festivals are held.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ADRIAN, MICH.
TELEGRAM

DEC 4 - 1940

Conductor

Serge Koussevitzky is conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which will be heard in the Choral Union Series at Hill Auditorium, Ann Arbor, December 11.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The second concert in the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Symphony Hall. Serge Koussevitzky conducted; and the soloist was Paul Makovsky, violinist. The program was as follows:

Prokofieff ..... Classical Symphony Op. 25
Brahms .... Violin Concerto in D major Op. 77
Shostakovitch .... Symphony No. 5 Op. 47

Mr. Makovsky, whose Boston debut this was, proved that he was a brilliant and thoroughly musicianly violinist. He tackled the greatest of all violin concertos, the Brahms D major; and he emerged from this ordeal triumphantly. In most of our ears the performance that Mr. Heifetz and the Boston Symphony gave some years ago, and which was so successfully preserved in wax, is still ringing. Other violinists with this orchestra, however unfairly, have to measure up to that high standard. Mr. Makovsky acquitted himself nobly. His slow movement had not perhaps that ultimate, tranquil perfection that is sometimes achieved; but then he probably did not have as many rehearsals in which to achieve it. It was a fine performance, and he deserved every bit of the applause which was in fact forthcoming.

While he was in New York Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony in Carnegie Hall on a Saturday afternoon; and, such was the fire of his interpretation, that he and the orchestra and Shostakovitch won an ovation. Thereafter there were many willing to swear in public that they had listened to a great work of art.

Now, this is but another instance of what has often been ingeniously suggested is the inherent provincialism of New York.

No one studying or studiously listening to the last two movements of this particular symphony has any business to say that it is great music. What has happened is that Mr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony have worked the old miracle of making wine out of water or a silk purse out of a sow's ear. And, heavens, now they have to work! Pity and admire the brass, commiserate with the strings; and reflect that the same miracle will have to be worked again today.

We have already discussed this symphony in sufficient detail, and no performance is just now going to persuade us to admire it. The end of the first movement is lovely and shows that the composer has some talent. The scherzo has been infinitely better done by Prokofieff; and, by the way, it was rather mean of Mr. Koussevitzky to spike Shostakovitch's guns by putting a really good modern so near to him. Still, the Brahms Concerto is rather a formidable barrier.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. The next concerts in this series occur on Dec. 30 and 31.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, O.
BLADE

DEC 4 - 1940

Boston Symphony To Give Concert

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will play Dimitri Shostakovitch's new Fifth Symphony at the membership concert to be given Dec. 12 in the Peristyle, it was announced today. Shostakovitch is one of the leading composers of Soviet Russia.

Joint lectures on the Shostakovitch work and other compositions in the program will be given at 7:30 Thursday night and 10:30 Friday morning by Mary Van Doren and A. B. Barksdale.

This Clipping From
TOLEDO, O.
TIMES

DEC 5 - 1940

Symphony Plans Russian Works

Concert To Be Heard at Museum Dec. 12

The sensational new Fifth symphony of Dimitri Shostakovitch, 30-year-old Soviet Russian composer, will be among the works played by the Boston Symphony orchestra at 8:30 p. m. Dec. 12 in the Toledo Museum of Art peristyle.

The concert will be for museum members only, but the public may have opportunity to hear a new recording of the Shostakovitch symphony as well as other numbers at 8 p. m. today and 10:30 a. m. tomorrow when Mary Van Doren and A. Beverly Barksdale present a joint analytical music lecture. Also to be played are Beethoven's "Leonore" overture and parts of Haydn's Symphony in G Major No. 88.

Shostakovitch's first symphony attracted the music world when heard in this country several years ago. His second, third and fourth symphonies were not allowed to leave Russia on grounds they were too reminiscent of the old Russian spirit.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

DEC 4 - 1940

Russian Works Feature Boston Symphony Concert

Every contribution to the Boston Symphony paired programs for the current Monday-Tuesday series, of which the Tuesday afternoon is still warm in remembered joys of full satisfaction, was Russian—all but Brahms, and he eloquently, fastidiously, poetically, brilliantly played by the European concert artist, Paul Makowsky. It was the most completely enjoyable program in its three offerings of any heard in Symphony Hall in the experience of this writer.

Coming soon after the Brahms 2d symphony in D major of a recent Friday-Saturday program, a dream of happiness and poetry, this beautiful only violin concerto of the same composer with the Russian-Swedish Parisian violinist's art growing out of the tender string body as flowers rear themselves out of a grassy field—both nurtured by the same soil—was especially appreciated. With good old Johannes, we were happy in the Adagio of a Sabbath morning.

The concert opened with the most invigorating and disarming presentation of Prokovieff's "Classical Symphony" recalled from many hearings. Possibly, now the same composer's "Peter and the Wolf" is familiar fare, we understand better the gay rhythmic advances of this other Soviet musician's little work modeled on earlier styles. It is such fun to note the flutes rip off the tread—those dulcet, ofttimes lyric instruments.

To this hearer, appetite has been whetted in recent weeks for the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony by word of Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting in Boston and New York and from the broadcast of Stokowski's premiere of the Shostakovitch 6th.

The Philadelphia premiere was lyrically enchanting. This 5th astounded by its purity out of rising clamor; its clear, clean, brilliant joy in something accomplished. With Russian propaganda films in mind, one felt immediately the rolling of mammoth tanks, the Red Square, Russia new and strong learning to produce and her people exulting. It was the 20th anniversary of the Republic of Soviet Russia for which this Symphony was composed, you should realize.

Were there time to indulge in stimulated ideas, one could point out how the two—the 5th and 6th symphonies—might be welded through selected movements and portions of movements and reordering into a tone poem of the spirit of new Russia. Understand, one speaks looking into the mind of this young Soviet, not in personal sympathy. His work must surely endure, for it has freshness of outlook and is beautifully skilled.

A. C. R.

SECOND MONDAY BY SYMPHONY

Makovsky Is Soloist in Brahms' Violin Concerto

Dec. 2 / 40

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was a curious sandwich that Dr. Koussevitzky presetned last evening as the second programme of the Monday-Tuesday series: a thick slice of Schwarzbrot between two spreads of caviar. Or, in less gastronomic terms, the Violin Concerto of Brahms with Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony before it and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch after it.

Prokofieff's jeu d'espirit had not been played this season at the regular concerts. Shostakovitch's bombastic creation had, however, been played both in Boston and in New York, in which city the reviewers took mostly kindly to it. With a basis for comparison denied to us of Boston the Manhattan critics could say that Dr. Koussevitzky did for the Symphony everything that could be done. Prokofieff's fetching conceit has, of course, long been one of his specialties.

The soloist in Brahms' overlong and somewhat ponderous work was Paul Makovsky, a violinist of Russian blood and Swedish birth, lately come to America. Had he chosen some other vehicle for the exhibtion of his talents Mr. Makovsky might have made a better impression. In the music of Brahms he was distinctly miscast. Neither his tone nor his style was broad enough. The only time when he seemed really at home was in the cadenza in the first movement, and he tore into this with enthusiasm which suggested that some more displayful work would have better suited his present abilities. Mr. Makovsky is still young and he may yet grow to Brahms. The audience received him cordially.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY

DEC 2 - 1940

Symphonic Programs In Boston This Week

The second of the monthly paired programs for Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon that the Boston Symphony Orchestra carries on as supplementary to their regular Friday-Saturday concerts in Symphony Hall is scheduled for this week, Dec. 2, 3. Serge Koussevitzky conducting, the soloist will be Paul Makovsky, the brilliant young European violinist who is making his Boston debut. Mr. Makovsky will appear with the orchestra in the Violin Concerto of Brahms, in D major.

The program opens with Prokofieff's Classical Symphony, and closes with the 5th Symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, the talented composer of Soviet Russia.

Shostakovitch as a symphonist is becoming an outstanding feature of our American orchestras. His 5th Symphony had enthusiastic reception when it was presented by Dr. Koussevitzky in the second concerts of this season and again on repetition in the Cambridge series. The monthly audiences are now to have the benefit of a ripened performance.

Radio audiences were enchanted with the American premiere of the Shostakovitch 6th Symphony which came from the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra last Friday afternoon.

Heard Locally

Incidentally, writing in New Bedford, we wish to express personal appreciation and that of other listeners in this city to Radio Station WNBH for carrying the three weeks' Philadelphia broadcasts of Stokowski and his orchestra. We were grateful for a performance secure from interference of cincident programs.

The remaining four pairs of Monday-Tuesday concerts will be given on Dec. 30-31, Jan. 27-28, March 3-4, April 14, 15. The Tuesday concerts at 3 p. m. (a half hour later than the Friday "rehearsals" to accomodate out-of-town patronage, these being the so-called Commuters' concerts) are recommended for convenience and for having more seats available than the practically all-subscribed Monday nights.

Philharmonic Program

John Barbirolli conducts the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston, Wednesday evening, Dec. 4—the concert beginning at 8:15.

The soloist will be Rudolf Serkin, pianist, who delighted a Civic Music audience in this city a few years ago. Mr. Serkin will appear in the Brahms' concerto for piano in B flat major. The program opens with Mr. Barbirolli's arrangement of a Chaconne by Purcell. The symphony is that of Schubert in C major, No. 7.

A. C. R.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1940

STOKOWSKI BRINGS SHOSTAKOVICH 6TH

New Symphony Introduced by the Philadelphians.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The slickest of composer-technicians born in this century, Dmitri Shostakovich, enabled Leopold Stokowski to close a Philadelphia Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night with a brilliant question mark. Performed for the first time in New York, the year-old Sixth Symphony of the musical laureate of the Soviets created no sensation. But it sent listeners away wondering whether there was more in it than they got out of it; and whether, after all, to be brought up in a capitalist country was to be blind, deaf and insensate to beauties that can flower only under Communism.

This is not to say that the symphony failed of an ordinarily friendly reception. But there was no such demonstration of favor as greeted Serge Koussevitzky's stunning performance of its immediate predecessor, the Fifth, at a recent Boston Symphony concert in the same auditorium. Mr. Stokowski's communication of the Sixth was also one of the most stimulating virtuosity. Whether, with repetitions, the new symphony will fare as well as the Fifth, or for that matter, the First of the Shostakovich series, is pure conjecture and not the critical business of the day.

Planned 'Lenin Symphony.'

We have Mr. Stokowski's word for it that the new work, once the obscurities of a first hearing have been penetrated, has "great depth of expression." In a program note he calls attention "to harmonic sequences and several melodies sounding at the same time, making modern counterpoint, which are of great originality and intensity." As compared to his writing in the Fifth Symphony, the composer has here become "more individualistic." Whether this means that he is less the voice of the proletariat, is for those who can decipher the politics in ideological music to say. It has been reported that Shosakovich originally intended to write "a Lenin symphony," in which he was to emulate Beethoven and the German's "Hymn to Joy" by having a chorus sing a poetic tribute to the father of the revolution. But the symphony has come forth sans chorus and, so far as can be discovered, sans Lenin. Possibly this, possibly something in the music as music, resulted in a mild reception when the Sixth was performed in Moscow, for the first time anywhere, just a year ago yesterday.

Less Heart Than Piccolo.

There are three movements: largo, allegro, presto. The first is remotely rapturous, glinting with a sort of glassy ecstacy. It begins arrestingly with a broad, long-breathed theme, its soaring lyricism seasoned with dissonance. But this largo goes on and on after it has seemed to reach a logical resting place several times. Details, such as trilling pedal points in the deep strings with woodwinds weaving patterns above, are of interest in their own right. But, as in the Shostakovich Fifth, one begins to look vainly for a heart. In lieu of that perhaps obsolete organ, there is always the piccolo. It has a distinctive role in the instrumentation of this work. And there are wind glissando effects to jog those who tire too easily. The allegro is a bravado sherzo, the presto another of those brass-band tunes, strikingly orchestrated and tossed about with engaging showmanship.

Mr. Stokowski's other music, in the first of the two Manhattan concerts he is contenting himself with this season, was the Beethoven "Leonore" No. 3, the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and "The Death of Siegfried" from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung." All was lushly, and in the case of the "Leonore," too lushly played. The conductor's exclusive seating arrangement again left the up-front woodwinds more than modestly assertive in their relation to the back-seat strings.

PHILHARMONIC GIVES CONCERT

Rudolf Serkin, Pianist, Soloist With New Yorkers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra came to Symphony Hall last evening, just 10 days after the Chicago Orchestra had played in that same auditorium. In neither case was the hall completely filled, though last evening's audience came near to doing the trick, a fact for which the presence of Rudolf Serkin as assisting pianist may have been partly responsible.

Although Bruno Walter and Dimitri Mitropolus will both lead the Philharmonic Symphony for a portion of the present season, the conductor last evening was the orchestra's regular leader, John Barbirolli. By no means a glamorous figure, Mr. Barbirolli is an earnest, faithful and competent director; and that the orchestra maintains its very high standards of tone and performance under his leadership speaks much for him. Even a Bostonian can listen to the Philharmonic Symphony without feeling disagreebaly superior.

Mr. Barbirolli might have made a more intriguing programme on this occasion. But this after all, is a matter of taste. Possibily most of the audience rejoiced to hear Schubert's long C major Symphony on top of that longest of piano concertos, the Second of Brahms. For this reviewer the high point of the evening was the first number, a Chaconne of Purcell, composed for strings and skilfully arranged by Mr. Barbirolli for a comparatively large orchestra. Purcell, who died when Bach was 10 years old, was an astonishingly prophetic composer. Parts of his Chaconne sounded a good deal more modern than anything in Brahms' Concerto. Here is a very great composer of whom we know all too little.

For a pianist to choose the Brahms B-flat would seem to be an act of abnegation and self-effacement. Until the fourth movement, when Brahms breaks down and really writes a piano concerto, the work is virtually a symphony with piano obbligato. Yet had Mr. Serkin selected the showiest of show pieces he could not have been any more enthusiastically received. He did play the finale with great brilliance, and his playing in the other movements while it could not, under the circumstances, bring down the house was worthy of all praise. If the audience realized this, too, such sense of values was much to its credit.

DAILY GLOBE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra

John Barbirolli and the gentlemen of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra paid their annual visit to Symphony Hall last night. With them came that admirable poet of the piano keyboard, Rudolf Serkin, who was soloist in the B-flat Concerto of Brahms. The concert began with a score new to Boston: Mr. Barbirolli's own transcription for large orchestra of a Chaconne in G minor by Henry Purcell. The Seventh (or "Great") Symphony by Schubert was closing piece.

While Symphony Hall was not filled, those who attended gave Messrs. Barbirolli and Serkin and their colleagues a very cordial greeting. Enthusiasm compensated in some degree for lack of numbers. The hall ought to have been filled. But the apathy of Bostonians toward visiting orchestras is one of the unsolvable mysteries. The Boston Symphony goes to New York and Carnegie Hall is filled. The New York orchestra comes to Boston and——well, what's the reason?

No doubt everyone in the audience welcomed opportunity to make acquaintance with Mr. Barbirolli's modern treatment of the 17th Century Purcell. But in the actual hearing one must admit that the version gives aid and comfort to the enemies of transcriptions. The Chaconne, says Pitts Sanborn in his ably written program notes, was originally the sixth of "Ten Sonatas of Four Parts," for the 17th Century equivalent of the string quartet.

Mr. Barbirolli has expanded the Chaconne into a big work hardly recognizable as Purcell. The scoring is heavy and in need of varied color, possessing none of the magnificence which is the redeeming virtue of such transcriptions as those Respighi and Stokowski made of pieces by Bach.

Mr. Serkin's performance of Brahms' great piano concerto is a masterpiece of technical prowess and esthetic perception. Its vitality is enormous, and at the same time it is poetic. Mr. Serkin commands the enviable power of obtaining rugged grandeur from the piano, but he does not exaggerate the music. Conversely, in the idyllic slow movement, his work is of caressing gentleness. No wonder, then, the audience clapped and stamped when the Concerto was over, and recalled Mr. Serkin to the stage numerous times.

A straightforward interpretation of the Schubert C major Symphony is not so common as might be thought. Music so completely unsophisticated, so direct, does tempt some conductors to twist it into a personal if not mannered reading. Mr. Barbirolli is, commendably, one of those bent entirely upon serving Schubert. His whole conception is honest, unadorned. When thus performed, and only then, may be music be heard at best. Mr. Barbirolli phrases the opening theme for solo horn quite simply, he keeps the pace moving, not too fast nor too slow.

The quality of the Philharmonic-Symphony playing last night was not up to the high standards they have shown here in the past. Perhaps, at the end of a fortnight's tour the men were tired. At any rate the familiar crispness was not always evident, the string tone was more brittle than light and fluid, and accompaniment for Brahms was almost perfunctory. Schubert was done with spirit, but could have been more songful. C. W. D.

BOSTON HERALD,

Dec 5.

Philharmonic Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra, John Barbirolli, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Purcell
Chaconne in G minor, transcribed for orchestra by John Barbirolli
Brahms
Piano Concerto in B flat major No. 2 Op. 83
Schubert .... Symphony in C major No. 7

We had looked forward to few concerts this season with as keen anticipatory pleasure as this one by the New York Philharmonic, and therefore was our disappointment the greater last night. The prospect of hearing the Brahms concerto was what aroused this previous emotion, and the performance was what in large measure scotched it. Mr. Serkin is a remarkable pianist, as has been time and again proved by his playing here. Moreover, the concerto accompaniments by the Philharmonic under Mr. Barbirolli have called forth universal praise.

So much for prospects, now for results. The first movement was a credit to no party last night. The playing of the orchestra was heavy-handed, frequently not precise and often sloppy. The sonority was not good. Mr. Serkin's playing, possibly in consequence, was nervous and jerky. The second and third movements established order again and sounded much as we had hoped. The finale, though, dispelled this armistice. The orchestral playing of the lovely second theme lacked buoyancy or much suggestion of Viennese gaiety. There were moments, of course, when the mists lifted, but this was not a performance as a whole that a first-rate pianist and ochestra could look back on with pleasure.

The Schubert Symphony once more let us hear how good an orchestra the Philharmonic can be when it wants to. Even here it was not always on its best behaviour. The scherzo was once heavily played, but this was Mr. Barbirolli's fault. He has at his command one of the best string ensembles in the world, but he seemed deliberately to cramp the rhythm of this movement.

The symphony, intrinsically lovely as it is, must always be something of a chore to orchestra and conductor. It is not hard to play; but, because of its length and the number of repetitions, it is dangerously easy to slump in its interpretation so that the playing sounds mechanical and perfunctory. It says much for Mr. Barbirolli's direction that this criticism could only rarely be levelled and then only in the last two movements. Most American orchestras have attained such a pitch of perfection and usually are at their best when on tour that we are apt to be hypercritical and look for faults rather than listen to the obvious virtues.

We can not become greatly excited over the Purcell Chaconne, which was heard for the first time in Boston in Barbirolli's orchestral transcription. We can imagine liking it very much in its original, chamber music form. But it seems hardly suitable blown up for a large modern orchestra. It certainly loses whatever intimacy it once possessed and is harly a character, essentially, to gain by its new magnificence. It is not that the arrangement was in poor taste—indeed Mr. Barbirolli was clearly at some pains in this respect—merely that it was not really worth doing in the first place.

There was a good-sized audience present, but not nearly of the size that an orchestra of the eminence of the Philharmonic should command in Boston. There was, however, a near-ovation after the concerto.

MUSIC

Shostakovitch Sixth

Stokowski and Philadelphia Orchestra Give The First Performances Outside of Russia

By EDWARD DOWNES

NEW YORK, Dec. 4—That restless innovator, Leopold Stokowski, having scandalized, puzzled and delighted the big city by permitting technicolor centaurettes to cavort upon a movie screen while he himself supplied an accompaniment consisting of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, was back in town yesterday with another surprise. This was the Sixth Symphony of the young Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovitch, played for the first time outside of Russia by the Philadelphia Orchestra last week in Philadelphia, and given its first New York hearing last night in Carnegie Hall. The rare concerts in which Mr. Stokowski nowadays conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra, are musical events of the first importance, whether they take place in New York, Philadelphia or elsewhere. And if his little Soviet surprise did not quite come off, there were compensating splendors in a program which included the scene of the murder of Siegfried and Siegfried's Funeral Music from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," an eloquent exposition of the Brahms-Haydn Variations and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture.

In spite of the lack of enthusiasm which the Soviet press greeted Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, expectation had been roused in this country by his magnificent Fifth as revealed to us this season by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Besides, we had Mr. Stokowski's word that "In each symphony Shostakovitch shows himself to be more of a master, to be ever growing, ever expanding in his imagination and musical consciousness. In his Sixth Symphony he has reached new depths, especially in the first part."

First Movement Best

It is true that the first, the slow movement is by far the strongest. But it does not approach in depth and strength of feeling, or in its architecture either, the slow movement of the fifth. Shostakovitch's strong melodic gift is still obvious in the first movement, where it speaks in an almost romantic vein. There is a long and rather beautiful dialogue for two flutes over a pedal point in the deep strings, in fact, there is a tendency throughout to use the instruments as individual voices rather than as members of a choir. When they are heard in groups, the combinations are often highly original.

The second movement, an allegro, starts out in a spirit of not too boisterous horseplay, but gets bogged down by the wayside and somehow never lives up to its initial promise. The last movement seemed the weakest of the three. Much of it is clothed in a modern pseudo-classical style, more than reminiscent of Prokofieff. There is a constantly recurring device known in Mozart's day as a "Mannheim rocket," and familiar to concert-goers from the first theme of Mozart's G minor Symphony. But there is little that is original in invention or in treatment of themes. Sterile is the word.

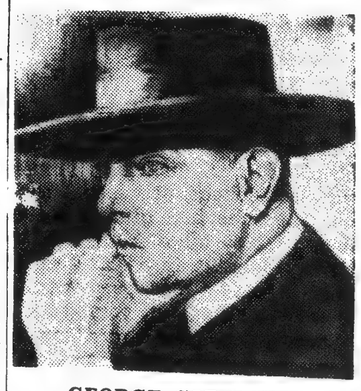
True, the first hearing of the Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony was a disappointment. Yet in view of the amazing difference between the same composer's Fifth Symphony as played by the Boston Symphony, and the Fifth Symphony interpreted by other orchestras we have heard, let us hope that Koussevitzky may be persuaded to give the Sixth Symphony, too, a hearing in Boston. Such a hearing might only confirm the unimportance of this music. Just the same, pending that concert, we reserve the right to change our minds completely about the Shostakovitch Sixth.

Brahms and Wagner

In the more familiar first half of the program there was better opportunity to appreciate Stokowski's extraordinary mastery of the sonorities and colors of the modern orchestra. The silvery sheen of the Philadelphia strings and the warmth and mellowness of its brass remain a joy to the most spoiled ear. Great finesse and a wealth of delicate nuance distinguished Stokowski's reading of the Brahms - Haydn Variations, though it might have profited from a more rugged style.

The Wagner on the other hand was magnificent. If this kind of orchestral music were ever heard nowadays from the pit of the Metropolitan Opera it would cause a revolution.

At Jordan Hall



GEORGE COPELAND
Noted pianist who appears in recital at Jordan Hall Thursday evening.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
DEC 4 - 1940

STOKOWSKI BRINGS SHOSTAKOVICH 6TH

New Symphony Introduced by the Philadelphians.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

The slickest of composer-technicians born in this century, Dmitri Shostakovich, enabled Leopold Stokowski to close a Philadelphia Orchestra concert in Carnegie Hall last night with a brilliant question mark. Performed for the first time in New York, the year-old Sixth Symphony of the musical laureate of the Soviets created no sensation. But it sent listeners away wondering whether there was more in it than they got out of it; and whether, after all, to be brought up in a capitalist country was to be blind, deaf and insensate to beauties that can flower only under Communism.

This is not to say that the symphony failed of an ordinarily friendly reception. But there was no such demonstration of favor as greeted Serge Koussevitzky's stunning performance of its immediate predecessor, the Fifth, at a recent Boston Symphony concert in the same auditorium. Mr. Stokowski's communication of the Sixth was also one of the most stimulating virtuosity. Whether, with repetitions, the new symphony will fare as well as the Fifth, or for that matter, the First of the Shostakovich series, is pure conjecture and not the critical business of the day.

Planned 'Lenin Symphony.'

We have Mr. Stokowski's word for it that the new work, once the obscurities of a first hearing have been penetrated, has "great depth of expression." In a program note he calls attention "to harmonic sequences and several melodies sounding at the same time, making modern counterpoint, which are of great originality and intensity." As compared to his writing in the Fifth Symphony, the composer has here become "more individualistic." Whether this means that he is less the voice of the proletariat, is for those who can decipher the politics in ideological music to say. It has been reported that Shosakovich originally intended to write "a Lenin symphony," in which he was to emulate Beethoven and the German's "Hymn to Joy" by having a chorus sing a poetic tribute to the father of the revolution. But the symphony has come forth sans chorus and, so far as can be discovered, sans Lenin. Possibly this, possibly something in the music as music, resulted in a mild reception when the Sixth was performed in Moscow, for the first time anywhere, just a year ago yesterday.

Less Heart Than Piccolo.

There are three movements: largo, allegro, presto. The first is remotely rapturous, glinting with a sort of glassy ecstacy. It begins arrestingly with a broad, long-breathed theme, its soaring lyricism seasoned with dissonance. But this largo goes on and on after it has seemed to reach a logical resting place several times. Details, such as trilling pedal points in the deep strings with woodwinds weaving patterns above, are of interest in their own right. But, as in the Shostakovich Fifth, one begins to look vainly for a heart. In lieu of that perhaps obsolete organ, there is always the piccolo. It has a distinctive role in the instrumentation of this work. And there are wind glissando effects to jog those who tire too easily. The allegro is a bravado sherzo, the presto another of those brass-band tunes, strikingly orchestrated and tossed about with engaging showmanship.

Mr. Stokowski's other music, in the first of the two Manhattan concerts he is contenting himself with this season, was the Beethoven "Leonore" No. 3, the Brahms Variations on a Theme by Haydn, and "The Death of Siegfried" from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung." All was lushly, and in the case of the "Leonore," too lushly played. The conductor's exclusive seating arrangement again left the up-front woodwinds more than modestly assertive in their relation to the back-seat strings.

PHILHARMONIC GIVES CONCERT

Rudolf Serkin, Pianist, Soloist With New Yorkers

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra came to Symphony Hall last evening, just 10 days after the Chicago Orchestra had played in that same auditorium. In neither case was the hall completely filled, though last evening's audience came near to doing the trick, a fact for which the presence of Rudolf Serkin as assisting pianist may have been partly responsible.

Although Bruno Walter and Dimitri Mitropolus will both lead the Philharmonic Symphony for a portion of the present season, the conductor last evening was the orchestra's regular leader, John Barbirolli. By no means a glamorous figure, Mr. Barbirolli is an earnest, faithful and competent director; and that the orchestra maintains its very high standards of tone and performance under his leadership speaks much for him. Even a Bostonian can listen to the Philharmonic Symphony without feeling disagreebaly superior.

Mr. Barbirolli might have made a more intriguing programme on this occasion. But this after all, is a matter of taste. Possibly most of the audience rejoiced to hear Schubert's long C major Symphony on top of that longest of piano concertos, the Second of Brahms. For this reviewer the high point of the evening was the first number, a Chaconne of Purcell, composed for strings and skilfully arranged by Mr. Barbirolli for a comparatively large orchestra. Purcell, who died when Bach was 10 years old, was an astonishingly prophetic composer. Parts of his Chaconne sounded a good deal more modern than anything in Brahms' Concerto. Here is a very great composer of whom we know all too little.

For a pianist to choose the Brahms B-flat would seem to be an act of abnegation and self-effacement. Until the fourth movement, when Brahms breaks down and really writes a piano concerto, the work is virtually a symphony with piano obbligato. Yet had Mr. Serkin selected the showiest of show pieces he could not have been any more enthusiastically received. He did play the finale with great brilliance, and his playing in the other movements while it could not, under the circumstances, bring down the house was worthy of all praise. If the audience realized this, too, such sense of values was much to its credit.

BOSTON HERALD,
Dec 5,

Philharmonic Symphony

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The New York Philharmonic Symphony orchestra, John Barbirolli, conductor, gave a concert last night in Symphony Hall. Rudolf Serkin, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Purcell ..... Chaconne in G minor, transcribed for orchestra by John Barbirolli
Brahms ..... Piano Concerto in B flat major No. 2 Op 83
Schubert .... Symphony in C major No. 7

We had looked forward to few concerts this season with as keen anticipatory pleasure as this one by the New York Philharmonic, and therefore was our disappointment the greater last night. The prospect of hearing the Brahms concerto was what aroused this previous emotion, and the performance was what in large measure scotched it. Mr. Serkin is a remarkable pianist, as has been time and again proved by his playing here. Moreover, the concerto accompaniments by the Philharmonic under Mr. Barbirolli have called forth universal praise.

So much for prospects, now for results. The first movement was a credit to no party last night. The playing of the orchestra was heavy-handed, frequently not precise and often sloppy. The sonority was not good. Mr. Serkin's playing, possibly in consequence, was nervous and jerky. The second and third movements established order again and sounded much as we had hoped. The finale, though, dispelled this armistice. The orchestral playing of the lovely second theme lacked buoyancy or much suggestion of Viennese gaiety. There were moments, of course, when the mists lifted, but this was not a performance as a whole that a first-rate pianist and ochestra could look back on with pleasure.

The Schubert Symphony once more let us hear how good an orchestra the Philharmonic can be when it wants to. Even here it was not always on its best behaviour. The scherzo was once heavily played, but this was Mr. Barbirolli's fault. He has at his command one of the best string ensembles in the world, but he seemed deliberately to cramp the rhythm of this movement.

The symphony, intrinsically lovely as it is, must always be something of a chore to orchestra and conductor. It is not hard to play; but, because of its length and the number of repetitions, it is dangerously easy to slump in its interpretation so that the playing sounds mechanical and perfunctory. It says much for Mr. Barbirolli's direction that this criticism could only rarely be levelled and then only in the last two movements. Most American orchestras have attained such a pitch of perfection and usually are at their best when on tour that we are apt to be hypercritical and look for faults rather than listen to the obvious virtues.

We can not become greatly excited over the Purcell Chaconne, which was heard for the first time in Boston in Barbirolli's orchestral transcription. We can imagine liking it very much in its original, chamber music form. But it seems hardly suitable blown up for a large modern orchestra. It certainly loses whatever intimacy it once possessed and is harly a character, essentially, to gain by its new magnificence. It is not that the arrangement was in poor taste—indeed Mr. Barbirolli was clearly at some pains in this respect—merely that it was not really worth doing in the first place.

There was a good-sized audience present, but not nearly of the size that an orchestra of the eminence of the Philharmonic should command in Boston. There was, however, a near-ovation after the concerto.

DAILY GLOBE

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra

John Barbirolli and the gentlemen of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra paid their annual visit to Symphony Hall last night. With them came that admirable poet of the piano keyboard, Rudolf Serkin, who was soloist in the B-flat Concerto of Brahms. The concert began with a score new to Boston: Mr. Barbirolli's own transcription for large orchestra of a Chaconne in G minor by Henry Purcell. The Seventh (or "Great") Symphony by Schubert was closing piece.

While Symphony Hall was not filled, those who attended gave Messrs. Barbirolli and Serkin and their colleagues a very cordial greeting. Enthusiasm compensated in some degree for lack of numbers. The hall ought to have been filled. But the apathy of Bostonians toward visiting orchestras is one of the unsolvable mysteries. The Boston Symphony goes to New York and Carnegie Hall is filled. The New York orchestra comes to Boston and——well, what's the reason?

No doubt everyone in the audience welcomed opportunity to make acquaintance with Mr. Barbirolli's modern treatment of the 17th Century Purcell. But in the actual hearing one must admit that the version gives aid and comfort to the enemies of transcriptions. The Chaconne, says Pitts Sanborn in his ably written program notes, was originally the sixth of "Ten Sonatas of Four Parts," for the 17th Century equivalent of the string quartet.

Mr. Barbirolli has expanded the Chaconne into a big work hardly recognizable as Purcell. The scoring is heavy and in need of varied color, possessing none of the magnificence which is the redeeming virtue of such transcriptions as those Respighi and Stokowski made of pieces by Bach.

Mr. Serkin's performance of Brahms' great piano concerto is a masterpiece of technical prowess and esthetic perception. Its vitality is enormous, and at the same time it is poetic. Mr. Serkin commands the enviable power of obtaining rugged grandeur from the piano, but he does not exaggerate the music. Conversely, in the idyllic slow movement, his work is of caressing gentleness. No wonder, then, the audience clapped and stamped when the Concerto was over, and recalled Mr. Serkin to the stage numerous times.

A straightforward interpretation of the Schubert C major Symphony is not so common as might be thought. Music so completely unsophisticated, so direct, does tempt some conductors to twist it into a personal if not mannered reading. Mr. Barbirolli is, commendably, one of those bent entirely upon serving Schubert. His whole conception is honest, unadorned. When thus performed, and only then, may be music be heard at best. Mr. Barbirolli phrases the opening theme for solo horn quite simply, he keeps the pace moving, not too fast nor too slow.

The quality of the Philharmonic-Symphony playing last night was not up to the high standards they have shown here in the past. Perhaps, at the end of a fortnight's tour the men were tired. At any rate the familiar crispness was not always evident, the string tone was more brittle than light and fluid, and accompaniment for Brahms was almost perfunctory. Schubert was done with spirit, but could have been more songful. C. W. D.

MUSIC

Daily Mirror Dec. 4-40

Shostakovitch Sixth

Stokowski and Philadelphia Orchestra Give The First Performances Outside of Russia

By EDWARD DOWNES

NEW YORK, Dec. 4—That restless innovator, Leopold Stokowski, having scandalized, puzzled and delighted the big city by permitting technicolor centaurettes to cavort upon a movie screen while he himself supplied an accompaniment consisting of Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, was back in town yesterday with another surprise. This was the Sixth Symphony of the young Soviet composer, Dimitri Shostakovitch, played for the first time outside of Russia by the Philadelphia Orchestra last week in Philadelphia, and given its first New York hearing last night in Carnegie Hall. The rare concerts in which Mr. Stokowski nowadays conducts the Philadelphia Orchestra, are musical events of the first importance, whether they take place in New York, Philadelphia or elsewhere. And if his little Soviet surprise did not quite come off, there were compensating splendors in a program which included the scene of the murder of Siegfried and Siegfried's Funeral Music from Wagner's "Goetterdaemmerung," an eloquent exposition of the Brahms-Haydn Variations and Beethoven's Third "Leonore" Overture.

In spite of the lack of enthusiasm which the Soviet press greeted Shostakovitch's Sixth Symphony, expectation had been roused in this country by his magnificent Fifth as revealed to us this season by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Besides, we had Mr. Stokowski's word that "In each symphony Shostakovitch shows himself to be more of a master, to be ever growing, ever expanding in his imagination and musical consciousness. In his Sixth Symphony he has reached new depths, especially in the first part."

First Movement Best

It is true that the first, the slow movement is by far the strongest. But it does not approach in depth and strength of feeling, or in its architecture either, the slow movement of the fifth. Shostakovitch's strong melodic gift is still obvious in the first movement, where it speaks in an almost romantic vein. There is a long and rather beautiful dialogue for two flutes over a pedal point in the deep strings, in fact, there is a tendency throughout to use the instruments as individual voices rather than as members of a choir. When they are heard in groups, the combinations are often highly original.

The second movement, an allegro, starts out in a spirit of not too boisterous horseplay, but gets bogged down by the wayside and somehow never lives up to its initial promise. The last movement seemed the weakest of the three. Much of it is clothed in a modern pseudo-classical style, more than reminiscent of Prokofieff. There is a constantly recurring device known in Mozart's day as a "Mannheim rocket," and familiar to concert-goers from the first theme of Mozart's G minor Symphony. But there is little that is original in invention or in treatment of themes. Sterile is the word.

True, the first hearing of the Shostakovitch Sixth Symphony was a disappointment. Yet in view of the amazing difference between the same composer's Fifth Symphony as played by the Boston Symphony, and the Fifth Symphony interpreted by other orchestras we have heard, let us hope that Koussevitzky may be persuaded to give the Sixth Symphony, too, a hearing in Boston. Such a hearing might only confirm the unimportance of this music. Just the same, pending that concert, we reserve the right to change our minds completely about the Shostakovitch Sixth.

Brahms and Wagner

In the more familiar first half of the program there was better opportunity to appreciate Stokowski's extraordinary mastery of the sonorities and colors of the modern orchestra. The silvery sheen of the Philadelphia strings and the warmth and mellowness of its brass remain a joy to the most spoiled ear. Great finesse and a wealth of delicate nuance distinguished Stokowski's reading of the Brahms - Haydn Variations, though it might have profited from a more rugged style.

The Wagner on the other hand was magnificent. If this kind of orchestral music were ever heard nowadays from the pit of the Metropolitan Opera it would cause a revolution.

At Jordan Hall

GEORGE COPELAND
Noted pianist who appears in recital at Jordan Hall Thursday evening.

CSM. Dec 7

In Honor of Sibelius

By L. A. Sloper

Like the rest of the musical world, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra are doing homage to Jean Sibelius this week, in honor of the Finnish master's seventy-fifth birthday. The Boston celebration takes the form of a program, for the eighth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, made up of three Sibelius symphonies—the Sixth, the Seventh and the Second.

Sibelius is at the height of his fame as he observes his seventy-fifth anniversary. His genius was long ago recognized by the Government of his country, which awarded him an annuity that has enabled him to devote his lifetime to composition. Recognition came more slowly in the rest of the world. At first, there were only a few devoted followers. Gradually the number grew. In recent years, thanks to the sponsorship of a few conductors and the acclaim of a few critics, Sibelius has become one of the most popular symphonic composers in America.

There is a danger in such success. Often the disciples of a great artist, in their eagerness to win honor for him, overdo their praises. When they have him safely esconced, as they suppose, in the musical hall of fame, there is a tendency to re-examine him. This sometimes leads to a revaluation. But this revaluation also tends to be carried to an extreme. Detractors become voluble. Presently the hero is reduced to a lower position than he held before the campaign in his behalf began.

* * *

The reputation of Sibelius is probably about to undergo such a phase. Indeed, there is already evidence of it. No doubt some of the Finnish composer's advocates have carried their admiration of him too far. One of them, Cecil Gray, has placed Sibelius above Brahms and has suggested the possibility that he may rank above Beethoven. Already the voices of the detractors are heard. It is being said that Sibelius is a badly overrated composer.

This tendency to go to extremes in evaluations is unfortunate. It is unfair to artists, and confusing to the public. No sooner have listeners been educated to appreciate a composer than they are told that he is no longer worthy of so much admiration. How much better it would be if a more balanced view could be taken of the artist in the first instance.

But that is difficult, because human judgment itself is weak and insecure. Sometimes you will find the very men who were loudest in praise of a composer are among the first to change with the fashion.

* * *

On the other hand, these critical flurries, these passing currents of opinion, cannot affect the ultimate place of an artist. Sibelius no doubt has flaws which were overlooked by many in the first enthusiasm of their acquaintance with him. Nevertheless, he is still deserving of their admiration. His originality, his musical integrity, his emotional power will, we may be confident, assure him a permanent niche.

Dr. Koussevitzky's birthday list was well chosen, from the point of view of program making and of a brief survey of the composer's work. The Sixth is the least accessible of Sibelius' symphonies. Yet, as Mr. Burke's able program notes reminded us, it has its champions among the special advocates of Sibelius. But the Seventh, from the same period, has an emotional impact that can hardly be resisted. And the Second, of course, requires no champions.

Dr. Koussevitzky has long been one of the chief and most influential of the proponents of the music of Sibelius, and one of its most persuasive interpreters. Returning to the podium Friday afternoon after a brief fall vacation, he honored not only the composer, but his magnificent orchestra and himself by the performances he directed. There was a prolonged ovation at the close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM WEST NEWTON, PA
TIMES
12/6/40

Symphony Orchestra Draws Music Lovers

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 106 players, reputed the finest organization of its kind in the world, having reached new heights under the electrifying baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give their annual pair of concerts in Pittsburgh at Syria Mosque on Saturday evening, December 14 and Sunday afternoon, December 15.

The Sunday afternoon concert gives opportunity to hundreds of out of town residents to hear this great orchestra and return home early in the evening. All roads within a radius of 75 miles lead to Syria Mosque when the Boston Symphony comes to the city. Jesus Maria Sanroma, one of the foremost of the younger generation of pianists, will be soloist at the Sunday afternoon concert. The following important programs are announced.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 9 - 1940

George W. Edman, secretary of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, Inc., is traveling for a few days with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the start of its annual western tour. Mr. Edman is the guest of the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, and the manager, George Judd.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, O.
TIMES
DEC 6 - 1940

Boston Orchestra Uses Special Train

Members of the Boston Symphony orchestra will arrive in Toledo at 12:20 p. m. Dec. 12 for their concert in the Toledo Museum of Art.

This was announced yesterday by E. C. Cook, passenger agent of the New York Central railroad, which is providing a special train for the orchestra's concert tour. A feature of the train, Mr. Cook said, is a special baggage car maintained at a low even temperature and under guard to house the valuable musical instruments.

The more than 100 musicians will remain in Toledo overnight and leave at 10:30 a. m. Dec. 13 for Cleveland.

This Clipping From
ANN ARBOR, MICH.
NEWS
DEC 6 - 1940

Boston Symphony Has Special Train

Members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive here by special train at 3:25 Wednesday afternoon for their Choral Union concert that night in Hill auditorium.

A feature of the special New York Central train in which the band will tour Ohio, New York and Pennsylvania for one week, is a baggage car which is kept at a constant, low temperature and under guard and which contains the many valuable instruments of the orchestra.

The orchestra, numbering more than 100 men, will stop overnight at the Michigan Union and will leave at 10 o'clock Thursday morning for Toledo.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 8 - 1940

KOUSSEVITZKY IN ACTION

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY—The renowned conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is shown in three striking action pictures. He will be here with the orchestra for concerts on Saturday night and next Sunday afternoon at Syria Mosque.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
DEC 7 - 1940

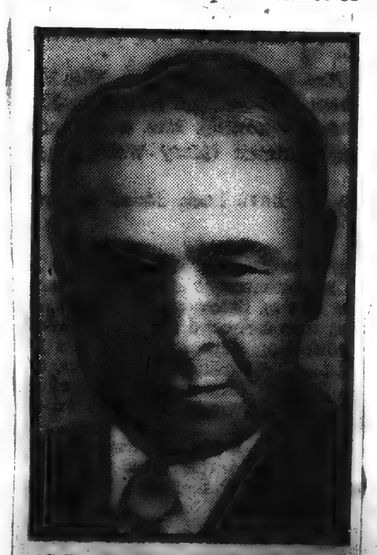
Cleveland, Boston Syr. Week in Music Here;

BY ELMORE BACON

TWO great orchestras command the attention of music fans the coming week, along with the annual offering of "The Messiah."

The Cleveland Orchestra under Dr. Artur Rodzinski features the first Cleveland performance of Alban Berg's violin concerto, with Louis Krasner as soloist. That's at Severance Hall.

And Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony offer the first Cleveland performance of Stravinsky's "Capriccio," with J. M. Sanroma at the piano. This at Music Hall.



DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY brings the Boston Symphony orchestra to Music Hall Friday night.

Clevelanders, their symphonic appetites whetted by Dr. Rodzinski's fine programs, have been according the Boston visitors the warmest of welcomes. And this, it seems to us, is as it should be.

Dr. Rodzinski and the Cleveland Orchestra have such an assured place in the symphonic sun that it seems to us visiting orchestras come as a complement to the Rodzinski cultural endeavors, rather than as competition.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 9 - 1940

Boston Symphony Here Tonight

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, did his Christmas giving early to Rochester music lovers.

On arrival today for his annual concert tonight in the Eastman Theater, he announced addition to his already published program of the colorful Debussy Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes.

These works complete a finely molded program of master works.

The evening's music opens with the Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88. After that comes the Debusyy addition and then, before intermission, the Stravinsky Capriccio for piano and orchestra.

This work will introduce to Rochesterians the renowned pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, as soloist.

Concluding the program will be the Brahms Second Symphony.

FRENCH LEADER AT SYMPHONY

M. Milhaud Will Conduct Boston Orchestra in Concerts of the Coming Week

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

THE French Group of Six, which no longer seems very revolutionary, has shaken itself down about as follows: Milhaud and Honegger (take your choice), Poulenc, Auric, Miss Taillefer and Durey. Poor Durey, who in these parts knows anything by him?

Several years back Honegger conducted a programme of his works at the Symphony Concerts, and now we are to hear from Milhaud. The latter, who is now living in California, as a member of the faculty of Mills College, will make his first Symphony Hall appearance since 1926 at this week's pair of concerts. On the former occasion he was disclosed to us as piano soloist in his own "Le Carnival d'Aix." Now he will assume the role of conductor and direct the first performances here of his "Le Cortege funebre," composed last May, his "Fantaisie pastorale" for piano and orchestra, in which the soloist will be Stell Andersen, and his "Suite Provencale." The second half of the programme will be given over to Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony, conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From AKRON, O.
BEACON-JOURNAL
DEC 14 1940

Koussevitzky Is Applauded At Cleveland

By OSCAR SMITH

THE appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's baton last night on the Cleveland concert course in the Music hall of Public auditorium was the signal for a tremendous ovation not only for the famous conductor and his musicians but for the piano soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, as well.

Known for his presentations of modern compositions, even "ultra-modern" works, Dr. Koussevitzky revealed his skill in program-building—not to mention his wizardy with the baton.

Haydn, Brahms and Debussy were on the program, and so was Stravinsky, with his clever and scintillating "Capriccio," for orchestra and piano solo.

Pianist Is Applauded

The 37-year-old Sanroma, Porto Rican pianist and teacher who became pianist with the Boston orchestra 15 years ago, was compelled to take many curtain calls for his brilliant playing of the "Capriccio."

Rarely does an audience at a symphonic concert experience as much mounting excitement as was in evidence on last night's program. The classic measures of Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88, were given an exuberant quality and unfailing vigor; the vaporous beauty and exquisite tone-painting of Debussy's "Nuages" and the contrasting and rhythmic festival spirit of "Fetes" were superbly projected and, as a capstone for the program, was Brahms' lyrical Symphony No. 2 in D major.

It was in the finale of this last symphony that the famous orchestra reached its loftiest heights of tonal richness and strength. It seemed as if Dr. Koussevitzky, now exhorting and talking busily to his musicians, now smiling benignly at particularly well-done passages, could not possibly draw forth more spendor from his orchestra. But he always did. That finale of Brahms' Second Symphony was a fitting close to a memorable evening of music.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PRESS
DEC 14 1940

Boston Symphony Again Thrills Capacity Audience

Koussevitsky and His 110 Men Here for Third Time; Heifetz at Severance Next Week

By MILTON WIDDER

ONCE again it was a pleasure and an exhilarating experience for Cleveland to pay homage to the great Boston Symphony Orchestra and its virulent leader, Serge Koussevitzky.

Public Music Hall was filled to capacity last night and the grateful audience showered thunderous applause on this 110-piece symphony orchestra and its leader.

A wide variety of compositions were played by the orchestra, displaying its different techniques and showing that its men are masters in many phases of symphonic literature. Mr. Koussevitzky seems to be a master program builder, working up to an appropriate climax, something like a champion prize fighter preparing for his big battle.

The concert last night started out with the playing Haydn's Symphony in G Major, No. 88, in which the orchestra displayed its precision and metronomic astuteness, something like the aforesaid prize fighter takes road work to get himself in shape.

Next came two short works by Debussy, "Clouds" and "Festivals," whose ethereal passages and fine points were given a poetic reading. This phase of the concert might be construed in the languages of fisticuffs as "shadow boxing"—still preparing for the big battle.

The Brahms Second

THIRD work on the program was Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, in which rhythm, sharply defined pianistic difficulties and fantastic thematic developments, could be compared with footwork in the squared circle. In this phase of training Mr. Koussevitzky had an excellent "sparring partner" Jesu Maria Sanroma, a fine pianist whose fame preceded him. The Stravinsky might be modern, but it has its very entertaining points.

Then came the "piece de resistance" in the career of "Champ Koussy" who met in the last and critical battle another champ, Johannes Brahms of the Vienna Brahmses.

"Kid" Brahms came into the ring with a reputation and his contribution for this encounter was the marvelous Second Symphony—the gem of the Brahmsian literature.

The battle—meaning the preformance—was terrific. The two champs were made for each other and the heroic performance, showing the best points of each, brought the huge audience to its feet in shouts and bravos.

Seriously, though, Mr. Koussevitzky discovered for us hidden beauties in this symphony, proving that all the glowing things that have been said of the Boston and its prophetic conductor are mere words that cannot recreate the thrill a Boston concert produces.

We hope the Cleveland concert course's manager, Mrs. Emil Brudno, will return this orchestra for repeated engagements in the years to come.

Pension Fund Concert

THE members of the Cleveland Orchestra have formed the Cleveland Orchestra Pension Institute to provide a suitable form of retirement for members who have spent a number of years in the service of the orchestra. The institute is the result of a long-felt desire to have a pension plan similar to those successfully operated by the Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago and other orchestras. The Cleveland Orchestra will be the only orchestra to have a pension fund administered solely by orchestra members. A portion of the fund will be raised by weekly dues. The rest must be earned by Pension Fund concerts.

The pension institute will be headed by a committee including Philip Kirchner, oboe; Charles McBrie, 'cello; Maurice Sharp, flute; Frederick Funkhouser, viola, and Albert Edelman of the first violin section, president.

The first pension fund concert will take place on Jan. 17 in Severance Hall. Arthur Rodzinski will conduct, and the soloists will be Severin Eisenberger, piano; Josef Fuchs, violin, and Leonard Rose, 'cello. The program will open with the Toccata and Fugue in D minor of Bach. Mr. Fuchs and Mr. Rose will be the violin and 'cello soloists in Brahms' Double Concerto in A minor. Mr. Eisenberger will appear in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 17 1940

Distinguished Recognition

The fact that the Baldwin Piano is now being used by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra is tribute of the highest type. Yet the Baldwin company makes those fine, "Acrosonic" spinette pianos that are designed for any home, even to the tiniest apartment, and which may be purchased from $365 up at Gallup & Alfred's, 201 Asylum St. What could be a more fitting gift to any music lover?

This Clipping From DETROIT, MICH.
FREE PRESS
DEC 15 1940

Islanders Motor Off to Concert

A GROUP of music lovers motored to Ann Arbor Wednesday evening, to hear the Boston Symphony program in Mnr Auditorium, under the direction of Serge Koussevitsky.

In it were Mrs. Reginald E. Leggette, Mrs. Sidney Corbett, III, Mrs. Cyrus H. Kinsman, Mr. and Mrs. Frederick S. Glover, Jr., of the Island, who were joined by Mrs. Sterling Smith, now of Detroit, and Mr. and Mrs. Harry H. McGregor, of Trenton. Mrs. McGregor's brother, Roland Tapley, is one of the first violins in this famous orchestra.

This Clipping From
TULSA, OKLA.
WORLD
DEC 14 1940

47

Robert Weatherly to Play With Important Orchestra

Young Robert Weatherly of Tulsa will occupy the first trumpet chair in one of the most important orchestra series of the New York season, that presented by the New Friends of Music in Carnegie hall beginning Sunday afternoon.

The opening concert of the season by the New Friends of Music, with Weatherly playing first trumpet, will be broadcast Sunday afternoon over NBC at 4:30 o'clock (C.S.T.), consisting of two Brandenburg concertos by Bach and the world premiere of the second chamber symphony by the famed modernist Arnold Schonberg.

The orchestra will give 10 subscription concerts conducted by Fritz Stiedry, with soloists of the rank of Rudolph Serkin, William Primrose, Egon Petri and Nathan Milstein. The New Friends of Music is one of the most highly esteemed chamber and orchestral organizations in the United States.

The 18-year-old musician is the son of Mr. and Mrs. Albert Weatherly, 1731 South Florence place. He is in his third year at the Juilliard Graduate School of Music majoring in trumpet. Returning to New York after a summer scholarship with the Berkshire Festival orchestra under Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston symphony, he was accepted for membership in the National Orchestra association.

This association is regarded as the "West Point and Annapolis" of orchestra trainees, under the direction of Leon Barzin. An average of only 23 players are accepted each year. For the last 10 years the association has presented regular symphonic concerts in Carnegie hall, with many of the world's most renowned soloists performing as their contribution to the association's activities. This year for the first time half of each concert will consist of an operatic presentation.

Before going to New York young Weatherly studied trumpet with his father, Albert Weatherly and attended A. & M. college at Stillwater for one year. For several seasons he was a member of the Tulsa civic symphony. His teacher at Berkshire was Pierre Mager of the Boston symphony, and in New York he studies under William Vacchiano of the New York Philharmonic symphony.

—G. W. B.

ROBERT WEATHERLY

Survivor of 'Les Six'

Darius Milhaud, famous French composer, who will conduct several of his own compositions with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dec. 20 and 21.

THROUGH SIXTY YEARS WITH THE Boston Symphony Orchestra

PHOTO BY EGONE

THE BOSTON HERALD

December 15, 1940

A Continuing Record of

OUTSTANDING MUSICAL ACHIEVEMENT

HAS JOINED TOGETHER TWO GREAT AMERICAN INSTITUTIONS . . .

THE Baldwin PIANO AND THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

» » World-wide recognition of the fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the musical genius of Serge Koussevitzky is a sterling tribute to sixty years of a determined search for perfection in musical interpretation.

» » Because of his undying demand for precision and tonal perfection, Dr. Koussevitzky has given America a preeminent cultural institution of which it can well be proud.

"The Baldwin piano for the orchestra, as well as for my own use, is perfection . . . a truly orchestral tone, round, full, and of magnificent color. I consider it a great work of musical art and look forward to many years of happy association with the superb Baldwin."

Serge Koussevitzky

» » Praise such as this is an honor seldom accorded to any piano. It is distinguished recognition of an uncompromising effort through the years to produce an instrument to serve as a fitting companion to the expressive personalities of today's great masters.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA NOW USES THE BALDWIN PIANO IN ITS CONCERTS

THE BALDWIN PIANO WAREROOMS

150 BOYLSTON STREET, BOSTON, MASS.

Products of Baldwin... BALDWIN, ACROSONIC, HAMILTON, AND HOWARD PIANOS

Crowning a Glorious Vision

By LAWRENCE DAME

How a Man, Denied the Fulfillment Of His Own Genius, Made His Love For Music a Communal Heritage

A great spirit is hovering about the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this 60th year of existence. Although the immortals of music—Beethoven and Wagner and the rest—are on the stage, they hold the background. The spirit is that of a civil war veteran who, early in life, through an accident, lost his hope of becoming a great musician but who conquered the fate which might have made him exclusively a banker, translating everything in terms of money.

This Yankee who founded one of the modern world's three great orchestras at a time when Boston culture had sunk very low, substituted a new vision, worthy of the Medicis of old Florence, for his personal ambitions. With his arm crippled, he could not give his own music to Boston; so he determined to stage a musical renaissance that would benefit everybody.

MAJOR HIGGINSON ENTERS

That man was Henry Lee Higginson. His own story is also the story of how an orchestra was born and how it grew, how culture rose and allied arts found faith.

It is a tale of imagination and self-sacrifice, of stunning defeats and magnificent victories. Of all the annals of Boston Town, it is one of the most inspiring.

The man with the kindly eyes, the fierce moustachioed beard and the Rebel sabre cut across his right cheek is dead now. The orchestra he created is more than ever a living thing. It has raised the standards of music to new heights. It is Henry Lee Higginson's legacy to America and to the world.

Born in New York of old New England stock, Henry Higginson went, of course, to Harvard. And although he left school in the middle of his freshman year, because of eye trouble, he was often referred to paradoxically as "the typical Harvard man." Seeking rest, he went to Europe on a sort of grand tour for several months. Then he returned to Boston and was sat down at a counting house desk. He might have stayed there the rest of his life.

AWAY WITH FINANCE

However, young Henry had the soul of an artist. He had always liked the piano, and as he sat, cramming his head and his ledgers with neat little figures, he still found room to toy with the idea of becoming a musician.

One day he rose from his banal stool, determined not to sit on it again. He returned to Europe, in 1856, at the age of 22, and he threw himself into the study of music in Vienna with an enthusiasm which never left him, not even when he was a very old man. Relatives looked askance. One, Charles Russell Lowell, wrote condescendingly, "Well, with a little culture, Henry will probably come back far more of a man and no less a merchant."

From Henry came letters in an entirely different vein. "Music is almost my inner world," he wrote. One can imagine him listening to Strauss, in person, in Vienna, and going nights to Grinzing to drink the new wine and watch the players of gay pieces weave back and forth under the vines. One may also imagine him, for it is a fact, applying himself with Yankee industry to the hard, cold matter of musical technique.

Again, in a letter, appeared a thought which must have seemed a bit revolutionary to Henry's home-bound friends. "My money may fly away, my knowledge cannot," he said.

The young student ate the heavy but pleasant Austrian food, learned the German language, gave lessons in English and practiced, practiced, practiced at the piano. He must have worked terrifically hard.

MAJOR HENRY LEE HIGGINSON, founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thus it was no wonder that he had a series of severe headaches. He went to a little Viennese barber, who, in the custom of the day, was also a surgeon and a leech. "Bleeding's the thing," said the man, and he took a half pint of blood out of Henry's left arm. The student went right back to his piano and pounded away with the left hand that night. And that was his last night of effective practice.

A nerve had been injured by the barber's puncture, and the exercise immediately afterward had crippled the patient. In 1860, Henry Higginson faced the truth. He had a mastery of technique and no chance to practice it. He returned to America, just then about to erupt in the civil war.

A LITTLE MUSIC HISTORY

Although the young man could not play the piano, he could swing a sabre and he did so, as a dashing officer of the First Massachusetts Cavalry. By irony, he was cut down himself in the first skirmish of his troop. That sent him out of the war, and in 1865, he was developing oil wells in Ohio. He returned to Boston and entered the banking firm of Lee, Higginson & Co. in 1868 and he remained primarily a business man until the orchestra was founded in 1881.

So we find a man forced away from the life of a musician, yet full of music. He had to do something with it. He did. Freud has a word for it.

Music, it must be said, had not flourished under the Puritans, though they were fairly good at psalm-singing, and it had not been given much of a chance in Boston until 1815, when the Handel and Haydn Society was formed, for choral purposes. This society actually wrote to Beethoven, asking him to write a special oratorio for its use. In 1837 appeared the rival Musical Institute of Boston. The Boston Academy of Music, 1833, gave the first Beethoven symphonies to be heard here in 1840. People abroad began to hear about Boston as a sort of "Hub" and visiting singers appeared. Sometimes they had to perform in railroad stations for want of an auditorium, and so in 1852 the Boston Music Hall was built.

The Music Hall, nothing ornate and often used for prize fights, dances and lectures as well as concerts, stood on the present site of Loew's Orpheum Theater, off Tremont street in Hamilton place. In fact, when the Music Hall was vacated and the orchestra moved into Symphony Hall in 1900, part of the old hall's foundations were used for the temple of the cinema.

To this hall, Henry Higginson and gay bloods of the town, with ladies in horse cars as well as broughams, came to hear the Harvard Musical Association concerts, the Musical Fund Society soirees, and Carl Zerrahn's Germania orchestra of 50 players.

Higginson thought that something better could be done, so that Boston might have a permanent orchestra all its own. He began to talk about his plan and he was heard to scheme and question himself in the very midst of a soft waltz by the Germania group. He was a man with a vision.

"THE DREAM OF MY LIFE"

Georg Henschel, later Sir George Henschel, came to town from London in 1881 and Henschel conducted his own Concert Overture for the Harvard Musical concert. Higginson heard and saw. He thought he had his man.

PATRON OF ARTS, symbolizing the daring of Boston's musical renaissance, was Mrs. Jack Gardner, as painted by Sargent in her prime.

A few days after this concert in the Music Hall, Major Higginson wrote Henschel, outlined plans for an orchestra of 60 players and offered the singer and composer the chance of becoming first conductor of the embryo Boston Symphony Orchestra. Henschel, who was engaged to a Boston girl, Lillian Bailey, jumped at the opportunity.

"This has been the dream of my life," Major Higginson explained. He was 46; he was to die at 84. "For many years my hope for music lay asleep. Now it revives."

The major did not think about profits. He knew perfectly well that it would cost $100,000 to organize an orchestra and that the deficit would be $20,000 a year. He wanted to have a band of musicians, he felt himself competent to direct their destinies, and he was public-spirited enough, in addition to achieving in a roundabout way his old artistic ambitions, to want the populace to share his delight. For 36 years he kept that orchestra going through his own initiative, and the constant deficits were met through his own cheerfully opened pocketbook.

This Boston Maecenas was remarkably foresighted, right at the start. He acquired control of the Music Hall, so that prize fighters would not disturb the long rehearsals which he deemed essential to success. He wanted what some people termed "hoipolloi," in other words, the non-Brahmin proletariat, to be able to attend, so he set the price of single tickets at 25 and 75 cents. Season tickets were $5 and $10.

In that distant day, he actually visualized the Pops concerts, suggesting that the orchestra could play heavy stuff in winter and "could relax in summer, playing a lighter sort of thing." Besides, since the first orchestra was made up of that local talent which used to play at weddings, dances and funerals, and inasmuch as a $10 commission often lured a musician out of the ranks, summer work would supplement the winter season financially, so that it would be profitable to remain a symphony player.

Moreover, as a seer, Major Higginson gently hinted that "a good, honest school for musicians" might come out of the future. It did—Dr. Koussevitzky's project of the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood.

Continued on Page 10

The Sweep of the Baton

Nine conductors, some tame, some fiery, close to mediocrity or close to genius, have headed the Boston Symphony Orchestra since the founding in 1881. Although personalities have been as different as methods of conducting, each, no matter what his rank in the world of music, has contributed much toward building a superb vehicle for the works of the masters.

Each one deserves his niche in the Symphony Hall of Fame.

As Boston has grown, from the days of horsecars and hoopskirts, so has the orchestra grown. In that growth are reflected the various stages of Boston history—and the astonishing progress in musical technique. Gas street lamps have given way to electricity, and the old methods of artistic composition and interpretation have had to make place for the new.

Therefore, one must view with tolerance and sympathy, as well as admiration, the struggles and achievements of the past 60 years.

FIRST OF THE CHIEFS

When German-born Georg Henschel was persuaded to become the first conductor in 1881, it must be remembered that this young man with the tremendous beard was more of a singer than an orchestra leader. Moreover, the 60 members were all local men, recruited from various small groups, had never played together before, lacked proper rehearsals and were somewhat awed by the magnitude of the undertaking.

Yet these men had some of the courage and zeal of the new conductor and in an incredibly short time, before capacity audiences in the old Boston Music Hall, they were able to play such "advanced" music as Wagner and Brahms. More discipline than Henschel could muster was needed, but he often struck fire and evoked drama for audiences which were much more enthusiastic than the early critics.

After Henschel, a man of high ideals who returned to Boston (as Sir George Henschel) to conduct at the orchestra's 50th anniversary, came William Gericke, also bearded, also Teutonic, to serve from 1884 to 1889. A strict disciplinarian and polisher, he made of the orchestra a real ensemble, rather than a mere group of players. He was careful about repertoire (perhaps in view of the limitations of his instrument) and even the critics who often scalded him admitted that performances became superb.

CONDUCTORS OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, reading from top right, across, and down the page: Georg Henschel, 1881-1884; Wilhelm Gericke, 1884-1889 and 1898-1906; Arthur Nikisch, 1889-1893; Emil Paur, 1893-1898; Karl Muck, 1906-1908 and 1912-1918; Max Fiedler, 1908-1912; Henri Rabaud, 1918-1919; Pierre Monteux, 1919-1924.

Then came fire, dash and romance out of the land of Hungary, in the personable form of Arthur Nikisch (1889-1893). He was a rhapsodizer. He had an impressive head of hair both above and below his flashing eyes. He was the epitome of grace, as suave in his conducting as fine old Tokay wine is soft and rolling on the tongue. He killed the last vestige of the old-fashioned idea that Brahms was dry. Impressionable young women swooned and languished when it was announced that he would no longer twirl his beard after 1893.

The critics of that era—much more savage than now—hailed with fiendish joy the arrival of poetic Emil Paur, also Teutonic (1893-1898). They saw a chance to make a pun, to accuse him of lack of power. But he was dynamic, and when he conducted, he did so with such energy that his collar came askew. Once a button popped into the audience. Paur, "the bearded Buelow," had a wife who was a singer. He introduced Johann Strauss, the "hyper-modern" of that age. He did his task well.

Broadened, more elastic and much better equipped than in 1889, back came Gericke for his second term, from 1898 to 1906. His labors, especially in the fields of the classics, were hard and fruitful.

FATE TAKES A HAND

Karl Muck (pronounced Mee-yewk) came next, and with him, Fate began to take a diabolically playful course.

Hofkapellmeister of the Royal Opera House of Berlin, Dr. Muck was as aristocratic as a Prussian cavalry officer. He had the pride of Lucifer behind his ascetic, angular face and one critic went as far as to refer to him as "Dr. Mephistopheles Muck." He ruled with an iron hand, but he knew what he was doing. Not until Dr. Serge Koussevitzky took over were such heights of orchestral triumph to be scaled again. It may not matter much, but Dr. Muck was the first of a line of beardless conductors. The Emperor wanted this near-genius back in Berlin, and over he went in 1908, after two years' service here.

Max Fiedler (no relation to Arthur) became the new conductor in 1908 and served four seasons. His concerts, based on contemporary as well as classical music, were popular with the general public, not so much so with the cognoscenti. He bridged the gap between the Muck of 1908 and the new Muck of 1912. He gave Sibelius, then a bit questionable, to the wondering Back Bay.

Everybody knows that Dr. Muck, in his second term from 1912 to 1918, equipped the orchestra with a singing, celestial voice. So that is only necessary here, in this present age when the mad intolerances of the first world war are crowding in again, to mention what happened to Dr. Karl Muck.

Henry Lee Higginson knew that prejudice would rise, with the United States in the war, against a German as conductor. But he felt, with typical courage, that genius and art really had no nationality. He failed to count on the machinations of psychopathic patriots and professional busy-bodies.

DR. MUCK IS SMOTHERED

The explosion came in Providence, R. I., Oct. 30, 1917. Dr. Muck took the orchestra there for the usual seasonal concert. A Providence editor, inflamed by the zeal of red-baiting, insisted that Dr. Muck be put to the test by being asked to play the Star-Spangled Banner.

Such a request was all very well—but it never reached Dr. Muck. Business leaders of the orchestra received the suggestion, decided that there was no time for a rehearsal in the few hours before the concert, and so shelved the whole matter. Not until the next day, when Dr. Muck read about the affair in the newspapers, did he know what had happened. It was too late. A storm of criticism swept the United States. It was the start of a chain of persecutions which sent the gifted conductor into internment and then back to Germany. That was the year, 1918, which saw Henry Lee Higginson end 38 seasons of benevolent direction and hand over the reins to a board of trustees. The major had spent about $1,000,000 on his vision of a great orchestra.

Dr. Muck, who came to Boston at the age of 48, and who died in Stuttgart at 80, March 4, 1940, was the last of the Germans. A French cycle started officially with Henri Rabaud in 1918. His single season was hampered by a disorganization of the Symphony inevitable after Muck. Some of the players had been dismissed as "enemy aliens" and French musicians filtered in. Pierre Monteux, who succeeded Rabaud and served from 1919 to 1924, pinch-hit for Rabaud at the first of the 1918 series of concerts.

When Monteux finally took hold officially, he showed ability to lead the Symphony out of the desert into more fertile fields. He was not spectacular, but he was sound, not vivid, but accurate. He was never quite sure about the local scene. The writer gave Monteux a dinner in Portland, Me., all carefully chosen, with even a smuggled bottle of Chambertin '19. All went well until it came to the salad. The hotel chef had mixed fruit with the greens. Monteux gasped. "What is this, poudin or salade?" he asked. "Ah, what a country." After Monteux came Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Koussevitzky Steps to the Podium

Tremendous suspense and curiosity made the air thick over Boston in 1924. A Russian expatriate, whose name was unknown to most people, had been invited to conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A few benighted souls feared they were going to get something out of the novels of Turgenev and Dostoievsky. Others, more musically alert, believed that an invasion of ultra-modern music would occur, that the classical composers would be sent down the Charles and out to sea.

Of course, musical circles knew that Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had achieved new fame in London and in Paris as an interpreter of modern compositions. What he would do in conservative Boston, which he had never visited, could hardly be determined.

Time has turned its cycle and long ago proved that the Symphony trustees had vision. As 1924 came in, Pierre Monteux, a Parisian, was in his last season as conductor at Symphony Hall. In order to choose a successor, the trustees looked over the field, and they saw at once that Koussevitzky was in top rank.

The splendid orchestra, then in its 44th year, needed new moulding and new training. The nucleus of artists required a leader whose enthusiasm and knowledge would match their own, whose forward vision would even surpass their own dreams of greatness.

That Dr. Koussevitzky has been able to inspire the present orchestra to reach the heights of 1940 is the greatest compliment that can be paid to both musicians and conductor. Every one is an artist in Symphony Hall today.

A GREAT INDIVIDUALIST

Although it is a fact that Dr. Koussevitzky came here with a penchant for innovations, and that he shocked some of the traditionalists, his creative judgment was soon proved sound. While he had sponsored new music in Paris—and continued to sponsor it here to unprecedented degree—he never once neglected the classics and never has he failed to give them great interpretation. If he had placed emphasis on the moderns while conducting aboard, it was because the restrictions there had been too tight to offer rounded programs.

A great individualist—a safe enough thing to be if equipped with infallible taste and intuition—Dr. Koussevitzky did take what some people called "liberties" with pieces like Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. He did not follow the leadership of other conductors in placing emphasis. He had ideas of his own on tempo, he braved criticism to prove eventually that he had a right to exercise originality.

As another example of gentle defiance, he took the funeral march in the Eroica more slowly than had the others. In that way, he believed, he could better emphasize the swing and feeling of Beethoven. The critics carped at first; now they applaud.

Under the magic spell of this dynamic Russian, who is now an American citizen and a Boston fixture, the discriminating public has come to love almost anything he does in his own inimitable way. And many are the ways, through introducing new composers as well as new interpretations, in which he has enriched the world of music.

DON'T CALL HIM 'KOUSSIE'

The present conductor, called "Koussie" by associates (except to his face) came from a humble but musical family. Just as the founder of the 60-year-old orchestra, Henry Lee Higginson, was called "the perfect Harvard man," although he went to Harvard less than a year, so Dr. Koussevitzky, by virtue of manners and bearing, can pass as a typical Russian noble of pre-Bolshevik days. The place of birth 66 years ago was an obscure little town named Vyshny Volochek.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, in bronze, by his wife.

In the old Russia, one could find sproutings of culture and genius in strange places. The elder Koussevitzky, a violin teacher, and the mother, a piano player, were doomed to live their lives in the drab provincial town. The father wanted little Sergei to take up something other than music, to make his way in the world. But Sergei had inherited music, it did not come to him, and he insisted upon its practise. That is why, at 14, the boy ran away to Moscow and enrolled, after some difficulty, in the Philharmonic School. There he studied the lowly double-bass fiddle, or "bull," not from fondness but because he had to make a choice of something. Years later, he was to become a virtuoso with this clumsy instrument, and it is to be found, and sometimes heard, in the Koussevitzky's Brookline home today.

So Sergei Koussevitzky rose in the world of music. He first saw his present wife, a sculptress who has subdued her own art so as to care for her husband's needs, at a concert. He waited two years for an introduction, and then married Natalya Konstantinovna. She is a woman of means and she has been one of the greatest influences in the artist's life. After marriage, his progress was speedy, and he reached the rank of conducting which first attracted the Symphony trustees.

In his 17th year of conducting, now acclaimed all over the world, Dr. Koussevitzky still lives simply. He loves travel and movement. He prefers not to make a splurge in society, although he enjoys himself and talks a lot at the few parties he attends. He eats sparsely and drinks very little. At home, his favorite tipple is a non-alcoholic potion of hot water and lemon juice, which his niece and secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, laughingly calls, in French, the "the sans the," or, in a pun, the tea of health. Incidentally, the shy but charming niece is a cartoonist of ability, though not for show.

The conductor's English, extremely sketchy at the start, is better now. It is still encumbered with an accent including traces of French, German and Russian. Although he has grown a bit gray in the service, he is in excellent health, has his old enthusiasms bordering a fiercely ardent love of music, and is as magnetic and dashing a figure as ever when he takes the podium. A short man, with strength showing in his body, he gives the illusion, through his flaming spirit, of being much taller and amazingly graceful.

Into his leadership, Koussevitzky puts everything he has. After a concert, he has to be rubbed down and given a complete change of clothing. Then his black cloak (no brilliant red lining for him) is adjusted romantically, and he is ready to go home and play with his cocker spaniels. For reading, he prefers books on philosophy. He is ever ready to help artists, both in the fields of music and painting, and his benefactions, though considerable, are unadvertised.

EXPANDS AT REHEARSALS

Rehearsals bring out the relief in Koussevitzky's nature. They bring out the best in the musicians.

Woe to the player who is on hand later than 10 A. M. Onto tardy ones is clapped a $10 fine. For this is an orchestra of intense discipline. Once Koussevitzky arrived late himself. He said nothing, merely laid a $10 bill on a table.

The conductor can be caustic in his criticisms. He will have nothing but the best. Often he exclaims, "So you think zat is music, hai? Vell, I do not." Once he made a pun—"Basses, do not be so vile."

Again, during a slow and sombre piece, he raised his hands. "My friends," he said, "I know zis iss a funeral march, but you, you, you are not zee cadaver." He is like Gericke, second of the conductors, who announced to his new players in 1884, "I have no friends, I love you all."

Somebody has described Koussevitzky in a few words by saying, "He controls rigidly a volcanic temperament."

The volcano comes nearest to eruption at rehearsals. When he says, "I want this a thousand times stronger," the playing very nearly becomes so. If audiences think Koussevitzky magnetic, so do the musicians. Their conductor is attired at rehearsals in a sort of moujik's blouse of his own design. He has two—one of light tan and the other a sort of green. He gesticulates, waves and pounds in a way which would exhaust a football player. His collar wilts and the perspiration pours. The veins stand out in his broad forehead.

AS CALM AS A STATUE

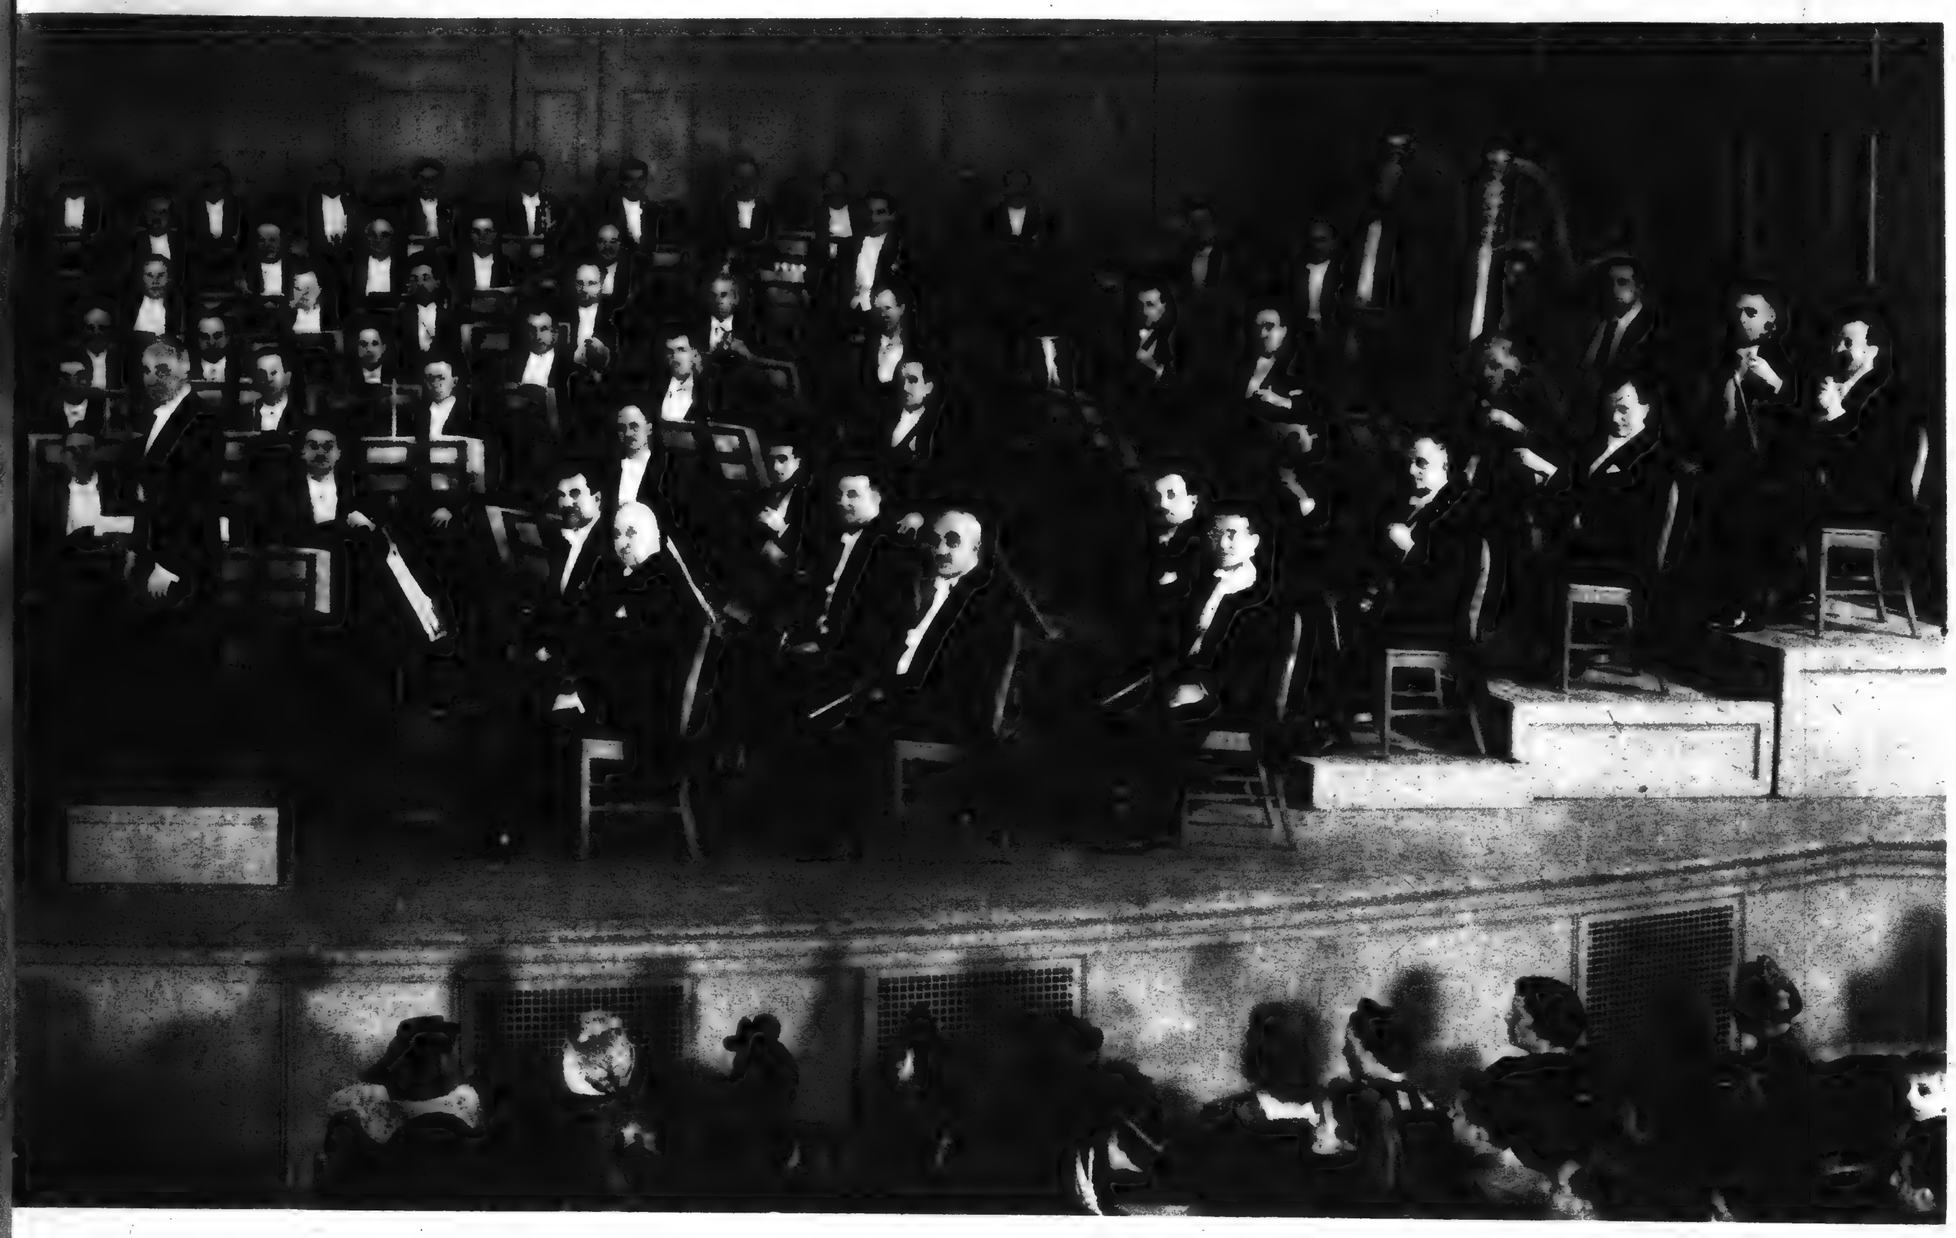
Yet, when the violent but well-planned rehearsal ends, Dr. Koussevitzky becomes as instantly calm as the statue of Apollo in the gilded hall.

These are happy days for Dr. Koussevitzky. He and his players have made the orchestra a sterling instrument without a peer. He has seen an old dream of Moscow days come true—the creation of a music school, now known as the Berkshire Music Center. Not only has he helped create new prestige for his old favorites—Igor Stravinsky, Tchaikovsky, Prokofief and Scriabin—but he has pushed the works of 46 American composers, old and new, at 156 performances in 15 seasons. These, as well as Wagner and the others of international acceptance, he has been able to present at the now-famed Berkshire Symphonic Festival. Only recently, en tour, the conductor sponsored a Russian composer not yet wholeheartedly welcomed in Boston—Dmitri Shostakovitch. A more popular innovation here has been Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony."

In his conducting today, Dr. Koussevitzky has tempered his style. People are no longer afraid that he will go out of bounds. Probably the reason for lack of fear is that the great conductor has set his bounds himself. And the world has come to accept them.

MUSICAL to the fingertips were the brothers Adamowski. Timothee, left, was a Symphony orchestra violinist and Pops conductor, and founded the famous Adamowski string quartet and the Adamowski Trio. Josef right, was a Symphony 'cellist and performer with Timothee. A third member of the trio was Josef's pianist-wife, Antoinette Szumowska-Adamowska.—(Photo by Notman)

GRAND DEBUT of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra in the old Boston Music Hall of 60 years ago. To watch and hear these gallant players, society drove to Winter street in horse-drawn carriages. The conductor shown here is Georg Henschel, first of a distinguished line of nine. — (Photo by Notman)



CRESCENDO
symbolizes the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1940. Here is the full roster of 110 musicians led by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky in Symphony Hall. Here is the burgeoning of Henry Lee Higginson's vision.—(Photo by Paul Davis) is this curiously bedecked Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1915. Players are en route to the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco. Dr. Karl Muck, conductor, is in golf knickers directly under the "San" on the sign of the special train.

EN TOUR

FIRST LADY
to play as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was Mme. Lydia Savitzkaya, who was a harpist during Dr. Koussevitzky's first season, 1924-25. Louise Came, harpist, only other woman player, served in 1934-35.

LINE-UP
for the advance sale of Symphony tickets, way back in merry 1889, when the orchestra used to play in the old Music Hall off Winter street. Notice the messenger boys sent to get the precious pasteboards — and notice the policeman's topper and the other odd skimmers.

Oddities not in the Score

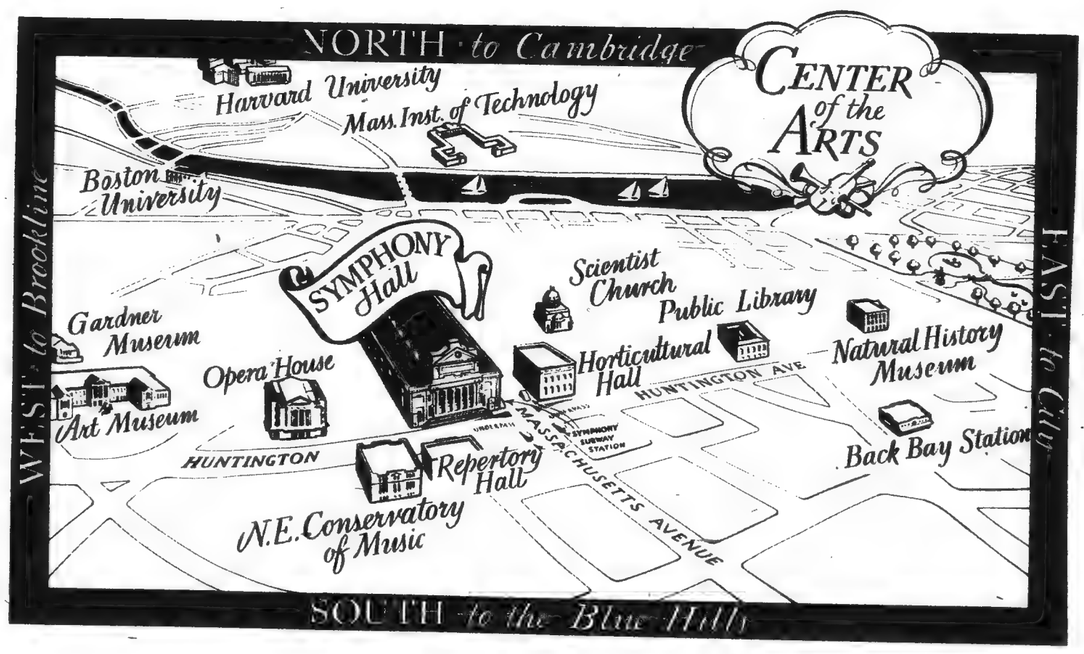
Many a music lover has missed a concert; seldom does the scheduled concert fail to appear. In 59 years of travelling over the country, the Boston Symphony has missed but one engagement. That was in Hartford, in 1888, and the cause was the famous blizzard . . . . . When Symphony Hall was opened in 1900, the last of the horse cars on the Back Bay line made its final run. The two nags were black and white. Now, in the orchestra's 60th season, the new Huntington avenue subway's Symphony station will open . . . . Emil Paur, conductor from 1893 to 1898, kept hens while here, and it is to Boston, where he conducted between 1889 and 1893, that the vibrant Arthur Nikisch owed his acquaintance with stud poker . . . . . The term Brahmins, as applied to Back Bay social lights, seems to have nothing to do with Brahms, the German composer. Brahmins form the highest social caste among the Hindoos . . . . . Georg Henschel, the first conductor of 1881, was raked over the critical coals for not being "Haydnesque." Yet really the worst the critics could do was to refer to him as "Eggschel" in a mock program . . . . . A mid-Western city, not so long ago, asked for a Symphony engagement, stating that the concert would be followed by a ball and that the "leader" had better bring his best dance music . . . . . The old Music Hall caused a need for Symphony Hall because it was smelly, bad for sound and a firetrap . . . . . Who was the first American to conduct the Symphony as a guest? The late Henry Hadley, Somerville composer, Feb. 6, 1935 . . . . . The orchestra has nine trustees, with Ernest B. Dane, an original member of the board which took over when Henry Lee Higginson retired in 1918, as president, and George E. Judd, an earnest, artistic Harvard man and floriculturist, as manager. C. W. Spalding is assistant manager. Financial burdens have become somewhat lighter through work of a society of 2200 members known as the Friends of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, organized in 1935. There is room for more members . . . . . When the orchestra appears in Cambridge for annual concerts, the conductor's stand in Sanders Theater always has garlands of roses—and the Cambridge firemen never blow their sirens in the neighborhood during a concert . . . . . Dr. Margaret Grant is among Symphony Hall's own authors. She collaborated on a Carnegie Foundation book dealing with "America's Symphony Orchestras." George Kuyper and Laning Humphrey are among other writers on the Hall's staff . . . . . Dr. Serge Koussevitzky never smokes. He got his doctor's degree from Brown and, because of a European custom of making some material acknowledgment of this honor, he gave Brown a concert solo on his bull fiddle (which he played notably in Russia at 22) . . . . . The conductor and his wife are publishers of music . . . . . Dr. Koussevitzky likes to ponder over Nietsche and Schopenhauer. By custom, he has had all his clothes made in Europe up to this war year. With a dress suit he wears a special soft collar of his own devising. Victor is his valet and major domo, while Victor's wife is the cook, expert at concocting blinis and beet soup . . . . . The Koussevitzkys live in a rented house in swank Druse street, Brookline. The interior is darkish and the furnishings Victorian. Friends deny that the doctor wears a nightcap. He is a connoisseur of painting . . . . . A Berkshire newspaperman, George Edman of the Berkshire Eagle in Pittsfield, has been a prime mover in Berkshire festival developments. His mind it teems with music schemes and yet he gets out a fine paper . . . . . C. A. Ellis served as manager of the orchestra under Dr. Karl Muck . . . . . In the old days of savage critics, one wrote that the Music Hall's fire exits were for use "in case of Brahms." . . . . . Symphony Hall seats 2600 persons with comfort, under the permanent grimaces of antique statues, some of which came from the Music Hall and which have been known to give visiting singers stage fright . . . . In the old days, tickets were sold by auction to thwart speculators. Mrs. Jack Gardner was known to pay as high as $500 a seat, for a single performance, to get her customary place at extreme right, front row balcony. It was Chaliapin who said the gallery is where the heart throbs are . . . . . John N. Burk, the present program annotator, besides writing a recently published life of Clara Schumann, has edited an edition of Philip Hale's famous program notes . . . . . What is the orchestra's most expensive instrument? Probably the harp, which could cost $2000. But several violinists have Stradivarii and Guarneris, insured for more than $3000 . . . . . Friday Afternoons are still the nobbiest Symphony concerts. More young people appear thani in the '90's. Some come to look, many to listen, many to be seen. Old patricians never seen outside their Back Bay homes on other days, except for funerals, come traditionally.

FLIGHT TO THE RUSH SEATS

"CAN I STEP OVER THAT?"

1900-1940

Home of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA



1900-1940

On the New Subway "SYMPHONY STATION"

IN the forty years since SYMPHONY HALL opened its doors in 1900, it has been the setting for 2,229 Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, 1,354 recitals, 2,226 "Pop" concerts, 416 lectures, and hundreds of public meetings, fraternal ceremonials, banquets and balls, ballets, exhibitions, travelogues, debates, festivals, school commencements, benefits and conventions.

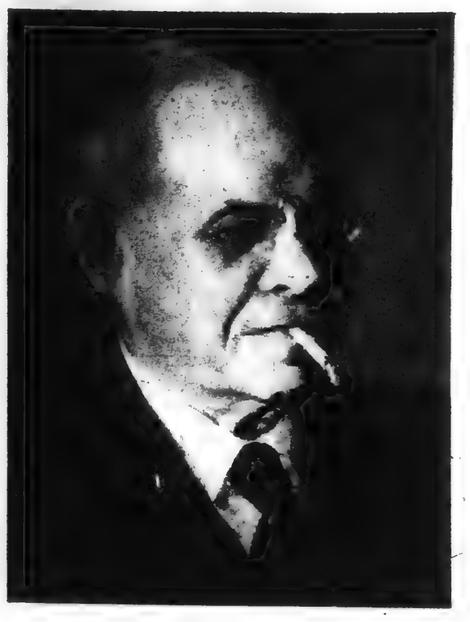
EVERY PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES SINCE 1900 HAS SPOKEN FROM ITS PLATFORM

For tickets and for rental information call Commonwealth 1492

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston's Finest Auditorium—ACOUSTICALLY UNEXCELLED

Two Titans Out Of the Past



HENRY TAYLOR PARKER
(From the Painting by Gordon Hansen, of The Boston Herald.)

Music critics are the liaison agents, the interpreters and reporters, who unite an orchestra with the reading public. Boston has had some good ones and has some good ones now. At the beginnings of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, the critics seemed as fierce as wolves, eager to fall upon their prey. Today, though severe at times, they are more inclined to be suave, to rely upon real music appreciation rather than force of pen dipped in vitriol. And while the modern ones are not always respected and believed, they are certainly read by both public and players in this year of 1940.

Looking into the past, one sees that two titanic figures soared above the run - of - the - mill critics.

One of the Titans was Philip Hale. The other was H. T. P., less frequently known as H. T. Parker. Both could be as scathing as acid, as scholarly as Erasmus, in their vastly different ways. Masters of the telling word, they could flick their phrases like a whip or give praise in tones of high literature. They were great men and great individualists who moulded Boston culture fully as much as did the orchestra.

A man of the world, good-natured and affable, full of wisdom, love of life and social graces was Philip Hale, music and dramatic editor of The Boston Herald from 1903 until his death, Nov. 30, 1934. Mr. Parker, critic of music and drama for the Boston Transcript from 1905 until his death, March 30, 1934, was crusty and feared, an arrant indiviidualist, full of prejudices explosively announced. He had love and sentiment, but both were hidden. Only those close to him—and they were few—knew his humanity.

People often called Mr. Hale "Phil." But they called H.T.P. "Hell-to-pay."

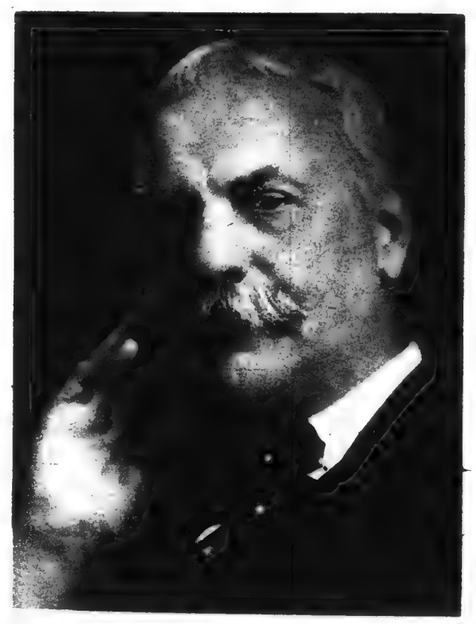
Philip Hale, who looked like a noble old Roman in his latter years, was born in Norwich, Vt. He could have become a professor at his alma mater, Yale, but all he asked of life was to let him remain a newspaperman. Symphony lovers will always remember him as a music critic in the flesh, with a flowing bow tie of red or black, sitting in his accustomed seat in the third row, right, second balcony, Symphony Hall.

George H. Wilson first did the Symphony program notes, in 1891. He was succeeded by William A. Apthorp, a noted music critic of the day. Philip Hale brilliantly succeeded Apthorp.

The busy Mr. Hale found time to edit his own humorous Herald column, "As The World Wags," and to write editorials on any subject, with delightful obscurities raked out of his fertile mind as illustrations.

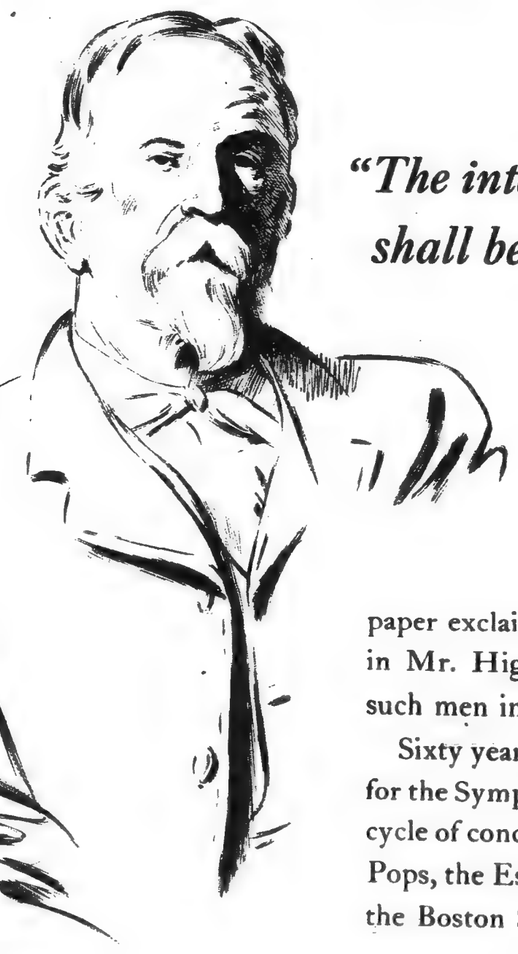
In the course of his comic sallies, Philip Hale invented a foil for himself called Herkimer Johnson, the Clamport philosopher. To many, Herkimer, with his preposterous dissertations, seemed as real as Philip Hale. And the latter was as close to genius as any man in the history of Boston journalism. The Symphony was at his quiet funeral and paid tribute to him in many ways. He died at 80.

H.T.P., considered by many to be as eminent as Mr. Hale but who certainly, himself, tried to disguise the fact, was a native of Boston and went to Harvard. People used to say, as they did about Philip Hale, that he scribbled all his musical reviews in Latin and that it was up to his office to translate them. He did write in a little crabbed hand so that English looked like Sanskrit to the uninitiate. Compared with Mr. Hale, he was less scholarly, perhaps more intuitive. He prided himself on his knowledge of Rhine wines and smoked cigars which shot out embers like Fourth of July sparklers. His seat was in the first row right of the first balcony, near Mrs. Jack Gardner's. Sometimes he thumped his walking stick on the floor when sour notes came from the stage. Once, legend says, he brought the bamboo stick down on the toes of Mrs. Gardner and got a look which would have killed the leopard with which she once walked down Tremont street.



PHILIP HALE

Enemies said H. T. P. was tone-deaf—but they never could catch him at it. He died at 66.



After a portrait by John Singer Sargent

"The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent here"

THUS on March 30, 1881, Major Henry L. Higginson concluded his announcement of the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Public acclaim was enthusiastic, not only in Boston but throughout the nation. A San Francisco paper exclaimed: "What a wealth of enjoyment is promised in Mr. Higginson's modest little circular! Oh, for a few such men in our midst!"

Sixty years have passed and the "intention" of permanency for the Symphony is truly an accomplished fact with the yearly cycle of concerts at Symphony Hall and Sanders Theatre, the Pops, the Esplanade concerts and the Berkshire Festival. To the Boston Symphony, we extend our congratulations.

Investment and Management of Property

Agent ★ Trustee ★ Guardian ★ Executor

Every property owner will find our new booklet, "Planning an Estate," both interesting and helpful. A copy will be sent on request.

OLD COLONY
TRUST COMPANY
17 COURT STREET, BOSTON

Member of the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation

Allied with THE FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF BOSTON

Bright Beams from Symphony's Torch

On wooded Berkshire slopes where Stockbridge Indians performed their tribal rites and Nathaniel Hawthorne polished up his novels stands Tanglewood. Like the Esplanade, Youth and Pops concerts of Boston, this Berkshire musical development is another symbol of the extra-mural activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Each of them exerts its influence on culture and entertainment and each of them is a civilizing power in a world close to madness.

Where the Indians once beat their tom-toms, musicians of the orchestra, clad in summer finery, give impeccable concerts for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Within sight of Lake Mahkeenac, where young Indians learned to make canoes in the old days, the new Berkshire Music Center, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, teaches advanced music students to become great musicians. This school is a boyhood dream of the famous conductor come true.

Tanglewood, from which one sees a landscape reminiscent of the Wienerwald so dear to Strauss, is a place of summer concerts. Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline gave the estate to the orchestra in 1937; soon afterward, Berkshire folk were saying, "It's the greatest thing that ever happened to us up here." They are still saying that.

AFTER THE SYMPHONY concert in 1892

Not only has Tanglewood lifted the standards of the festival above those of Austria's old Salzburg and provided the finest summer music school in the world, but it has increased bank deposits, tourist business and real estate values. The cultural benefits came first, of course, and have never been subordinated to material things. Yet the economic boons cannot be ignored, especially because audiences averaged 8000 for each of the nine regular festival concerts last summer, and 30 per cent. of the pilgrims came from outside New England.

MUSICIANS MUST LIVE

The musicians, too, think of Tanglewood in other than mundane ways. Nevertheless, the splendid virtuosi of the orchestra are like other people in their worldly habits—they must buy clothing and food, pay rent and get constant practice. The Berkshire development rounds out the regular symphony seasons in Boston and en tour—it helps keep most of the players busy every month in the year but one. That month of rest is always welcome and is sometimes passed, as Dr. Koussevitzky spends it, in Berkshire county retreats.

It is the Berkshire Music Center which the conductor views with boyish enthusiasm. "I will turn out five good conductors here in five years," he prophesied when the school started last July.

The first season brought 312 students selected from twice as many applicants all over the country. Next year, the rush to enroll will be something like a stampede.

Members of the faculty include 30 members of the orchestra, who are as enthusiastic and as capable of becoming "schoolmasters" as their conductor. Also on the first faculty were such experts as Aaron Copland and Paul Hindemith, composers; Harvard's Prof. G. Wallace Woodworth; Herbert Graf, the Metropolitan Opera stage director, and Olin Downes, New York musical critic.

Musical by tradition, endowed with symphony concerts and chamber music for years, the Berkshires are wider awake than ever in a cultural way. From the festival has grown a layman's music course in nine public and parochial schools, as well as seven festival clubs which study music in off seasons through recordings. Horace Hunt's Berkshire Musical Association chorus, 200 voices, is another of the notable offshoots.

In many other places, the artists of the orchestra inspire love of music. For example, the total annual attendance at all concerts has rocketed from 83,000 the first season, in 1881, to 750,000 last year. Against the first season of 20 concerts, the Symphony now has an annual run of 62 symphony concerts and six youth concerts (the latter under Wheeler Beckett) in Boston's 40-year-old Symphony Hall; eight concerts at Harvard; 37 in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Cleveland and other cities; 58 Pop concerts in Symphony Hall under Arthur Fiedler; 24 summer concerts on the Charles River Esplanade under Mr. Fiedler, and nine in the Berkshires.

Rich and poor, young and old, are served. And the younger are getting more interested, while music makes the aged young again for a little while.

The first of the Symphony tours landed in Philadelphia in 1886, under Wilhelm Gericke, conductor. That same year, apparently harmless and docile Stony Brook in Roxbury, now underground, ran amok and people left alive in the flood had to leave their homes in boats. The Symphony responded with a benefit performance. It also staged a benefit to erect a monument to Mozart in Vienna in 1889. Another concert gave its proceeds to survivors of the San Francisco earthquake. In 1915, Dr. Karl Muck took the orchestra on its longest tour, to play at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in 'Frisco. Again, Muck conducted for the benefit of the sufferers after the Halifax explosion of 1917. History is still repeating itself—Dr. Koussevitzky and his artists raised $23,000 for British war relief at a concert in the Berkshires last summer.

GIFT FOR ORCHESTRA

Sometimes the orchestra enjoys a gift. The superb Hatch music shell, a glittering thing of bronze, stone and teak, was dedicated for use of Esplanade concerts July 2, 1940. Arthur Fiedler, who started these beautiful open-air musicales beside the Charles in 1929, paid tribute to trustees of the White Fund, allocators of more than $270,000 for the structure. The money came from the long-dormant will of Maria Hatch of Boston, who is not known to have had any prominence in the world of music. The creation stands as a memorial to her brother, Edward Hatch, an auctioneer.

Neither of the Hatches knew what the money would be used for—the sister left an elastic bequest "for a park, playground or memorial." However, could they stand before the shell today, they undoubtedly would approve of anything enhancing the equipment of such an orchestra as the Boston Symphony.

Arthur Fiedler, "a child of the orchestra," now the conductor of the Pops and the Esplanade concerts, is the son of Emanuel Fiedler, now 80, who was a violinist in the Symphony of 55 years ago. Arthur, personable and acute, has conducted before more than 3,000,000 persons. He was born 45 years ago in Boston, educated musically in Europe.

Appeal to youth, so that young people will understand symphony music, is the ideal of Wheeler Beckett, conductor of the Youth Concerts. He is 42, has conducted abroad and is a composer, writer, player and lecturer.

AARON RICHMOND'S
Jordan Hall Chamber Music Series
Entire Series $3.30 & $4.40
An Ideal Xmas Gift for the Music Lover
TEL. RESERVATIONS
(KEN. 6037 & KEN. 8664)
HELD ONLY 48 HOURS
1. BUDAPEST QUARTET
2. GORDON QUARTET & BAUER*
3. EMMANUEL FEUERMANN*
4. BUSCH STRING QUARTET*
Remaining Series Tickets at Aaron Richmond offices in Pierce Bldg., and at Jordan Hall daily from 10:30 to 5:30. *Baldwin Piano Used

TONIGHT at 8 - JORDAN HALL
Recital PALMYRA
DaCAMARA
Portuguese-American Pianist (Baldwin Piano)
Tickets 55c to $1.65 at Box-office, 2 o'clock

Remaining Tickets Now
JORDAN HALL
Wed Eve. Jan. 8
BUSCH & SERKIN
ONLY Boston concert by noted Violin-Piano Sonata recitalists (Steinway)

ONLY 800 Seats STILL AVAILABLE
SUN. AFT., JAN. 12 AT 3:30
At SYMPHONY HALL
LAWRENCE TIBBETT
Leading Met. Opera Baritone

JORDAN HALL—TUES. EVE., JAN. 14
Pianoforte Recital
JESUS MARIA SANROMA
Tickets $2.20 to 55c
ALREADY ON SALE
Baldwin Piano

ADVANCE SALE NOW
at SYMPHONY HALL
($1.10 to $2.75) (Knabe)
FLAGSTAD
ONLY BOSTON CONCERT
Sun. Aft. Feb. 2
Management Aaron Richmond

Crowning a Glorious Vision

Continued from Page 3

The good major even went into such things as pensions and outside interests of musicians. He intended to endow the orchestra, so that it would go on forever, but financial reverses late in life prevented this step. The orchestra will go on anyhow.

FIRST OF THE CONCERTS

So, after all these painstaking preparations, the first series of 20 concerts was advertised, to run from the middle of October, 1881, to the middle of March, 1882. Crowds stood in line for the advance sale of pasteboards from the Hamilton place entrance to the Park Street Church and beyond. Henschel worked furiously to get his players into shape—and a herculean job it was.

The creme de la creme of society swarmed to the Music Hall that first Saturday night, Oct. 22, 1881. Even those who could not afford the price of a horse car ride appeared, determined to woo Orpheus whatever the sacrifice the next day. Incandescent lights had just appeared in Boston, and the hall never looked brighter.

So magical was the charm of music that the citizenry, who had just got over the assassination of President Garfield, forgot about a similar killing of Alexander II by Nihilists in far-off Russia, and paid no attention for the moment to the French, about ready to start building the Panama Canal.

Beethoven's overture, Opus 124, "Dedication of the House," was appropriately first on the program. Other pieces were Gluck's Air from Orpheus; Haydn's Symphony in B Flat; Schubert's Ballet Music (Rosamunde); Max Bruch's Scena (Odysseus); Festival Overture, by Weber. The applause almost deafened Major Higginson and Conductor Henschel. A total of 49,374 persons turned out that first season—and the Symphony was made.

Yet the critics the next day were caustic. They ignored the fact that the conductor had worked with what some one called "inexpert and demoralized men," that the rehearsal work had necessarily been sparse. They scored Henschel for not conducting in the "classical" Thomas tradition.

"The critics suggest a little boy making faces at himself in a mirror," observed the undaunted Higginson. He had faced cannon and cavalry charges during the war: he could face the music now, and he held to his vision. In fact, he held his guns—and the orchestra—right up to his retirement in April, 1918.

Therefore, one may rightly say of Henry Lee Higginson: "His spirit is still alive."

An Ensemble of Eminent Artists

DANIEL KUNTZ, only survivor in New England of the original Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Every conductor knows that he cannot become truly great alone. He knows that whatever he has of genius cannot burgeon without the inspired performance of his players. People may say, "Koussevitzky has just lifted us to the heights," or "We heard Toscanini tonight." But what they really mean is that the conductor has used his powers to play upon the instrument which is his orchestra, and that the harmonious ensemble has produced results little short of miraculous in their effect on the spirit.

Conductors may change, but the spirit of the orchestra, reaching for perfection, goes on.

A glimpse into the past shows that, just as today, the Boston Symphony had some giants in its ranks.

There was Giuseppe Campanari, a 'cellist in the orchestra between 1885 and 1893, and a member of the noted Adamowski quartet, of which Timothee Adamowski, who played solos 82 times as an orchestra member, was first violin. Campanari did what people said was impossible—he became a distinguished baritone in grand opera.

Josef, Timothee Adamowski's brother, took Campanari's place as 'cellist in the quartet and also played in Timothee's trio. The other member of the trio was a beautiful pianist, Antoinette Szumowska-Adamowska, Josef's wife.

The Kneisel quartet was another chamber music group from the ranks of the orchestra. Founded in 1885 by Franz Kneisel, the orchestra's concertmaster from 1885 to 1903, this quartet still stirs nostalgic tremors in the memory of musical Boston. Kneisel was first violin and the second violin was the phenomenal Julius Theodorowicz, believed to be the sole survivor of the quartet, who has been with the orchestra 38 years, is now its assistant concertmaster and is concertmaster of the Pops. He is 63. Incidentally, the youngest Symphony player today is Willis Page, 22, of Rochester, N. Y., double-bass, a first graduate of Dr. Koussevitzky's new school at the Berkshire Music Center.

Musicians still marvel at Henry Lorbeer, who played the French horn 50 years. As the lip is a vital but delicate necessity to this instrument, nobody ever believed that he would be able to serve in the orchestra from 1891 to 1939. But he did, and he is probably a world's champion in his art.

Arthur Fiedler, present conductor of the Pops, is rather versatile. His father played in the orchestra, and so did his uncles, Bernhard and Gustav. He plays the violin, viola and celesta, conducts the Esplanade concerts, which he founded; the chorus known as the Cecilia Society, the MacDowell Club orchestra and chorus, the Boston University orchestra and the Boston Sinfonietta (founder as well as conductor). He is a busy man.

Present concertmaster is a notable first violin, youthful in his energy and tense in his drama, named Richard Burgin. Born in Warsaw in 1892, he is not a Pole but a Russian.

At 12, Burgin dazzled a critical audience as soloist. He has been doing so ever since. They used to call him the "boy wonder." He referred to himself as "the wondering boy." He came here in 1920, front row, right center.

The orchestra has given many conductors to the music world. Max Zach, Symphony viola player from 1886 to 1907, organized and conducted the St. Louis Symphony. Nicolai Sokoloff (violin, 1904-07) conducted the Cleveland Symphony. Bernard Zighera, now Symphony pianist and harpist, founded and conducts the Boston Chamber Orchestra. Emil Mollenhauer (violin, 1884-89) conducted the Handel and Haydn Society for many years. Martin Loeffler (violinist, 1882-93) and Georges Longy (superlative oboeist, 1898-1925) are outstanding figures out of the past who had their own groups.

Back even further one sees the portly, jolly figure of Daniel Kuntz, who played the violin from 1881 to 1914, and who certainly is the only surviving member of the original orchestra this side of New York. Now

OLDEST BOSTON Symphony player in point of service is Julius Theodorowicz.

83, he was a first-ranker. Another original player is Karl Behr, 'cellist, believed to be living in North Carolina.

Of course all these artists saw great figures of the operatic and concert world stand before them in Boston. There was Paderewski as a young man, with flaming red hair and electric energy. Geraldine Farrar, stunning even today; Emma Eames; Nordica; young Fritz Kreisler, earnest and poetic; Emma Calve, Teresa Carreno and a host of others appeared here as soloists. In the old days they gave prestige to concerts: today the Symphony has its own prestige.

So out of all this background, out of genius and vision and the highest of standards, has grown the Boston Symphony Orchestra of 1940.

M. Steinert & Sons felicitate the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

So distinguished an anniversary as this is always an occasion for congratulations, and Steinway & Sons most heartily join M. Steinert & Sons in offering best wishes to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Henry Lee Higginson, honored founder of the Orchestra, entered Harvard only two years before Henry Engelhard Steinway founded this world-famous piano firm in New York City. Thus the growth of the two organizations has, to a large extent, been parallel.

It is an interesting fact that the great majority of world-famous musicians who have appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, over the past sixty years, have been exclusive Steinway artists. And what is also a matter of pride to Steinway & Sons, they also have been close friends of the Steinway family.

To the people of Boston, to the members of the great Boston Symphony Orchestra, to conductor, and to Board of Trustees, our cordial felicitations!

M. STEINERT & SONS

162 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON, MASS.

A NEW ENGLAND INSTITUTION SINCE 1860

RCA Victor Record Player

Now at this amazingly low price! $4.95

Just $4.95, and you can enjoy music of your choice when you want it . . . transforms your radio into a combination. This model has improved feather-touch pick-up; plays 10" & 12" records; volume control. An appropriate Christmas gift for a music-loving friend.

JORDAN MARSH COMPANY

SPECIAL for Music Lovers! ★ ★

VICTOR RECORDS

25% TO 50% LESS!

INCLUDING MANY Boston Symphony RECORDINGS

Mail or telephone orders filled . . . Call HUBbard 2700 till 10 P. M. (except Sunday)

			Formerly	Now
M-262	The Music of Johann Strauss	Ormandy-Minneapolis Symphony Orchestra	$10.00	$5.50
DM-262	The Music of Johann Strauss
M-263	Symphony No. 3, in E Flat ("Eroica") (Beethoven)	Koussevitzky-London Philharmonic Orchestra	$12.00	$6.50
DM-263	Symphony No. 3, in E Flat ("Eroica") (Beethoven)
M-265	Nutcracker Suite (Tschaikowsky)	Stokowski-Philadelphia Orchestra	$6.50	$3.50
DM-265	Nutcracker Suite (Tschaikowsky)
M-269	Scheherazade (Rimsky-Korsakow)	Philadelphia Orchestra, Cond. Goehr	$12.00	$6.50
DM-269	Scheherazade (Rimsky-Korsakow)
DM-473	Concerto in A Minor (Schumann)	Koussevitzky-Boston Orchestra	$10.00	$5.50
M-474	Symphony No. 5, in E Flat (Sibelius)
DM-474	Symphony No. 5, in E Flat (Sibelius)
1502	Lakme (The Bell Song)	Lily Pons	$1.50	75c
1726	Die Walkure-Ho-yo-to-ho Allerseelen	Flagsted	$1.50	75c
1804	Ich Liebe Dich Ein Traum	Flagsted	$1.50	75c
1812	Claire de Lune (Debussy) Parts 1 and 2	Stokowski Phil. Orch.	$1.50	75c
2032	Deep River Dere's No Hidin' Place	Anderson	$1.50	75c
4319	Entrance of the Fauns Thunder and Lightning	Boston "Pops"	$1.00	75c
4338	In a Persian Market Parts 1 and 2	Boston "Pops"	$1.00	75c
4396	The Skaters' Waltz Parts 1 and 2	Boston "Pops"	$1.00	75c
4434	La Paloma La Golondrina	Boston "Pops"	$1.00	75c
4461	Espana Waltz Parts 1 and 2	Boston "Pops"	$1.00	75c
6513	Marche Slav Parts 1 and 2	Stokowski Phil. Orch.	$2.00	$1.00
6587	Pagliacci-Prologue Parts 1 and 2 (Italian)	Tibbett	$2.00	$1.00
7196	Classical Symphony (Prokofieff) Parts 1 and 2	Boston Sym. Orchestra	$4.00	$2.00
7412	Finlandia Parts 1 and 2	Stokowski Phil. Orch.	$2.00	$1.00
7413	La Valse (Ravel) Parts 1 and 2	Koussevitzky Boston Sym.	$2.00	$1.00
7414	La Valse (Danse) Part 3	Koussevitzky Boston Sym.	$2.00	$1.00
11833	Dance of the Hours (from La Gioconda) Parts 1-2	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
11895	Aida-Grand March Pomp and Circumstance	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
11886	Fingal's Cave—Overture Parts 1 and 2	Boult-BBC Sym. Orch.	$1.50	$1.00
11887	Meditation (from "Thais") Largo (Handel)	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
11986	Poet and Peasant Overture Parts 1 and 2	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
12160	Jealousy (Tango) Amor Brugo	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
12191	Kammenoi-Ostrow Parts 1 and 2	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
12510	Danube Waves—Waltz Parts 1 and 2	Boston "Pops"	$1.50	$1.00
14210	Ave Maria (Schubert) Aufenthalt	Anderson	$2.00	$1.00
14422	Hungarian Rhapsody Parts 1 and 2	Stokowski Phil. Orch.	$2.00	$1.00
M-336	Symphony No. 8, in F Major (Beethoven)	Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony Orchestra	$6.50	$3.50
DM-336	Symphony No. 8, in F Major (Beethoven)
M-643	La Mer (Debussy)	Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony Orchestra	$6.50	$3.50
DM-643	La Mer (Debussy)
M-644	Three famous Scenes (Wagner)	Flagstad-Melchior-San Francisco Orchestra	$10.00	$6.50
DM-644	Three Famous Scenes (Wagner)
M-317	Symphony No. 7, in A Major (Beethoven)	Toscanini-Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra of New York	$10.00	$5.50
DM-317	Symphony No. 7, in A Major (Beethoven)
M-319	Symphony No. 8 ("Unfinished") (Schubert)	Koussevitzky-Boston Symphony Orchestra	$6.50	$3.50
DM-319	Symphony No. 8 ("Unfinished") (Schubert)
M-253	Symphony No. 5, in E Minor (Tschaikowsky)	Stokowski-Philadelphia Orchestra	$12.00	$6.50
DM-253	Symphony No. 5, in E Minor (Tschaikowsky)
M-293	Symphony No. 40, in G Minor (Mozart)	Koussevitzky-London Philharmonic Orchestra	$6.50	$3.50
DM-293	Symphony No. 40, in G Minor (Mozart)
14690	Caprice Viennois Tambourine Chinois	Kreisler	$2.00	$1.00
15189	Invitation to the Waltz Parts 1 and 2	Stokowski Phil. Orch.	$2.00	$1.00
15425	Blue Danube Tales of the Vienna Woods	Stokowski Phil. Orch.	$2.00	$1.00
16250	Moonlight Sonata (Beethoven) Minuet in G Major (Paderewski)	Paderewski	$2.00	$1.00

"LIBRARY BUILDER"—Unit No. 1

VICTOR Red Seal RECORDS

		Old List Price	New List Price
Blue Danube Waltz Tales from Vienna Woods LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI AND PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA Record Number 15425	Strauss	$2.00	$1.00
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 2 LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI AND PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA Record Number 14422	Liszt	$2.00	$1.00
Finlandia LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI AND PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA Record Number 7412	Sibelius	$2.00	$1.00
Magic Flute Overture ARTURO TOSCANNINI AND BBC SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Record Number 15190	Mozart	$2.00	$1.00
Invitation to the Waltz ARTURO TOSCANNINI AND BBC SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA Record Number 15192	Weber	$2.00	$1.00
Die Walkure—Magic Flute Music LEOPOLD STOKOWSKI AND PHILADELPHIA ORCHESTRA Record Number 15800	Wagner	$2.00	$1.00
Deluxe 12-Inch Library Album Holds 12 Victor Records		$2.25	$1.00

Former List Value $14.25

6 Records and a Library Album for only.... $7

LIMITED TIME OFFER

MUSIC CENTER—NINTH FLOOR—ANNEX

Herald

Italian Refugee Photographer Did Koussevitzky for Herald

A year ago, the lively and imaginative man who made the photograph of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the cover of today's Sunday Herald Boston Symphony Orchestra magazine, landed penniless in New York, a refugee from Fascist Italy with a wife and a 5-year-old daughter. Behind him, in a studio in Milan where his work had made him rich, he had to leave most of his photographic equipment and most of his funds.

Virtually penniless, Egone, the photographer who had made art studies of royalty and peasants, tramped the streets of New York looking for a job. He could hardly express himself in English. He found nothing.

"Now I begin again," he said to himself when he reached Boston with his family. He has made good, just as he has mastered English. Symphony Hall will show 25 of his studies of life at Tanglewood, the Berkshire music colony, this week.

Egone is 40, born in Trieste of Austrian parentage. In 1916, he achieved fame by using the first candid camera in Italy. He has it now, an old German Minnigraph, which he calls "the grandfather of all candid cameras." But it is now a museum piece, and he long ago perfected a new technique of studio and art photographs as different from candid shots as Renoir is different from Dali.

"The trouble is all over now," Egone explains. "Why, my daughter, Renata, has become a perfect American in a year. We all know that this is the best place in the world to be."

49

Guest of the Symphony; Darius Milhaud in Boston

Herald Dec 15

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It has been a long time since anything of Darius Milhaud's work has been played at a Boston Symphony concert, and we may regard ourselves as lucky that the distinguished French composer is now in this country and will conduct half of the programs on next Friday and Saturday in some of his recent scores. Milhaud visited Boston in 1922, and a symphonic work of his was played in 1926. This long lapse in the Boston public's acquaintance with the music of one of the most prominent of contemporary composers suggests that it would be wise to recall something of his career.

The chief artistic influences that Milhaud underwent are not hard to collect, though they do not entirely account for the diversity of his musical expression. Most important among them, probably, is his long association with the famous French poet Paul Claudel. Claudel's is a very strong artistic personality and one that has been sympathetic to the art of music. His poems are usually deeply religious and Roman Catholic, and they are often outspoken and vigorous. He and Paul Valery have long been the leaders in modern French poetry.

Milhaud was introduced to the poetry of Claudel by Francis Jammes before the war, when he was given a copy of "Connaissance do l'Est" to read in the train. Jammes' description of the man with whom young Milhaud was to be so closely associated was not especially reassuring. "He represented him to me," M. Milhaud was later destined to report, "at once as a kind of saint and a frightful bugaboo, incapable of supporting the odor of vanilla, clad in a Chinese robe and bonneted with the hat of a consul general." Milhaud was immediately tempted to set some of the "Connaissance de l'Est" to music. He met Claudel in 1911, and thereafter there was incessant colaboration between the two. During the war they went to Brazil, where Claudel had a diplomatic post.

On his return from Rio de Janeiro Milhaud came under another influence which was scarcely less vital to his art. In 1919, at the instigation of Jean Cocteau and with Erik Satie as a model for inspiration, there gathered together six composers who felt they had a common cause in art. They held that the goal towards which Debussy worked had been reached and the possibilities for further exploitation of that vein exhausted. They mistrusted the still potent influence of Wagner and Strauss; they were repelled by the Schola Cantorum, d'Indy and the admirers of Franck.

The names of these composers were—and still are, for that matter—Georges Auric, Louis Durey, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, Francis Poulenc, Germaine Tailleferre. As a group Les Six came in for a great deal of rough criticism and vicious attack. Moreover it has later been proved that they were a group only in the sense that they were friends and composers. Their aims and ideals, like those of any artists, were found soon to be widely different. Milhaud was often considered as the leader of Les Six, partly because Honegger was one of the first to leave the group. At any rate these two were and probably still are the most interesting composers of Les Six.

In 1939 the Nouvelles Litteraires interviewed each one of these composers and M. Cocteau to find out what they then thought, 20 years after. All of them were very polite about each other and noncommittal about the group as a group. Milhaud felt that there was no longer any need for them to manifest themselves collectively and he stated that the essential thing was to have been born together at an auspicious moment. Honegger pointed out that the post-war period was, with its controversies and its partisan groups, a not too bad period in which to launch one's artistic footsteps. He believed that the next generation would feel the lack of those stimulating advantages.

Milhaud's output has been very extensive and has not been received with universal admiration. Criticism has waxed both hot and cold in his direction. At the least his is not soporific music. It does arouse protest from those with firmly established preconceived notions about music. One of his best known pieces, with American audiences, is often played on two-piano programs. It is a set of dances, called "Scaramouche," and exploits this uncompromising medium brilliantly. His symphony was played by the Chicago Orchestra as part of the celebrations for their 50th anniversary and is said to have been well received. All the works on the next symphony program are new to Boston, and we know only that they represent the latest development of this interesting composer.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
DEC 14 1940

Koussevitzky Thrills Crowd At Music Hall

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY waved his magic wand last night and thrilled a capacity audience at Music Hall.

Directing his Boston Symphony Orchestra, Magician Koussevitzky drew a gorgeous gem out of his Haydn repertoire, turned a familiar pair of Debussy ornaments into vivid, vital realities, popped a brilliant young pianist out of a Stravinsky syncapriccio and revealed all of the lyric beauty and vernal freshness that Brahms put into his Second Symphony.

Pianist J. M. Sanroma and various members of the orchestra, including the first bass viol draped in front of the piano, poured out our third introduction to modernism, into ears that proved highly receptive. Sanroma justly won an ovation for his performance of this prodigious work, mostly syncopation, pungent outbursts and odd instrumental combinations and often melodic.

The Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88 or No. 13, take your choice, our favorite, by the way, was given a marvelous reading. This exquisite music was played with flawless rhythmic and dynamic attention and superb artistry as to expressive nuance. Of the two Debussy pieces, "Clouds" with its fleecy texture and sparkling interludes offered impressions of pure tonal beauty. The "Festivals" and its imaginative procession became a brilliant, scintillating and ever-changing colorful worldly scene under Boston supervision.

Koussevitzky brought to the Brahms opus a magical touch that etched with the utmost clarity every beautiful phrase in this rapturous apothesis of spring.

The concert was a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course of which Mrs. Emil Brudno is director. The next attraction is Alec Templeton, December 31.—E. B.

Music and Sentries

Boston Herald Dec 15

James C. Petrillo, the handsomely paid president of the American Federation of Musicians, has again demonstrated his claim to the title of Czar of America's Music, but not in a way which will endear him to subjects. He declined to sanction a radio broadcast by an army band at Fort Dix, N. J., because "there's no telling where this thing might end." Admittedly army bands are non-union and if they gave concerts over the air morning, noon and night their performances would undoubtedly deprive some union musicians of employment. But there is small chance that the army would permit this to occur. Army bands have other things to do. Meanwhile Mr. Petrillo does not allow any patriotic qualms to interfere with his duty. He acts to protect the interests of his men, even if that action happens to be in clear defiance of the nation's interest.

Speaking of the army and military training, it may not be amiss to call attention to an incident at Fort Devens Saturday. A young woman suffered a slight wound when the automobile in which she was riding failed to stop for a sentry and the sentry fired at the car. Sentries on duty at an army camp or naval reservation are not there for decorative effect. They are there to preserve order and to protect government property. They are usually armed and instructed to use their arms in the event they are disobeyed. Civilians should not run the risk of assuming that they will be as genial and tolerant in regard to minor infractions of rules as police officers are.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Shows Wizardry in Concerts Here

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Serge Koussevitzky again demonstrated his wizardry with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two wonderful concerts at Syria Mosque over the week end.

Saturday night he presented a program in which the musician revels and in return for which the massive audience cheered and shouted its bravos. There was a cheerful Haydn Symphony, G Major No. 88. Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 5.

I have always contended that so large an orchestra counteracts much of the charm of Haydn's music. Despite the fact that this director manipulates his virtuoso players with uncanny skill, giving us again so clearly the success of those problems which confronted the mannheim Symphonists, yet such movements as the delicate minuets and the largo sound still better with chamber music orchestras. Koussevitzky never plays into this music its all too-evident humor; his reading is far more a playing with the well-being of good music.

In the Beethoven the most amazing bit of technical perfection was the distancing of tone for the off-stage trumpet. Never before has it sounded more comforting in its far-off signal for release. Of the obviously fine gradations in emotion and color one loses oneself in superlatives, the tremendous sweep of the strings in that powerful climax being almost superhuman.

That we have a power in modern music to reckon with in Shostakovitch, his fifth symphony proved beyond doubt. He is an original without a peer among contemporary writers—his daring use of old forms, his witty alternation of the real with the parody in harmony and melody, his naive use of a dissonant drone above a solidly built lament, his mocking pessimism in the midst of his triumphant marche themes pitted against simple folk-like tunes, all seem to say the truth of Soviet Russia. He is an artist who is speaking of his times and therefore a genuine creator.

Sunday afternoon's program was quite another matter. The climax of that music came with the Brahms' second symphony which we had recently enough heard in our own orchestra. Its opening movement and last in Koussevitzky's tempo are glorious music, but contrasting the middle parts with the nimbleness of Shostakovitch and Stravinsky we can understand why the earlier listeners to Brahms were likely to slumber while he with heavy foot plodded through his complexities.

As novelty came Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal." This young American combines the grace of Mozartean figures with just enough of today's innovations in orchestration to make his music both understandable and palatable on first hearing. That he kept to the artificial gayety of Sheridan's theater and that within the bounds of good forms shows both excellent schooling and the ability of speak for himself as well.

Debussy's "Nuages et Fetes" displayed all the restraint which the Bostonians have at their command and in understatement recreated Debussy's impressionisms.

Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and chamber orchestra, played by Jesus Maria Sanroma for the first time here, gives us the composer at his best and less good. The soloist is one of the best players of modern music, the director is the same and so we may accept this playing as authoritative, for we need such assurance on listening to later Stravinsky for the first time. The work seems too artificial to me, a theoretic demonstration of his philosophies of the new music which assails the audience over too long a period with mathematics without giving it enough reasonable music content to bear away any impression whatever, as does indeed come in the last movement.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
DEC 15 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS MUSIC SPEAK

Spontaneity of Koussevitzky's Musicians Unrivaled

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

BY HERBERT ELWELL

One of the high spots of Cleveland's music season was the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at Public Music Hall last night. Appearing for the third consecutive year in the Cleveland Concert Course, the famed orchestra was greeted by a capacity audience whose marked enthusiasm drew a grateful smile from the face of the distinguished conductor as he returned repeatedly to aeknowlewge applause that seemed as spontaneous as the music which inspired it.

There is, indeed, a kind of spontaneity in the playing of this orchestra which seems unrivaled. And each time it returns one's admiration for it grows. No other symphonic body has given us rhythm so joyously alive as this group, whose conductor feels not only every beat but every subdivision thereof. And it is this extraordinary awareness of minute pulsations, this proximity to something like cosmic vibration, that causes heavy outlines to vanish and allows the very heart of music to rise up in its incorpareal reality and speak to us with eloquence and splendor and incomparably sweet intimacy.

What can one say of such a performance as Kousevitzky gave us of the Brahms Second Symphony, except humbly to thank him and his musicians for so moving an experience? The symphony was not played. It was sung by strings that have no equal, by woodwinds that merge so softly out of the total texture that their presence is almost unsuspected, and by brasses that temper their tone gently, until the crucial moment when their full force drives home an unforgettable climax.

Share of Modernity

But if the Bostonians brought us memorable classics, memorably performed, they did not neglect this time to enlighten us also with a share of modernity in the form of Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, nor to play one of their trump cards by bringing their admirable pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, to perform the solo part.

This item alone would have made an exciting evening, for, thanks to an impeccable interpretation, Stravinsky's music sounded more engaging than ever. Heard here for the first time, and received with acclaim, this masterful badinage summarizes all the Stravinsky periods from "Petrouchka" to jazz and neo-classicism, and it tickles every nerve center with such impersonal delicacy that its gayety becomes almost immoderate.

Polished to its fingertips also was the opening Symphony in G Major, No. 88 of Haydn, and if there were not dozens of other passages in it to contemplate with pleasure, the one with cross accents in the Trio would suffice to make one happy. Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," were included between the Haydn and the Stravinsky, and both were masterpieces in control of dynamics, one of the most noteworthy spots being the distant pianissimo of the trumpets at the beginning of the procession in "Fetes."

We'll be in the Sun of the I but I wasn't any more

Herald

Italian Refugee Photographer Did Koussevitzky for Herald

A year ago, the lively and imaginative man who made the photograph of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky on the cover of today's Sunday Herald Boston Symphony Orchestra magazine, landed penniless in New York, a refugee from Fascist Italy with a wife and a 5-year-old daughter. Behind him, in a studio in Milan where his work had made him rich, he had to leave most of his photographic equipment and most of his funds.

Virtually penniless, Egone, the photographer who had made art studies of royalty and peasants, tramped the streets of New York looking for a job. He could hardly express himself in English. He found nothing.

"Now I begin again," he said to himself when he reached Boston with his family. He has made good, just as he has mastered English. Symphony Hall will show 25 of his studies of life at Tanglewood, the Berkshire music colony, this week.

Egone is 40, born in Trieste of Austrian parentage. In 1916, he achieved fame by using the first candid camera in Italy. He has it now, an old German Minnigraph, which he calls "the grandfather of all candid cameras." But it is now a museum piece, and he long ago perfected a new technique of studio and art photographs as different from candid shots as Renoir is different from Dali.

"The trouble is all over now," Egone explains. "Why, my daughter, Renata, has become a perfect American in a year. We all know that this is the best place in the world to be."

49

Guest of the Symphony; Darius Milhaud in Boston

Herald Dec 15

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

It has been a long time since anything of Darius Milhaud's work has been played at a Boston Symphony concert, and we may regard ourselves as lucky that the distinguished French composer is now in this country and will conduct half of the programs on next Friday and Saturday in some of his recent scores. Milhaud visited Boston in 1922, and a symphonic work of his was played in 1926. This long lapse in the Boston public's acquaintance with the music of one of the most prominent of contemporary composers suggests that it would be wise to recall something of his career.

The chief artistic influences that Milhaud underwent are not hard to collect, though they do not entirely account for the diversity of his musical expression. Most important among them, probably, is his long association with the famous French poet Paul Claudel. Claudel's is a very strong artistic personality and one that has been sympathetic to the art of music. His poems are usually deeply religious and Roman Catholic, and they are often outspoken and vigorous. He and Paul Valery have long been the leaders in modern French poetry.

Milhaud was introduced to the poetry of Claudel by Francis Jammes before the war, when he was given a copy of "Connaissance do l'Est" to read in the train. Jammes' description of the man with whom young Milhaud was to be so closely associated was not especially reassuring. "He represented him to me," M. Milhaud was later destined to report, "at once as a kind of saint and a frightful bugaboo, incapable of supporting the odor of vanilla, clad in a Chinese robe and bonneted with the hat of a consul general." Milhaud was immediately tempted to set some of the "Connaissance de l'Est" to music. He met Claudel in 1911, and thereafter there was incessant colaboration between the two. During the war they went to Brazil, where Claudel had a diplomatic post.

On his return from Rio de Janeiro Milhaud came under another influence which was scarcely less vital to his art. In 1919, at the instigation of Jean Cocteau and with Erik Satie as a model for inspiration, there gathered together six composers who felt they had a common cause in art. They held that the goal towards which Debussy worked had been reached and the possibilities for further exploitation of that vein exhausted. They mistrusted the still potent influence of Wagner and Strauss; they were repelled by the Schola Cantorum, d'Indy and the admirers of Franck.

The names of these composers were—and still are, for that matter—Georges Auric, Louis Durey, Arthur Honegger, Darius Milhaud, Francis Poulenc, Germaine Tailleferre. As a group Les Six came in for a great deal of rough criticism and vicious attack. Moreover it has later been proved that they were a group only in the sense that they were friends and composers. Their aims and ideals, like those of any artists, were found soon to be widely different. Milhaud was often considered as the leader of Les Six, partly because Honegger was one of the first to leave the group. At any rate these two were and probably still are the most interesting composers of Les Six.

In 1939 the Nouvelles Litteraires interviewed each one of these composers and M. Cocteau to find out what they then thought, 20 years after. All of them were very polite about each other and noncommittal about the group as a group. Milhaud felt that there was no longer any need for them to manifest themselves collectively and he stated that the essential thing was to have been born together at an auspicious moment. Honegger pointed out that the post-war period was, with its controversies and its partisan groups, a not too bad period in which to launch one's artistic footsteps. He believed that the next generation would feel the lack of those stimulating advantages.

Milhaud's output has been very extensive and has not been received with universal admiration. Criticism has waxed both hot and cold in his direction. At the least his is not soporific music. It does arouse protest from those with firmly established preconceived notions about music. One of his best known pieces, with American audiences, is often played on two-piano programs. It is a set of dances, called "Scaramouche," and exploits this uncompromising medium brilliantly. His symphony was played by the Chicago Orchestra as part of the celebrations for their 50th anniversary and is said to have been well received. All the works on the next symphony program are new to Boston, and we know only that they represent the latest development of this interesting composer.

Music and Sentries

Post-Herald Dec. 17

James C. Petrillo, the handsomely paid president of the American Federation of Musicians, has again demonstrated his claim to the title of Czar of America's Music, but not in a way which will endear him to subjects. He declined to sanction a radio broadcast by an army band at Fort Dix, N. J., because "there's no telling where this thing might end." Admittedly army bands are non-union and if they gave concerts over the air morning, noon and night their performances would undoubtedly deprive some union musicians of employment. But there is small chance that the army would permit this to occur. Army bands have other things to do. Meanwhile Mr. Petrillo does not allow any patriotic qualms to interfere with his duty. He acts to protect the interests of his men, even if that action happens to be in clear defiance of the nation's interest.

Speaking of the army and military training, it may not be amiss to call attention to an incident at Fort Devens Saturday. A young woman suffered a slight wound when the automobile in which she was riding failed to stop for a sentry and the sentry fired at the car. Sentries on duty at an army camp or naval reservation are not there for decorative effect. They are there to preserve order and to protect government property. They are usually armed and instructed to use their arms in the event they are disobeyed. Civilians should not run the risk of assuming that they will be as genial and tolerant in regard to minor infractions of rules as police officers are.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
SUN-TELEGRAPH
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Shows Wizardry in Concerts Here

By J. FRED LISSFELT

Serge Koussevitzky again demonstrated his wizardry with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in two wonderful concerts at Syria Mosque over the week end.

Saturday night he presented a program in which the musician revels and in return for which the massive audience cheered and shouted its bravos. There was a cheerful Haydn Symphony, G Major No. 88, Beethoven's "Leonore" Overture No. 3, and the Shostakovitch Symphony No. 5.

I have always contended that so large an orchestra counteracts much of the charm of Haydn's music. Despite the fact that this director manipulates his virtuoso players with uncanny skill, giving us again so clearly the success of those problems which confronted the mannheim Symphonists, yet such movements as the delicate minuets and the largo sound still better with chamber music orchestras. Koussevitzky never plays into this music its all too-evident humor; his reading is far more a playing with the well-being of good music.

In the Beethoven the most amazing bit of technical perfection was the distancing of tone for the off-stage trumpet. Never before has it sounded more comforting in its far-off signal for release. Of the obviously fine gradations in emotion and color one loses oneself in superlatives, the tremendous sweep of the strings in that powerful climax being almost superhuman.

That we have a power in modern music to reckon with in Shostakovitch, his fifth symphony proved beyond doubt. He is an original without a peer among contemporary writers—his daring use of old forms, his witty alternation of the real with the parody in harmony and melody, his naive use of a dissonant drone above a solidly built lament, his mocking pessimism in the midst of his triumphant marche themes pitted against simple folk-like tunes, all seem to say the truth of Soviet Russia. He is an artist who is speaking of his times and therefore a genuine creator.

Sunday afternoon's program was quite another matter. The climax of that music came with the Brahms' second symphony which we had recently enough heard in our own orchestra. Its opening movement and last in Koussevitzky's tempo are glorious music, but contrasting the middle parts with the nimbleness of Shostakovitch and Stravinsky we can understand why the earlier listeners to Brahms were likely to slumber while he with heavy foot plodded through his complexities.

As novelty came Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal." This young American combines the grace of Mozartean figures with just enough of today's innovations in orchestration to make his music both understandable and palatable on first hearing. That he kept to the artificial gayety of Sheridan's theater and that within the bounds of good forms shows both excellent schooling and the ability of speak for himself as well.

Debussy's "Nuages et Fetes" displayed all the restraint which the Bostonians have at their command and in understatement recreated Debussy's impressionisms.

Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and chamber orchestra, played by Jesus Maria Sanroma for the first time here, [redacted] the composer at his best and less good. The soloist is one of the best players of modern music, the director is the same and so we may accept this playing as authoritative, for we need such assurance on listening to later Stravinsky for the first time. The work seems too artificial to me, a theoretic demonstration of his philosophies of the new music which assails the audience over too long a period with mathematics without giving it enough reasonable music content to bear away any impression whatever, as does indeed come in the last movement.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
NEWS
DEC 14 1940

Koussevitzky Thrills Crowd At Music Hall

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY waved his magic wand last night and thrilled a capacity audience at Music Hall.

Directing his Boston Symphony Orchestra, Magician Koussevitzky drew a gorgeous gem out of his Haydn repertoire, turned a familiar pair of Debussy ornaments into vivid, vital realities, popped a brilliant young pianist out of a Stravinsky syncapriccio and revealed all of the lyric beauty and vernal freshness that Brahms put into his Second Symphony.

Pianist J. M. Sanroma and various members of the orchestra, including the first bass viol draped in front of the piano, poured out our third introduction to modernism, into ears that proved highly receptive. Sanroma justly won an ovation for his performance of this prodigious work, mostly syncopation, pungent outbursts and odd instrumental combinations and often melodic.

The Haydn Symphony in G Major, No. 88 or No. 13, take your choice, our favorite, by the way, was given a marvelous reading. This exquisite music was played with flawless rhythmic and dynamic attention and superb artistry as to expressive nuance. Of the two Debussy pieces, "Clouds" with its fleecy texture and sparkling interludes offered impressions of pure tonal beauty. The "Festivals" and its imaginative procession became a brilliant, scintillating and ever-changing colorful worldly scene under Boston supervision.

Koussevitzky brought to the Brahms opus a magical touch that etched with the utmost clarity every beautiful phrase in this rapturous apothesis of spring.

The concert was a feature of the Cleveland Concert Course of which Mrs. Emil Brudno is director. The next attraction is Alec Templeton, December 31.—E. B.

This Clipping From
CLEVELAND, OHIO
PLAIN DEALER
DEC 15 1940

BOSTON SYMPHONY LETS MUSIC SPEAK

Spontaneity of Koussevitzky's Musicians Unrivaled

(Reprinted from yesterday's late editions)

BY HERBERT ELWELL

One of the high spots of Cleveland's music season was the visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky at Public Music Hall last night. Appearing for the third consecutive year in the Cleveland Concert Course, the famed orchestra was greeted by a capacity audience whose marked enthusiasm drew a grateful smile from the face of the distinguished conductor as he returned repeatedly to acknowlewge applause that seemed as spontaneous as the music which inspired it.

There is, indeed, a kind of spontaneity in the playing of this orchestra which seems unrivaled. And each time it returns one's admiration for it grows. No other symphonic body has given us rhythm so joyously alive as this group, whose conductor feels not only every beat but every subdivision thereof. And it is this extraordinary awareness of minute pulsations, this proximity to something like cosmic vibration, that causes heavy outlines to vanish and allows the very heart of music to rise up in its incorpareal reality and speak to us with eloquence and splendor and incomparably sweet intimacy.

What can one say of such a performance as Kousevitzky gave us of the Brahms Second Symphony, except humbly to thank him and his musicians for so moving an experience? The symphony was not played. It was sung by strings that have no equal, by woodwinds that merge so softly out of the total texture that their presence is almost unsuspected, and by brasses that temper their tone gently, until the crucial moment when their full force drives home an unforgettable climax.

Share of Modernity

But if the Bostonians brought us memorable classics, memorably performed, they did not neglect this time to enlighten us also with a share of modernity in the form of Stravinsky's "Capriccio" for piano and orchestra, nor to play one of their trump cards by bringing their admirable pianist, Jesus Maria Sanroma, to perform the solo part.

This item alone would have made an exciting evening, for, thanks to an impeccable interpretation, Stravinsky's music sounded more engaging than ever. Heard here for the first time, and received with acclaim, this masterful badinage summarizes all the Stravinsky periods from "Petrouchka" to jazz and neo-classicism, and it tickles every nerve center with such impersonal delicacy that its gayety becomes almost immoderate.

Polished to its fingertips also was the opening Symphony in G Major, No. 88 of Haydn, and if there were not dozens of other passages in it to contemplate with pleasure, the one with cross accents in the Trio would suffice to make one happy. Debussy's two nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," were included between the Haydn and the Stravinsky, and both were masterpieces in control of dynamics, one of the most noteworthy spots being the distant pianissimo of the trumpets at the beginning of the procession in "Fetes."

[redacted] of the I wasn't any more

This Clipping From
MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
DEC 15 1940

50

FAMED LEADER BREAKS TRADITION

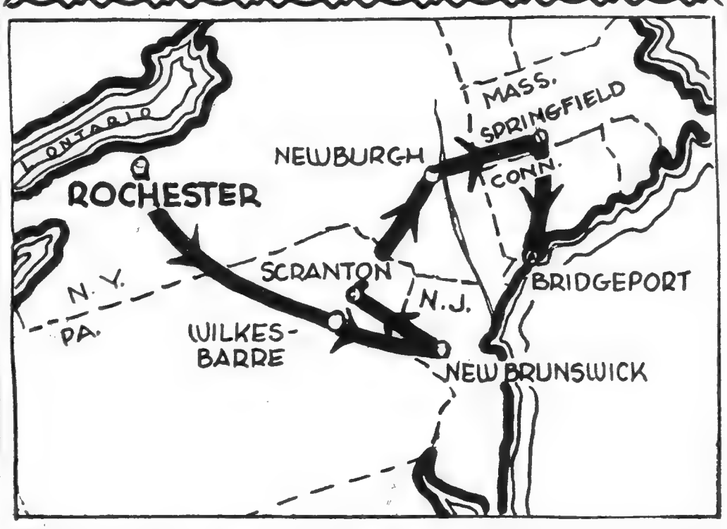
Breaking a 60-year tradition of orchestra and his own tradition during 17 years he has conducted it, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky permitted the two accompanying photographs of himself and famous Boston Symphony orchestra at an especially arranged concert for news photographers. At left, he indicates the first down beat—for the music to begin softly. At right, he gives "attack forte" with his baton and indicates volume of tone with his left hand.

The special concert ends on a humorous note. Instead of following his usual custom of bowing and quickly walking from the stage, Dr. Koussevitzky suddenly wheels around, and to the astonishment of orchestra and audience, sits down with a bow on the podium.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 9 - 1940

City Swaps Orchestras

Boston Musicians Arrive



Members of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra took off today for a tour on which they will give concerts in the cities indicated on this map.

• • •

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Just as the Rochester musicians were piling onto a train at the Lehigh Valley Station, Conductor Koussevitzky and members of his famed Boston Symphony Orchestra were piling out of a train at the New York Central Station.

Rochester Players Depart on 5-Day Concert Tour

IN A MASS musical exchange today, Rochester proudly sent its own 90-piece Philharmonic Orchestra on tour and welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra of more than 100 musicians.

At almost the same time the Rochester players were boarding a Lehigh Valley Railroad train for a five-day tour starting tonight at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., the Boston aggregation piled off its New York Central special train for its annual concert tonight in the Eastman Theater.

That music is a medium without international boundaries was evidenced once more when the Boston musicians deployed from the train, chatting in a mixture of languages in which German, French and Italian, and English flavored with a variety of accents could be heard.

Maestro Reveals Patience

One of the last to alight was Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed leader of the Boston orchestra, generally acclaimed as the world's greatest symphonic ensemble. He was the last word in correct dress, from his stylish Homburg hat, fur-collared greatcoat and impeccably Ascot-knotted scarf to his freshly-shined shoes.

He posed patiently for photographers, and paused to say a kind word for Rochester and its cordial concert-goers, who always, he said, have shown high appreciation of good music. He estimated that this was his 17th visit here with the Boston Symphony. Last June, he was awarded an honorary degree by the University of Rochester.

Audiences Gain in Knowledge

"American audiences have gained remarkably in their liking for and understanding of the best in music," he said. "They realize now that good music satisfies a deep need; it increases their feeling of happiness when times are good, and it consoles them in the stress of troubles such as we are having nowadays."

The Rochester Philharmonic will play tomorrow at New Brunswick, N. J.; Wednesday in Scranton, Pa.; Thursday in Newburgh, N. Y.; Friday in Springfield, Mass.; and Saturday in Bridgeport, Conn. Jose Iturbi, its conductor, will join the orchestra in Wilkes-Barre, to conduct the nightly concerts, and Guy Fraser Harrison will lead the Civic Orchestra in matinee concerts for children in New Brunswick and Newburgh.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Scores Brilliant Triumph in Concerts at the Mosque

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

The quintessence of interpretative conducting and orchestral response was revealed marvelously by the performances of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque last Saturday night and yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Lewando

Each occasion attracted a capacity audience that was stirred deeply by the superb playing of distinguished music. Following the final number of each event protracted demonstrations of enthusiasm surpassed any similar expression of approbation here in many moons.

We are indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky for presenting two fine lists of works, one that included Haydn's 88th symphony in G, Beethoven's 3rd Lenore overture, and the 5th Shostakovitch symphony; the other comprising Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," Debussy's Clouds and Festivals, Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra and piano, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms' 2nd symphony.

With his usual consummate mastery, Dr. Koussevitzky communicated through the orchestra the intense, vivid and vibrant qualities of Beethoven's overture. As often as we have listened to performances of this work no presentation seemed as impelling in expression as that given articulation by this inspired leader and his musicians. The grandeur of this overture took on a new aspect of tonal beauty and dramatic fervor. Playing, more vital than was accorded the piece, does not seem possible.

* * *

Heard here for the first time, the Shostakovitch symphony—a work by the 34-year-old Russian composer who is a forefront personality in modern composition proves its right to an important place in orchestral repertory. The score is virile, commanding, highly individual and original and is the offshoot of a throbbing talent who knows what to say and how to say it.

This music, without a program—or without need of one—is music of the present that seems likely to be embraced wholeheartedly by an understanding posterity. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave to the playing of this work skill and ardor that evoked an ovation seldom achieved in presentation of so modern a composition; an indication of its forthrightness and quality as well as a tribute to the manner of performance.

Aside from grandiloquent expression accorded the Debussy and Brahms numbers on the matinee list, the attention was riveted on the novelties of the occasion—the excellent music incorporated in both the Samuel Barber overture and Stravinsky Capriccio. America may well be proud of a composer of Barber's attainments. His musical thought is logical, his procedure artistic, his efforts genuine, and his powers point to unlimited possibilities. His overture was received with acclaim.

* * *

The Stravinsky work, very complex and very demanding for all concerned, is writing that may only be properly presented by a virtuoso group such as that under Dr. Koussevitzky's command in collaboration with a master pianist like Mr. Sanroma. Needless to state the articulation of this work was achieved with finesse and brilliance by the orchestra with Mr. Sanroma's phenomenal ability adding further scintillance to the performance. Soloist, orchestra and leader shared the approbation bestowed by the audience.

This Clipping From
MIAMI, FLA.
NEWS
DEC 15 1940

50

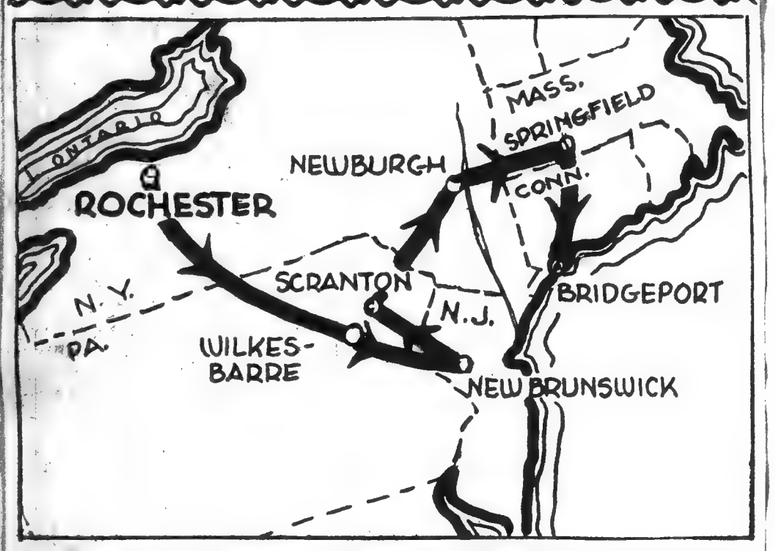
FAMED LEADER BREAKS TRADITION

Breaking a 60-year tradition of orchestra and his own tradition during 17 years he has conducted it, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky permitted the two accompanying photographs of himself and famous Boston Symphony orchestra at an especially arranged concert for news photographers. At left, he indicates the first down beat—for the music to begin softly. At right, he gives "attack forte" with his baton and indicates volume of tone with his left hand.

This Clipping From
ROCHESTER, N.Y.
TIMES UNION
DEC 9 - 1940

City Swaps Orchestras

Boston Musicians Arrive



Members of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra took off today for a tour on which they will give concerts in the cities indicated on this map.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Just as the Rochester musicians were piling onto a train at the Lehigh Valley Station, Conductor Koussevitzky and members of his famed Boston Symphony Orchestra were piling out of a train at the New York Central Station.

Rochester Players Depart on 5-Day Concert Tour

IN A MASS musical exchange today, Rochester proudly sent its own 90-piece Philharmonic Orchestra on tour and welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra of more than 100 musicians.

At almost the same time the Rochester players were boarding a Lehigh Valley Railroad train for a five-day tour starting tonight at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., the Boston aggregation piled off its New York Central special train for its annual concert tonight in the Eastman Theater.

That music is a medium without international boundaries was evidenced once more when the Boston musicians deployed from the train, chatting in a mixture of languages in which German, French and Italian, and English flavored with a variety of accents could be heard.

Maestro Reveals Patience

One of the last to alight was Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, famed leader of the Boston orchestra, generally acclaimed as the world's greatest symphonic ensemble. He was the last word in correct dress, from his stylish Homburg hat, fur-collared greatcoat and impeccably Ascot-knotted scarf to his freshly-shined shoes.

He posed patiently for photographers, and paused to say a kind word for Rochester and its cordial concert-goers, who always, he said, have shown high appreciation of good music. He estimated that this was his 17th visit here with the Boston Symphony. Last June, he was awarded an honorary degree by the University of Rochester.

Audiences Gain in Knowledge

"American audiences have gained remarkably in their liking for and understanding of the best in music," he said. "They realize now that good music satisfies a deep need; it increases their feeling of happiness when times are good, and it consoles them in the stress of troubles such as we are having nowadays."

The Rochester Philharmonic will play tomorrow at New Brunswick, N. J.; Wednesday in Scranton, Pa.; Thursday in Newburgh, N. Y.; Friday in Springfield, Mass.; and Saturday in Bridgeport, Conn. Jose Iturbi, its conductor, will join the orchestra in Wilkes-Barre, to conduct the nightly concerts, and Guy Fraser Harrison will lead the Civic Orchestra in matinee concerts for children in New Brunswick and Newburgh.

The special concert ends on a humorous note. Instead of following his usual custom of bowing and quickly walking from the stage, Dr. Koussevitzky suddenly wheels around, and to the astonishment of orchestra and audience, sits down with a bow on the podium.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Scores Brilliant Triumph in Concerts at the Mosque

By RALPH LEWANDO
Press Music Critic

The quintessence of interpretative conducting and orchestral response was revealed marvelously by the performances of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Syria Mosque last Saturday night and yesterday afternoon.

Mr. Lewando

Each occasion attracted a capacity audience that was stirred deeply by the superb playing of distinguished music. Following the final number of each event protracted demonstrations of enthusiasm surpassed any similar expression of approbation here in many moons.

We are indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky for presenting two fine lists of works, one that included Haydn's 88th symphony in G, Beethoven's 3rd Lenore overture, and the 5th Shostakovitch symphony; the other comprising Samuel Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," Debussy's Clouds and Festivals, Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra and piano, with Jesus Maria Sanroma as soloist, and Brahms 2nd symphony.

With his usual consummate mastery, Dr. Koussevitzky communicated through the orchestra the intense, vivid and vibrant qualities of Beethoven's overture. As often as we have listened to performances of this work no presentation seemed as impelling in expression as that given articulation by this inspired leader and his musicians. The grandeur of this overture took on a new aspect of tonal beauty and dramatic fervor. Playing, more vital than was accorded the piece, does not seem possible.

* * *

Heard here for the first time, the Shostakovitch symphony—a work by the 34-year-old Russian composer who is a forefront personality in modern composition proves its right to an important place in orchestral repertory. The score is virile, commanding, highly individual and original and is the offshoot of a throbbing talent who knows what to say and how to say it.

This music, without a program—or without need of one—is music of the present that seems likely to be embraced wholeheartedly by an understanding posterity. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave to the playing of this work skill and ardor that evoked an ovation seldom achieved in presentation of so modern a composition; an indication of its forthrightness and quality as well as a tribute to the manner of performance.

Aside from grandiloquent expression accorded the Debussy and Brahms numbers on the matinee list, the attention was riveted on the novelties of the occasion—the excellent music incorporated in both the Samuel Barber overture and Stravinsky Capriccio. America may well be proud of a composer of Barber's attainments. His musical thought is logical, his procedure artistic, his efforts genuine, and his powers point to unlimited possibilities. His overture was received with acclaim.

* * *

The Stravinsky work, very complex and very demanding for all concerned, is writing that may only be properly presented by a virtuoso group such as that under Dr. Koussevitzky's command in collaboration with a master pianist like Mr. Sanroma. Needless to state the articulation of this work was achieved with finesse and brilliance by the orchestra with Mr. Sanroma's phenomenal ability adding further scintillance to the performance. Soloist, orchestra and leader shared the approbation bestowed by the audience.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Inspiring Concerts

Koussevitzky Dynamic in Leadership of Musicians Who Thrill Audiences

By Donald Steinfirst

Two performances of symphonic music one so superb in every detail that it defies mere criticism and the other almost as perfect were provided over the week-end at Syria Mosque by the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra under its dynamic leader Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been appearing in Pittsburgh for many years and has given many memorable concerts, but it seemed to at least one member of the audience, that the performance on Saturday night will be remembered as the most vivid and inspiring concert given by a symphonic organization in Pittsburgh in this observer's life-time of concert-going.

Perhaps because the orchestra was concluding a short and, as usual, highly successful tour, winning fresh laurels and deafening ovations everywhere; perhaps because Dr. Koussevitzky was in just the right mood or the orchestra more alert than usual—whatever the reason, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although there was never any doubt of it, established itself anew as the outstanding musical creation of our time. In both these concerts, the strings glowed and shone like some fine polished crystal, the brass section was powerful and mellow as the music made its various demands and the woodwinds—the fabulous Boston woodwinds—sang their plaintive songs unendingly with never a false entry, a misplaced tone nor a brash phrasing to mar the unity of the whole ensemble. Over all stood the colossal figure of Serge Koussevitzky, a master conductor of the music he chose to interpret, whose every motion indicated a wish, to which his men responded accurately and instantaneously.

Saturday night, for the sake of chronology, no doubt to show the development of the symphony from Haydn to the ultra modern Russian Shostakovich, the conductor opened with the G Major Symphony of Haydn, No. 88 in the B. & H. catalogue, followed with the Leonore Overture No. 3 of Beethoven and concluded with Pittsburgh's first hearing of Dmitri Shostkovich Fifth Symphony. Everything in this program cries out for comment and commendation, but perhaps most of all, the electrifying playing of the Beethoven overture. Dr. Koussevitsky is including the Leonore No. 3 on his programs this season after several years when the work was absent. He has restudied the music which has received so many performances at the hands of other less gifted conductors and the result was apparent Saturday night. This observer has heard the work possibly 50 times, yet as Dr. Koussevitsky unfolded the music, it seemed to breathe freshness and reveal hidden voices, hitherto unheard. It was an Olympian conception and for once, the off-stage dramatic trumpet call really heralded freedom for a lost soul and was not just a cheap effect. This same intensity pervaded the whole performance.

The crystalline performance of the Haydn Symphony, too, must be set down as a triumph for orchestra and conductor alike. This is music for aristocrats, ornate, polished and refined, and as such, Dr. Koussevitzky played it. One looks back on the happy simplicity of the Largo with the strings singing the unbroken melody, or on the lilting, swinging Menuetto or on the fast-rushing Finale, on all this, only to stand in amazement before such masterly playing.

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich is one of, if not the outstanding, compositions of this generation. Of that there can be little doubt. Listeners will perhaps point out some banalities in the score, the tongue-in-cheek scherzo perhaps, or the very few clangorous dissonances. But they cannot deny that the work has a compelling virtuosity, that it has form and rhythm and substance, in short, that it "sounds." We like to feel that the scherzo, the most ingratiating movement, is an exciting bit of satire, a gay and witty folk dance tossed from solo violin to woodwinds and then to full orchestra. The slow movement, perhaps a little tenuous, is a brooding poetic largo, but the conclusion, with its brass-band marching effect, is sheer splendor. We are all indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky for playing the music for us, and for his performance with its miraculous crescendos and its split-second attacks.

We doubt though that immortality will come to the other modern Russian work offered yesterday. Stravinsky's Capriccio for Orchestra with piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma, the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is typical Stravinsky of the period of 10 years ago, brilliant if not too solidly constructed and time only will tell whether or not there is more glitter than gold in the work. Often witty, sophisticated and peppery music, it is scored for string quartet and reduced strings, winds and percussion, and, of course, Mr. Sanroma's tangy piano part which he dashed off like so much Ravel which in fact it often imitates, rather than the Weber the composer tried to follow.

Samuel Barber's Overture "The School For Scandal," the only American work presented during the two-day stay, was rather pale in comparison with the other contemporary music and the other two works comprising yesterday's list were the two Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes of Debussy and Brahms' D Major Symphony.

Both of these works, Koussevitzky has given us previously. The Brahms Symphony was played with dignity and commanding breadth. A little more virile than we have been accustomed to hearing it and a little less sentimentalized perhaps but still beautifully proportioned. The Debussy Nocturnes, as always were the Bostonians at their highest level, Nuages, evanescent and fleecy with every sombre shade in the color scale and fetes, fiery and vital to the last note.

There were tremendous ovations for Sanroma and for Dr. Koussevitzky and of course for the men of the orchestra.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
DEC 21 1940

Praise Heaped On Music Hall

IT IS a question who is deriving the greater pleasure from Kleinhans Music Hall—Buffalo audiences, who, remembering drab Elmwood Music Hall, murmur rapturously as they sink into soft seats and gaze at soothing surroundings; or the distinguished artists, who are brought here.

One of the most spectacular of the converts to the Kleinhans project is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. As the conductor slowly made his way to the podium, he craned his neck until he had taken in a complete panoramic view of the scene. Sensing what was transpiring, the audience applauded and the inspired Koussevitzky replied with: "You have here a most beautiful music hall—a magnificent temple of music."

It was not the conductor's first tribute to the hall, nor his last. Testing the hall's acoustics during the afternoon, the Russian-born musical genius sat on the last row of the balcony while a harpist played his softest tones. The notes reached Koussevitzky clear as a bell.

"UNBELIEVABLY marvelous," he breathed. Following the concert, he again voiced his praise to Mrs. Fred D. Corey, hall director, and to Eliel Saarinen, consultant architect, who designed the hall along with the Buffalo architects, F. J. and W. A. Kidd.

The bouquets which Dr. Koussevitzky tossed to the new music hall are unique only in that he expressed his delight before the audience. Artists appearing before him this season have been equally awed. Curiously, each artist has singled out differing aspects of the hall to praise.

Here are some of the comments as recalled by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry, under whose auspices many of the artists appeared, and Mrs. Corey:

MARIAN ANDERSON: "I have never seen a hall with such beautiful lighting."

EW YORK TIMES, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1940.

[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

MITROPOULOS WINS CONCERT OVATION

Conductor at First Appearance With the Philharmonic Stirs Repeated Cheering

WITHOUT BATON OR SCORE

Strauss 'Domestica' Seen as Climax of the Evening—Two Beethoven Works Played

By OLIN DOWNES

Hopes, long famished, of a conductor of commanding qualities to direct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York were gratified last night when Dimitri Mitropoulos appeared for the first time in a public concert in this city as guest conductor of that body in Carnegie Hall.

Conducting without score and without baton, with a strange, eccentric technique all his own, Mr. Mitropoulos quickly proved his energy and fire as a leader and his remarkable control of the players. He did as he pleased with the orchestra. The orchestra, after a first half week of rehearsals, obeyed him implicitly, and sounded like an entirely different body than the one we have been listening to in late months. This is not said in malice, but as plain fact.

The question of Mr. Mitropoulos as an interpreter is an interesting one to be taken up in a moment. But he conducts with amazing virtuosity. His tonsured head, his often athletic use of his arms, the hands that so flexibly and surely mold the orchestral tone and expose every melody in the complicated orchestral web, say, of a Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," make a curious and arresting individuality on the platform.

Scale of Sonorities Wide

There is no conductor just like him. His scale of sonorities is a very wide one, from a barely audible pianissimo to a fortissimo next to deafening. One likes it or one does not. The audience last night was overwhelmed. It was cheering the new conductor as the reviewers rushed for their editions from the hall.

This concert, also, showed us what had been largely forgotten, which is that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is a magnificent orchestra. In certain positions it needs fresh blood; there is no question of that. It remains a resplendent symphonic body. It was in the fortunate position last night of an instrumental ensemble with a commander-in-chief who knew what he wanted and how to get it. So that the orchestra did not lead the conductor. The conductor led the orchestra, and there was pleasure in the adjusted relation. We now come to the question not of the playing but the interpretations.

The compositions of the evening were Beethoven's Second "Leonore" Overture and Fourth symphony and the Strauss "Domestica." The introduction of the overture, after the chords, repeated, which came of like the crack of a whip, gave opportunity for subtle nuance, of which the conductor fully availed himself. His pianissimi, perfectly adjusted, a superbly developed crescendo, and attention to the smallest detail of accent and color were immediately striking. The overture itself is not equal in its contents to the "Leonore No. 3, but No. 2 seems to be one of Mr. Mitropoulos's favorite warhorses, which he rides with special confidence and skill.

The main body of the overture has one sweepingly dramatic passage which is not in No. 3—the pages which immediately precede the first trumpet-call. These were published with savage power. There was plenty of excitement. There were exaggerated pauses between chords, special swellings and diminishings of tone, not required by the score, and everything was italicized.

It is to be seen whether this was an accidental characteristic of the occasion or whether it will remain one of Mr. Mitropoulos's attributes.

RACHMANINOFF: "These are the cleanest dressing rooms I've ever been in. The resonant qualities of the hall's acoustics are marvelous."

JEANETTE MacDONALD: "This is the loveliest hall I've ever sung in."

JAMES MELTON: "Unquestionably the finest music hall there is."

RISE STEVENS: "It's perfect."

ALEC TEMPLETON: "The sound is so alive."

PAUL ROBESON: "This is a hall with a soul."

Mrs. Corey says she is asking these artists for written expressions of their opinions, which will be bound in a scrapbook for use on the hall's first anniversary program next Oct. 12.

MITROPOULOS GIVES MAHLER SYMPHONY

Work by Verrall Heard in Carnegie.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

There were all manner of unusual happenings at last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. A double base played a lyric solo in a symphony, in which the second and third movements were separated by a fifteen-minute intermission. Then, when the orchestra had the chance to pay its parting respects to Dimitri Mitropoulos, some of the string players boldly abandoned the evasive etiquette of bow-tapping, actually applauding manually, as if they had enjoyed playing. One cannot remember which is the greater rarity.

The uncommon symphony which occasioned these arresting occurrences was, of course, the first of Mahler, which promises to become as much a sensation of the conductor's leaving as the Strauss "Domestica" was of his coming. There have been fine performances of Mahler here in the past, but it is doubtful that any combined so eloquent a feeling for the composer's idiom with so great a capacity for making the orchestra articulate. Here the frustrations in the writing were not blemishes of the score, but inherent elements of its personality, all-too-human accentuations of its intensity and pathos.

Mr. Mitropoulos's plan of presentation was not as wide a variation of the composer's purpose as it might seem, for Mahler specified at least five minutes' pause before the slow movement. Certainly the more Schubertian-than-Schubert slow movement, with its musing tragedy and uneasy irony, gained by the freshness of the listener's attention after the pause. This is an altogether individual creation, as much a revelation of the composer's tortured self-doubts as the over-insistent, fustian peroration in the finale. Mr. Mitropoulos conducted as one delivering a revelation from on high, and the orchestra played with stunning virtuosity, earning full title to the prolonged applause that followed.

Actually the evening was a dazzling one throughout, beginning with the conductor's own transcription of Bach's G minor fantasy and fugue, in which the orchestra became a gigantic organ. One was not certain at all times whether Mr. Mitropoulos was conducting Bach or "The Battle of Prague," but it was assuredly arousing. Between these two massive creations, the "Concert Piece for Strings and Horn" of John Verrall, of Britt (Iowa) London, Budapest and St. Paul was definitely dwarfed, but it was plainly an event more important to the composer than to the audience. It established his ability to write sonorously for strings and with sufficient harmonic personality to file his name, mentally, for future attention. However, the evening belonged to Mahler and Mitropoulos.

DEC 18 1940

Youth Concert

Dec 19-40

Two names figured on the program of the third of the Youth Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Wheeler Beckett directed at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the first name ending in "kowsky," and the second coming to a stop with "sakow."

Whatever else there may be about the men who carry names having a "w" pronounced like "f" that puts them in the same category, nobody will deny that the first one's little set of pieces designated "Nutcracker" Suite and the second's big collection called "Schéhérazade" bear a close resemblance to each other. The sound of Tchaikovsky's group of dances and the sound of Rimsky-Korsakoff's four tone poems fall on the ear with such like effect as to demand explanation. How did the two composers happen to agree so well on what would be catchy ting-tang to young folks long after their own day?

Perhaps they went to school together, and learned to do things the same way. Some of yesterday's listeners must have asked themselves about that. At any rate, answer of a sort is at hand both in the musical dictionaries and in Mr. Beckett's program notes. Tchaikovsky studied music at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and taught at the Moscow Conservatory. He composed the "Nutcracker" a little less than 50 years ago. Rimsky-Korsakoff taught at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and composed "Schéhérazade" a little more than 50 years ago.

Russians they were, indeed, and contemporaries; but which one wants first place in our estimation, and which second?

Perhaps it will be as well for the present to allow them equal honors and let the next 50 years determine their relative rank. For even now they are rather modern. It wants about a whole century for composers to find their rating. On the showing of the two works in question, Rimsky-Korsakoff might easily be put ahead of Tchaikovsky. But Tchaikovsky wrote in large as well as small forms. Hear one of his symphonies, and his rival may have to retire a long way behind. For fair generalization, though, it may without much dispute be put down that Tchaikovsky excells at invention; and Rimsky-Korsakoff, at elaboration.

W. P. T.

ter in Norfolk, Va., Miss Maynor said that she believed that nothing was worth while unless it came by hard work.

Miracle of Voice—"Unknown" Sings at National Fete

By the United Press.

NEW YORK, Dec. 17.—A year and a half ago an almost unknown young Negro soprano sang at the Berkshire music festival.

"A miracle, a miracle!" Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony, shouted as she finished her number. "The world must hear her sing."

Today 29-year-old Dorothy Maynor left for Washington to sing tomorrow night at the Library of Congress at the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the freeing of the slaves—and she still can't quite believe that this wonderful thing has happened to her.

She's filled with gratitude," at the invitation, she said, remembering that the last time she sang in Washington she was "just a high school girl in my best white dress," appearing with the Hampton Institute choir.

But I wasn't any more worried about that performance than I am about this one," she added.

"I'm still just a student," she continued in her soft, gentle voice. "I'm full of humble gratitude that I should be asked to sing by the government. This Negro festival of music is a great thing to me."

Miss Maynor, who first studied to be a sewing teacher, said that although when she was young she was always singing, she never dreamed she'd be a concert singer. She still practices from 10 to 12 hours a day. And wants to be as great a singer as Marian Anderson and Paul Robeson, not realizing she already is considered almost their equal.

Away from the piano, her greatest delight is table tennis.

"I don't like vacations," she said. "I tried to go away last summer for a week to just loaf. I lasted three days."

Daughter of a Negro minis-

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Inspiring Concerts

Koussevitzky Dynamic in Leadership of Musicians Who Thrill Audiences

By Donald Steinfirst

Two performances of symphonic music one so superb in every detail that it defies mere criticism and the other almost as perfect were provided over the week-end at Syria Mosque by the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra under its dynamic leader Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been appearing in Pittsburgh for many years and has given many memorable concerts, but it seemed to at least one member of the audience, that the performance on Saturday night will be remembered as the most vivid and inspiring concert given by a symphonic organization in Pittsburgh in this observer's life-time of concert-going.

Perhaps because the orchestra was concluding a short and, as usual, highly successful tour, winning fresh laurels and deafening ovations everywhere; perhaps because Dr. Koussevitzky was in just the right mood or the orchestra more alert than usual—whatever the reason, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although there was never any doubt of it, established itself anew as the outstanding musical creation of our time. In both these concerts, the strings glowed and shone like some fine polished crystal, the brass section was powerful and mellow as the music made its various demands and the woodwinds—the fabulous Boston woodwinds—sang their plaintive songs unendingly with never a false entry, a misplaced tone nor a brash phrasing to mar the unity of the whole ensemble. Over all stood the colossal figure of Serge Koussevitzky, a master conductor of the music he chose to interpret, whose every motion indicated a wish, to which his men responded accurately and instantaneously.

Saturday night, for the sake of chronology, no doubt to show the development of the symphony from Haydn to the ultra modern Russian Shostakovich, the conductor opened with the G Major Symphony of Haydn, No. 88 in the B. & H. catalogue, followed with the Leonore Overture No. 3 of Beethoven and concluded with Pittsburgh's first hearing of Dmitri Shostkovich Fifth Symphony. Everything in this program cries out for comment and commendation, but perhaps most of all, the electrifying playing of the Beethoven overture. Dr. Koussevitsky is including the Leonore No. 3 on his programs this season after several years when the work was absent. He has restudied the music which has received so many performances at the hands of other less gifted conductors and the result was apparent Saturday night. This observer has heard the work possibly 50 times, yet as Dr. Koussevitsky unfolded the music, it seemed to breathe freshness and reveal hidden voices, hitherto unheard. It was an Olympian conception and for once, the off-stage dramatic trumpet call really heralded freedom for a lost soul and was not just a cheap effect. This same intensity pervaded the whole performance.

The crystalline performance of the Haydn Symphony, too, must be set down as a triumph for orchestra and conductor alike. This is music for aristocrats, ornate, polished and refined, and as such, Dr. Koussevitzky played it. One looks back on the happy simplicity of the Largo with the strings singing the unbroken melody, or on the lilting, swinging Menuetto or on the fast-rushing Finale, on all this, only to stand in amazement before such masterly playing.

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich is one of, if not the outstanding, compositions of this generation. Of that there can be little doubt. Listeners will perhaps point out some banalities in the score, the tongue-in-cheek scherzo perhaps, or the very few clangorous dissonances. But they cannot deny that the work has a compelling virtuosity, that it has form and rhythm and substance, in short, that it "sounds." We like to feel that the scherzo, the most ingratiating movement, is an exciting bit of satire, a gay and witty folk dance tossed from solo violin to woodwinds and then to full orchestra. The slow movement, perhaps a little tenuous, is a brooding poetic largo, but the conclusion, with its brass-band marching effect, is sheer splendor. We are all indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky for playing the music for us, and for his performance with its miraculous crescendos and its split-second attacks.

We doubt though that immortality will come to the other modern Russian work offered yesterday. Stravinsky's Capriccio for Orchestra with piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma, the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is typical Stravinsky of the period of 10 years ago, brilliant if not too solidly constructed and time only will tell whether or not there is more glitter than gold in the work. Often witty, sophisticated and peppery music, it is scored for string quartet and reduced strings, winds and percussion, and, of course, Mr. Sanroma's tangy piano part which he dashed off like so much Ravel which in fact it often imitates, rather than the Weber the composer tried to follow.

Samuel Barber's Overture "The School For Scandal," the only American work presented during the two-day stay, was rather pale in comparison with the other contemporary music and the other two works comprising yesterday's list were the two Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes of Debussy and Brahms' D Major Symphony.

Both of these works, Koussevitzky has given us previously. The Brahms Symphony was played with dignity and commanding breadth. A little more virile than we have been accustomed to hearing it and a little less sentimentalized perhaps but still beautifully proportioned. The Debussy Nocturnes, as always were the Bostonians at their highest level, Nuages, evanescent and fleecy with every sombre shade in the color scale and fetes, fiery and vital to the last note.

There were tremendous ovations for Sanroma and for Dr. Koussevitzky and of course for the men of the orchestra.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
DEC 21 1940

Praise Heaped On Music Hall

IT IS a question who is deriving the greater pleasure from Kleinhans Music Hall—Buffalo audiences, who, remembering drab Elmwood Music Hall, murmur rapturously as they sink into soft seats and gaze at soothing surroundings; or the distinguished artists, who are brought here.

One of the most spectacular of the converts to the Kleinhans project is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. As the conductor slowly made his way to the podium, he craned his neck until he had taken in a complete panoramic view of the scene. Sensing what was transpiring, the audience applauded and the inspired Koussevitzky replied with: "You have here a most beautiful music hall—a magnificent temple of music."

It was not the conductor's first tribute to the hall, nor his last. Testing the hall's acoustics during the afternoon, the Russian-born musical genius sat on the last row of the balcony while a harpist played his softest tones. The notes reached Koussevitzky clear as a bell.

"UNBELIEVABLY marvelous," he breathed. Following the concert, he again voiced his praise to Mrs. Fred D. Corey, hall director, and to Eliel Saarinen, consultant architect, who designed the hall along with the Buffalo architects, F. J. and W. A. Kidd.

The bouquets which Dr. Koussevitzky tossed to the new music hall are unique only in that he expressed his delight before the audience. Artists appearing before him this season have been equally awed. Curiously, each artist has singled out differing aspects of the hall to praise.

Here are some of the comments as recalled by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry, under whose auspices many of the artists appeared, and Mrs. Corey:

MARIAN ANDERSON: "I have never seen a hall with such beautiful lighting."

RACHMANINOFF: "These are the cleanest dressing rooms I've ever been in. The resonant qualities of the hall's acoustics are marvelous."

JEANETTE MacDONALD: "This is the loveliest hall I've ever sung in."

JAMES MELTON: "Unquestionably the finest music hall there is."

RISE STEVENS: "It's perfect."

ALEC TEMPLETON: "The sound is so alive."

PAUL ROBESON: "This is a hall with a soul."

Mrs. Corey says she is asking these artists for written expressions of their opinions, which will be bound in a scrapbook for use on the hall's first anniversary program next Oct. 12.

The New Y
[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

MITROPOULOS WINS CONCERT OVATION

Conductor at First Appearance With the Philharmonic Stirs Repeated Cheering

WITHOUT BATON OR SCORE

Strauss 'Domestica' Seen as Climax of the Evening—Two Beethoven Works Played

By OLIN DOWNES

Hopes, long famished, of a conductor of commanding qualities to direct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York were gratified last night when Dimitri Mitropoulos appeared for the first time in a public concert in this city as guest conductor of that body in Carnegie Hall.

Conducting without score and without baton, with a strange, eccentric technique all his own, Mr. Mitropoulos quickly proved his energy and fire as a leader and his remarkable control of the players. He did as he pleased with the orchestra. The orchestra, after a first half week of rehearsals, obeyed him implicitly, and sounded like an entirely different body than the one we have been listening to in late months. This is not said in malice, but as plain fact.

The question of Mr. Mitropoulos as an interpreter is an interesting one to be taken up in a moment. But he conducts with amazing virtuosity. His tonsured head, his often athletic use of his arms, the hands that so flexibly and surely mold the orchestral tone and expose every melody in the complicated orchestral web, say, of a Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," make a curious and arresting individuality on the platform.

Scale of Sonorities Wide

There is no conductor just like him. His scale of sonorities is a very wide one, from a barely audible pianissimo to a fortissimo next to deafening. One likes it or one does not. The audience last night was overwhelmed. It was cheering the new conductor as the reviewers rushed for their editions from the hall.

This concert, also, showed us what had been largely forgotten, which is that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is a magnificent orchestra. In certain positions it needs fresh blood; there is no question of that. It remains a resplendent symphonic body. It was in the fortunate position last night of an instrumental ensemble with a commander-in-chief who knew what he wanted and how to get it. So that the orchestra did not lead the conductor. The conductor led the orchestra, and there was pleasure in the adjusted relation. We now come to the question not of the playing but the interpretations.

The compositions of the evening were Beethoven's Second "Leonore" Overture and Fourth symphony and the Strauss "Domestica." The introduction of the overture, after the chords, repeated, which came off like the crack of a whip, gave opportunity for subtle nuance, of which the conductor fully availed himself. His planissimi, perfectly adjusted, a superbly developed crescendo, and attention to the smallest detail of accent and color were immediately striking. The overture itself is not equal in its contents to the "Leonore No. 3, but No. 2 seems to be one of Mr. Mitropoulos's favorite warhorses, which he rides with special confidence and skill.

The main body of the overture has one sweepingly dramatic passage which is not in No. 3—the pages which immediately precede the first trumpet-call. These were published with savage power. There was plenty of excitement. There were exaggerated pauses between chords, special swellings and diminishings of tone, not required by the score, and everything was italicized.

It is to be seen whether this was an accidental characteristic of the occasion or whether it will remain one of Mr. Mitropoulos's attributes.

Youth Concert

C&M Dec 19-40

Two names figured on the program of the third of the Youth Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which Wheeler Beckett directed at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, the first name ending in "kowsky," and the second coming to a stop with "sakow."

Whatever else there may be about the men who carry names having a "w" pronounced like "f" that puts them in the same category, nobody will deny that the first one's little set of pieces designated "Nutcracker" Suite and the second's big collection called "Schéhérazade" bear a close resemblance to each other. The sound of Tchaikovsky's group of dances and the sound of Rimsky-Korsakoff's four tone poems fall on the ear with such like effect as to demand explanation. How did the two composers happen to agree so well on what would be catchy ting-tang to young folks long after their own day?

Perhaps they went to school together, and learned to do things the same way. Some of yesterday's listeners must have asked themselves about that. At any rate, answer of a sort is at hand both in the musical dictionaries and in Mr. Beckett's program notes. Tchaikovsky studied music at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and taught at the Moscow Conservatory. He composed the "Nutcracker" a little less than 50 years ago. Rimsky-Korsakoff taught at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and composed "Schéhérazade" a little more than 50 years ago.

Russians they were, indeed, and contemporaries; but which one wants first place in our estimation, and which second?

Perhaps it will be as well for the present to allow them equal honors and let the next 50 years determine their relative rank. For even now they are rather modern. It wants about a whole century for composers to find their rating. On the showing of the two works in question, Rimsky-Korsakoff might easily be put ahead of Tchaikovsky. But Tchaikovsky wrote in large as well as small forms. Hear one of his symphonies, and his rival may have to retire a long way behind. For fair generalization, though, it may without much dispute be put down that Tchaikovsky excells at invention; and Rimsky-Korsakoff, at elaboration.

W. P. T.

MITROPOULOS GIVES MAHLER SYMPHONY

Work by Verrall Heard in Carnegie.

By IRVING KOLODIN.

There were all manner of unusual happenings at last night's Philharmonic-Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall. A double base played a lyric solo in a symphony, in which the second and third movements were separated by a fifteen-minute intermission. Then, when the orchestra had the chance to pay its parting respects to Dimitri Mitropoulos, some of the string players boldly abandoned the evasive etiquette of bow-tapping, actually applauding manually, as if they had enjoyed playing. One cannot remember which is the greater rarity.

The uncommon symphony which occasioned these arresting occurrences was, of course, the first of Mahler, which promises to become as much a sensation of the conductor's leaving as the Strauss "Domestica" was of his coming. There have been fine performances of Mahler here in the past, but it is doubtful that any combined so eloquent a feeling for the composer's idiom with so great a capacity for making the orchestra articulate. Here the frustrations in the writing were not blemishes of the score, but inherent elements of its personality, all-too-human accentuations of its intensity and pathos.

Mr. Mitropoulos's plan of presentation was not as wide a variation of the composer's purpose as it might seen, for Mahler specified at least five minutes' pause before the slow movement. Certainly the more Schubertian-than-Schubert slow movement, with its musing tragedy and uneasy irony, gained by the freshness of the listener's attention after the pause. This is an altogether individual creation, as much a revelation of the composer's tortured self-doubts as the over-insistent, fustian peroration in the finale. Mr. Mitropoulos conducted as one delivering a revelation from on high, and the orchestra played with stunning virtuosity, earning full title to the prolonged applause that followed.

Actually the evening was a dazzling one throughout, beginning with the conductor's own transcription of Bach's G minor fantasy and fugue, in which the orchestra became a gigantic organ. One was not certain at all times whether Mr. Mitropoulos was conducting Bach or "The Battle of Prague," but it was assuredly arousing. Between these two massive creations, the "Concert Piece for Strings and Horn" of John Verrall, of Britt (Iowa) London, Budapest and St. Paul was definitely dwarfed, but it was plainly an event more important to the composer than to the audience. It established his ability to write sonorously for strings and with sufficient harmonic personality to file his name, mentally, for future attention. However, the evening belonged to Mahler and Mitropoulos.

ter in Norfolk, Va., Miss Maynor said that she believed that nothing was worth while unless it came by hard work.

National Fete

worried about that performance than I am about this one," she added.

"I'm still just a student," she continued in her soft, gentle voice. "I'm full of humble gratitude that I should be asked to sing by the government. This Negro festival of music is a great thing to me."

Miss Maynor, who first studied to be a sewing teacher, said that although when she was young she was always singing, she neved dreamed she'd be a concert singer. She still practices from 10 to 12 hours a day. And wants to be as great a singer as Marian Anderson and Paul Robeson, not realizing she already is considered almost their equal.

Away from the piano, her greatest delight is table tennis.

"I don't like vacations," she said. "I tried to go away last summer for a week to just loaf. I lasted three days."

Daughter of a Negro minis-

Miracle of Voice--"Unknown" Sings at N

DEC 18 1940

By the United Press.

NEW YORK, Dec. 17.—A year and a half ago an almost unknown young Negro soprano sang at the Berkshire music festival.

"A miracle, a miracle!" Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony, shouted as she finished her number. "The world must hear her sing."

Today 28-year-old Dorothy Maynor left for Washington to sing tomorrow night at the Library of Congress at the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the freeing of the slaves—and she still can't quite believe that this wonderful thing has happened to her.

She's filled with the invitation, she said, remembering that the last time she sang in Washington she was "just a high school girl in my best white dress," appearing with the Howard Institute choir.

"But I wasn't any more

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
POST-GAZETTE
DEC 16 1940

Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays Inspiring Concerts

Koussevitzky Dynamic in Leadership of Musicians Who Thrill Audiences

By Donald Steinfirst

Two performances of symphonic music one so superb in every detail that it defies mere criticism and the other almost as perfect were provided over the week-end at Syria Mosque by the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra under its dynamic leader Serge Koussevitzky. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been appearing in Pittsburgh for many years and has given many memorable concerts, but it seemed to at least one member of the audience, that the performance on Saturday night will be remembered as the most vivid and inspiring concert given by a symphonic organization in Pittsburgh in this observer's life-time of concert-going.

Perhaps because the orchestra was concluding a short and, as usual, highly successful tour, winning fresh laurels and deafening ovations everywhere; perhaps because Dr. Koussevitzky was in just the right mood or the orchestra more alert than usual—whatever the reason, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, although there was never any doubt of it, established itself anew as the outstanding musical creation of our time. In both these concerts, the strings glowed and shone like some fine polished crystal, the brass section was powerful and mellow as the music made its various demands and the woodwinds—the fabulous Boston woodwinds—sang their plaintive songs unendingly with never a false entry, a misplaced tone nor a brash phrasing to mar the unity of the whole ensemble. Over all stood the colossal figure of Serge Koussevitzky, a master conductor of the music he chose to interpret, whose every motion indicated a wish, to which his men responded accurately and instantaneously.

Saturday night, for the sake of chronology, no doubt to show the development of the symphony from Haydn to the ultra modern Russian Shostakovich, the conductor opened with the G Major Symphony of Haydn, No. 88 in the B. & H. catalogue, followed with the Leonore Overture No. 3 of Beethoven and concluded with Pittsburgh's first hearing of Dmitri Shostkovich Fifth Symphony. Everything in this program cries out for comment and commendation, but perhaps most of all, the electrifying playing of the Beethoven overture. Dr. Koussevitsky is including the Leonore No. 3 on his programs this season after several years when the work was absent. He has restudied the music which has received so many performances at the hands of other less gifted conductors and the result was apparent Saturday night. This observer has heard the work possibly 50 times, yet as Dr. Koussevitsky unfolded the music, it seemed to breathe freshness and reveal hidden voices, hitherto unheard. It was an Olympian conception and for once, the off-stage dramatic trumpet call really heralded freedom for a lost soul and was not just a cheap effect. This same intensity pervaded the whole performance.

The crystalline performance of the Haydn Symphony, too, must be set down as a triumph for orchestra and conductor alike. This is music for aristocrats, ornate, polished and refined, and as such, Dr. Koussevitzky played it. One looks back on the happy simplicity of the Largo with the strings singing the unbroken melody, or on the lilting, swinging Menuetto or on the fast-rushing Finale, on all this, only to stand in amazement before such masterly playing.

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovich is one of, if not the outstanding compositions of this generation. Of that there can be little doubt. Listeners will perhaps point out some banalities in the score, the tongue-in-cheek scherzo perhaps, or the very few clangorous dissonances. But they cannot deny that the work has a compelling virtuosity, that it has form and rhythm and substance, in short, that it "sounds." We like to feel that the scherzo, the most ingratiating movement, is an exciting bit of satire, a gay and witty folk dance tossed from solo violin to woodwinds and then to full orchestra. The slow movement, perhaps a little tenuous, is a brooding poetic largo, but the conclusion, with its brass-band marching effect, is sheer splendor. We are all indebted to Dr. Koussevitzky for playing the music for us, and for his performance with its miraculous crescendos and its split-second attacks.

We doubt though that immortality will come to the other modern Russian work offered yesterday. Stravinsky's Capriccio for Orchestra with piano solo by Jesus Maria Sanroma, the official pianist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is typical Stravinsky of the period of 10 years ago, brilliant if not too solidly constructed and time only will tell whether or not there is more glitter than gold in the work. Often witty, sophisticated and peppery music, it is scored for string quartet and reduced strings, winds and percussion, and, of course, Mr. Sanroma's tangy piano part which he dashed off like so much Ravel which in fact it often imitates, rather than the Weber the composer tried to follow.

Samuel Barber's Overture "The School For Scandal," the only American work presented during the two-day stay, was rather pale in comparison with the other contemporary music and the other two works comprising yesterday's list were the two Nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes of Debussy and Brahms' D Major Symphony.

Both of these works, Koussevitzky has given us previously. The Brahms Symphony was played with dignity and commanding breadth. A little more virile than we have been accustomed to hearing it and a little less sentimentalized perhaps but still beautifully proportioned. The Debussy Nocturnes, as always were the Bostonians at their highest level, Nuages, evanescent and fleecy with every sombre shade in the color scale and fetes, fiery and vital to the last note.

There were tremendous ovations for Sanroma and for Dr. Koussevitzky and of course for the men of the orchestra.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
DEC 21 1940

Praise Heaped On Music Hall

IT IS a question who is deriving the greater pleasure from Kleinhans Music Hall—Buffalo audiences, who, remembering drab Elmwood Music Hall, murmur rapturously as they sink into soft seats and gaze at soothing surroundings; or the distinguished artists, who are brought here.

One of the most spectacular of the converts to the Kleinhans project is Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. As the conductor slowly made his way to the podium, he craned his neck until he had taken in a complete panoramic view of the scene. Sensing what was transpiring, the audience applauded and the inspired Koussevitzky replied with: "You have here a most beautiful music hall—a magnificent temple of music."

It was not the conductor's first tribute to the hall, nor his last. Testing the hall's acoustics during the afternoon, the Russian-born musical genius sat on the last row of the balcony while a harpist played his softest tones. The notes reached Koussevitzky clear as a bell.

"UNBELIEVABLY marvelous," he breathed. Following the concert, he again voiced his praise to Mrs. Fred D. Corey, hall director, and to Eliel Saarinen, consultant architect, who designed the hall along with the Buffalo architects, F. J. and W. A. Kidd.

The bouquets which Dr. Koussevitzky tossed to the new music hall are unique only in that he expressed his delight before the audience. Artists appearing before him this season have been equally awed. Curiously, each artist has singled out differing aspects of the hall to praise.

Here are some of the comments as recalled by Mrs. Zorah B. Berry, under whose auspices many of the artists appeared, and Mrs. Corey:

MARIAN ANDERSON: "I have never seen a hall with such beautiful lighting."

RACHMANINOFF: "These are the cleanest dressing rooms I've ever been in. The resonant qualities of the hall's acoustics are marvelous."

JEANETTE MacDONALD: "This is the loveliest hall I've ever sung in."

JAMES MELTON: "Unquestionably the finest music hall there is."

RISE STEVENS: "It's perfect."

ALEC TEMPLETON: "The sound is so alive."

PAUL ROBESON: "This is a hall with a soul."

Mrs. Corey says she is asking these artists for written expressions of their opinions, which will be bound in a scrapbook for use on the hall's first anniversary program next Oct. 12.

The New H
[From Final Edition of Yesterday's Times.]

MITROPOULOS WINS CONCERT OVATION

Conductor at First Appearance With the Philharmonic Stirs Repeated Cheering

WITHOUT BATON OR SCORE

Strauss 'Domestica' Seen as Climax of the Evening—Two Beethoven Works Played

By OLIN DOWNES

Hopes, long famished, of a conductor of commanding qualities to direct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra of New York were gratified last night when Dimitri Mitropoulos appeared for the first time in a public concert in this city as guest conductor of that body in Carnegie Hall.

Conducting without score and without baton, with a strange, eccentric technique all his own, Mr. Mitropoulos quickly proved his energy and fire as a leader and his remarkable control of the players. He did as he pleased with the orchestra. The orchestra, after a first half week of rehearsals, obeyed him implicitly, and sounded like an entirely different body than the one we have been listening to in late months. This is not said in malice, but as plain fact.

The question of Mr. Mitropoulos as an interpreter is an interesting one to be taken up in a moment. But he conducts with amazing virtuosity. His tonsured head, his often athletic use of his arms, the hands that so flexibly and surely mold the orchestral tone and expose every melody in the complicated orchestral web, say, of a Richard Strauss's "Sinfonia Domestica," make a curious and arresting individuality on the platform.

Scale of Sonorities Wide

There is no conductor just like him. His scale of sonorities is a very wide one, from a barely audible pianissimo to a fortissimo next to deafening. One likes it or one does not. The audience last night was overwhelmed. It was cheering the new conductor as the reviewers rushed for their editions from the hall.

This concert, also, showed us what had been largely forgotten, which is that the New York Philharmonic-Symphony is a magnificent orchestra. In certain positions it needs fresh blood; there is no question of that. It remains a resplendent symphonic body. It was in the fortunate position last night of an instrumental ensemble with a commander-in-chief who knew what he wanted and how to get it. So that the orchestra did not lead the conductor. The conductor led the orchestra, and there was pleasure in the adjusted relation. We now come to the question not of the playing but the interpretations.

The compositions of the evening were Beethoven's Second "Leonore" Overture and Fourth symphony and the Strauss "Domestica." The introduction of the overture, after the chords, repeated, which came off like the crack of a whip, gave opportunity for subtle nuance, of which the conductor fully availed himself. His pianissimi, perfectly adjusted, a superbly developed crescendo, and attention to the smallest detail of accent and color were immediately striking. The overture itself is not equal in its contents to the "Leonore No. 3, but No. 2 seems to be one of Mr. Mitropoulos's favorite warhorses, which he rides with special confidence and skill.

The main body of the overture has one sweepingly dramatic passage which is not in No. 3—the pages which immediately precede the first trumpet-call. These were published with savage power. There was plenty of excitement. There were exaggerated pauses between chords; special swellings and diminishings of tone, not required by the score, and everything was italicized.

It is to be seen whether this was an accidental characteristic of the occasion or whether it will remain one of Mr. Mitropoulos's attributes. With the symphony, which, in many respects, was remarkably played. But it is simple music. A mysterious beauty which inhabits, among other places, the slow movement was in part vanished. Where had it gone? Was it a tempo rather fast? Was it a serenity which must be profound, and cannot be forced from instruments? This Fourth symphony, not ostentatiously bucolic, could nevertheless also have been called by Beethoven his "pastoral." It was songful, animated, climactic—too much so—gay without innocence, and the repetitions became self-conscious. Whitman desired to what he terms the insouciance of the animals—we paraphrase, obviously. This principle might well be applied to the interpretation of the Fourth symphony, which is not a drama.

High Point of Evening

The most remarkable accomplishment of the evening was the overwhelming performance of the "Domestica." This is an irritatingly good piece, irritating because of the magniloquence, verbosity and bad taste with which so much of it is written. At the same time, the counterpoint and the fat themes in their various combinations offer engrossing musical developments. These combinations were exposed by the conductor with a skill, mastery and lyrical fervor that held the audience spellbound—or else exhausted—for a good forty minutes of music. How a conductor could so clearly reveal every note of melodic importance in the overladen counterpoint and orchestra was simply astounding. And when the orchestra hymned rapturously the love music of this highly publicized transcript of the domestic life of the Strauss household it was with an eloquence irresistible.

On the other hand, with so much intertwined counterpoint, and every strand of it made so clear, the ear's attention was sometimes distracted by multiplicity of detail from main melodic ideas. It was not always so. There were particular places where the line of the musical thought, as a phrase passed from group to group of instruments in the melee, was wonderfully connected. But excess of detail was a tendency in the very places where the detail was not of exceptional importance—for there is a lot of filling in, in this grandiose structure; a lot of notes gratuitously compiled, which could be shoveled out, and the piece the better for it.

And then there was the fact of climaxes too much and too many. After a time they were no longer news. Or perhaps we are too effete with our Strauss! It is clear that Mr. Mitropoulos is a conductor of no ordinary calibre. He gave the Thursday night Philharmonic-Symphony audience more sensations to the square minute than it had experienced in months preceding. He is a question mark, and an arresting one. It is yet to be seen what his common denominator is, aside from the tension of a first appearance. He will be watched and discussed by concertgoers vehemently, and possibly with trepidation by his rivals!

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, O.
POST
DEC 18 1940

Miracle of Voice—"Unknown" Sings at National Fete

By the United Press.

NEW YORK, Dec. 17.—A year and a half ago an almost unknown young Negro soprano sang at the Berkshire music festival.

"A miracle, a miracle!" Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston symphony, shouted as she finished her number. "The world must hear her sing."

Today 29-year-old Dorothy Maynor left for Washington to sing tomorrow night at the Library of Congress at the celebration of the 75th anniversary of the freeing of the slaves—and she still can't quite believe that this wonderful thing has happened to her.

She's filled with "humble gratitude" at the invitation, she said, remembering that the last time she sang in Washington she was "just a high school girl in my best white dress," appearing with the Hampton Institute choir.

But I wasn't any more worried about that performance than I am about this one," she added.

"I'm still just a student," she continued in her soft, gentle voice. "I'm full of humble gratitude that I should be asked to sing by the government. This Negro festival of music is a great thing to me."

Miss Maynor, who first studied to be a sewing teacher, said that although when she was young she was always singing, she never dreamed she'd be a concert singer. She still practices from 10 to 12 hours a day. And wants to be as great a singer as Marian Anderson and Paul Robeson, not realizing she already is considered almost their equal.

Away from the piano, her greatest delight is table tennis.

"I don't like vacations," she said. "I tried to go away last summer for a week to just loaf. I lasted three days."

Daughter of a Negro minis-

uth Concert

the pro-
he Youth ymphony
r Beckett
all yester-
ame endhe second akow."
may be y names like "f"
he same eny that of pieces
Suite and on called a close
her. The group of Rimsky-ns fall on fect as to did the agree so e catchy lks long chool to-do things

the same way. Some of yesterday's listeners must have asked themselves about that. At any rate, answer of a sort is at hand both in the musical dictionaries and in Mr. Beckett's program notes. Tchaikovsky studied music at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and taught at the Moscow Conservatory. He composed the "Nutcracker" a little less than 50 years ago. Rimsky-Korsakoff taught at the St. Petersburg Conservatory and composed "Schéhérazade" a little more than 50 years ago.

Russians they were, indeed, and contemporaries; but which one wants first place in our estimation, and which second?

Perhaps it will be as well for the present to allow them equal honors and let the next 50 years determine their relative rank. For even now they are rather modern. It wants about a whole century for composers to find their rating. On the showing of the two works in question, Rimsky-Korsakoff might easily be put ahead of Tchaikovsky. But Tchaikovsky wrote in large as well as small forms. Hear one of his symphonies, and his rival may have to retire a long way behind. For fair generalization, though, it may without much dispute be put down that Tchaikovsky excells at invention; and Rimsky-Kosakoff, at elaboration.

W. P. T.

Darius Milhaud

Back for a Longer Visit This Time, He Is Saddened But Not Crushed by the War

By EDWARD DOWNES

HE had arrived in the morning from California by air, in time for Koussevitzky's rehearsal with the Boston Symphony, and now we sat in a lobby of the Copley-Plaza talking of the changes in our respective countries since our last hurried greeting exchanged eight long years ago during an intermission in some Paris concert hall. Roosevelt had just won his first election; Adolf Hitler had just been made harmless by admitting him as a figurehead to a coalition cabinet.—Eight years like eight decades! Milhaud had waxed eloquent then over the magnificent artistry with which the Berlin Staatsoper mounted his "Christophe Colombe." Today he spoke of the brilliance with which his "Medee" was produced by the Paris Opera, even while mechanized Nazi columns were racing to extinguish the lights of the "Ville Lumiere."

Horrified as he is at the fate of the country he so greatly loves, you have the impression that Darius Milhaud can take even this in his stride. His is a resiliant and adaptable spirit. And things have broken well for him, even in the midst of catastrophe.

His present engagement with the Boston Symphony had been arranged before the German invasion of France. Hence an American visa was granted swiftly and with a minimum of red tape. As he and his wife fled before the Germans in their car, gasoline gave out, and they were forced to cross into Spain at the eastern end of the Pyrenees. Thus they missed the perilous crowding and delays at Biarritz and Hendaye. The Portuguese, who are a princely people, says Mr. Milhaud, received him hospitably and the government even arranged for him to give a radio broadcast—"which was a tactful way to providing us with funds."

It was while waiting in Lisbon that Mr. Milhaud received the invitation of Mills College to come to California and teach advanced composition. When he docked in New York, the Ballet Theater was producing his "Creation du Monde," written many years before, for the Swedish Ballet. He was greeted enthusiastically by the directors and asked to write a new ballet for them!

"Of course I accepted, for you know, I adore the theater. Even the smell of the wings and the foot-lights sets my imagination going."

That ballet is to be produced next month. Entitled "The Man from Median," it will have choreography by Eugene Loring and sets by de Molas.

A Haven

Mr. Milhaud comes direct from Mills College, where he has two days of lessons and classes a week, and the rest of the time to himself for composition. Himself a Provencal, he finds the countryside and the weather of California almost home-like. He is frankly astonished at the amount of talent and the abundance of technical equipment among his young American pupils, and the musical potentialities of this country seem to him unlimited.

His face lighted up as he spoke of the Boston Symphony. He had not heard it in 14 years and that morning at rehearsal, it has been again, "eblouissant."

Of his "Fantaisie Pastorale," which will have been played by the time these lines appear, Milhaud says it is actually the last of a series of artistic etudes in which he has tried to work out the problem of balance between piano and the orchestra. His "Suite Provencal" is based on themes of the eighteenth century opera composer, Campra, who was born, like Milhaud, at Aix-en-Provence, on Provencal themes and original themes in imitation of the Provencal style. It has been produced at the theater Orange as "Moyen Age Fleurie" at the Paris Opera and again at Orange as incidental music for a play of Lafontaine.

War has influenced the career of Milhaud before. It was World War I which interrupted the studies of the then 21-year-old musical student in Paris. He became an attache at the French legation in Rio de Janeiro where he met post-diplomat Paul Claudel, who subsequently supplied the texts for many of Milhaud's outstanding dramatic works.

Returning to Paris he joined with the now dissolved and partly forgotten group of composers, "The Six" who were most strongly influenced by Jean Cocteau and Eric Satie.

Milhaud and Milhaud

One day flippant and vulgar, the next sensitive and poetical, by turns emotional, intellectual, classical, romantic, cynical, naive, Milhaud has exploited jazz effects, written "pure" music (string quartets and sonatas), and set to music a florist's catalogue (for voice and orchestra). Some critics have found in his music strong evidence of his Jewish extraction, others find his religious works such as "L'annonce fait a Marie," to be the essence of Catholicism. Where the real Milhaud lies we do not yet know, but perhaps his concerts in this city will help clarify the question.

Drama Within a Drama

Of "Medee" Milhaud writes in the current issue of "Modern Music": "For some years I had wanted to portray a jealous woman on the grand scale of Phedre or Hermione. My wife, Madeleine Milhaud, suggested the idea of Medea. She studied the Medeas of Seneca, Euripedes and Corneille and then prepared

Milhaud Exhibit

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library has on exhibit a virtually complete collection of the works of Carius Milhaud.

With the exception of the works to be played this week, which have not yet been published, Milhaud's compositions—from his early pieces published in 1914 to his latest works—are here gathered, together with biographical and critical notes and commentaries. These comprise newspaper clippings, articles from periodicals as well as program notes. Most of the orchestra scores may be used only in the music department.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
DEC 23 1940

Milhaud in Boston

Darius Milhaud, probably the best known of the "Group des Six" which enlivened the musical life of Paris in 1920, appeared as guest conductor last week in Symphony Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra played three of his compositions, "Le Cortege Funebre" and "La Suite Provencal" were heard for the first time in Boston and "La Fantasie Pastorale," for piano and orchestra, was played for the first time in the United States.

As a conductor, Milhaud is convincing; as a composer he is modern a subtly arresting fashion. Uncompromisingly French, he combines the grace of Debussy with the precision of Ravel and says a little more in his own way. Short phrases, put together with great economy of instrumentation, move along rhythmically with vigor. When he writes in a delicate manner, the effect is completely charming.

"Le Cortege Funebre" was written last May at Aix-au-Provence and is Milhaud's expression of the feelings experienced by France at that time. It is sombre.

"La Fantasie Pastorale," played by Stell Anderson, pianist, is as fresh and delightful as the countryside of Provence. The piano and reed instruments predominate.

La Suite Provencal is jolly and light-hearted. It is a series of folk dances and in its quaint simplicity it suggests a ballet which could be danced by the peasants from Quimper china, if ever they should come to life. Milhaud has an enduring quality about his writing and we shall be glad when we may hear something else he has written.

R. T.

DECEMBER 21, 1940

Milhaud With the Symphony

The Arts in Boston

Darius Milhaud, once of the French "Six," now a refugee teacher in California, was welcomed yesterday afternoon as guest of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The first part of the ninth program of the Friday afternoon-Saturday evening series was given over to compositions by the distinguished visitor: "Le Cortège Funèbre," the Fantaisie Pastorale for piano and orchestra, and the Suite Provençale. The Fantaisie was played yesterday for the first time in the United States; the other two items for the first time in Boston. Stell Andersen was the soloist. M. Milhaud conducted all three of his works. This French program was completed by the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, with Dr. Koussevitzky for director.

Apart from the moving circumstances of M. Milhaud's return to the United States after an absence of 14 years, there is a good deal of musical interest in his reappearance. For he was one of the brightest flowers of the Parisian post-war school of musicians. Of the famous "Six," he and Honegger are the only ones whose names have remained clearly in memory. We associate them with the Diaghileff ballet, with the sophisticated 'twenties, with "Horace Victorieux," "Le Roi David," "Skating Rink." "Judith," with "La Création du Monde," "Le Train Bleu," "Le Pauvre Matelot," "Christophe Colomb." Those days, it seems, are gone forever; there is a nostalgic charm in recalling them.

The first number in M. Milhaud's list yesterday was a poignant reminder of the immediate reason for his presence in the United States. "Le Cortège Funèbre" was composed only last May, and was first performed on August 4 in a radio concert of the Columbia Broadcasting Company. It expresses, the composer says, "the feelings we all had in France at this terrible period." There can be no doubt of the sincerity of feeling in the work.

The Fantaisie is a lyrical piece in a single movement. A small orchestra accompanies the solo part. Miss Andersen, who was soloist at its first performance at the Salle Pleyel, Paris, in February, 1939, played yesterday with authority and fluency.

The Suite Provençale is a series of eight short movements based on popular tunes of the South of France, alternately lively and quiet. The composer has exercised considerable rhythmic ingenuity on them, but has apparently left them little altered in form.

M. Milhaud proved himself to be a conductor who was able to obtain the results he wanted with a minimum of gesture and without fuss. He was cordially received, and was recalled several times to the platform at the close of his half of the program.

L. A. S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
DEC 27 1940

Darius Milhaud, Whose Music Starts Battles, Returns to New York After 13 Years

French Composer To Hear Own Works Presented Tonight

By ELLIOTT ARNOLD,
World-Telegram Staff Writer.

World-Telegram Photo by Aumuller.

Darius Milhaud shows with his fingers how large a part music plays in movies—just that little bit.

Darius Milhaud, who once was cursed with the description "enfant terrible" but who since has composed music so good that all except a few of his enemies have forgotten that description, sat in his room in the Wellington this gloomy post-Christmas day and filled the air with expansive hand gestures and surly remarks about music and the movies.

Mr. Milhaud, a heavy soft man, who looks like a poor man's Alfred Hitchcock and spoils the illusion with a French accent instead of the dainty Hitchcock verbal tiptoes, has composed operas, symphonies, tone poems and endless chamber music. It was his musical accompaniments to French pictures that he discussed.

Education in Humility.

"Composing music for the movies teaches one true humility," he stated with exaggerated Gallic eye-lowering. "You work and you compose and finally you have something and you turn it in. Then you are informed that your work is magnificent, that it is the work of genius, except that three-quarters of it had to be cut out to fit the picture.

"Or else you are told that you have composed a truly memorable work, but you have to add 17 bars. It doesn't matter where—just 17 bars. The final and true test of any motion picture music is its unobtrusiveness.

"When a picture is performed you walk up to one and ask him how he liked the picture. He says it was excellent. Then you ask, shyly, 'And the music? You liked the music?' And he looks at you blankly for a moment and says, puzzled, 'Music? Music? Was there music? Oh, yes, the music? It was fine.'

"That is success. The music was so good no one noticed it. You have been successful."

Appearance Tonight.

Mr. Milhaud makes his first appearance in 13 years in New York tonight at a concert of his works to be given by the League of Composers at the Museum of Modern Art. He just arrived from Boston, where he attended the American premiere of his Fantaisie Pastorale, given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Another work of his, Medee, an opera, holds a unique position in the annals of music. It was the first opera written of the current war, and it received only one performance. It was given at the Paris Opera last April, and when the curtain fell the opera house was closed and soon afterward the Nazi soldiers were in the French capital. Medee was the first opera of the war and the last to be given in the free French city.

Opera Started Battle.

Mr. Milhaud, now 48, has had a stormy musical life, and the accepted recognition of his works these days blinds a great deal of the past. When his opera Christophe Colomb—portions of which will be given tonight—was given in the Staatsoper in pre-Hitler Berlin it so provoked some listeners that a 15-minute battle took place in the opera house, ending in the police separating the angry fist-fighters.

In Paris in 1920, when his Second Orchestral Suite was performed for the first time, gendarmes had to eject part of the audience before the program could continue. New Yorkers take their music a little more in stride, and no special police protection was asked for tonight's concert.

His wife, Mme. Madeleine Milhaud, a leading French actress, will deliver a narrative in tonight's concert. She wrote the libretto for Medee.

M. Milhaud, a native of southern France, has been in this country since July and teaches advanced music in Mills College, in California.

"Fresh Wind of Jazz."

He is an enthusiast about jazz, and some of his early works predated similar treatments of music by Gershwin and other jazz-symphonists.

"Jazz music," he said, "came along like a wild fresh wind, clearing the air of the miasma of musical preciousness. It was new and fresh, and it did a great service."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 18 1940

Words About

Music

And Musicians

Milhaud will conduct the first performances in Boston of his "Cortege funebre," "Fantaisie pastorale" for piano and orchestra and "Suite Provencale" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. Stell Andersen will be the piano soloist.

The rest of the program will be made up of the Berlioz Fantastic Symphony Op. 14A.

* * *

Milhaud, French Composer, Will Conduct Own Pieces at Symphony

Darius Milhaud likes to write music for the movies. And he teaches his students at Mills College, Calif., how to compose for films, as a means of acquiring orchestral balance and clearness.

"Composing for the microphone is not difficult, but it is good discipline in the use of the orchestra," the famous modern French musician said with a smile.

He was sitting in the librarian's room at Symphony Hall yesterday morning, where in the course of a short conversation he also declared that he enjoyed writing for the theatre, and that he admired Aaron Copland's music for the movie, "Our Town," because it was so well suited to the medium and the story.

Mr. Milhaud has come to Boston to conduct three of his own pieces—"Funeral March," "Pastoral Fantasy" and "Provencal Suite" at the Boston Symphony concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

"Funeral March" is an expression of his feelings just before the invasion of France. He wrote the score last May in his native Aix-en-Provence. At the beginning of that month he was in Paris for the premiere of his opera, "Media." It was the last new production given at the Paris Opera. In June he left for Lisbon and the United States. He will teach this season and next at Mills College.

Mr. Milhaud does not fit the conventional notion of a creative artist's appearance. Though neither tall nor short, his bulk is considerable. His dark hair is combed back over his forehead. The breast pocket of his gray suit held both a handkerchief and a fountain pen. His tie was plaid, mostly red. He looks at you steadily out of dark eyes, and speaks deliberately and quietly.

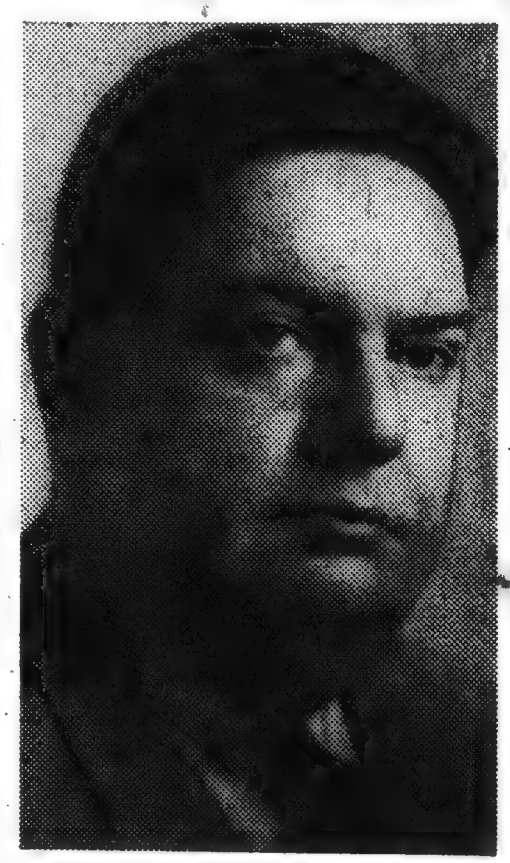
He is accompanied on this visit by his wife, a small, attractive, blond-haired woman. Mme. Milhaud is an actress, and taught dramatic art at the famed Schola Cantorum in Paris. She wrote the libretto for his "Medea."

Milhaud was born at Aix-on-Provence a little more than 48 years ago. As a student at the Paris Conservatory he won prizes in violin, fugue and counterpoint. His career began before the first World War, but it was just after that upheaval that his name became internationally known. He was one of a half-dozen young composers, militant modernists, who became known as "The Six."

Milhaud and Arthur Honegger proved the strongest creative talents of the group, which was attracted to the musical and esthetic ideas of Erik Satie and Jean Cocteau. "The Six" existed as a group until about 1926.

Where are the other five today? Mr. Milhaud was asked.

"Francis Poulenc and Georges Auric are in Paris, I think, and the last I knew Honegger and Germaine Taillefer were in the south of France. I have not heard from Louis Durey for a long time."



DARIUS MILHAUD

Minhaud was the "enfant terrible" of French music 20 years ago. His style was varied from work to work, as he emphasized when asked to speak of the nature of the three scores he will conduct this week. The sizable list of his compositions include 15 operas, one of which, "The Eumenides," required a huge orchestra, while another, "The Poor Sailor," called for only 13 instruments. At one time Milhaud was interested in jazz. In 1921 he set to music for voice and chamber orchestra the text of a flower catalog, giving the piece the logical title "Catalogue des Fleurs." C. W. D.

'Thunder in East' Will

'Tin Pan Alley' Held

53

Darius Milhaud as Symphony Guest

French Music Is Considered In Perspective

By Winthrop P. Tryon

French music is surviving the second World War, as it survived the first one, in works of Darius Milhaud, who is in town to lend a hand in the conducting of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts this week. When Mr. Milhaud originally visited the United States, he submitted certain wartime-made compositions of his to the curiosity of the public; and now a generation later, appearing on the platform of Symphony Hall as guest of Serge Koussevitzky, he offers compositions of which at least one carries an echo of battle.

Back in the twenties, he figured as the foremost member of a young group of Parisian radicals. Today, he wears the character of a conservative; and far from indulging in wild futuristic fantasies, he regards the present with calm, and he meditates on the past with fondness.

* * *

"A composer writes," he puts it, "according to no fixed pattern and after no particular method which he calls his own. He fits into his moment, as he can hardly help doing; and he suits what he says to the immediate occasion for his saying it. For myself, I disclaim any decided attachment to folk song, for example, as a guide to my ideas; and yet here I am in Boston calling the attention of Symphony audiences to a piece based on melodies of Southern France. That is because I wished, when writing my 'Suite Provençale,' to express myself through ancient tunes of the people. Now my 'Cortège Funèbre,' which I am also bringing to notice on Friday and Saturday, has an altogether different outlook and consequently follows another plan."

That is about all Mr. Milhaud said of what he has brought along in his portfolio. A word that he added in reference to the concerts, was his pleasure in finding studies by himself on Dr. Koussevitzky's program along with the "Fantastic" Symphony of Berlioz, which he accounts one of the things of top rank in the orchestral repertory. For an outside note, it may be added that the "Cortège Funèbre" is a very recent product; and further, that along with this and the "Suite Provençale," the visitor will submit to Bostonians' consideration his "Fantasie Pastorale" for piano and orchestra in one movement, with Stell Andersen as soloist.

* * *

Further comment, nevertheless, Mr. Milhaud made, and with warmth. For a French composer, especially one schooled at the Paris Conservatory, has a way of regarding himself less as an individual in the world of the instant than as a member of a national line. Mr. Milhaud acknowledges himself, to be sure, a man of the twentieth century, influenced by conflicts on the field in which his country has by turns won and lost. Competition, however, artistic as well as military, goes now this way and now that; and happen what will, he finds his dominating concern to be music right through history, or at any rate from medieval times down.

Specifically on French music, "It follows," he observes, "a direct course. A plain connection exists between the earliest and the latest; and I do not care how far you go back—to the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, if you wish. Take the descriptive piece by Jannequin, 'Battle of Marignan,' dating in the reign of King Francis I; there you have something as French as can be. You hit on an impressionism which is akin to that of our own period. To come nearer to now, there is Berlioz, who instituted a manner you find continuing in Albert Roussel. Then Gounod; he strikes out a path which Fauré follows. Chabrier, too; he opens a road for Debussy, whom I esteem one of the greatest of masters. Just the same, Debussy, like everybody else, takes up where his predecessors leave off."

Logically enough, Mr. Milhaud's geography, while admitting certain boundaries, tends to break over merely national frontiers. Besides an art of tone that can be identified as distinctly French, he discerns one of broader tracing which he describes as Mediterranean. He, coming from Provence, perhaps inevitably feels himself a part of the ancient Roman tradition. A native of the Mediterranean shoreland, he confesses an artistic relationship with Italy; and for that matter, with Spain. He entertains an extraordinary enthusiasm, for instance, for Verdi.

"There," he remarks, "is a man of music who still awaits complete discovery. Verdi, like many another composer of the last century, has suffered from being put in comparison with Wagner. For a long time the devotion of the world to Wagner made fair valuation of anybody else impossible. But now that the Wagnerian excitement is cooling off, we are beginning to appreciate Verdi at his true worth. You find all sorts of originality in his opera scores that have never gained the notice they deserve. What could be more audacious than an act ending with an a cappella chorus that occurs in 'Forza del Destino,' the orchestra ceasing to sound, and voices alone bringing the climax? How about the prelude to 'Traviata,' when handled by a conductor of the right sort? What we ought to have is a Verdi cycle, performed under the baton of a Toscanini. It would revise some of our notions."

GREEN MAGAZINE, Boston, Sunday, December 22, 1940

24

Symphony Concert

By LEO GAFFNEY

THE French modernist composer, Darius Milhaud, who is tops with his unhappy countrymen, conducted half of the Boston Symphony program in the weekend concerts, playing some of his own music, much to the puzzlement of most of us.

Dr. Koussevitzky took over for the last half with Berlioz' immense "Fantastic Symphony," thereby restoring the audience to more familiar territory.

Modernist though he is, there is nothing neither involved nor nutty about Milhaud's music. What goes on in the way of thematic material is principally folk tunes and old church music, all remarkably simple and straightforward, but rendered hard on the listener by a complication of keys.

The instrumentation, if less brilliant than Hindemith's, at least falls more gratefully on the ear—and at times achieves colors of caressing softness and beauty.

Probably remembering the plight of his native land, Milhaud began with the dolors of his "Le Cortege Funebre," written last May at a terrible moment for France.

In happier mood was his "Fantaisie Pastorale," for piano and orchestra, in which the American pianiste, Stell Andersen, appeared as soloist. Devoid of dynamics, the piece is astonishingly simple, delicate and, particularly at the end, downright charming. Miss Andersen played it with good gifts and sympathetic understanding.

For his closing number Milhaud gave the first Boston performance of his "Suite Provencal"—eight brief movements which, though sparing of development, nevertheless take in a lot of musical territory.

It was the most colorful of the three pieces and drew the most applause from the audience.

THE Berlioz "Fantastic Symphoney," with Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the podium, was such a deluge of virtuosity as to electrify even the Friday afternoon crowd.

The "Fastastic," if you remember, is where the love-maddened young Berlioz—squarely in the middle of Nineteenth Century romanticism—let himself go and and dashed off the ultimate in descriptive symphonic music.

Driven to desperation by his passion for the Irish Shakesperian actress, Harriet Smithson, the fevered composer dreamed up a delirium fit to capsize the stars. And he put it all down. The pain and pleasure of love, sacred and profane; a jealous murder; the march to the gallows, and a howling hell of witches and demons in which the Dies Irae is horribly parodied with the love theme—and all is ended in a blast of ruin.

Pretty strong meat, but it must be borne in mind that with his "Fantastic Symphony" Berlioz won the lady for his wife—and consequently many an audience by music as magnificent as it is turbulent and exciting.

Mr. Milhaud is all right, but the crowd is still with Berlioz.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Darius Milhaud introduced three of his own scores to this city at the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. As guest he conducted his "Funeral March," the "Pastoral Fantasy" with Stell Andersen as piano soloist, and the "Provencal Suite." The performance of the "Pastoral Fantasy" was also the first in the United States. Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony, the final number of an entirely French program, was conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

As one of the most adventurous French modernist composers since the first World War, Darius Milhaud has been a conspicuous if debated figure. Once his music signified, at least to that section of the public to whom all "modern stuff" was unpleasant, jerky rhythm, little or no recognizable melody and a great deal of dissonant harmony. Others, more liberal, found him a talented musician, with a perversely grotesque esthetic sense, but invariably stimulating and often witty.

The 1920s are a good way behind us now. Present-day audiences can absorb more than they could then. And on the evidence of the pieces heard yesterday—all of them composed within five years—Milhaud himself has grown somewhat conservative. The "Provencal Suite," in fact, is a contemporary gesture of homage to 18th century composers of Provence, notably Andre Campra, and Milhaud has made a number of old popular tunes resplendent with 20th century orchestration and harmony.

Listening to the "Provencal Suite" it was easy to think of music in similar vein: the Gretry-Mottl suite given us by Mr. Defauw three weeks ago, Prokofieff's "Classical" Symphony, even the "Buerger als Edelmann" of Richard Strauss. Only there is this difference, that if the "Provencal Suite" was not so expertly or so slickly turned out as the others, neither is it so consciously a technical stunt. In the eight contrasting movements are a hearty, almost peasant flavor, a most enjoyable freshness.

The "Provencal Suite" is the only one of the three works of symphonic stature. The "Pastoral Fantasy" and, paradoxically, even the "Funeral March" could be taken for oversize chamber music, because the instrumentation is slight and the style depends upon clear sounding of individual instruments. Pastoral the Fantasy unquestionably is, and at first hearing it is also dry. To some composers the word "pastoral" would be just an incentive to a soaring if abstract rhapsody. Not so with Milhaud, who as you would expect, has been careful not to make the Fantasy emotionally outspoken. Piano and orchestra are finely adjusted to each other; in place of rounded melody or violent contrasts, is a calculated delicacy.

Mr. Burk in the program book quotes Milhaud as writing of the "Funeral March" (composed at Aix-en-Provence just before the German invasion last May): "This work expresses the feelings we all had in France at this terrible period." No matter that you can hear two saxophones in the orchestra, this "Funeral March" is one of the most crushing outbursts one has ever heard. Here is not Death the deliverer, but Death the strangler of life, leaving no solace and no hope, except for a final major chord. Through its tortured course, the "Funeral March" is completely despairing, its growling dissonance oppressive to the point of suffocation.

Each of Mr. Milhaud's works is absorbing, and apart from the "Funeral March," of much beauty. To put it bluntly, however, composers are proverbially poor conductors of their own music. One suspects that all three would have made an even better impression had Mr. Koussevitzky conducted them. Mr. Milhaud and Miss Andersen, whose performance seemed to be admirable, were politely applauded.

Mr. Koussevitzky's account of the "Fantastic" Symphony was another of the miracles of emotional incandescence he brings about every so often. It was also a display of magnificent orchestral virtuosity, not only in the exciting grotesquerie of the "March to the Scaffold" and "Witches' Sabbath," but in the exquisite calm of the "Scene in the Fields," and the two passionate movements that preceded. This was surely the "definitive" interpretation of Berlioz' romantic masterpiece.

C. W. D.

SYMPHONY IS LED BY MILHAUD

Three of His Compositions Given Hearing

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon was doubly notable. In its first part Darius Milhaud appeared as conductor of three most rewarding compositions of his own. And after the intermission there came, at Dr. Koussevitzky's hands, one of the most extraordinary performances ever heard in Symphony Hall, where extraordinary performances have become almost a commonplace: namely, of Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony.

We of Boston had already made Mr. Milhaud's acquaintance. At a pair of Symphony concerts in 1926 he played the piano part in his "Le Carnaval d'Aix." No more a professional conductor than a professional pianist, he is as much at home in the latter capacity as in the former. With quiet authority, but with telling results, he led a responsive and eagerly co-operating orchestra through the impressive "Le Cortege funebre," composed last spring just before the German invasion of France; a charming "Fantaisie pastorale," for piano and orchestra, in which Stell Andersen was the competent and sympathetic soloist, and a decidedly fetching "Suite Provencale."

The group of six with which Mr. Milhaud was once associated, and which has been personally represented here also by Arthur Honegger and Germaine Tailleferre, revolted from both romanticism and impressionism. Under the aegis of the spoofing Satie they were collectively inclined to indulge in tonal pranks. The more serious Honegger soon withdrew. And Milhaud, who at the outset of his career had composed ponderable violin sonatas and string quartets, became again a responsible composer, though he can still be downright entertaining, as in the "Suite Provencale" of yesterday.

Perhaps both the "Cortege funebre" and the "Fantaisie pastorale" are overlong for their musical content, though one was in no hurry to hear the end of either of them. In the Fantaisie there is not only idyllic charm and an appealing nostalgic note, that turns up again in parts of the suite, but there is also beauty and emotional force. A very different emotion pervades the "Cortege," a most moving tonal document. We of Boston have heard absurdly little of Mr. Milhaud's music (one performance of the aforesaid "Carnaval" and one of the Second Orchestral Suite in 1921), so yesterday's contributions were all the more welcome. Now that the composer is established in California perhaps he will come our way again. Here's hoping.

Dr. Koussevitzky's present policy may be summarized as follows: to play fewer pieces and play them better. Sometimes he overdoes things. It has happened more than once this season. But there is no overdoing the "Fantastic." Intrinsically extravagant, no amount of extravagance in performance can harm it. It would be very nice to hear again "Harold in Italy," unplayed here since 1919. But it was something to hear its predecessor played as it was played yesterday. Such a performance could not have been imagined a few years ago. And if Dr. Koussevitzky is not doing much to enlarge the repertory, at least Mr. Burgin, the guest-conductors and the composer-conductors are helping out in this respect.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The ninth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, with Darius Milhaud conducting in the first part of the program, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Stell Andersen, pianist. The program was as follows:

Le cortege funebre.....Milhaud
Fantaisie pastorale for piano and orchestra.....Milhaud
Suite Provencale.....Milhaud
Symphonie fantastique, Op. 14 A....Berlioz

Milhaud's music has been too long neglected in the Boston Symphony concerts. We doubt if anyone listening to yesterday's program would deny that he was a composer of real talent, inventiveness and technical skill. No one of these three works, all of which were heard in Boston for the first time, was uninteresting, and each was different in mood from the others. The audience greeted Mr. Milhaud cordially when he first came to the platform; and, what is more significant, they were even more cordial when he left it for the last time.

The least attractive of these pieces was the "Cortege funebre"; but it was also a remarkable work and the most original of the three. Funeral music sounds more or less alike, for there are not many varieties of sound that effectively represent sorrow. Nor is it easy for composers to sustain the mood for long. Note how Beethoven got away from it in the funeral march of his Third Symphony.

Mr. Milhaud stays right with the atmosphere of utter despair which his opening measures create, and that is the reason that this "Cortege funebre" will not appeal readily to the majority. To us there was something fearfully fascinating in the picture of bleak, disconsolate gloom that the music conjured up. It was as uncompromising as those paintings of Rouault that recently were exhibited here.

The "Fantaisie pastorale" is a complete contrast. Here is music full of the clear sunlight of the composer's native Provence. It is a completely captivating work, without seeming to strive to charm us. The melodic writing is particularly fine, and the piece is as graceful, without being finicky, as you could want. It was delightfully played by Miss Stell Andersen, who was perfectly at home in it for the good reason that it had been written for her.

Again there was another contrast with the Suite Provencale. This is robust, rollicking music, a set of dance-like movements that are quite irresistible. The catchy nature of the tunes is deceptive, for the Suite shows a mastery of construction and orchestration. The last movement is the best of all, with its solo for two piccolos and delicious contrasts of wind and string timbre. Mr. Milhaud can rest assured that his visit here will not soon be forgotten. He provided us with as stimulating a half concert as we have had in some time.

After the intermission Mr. Koussevitzky led a truly magnificent performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony. The orchestral playing was so superb that it was exciting in and by itself, almost irrespective of what was being played, as it were! It is, therefore, paradoxical to say that the Fantastic Symphony, historical monument that it is, is often a crashing bore.

Berlioz was so striking a character and so entertaining a writer, unlike most composers, that he always has had a great fascination for the literary mind. It is also undeniable that he was an immensely important figure in the history of music. But his own music is often a great disappointment. Of course it has moments, but so much of it is either romantic pose or just downright tedious. We would ten times rather listen to Bruckner, although he is not supposed to be the liveliest of company in the concert hall. By the way, since it is our duty to hear Berlioz from time to time, may we not hear something besides the Fantastic Symphony and the bits from "The Damnation of Faust"?

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program is as follows: Mozart's Symphony in A major, K. 201, and his Piano Concerto in E flat, K. 482 (George Copeland, soloist); Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina"; Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet."

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 10th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. George Copeland, pianist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Mozart.....Symphony in A major K. 201
Mozart
Piano Concerto in E flat major K. 482
Moussorgsky..Prelude to "Khovanstchina"
Tchaikovsky
Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"

For those of us who can never get enough Mozart yesterday's concert was a delight and for the others there was the luscious counter-attraction of the Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet." Actually it was an oddly arranged program. In the first half we had Mozart at his youthfully charming best and at his mature greatest. In the last half we had Russian music at its most sincere and its most lurid. The concert may not have been one of Mr. Koussevitzky's strokes of genius as a builder of programs, but he certainly demanded that we be mentally agile.

This early symphony of Mozart's was a "discovery" a few seasons back, and naturally there was some surprise that it had not been played before. It is an adorable work and very much alive today. Mr. Koussevitzky is splendid interpreter of Mozart and Haydn. He polishes his performances so that they glow and yet he is careful not to refine them out of existence. Of course, it goes without saying that if he did not have an orchestra of virtuoso players, as is the Boston Symphony, he could not obtain the perfection that he is in fact able to command.

Mozart's E flat major Piano Concerto is a work on a big scale. It should not be regarded as a piece of display for the soloist. The orchestra is enormously important in it, rather more so than in others of Mozart's concertos for various instruments. The themes and their development, the inventiveness of the form, entitle this concerto to rank right up with the three great symphonies of Mozart; and it is extraordinary that we do not hear it more often.

Mr. Copeland, who has not played with the Boston Symphony before, brought to the interpretation of the solo part that sensitivity to tone quality for which he is justly celebrated. He succeeded in blending the piano with the instruments to a remarkable degree. In the first movement he was inclined to hurry, so he did not get that sense of lucid and effortless repose which is essential to good Mozart playing. But he was more at his ease in the andante and the finale and gave us an interesting and rewarding performance. Though not usually one of those to lament the absence of cadenzas, for once we felt the need of one in the finale. Still, the deliberate omission of them yesterday is not to be too seriously deplored.

Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovantchina" is a singularly beautiful piece of musical description. This is program music at its most satisfying. The feeling that it is exotic adds to its effectiveness in the concert hall.

Many people regard Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" as a finer work than the popular 4th and 5th symphonies. This opinion is in part due to the indubitable fact that it is shorter and that it concentrates all the qualities that make Tchaikovsky so beloved by the musical masses into one work. It is juicy, throaty music; and the best way to treat it is to squeeze it for all it is worth, that is to say: "Anything goes in playing it that will get the maximum effect." Mr. Koussevitzky can be trusted to achieve a real triumph with it, and that is just what he did yesterday. No matter what your intellectual prejudices, if you are human you will be excited by this interpretation.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the program offers Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Ravel's "Ma mere l'oye" and a repetition of the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony.

This Clipping From DALLAS, TEX.
NEWS
DEC 27 1940

Folk Song Symphony In Premiere Friday

NEW YORK, Dec. 26.—Roy Harris' Folk Song Symphony will be given its premiere by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Koussevitzky, Friday afternoon and Saturday in Boston. The orchestra will be assisted by the St. Cecilia Choir, directed by Arthur Fiedler.

The Harris composition also will be performed by the Cleveland Orchestra under Artur Rodzinski on Saturday night with the assistance of the Philharmonic Chorus, prepared by Boris Goldowsky. The performance will be repeated Sunday night for the national convention of Music Teachers Association and the American Musicological Society.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
DEC 29 1940

Boston Symphony

For the Boston Symphony Orchestra's first concerts of the New Year, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night in Symphony Hall, Serge Koussevitzky will conduct two symphonies, Mendelssohn's "Italian" and the fifth of Shostakovitch, and Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite.

HOLIDAY MUSIC BY SYMPHONY

George Copeland Soloist in Mozart Concerto

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Although it has nothing to do with either Christmas or New Year's, the programme for this week's Symphony concerts may be said to have a holiday flavor by reason of its emphasis upon familiar and easily assimilated music. Even the 18-year-old Mozart's little Symphony in A major might be spoken of as familiar through its three performances at the Friday and Saturday concerts since Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it to us in the fall of 1936.

Neither the performance of this Symphony nor those of Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Khovanstchina" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet" could be spoken of as an event, a title perfectly applicable, however, to the appearance of George Copeland as soloist in Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in E-flat major. For many years Mr. Copeland has been before this public as pianist. He is a prophet not without honor in his native city, but never until yesterday afternoon had he played with its orchestra.

We are reminded by John Burk's readable biography of Clara Schumann that when that gracious pianist first played in public without her notes she was accused of perpetrating the early 19th century equivalent of a publicity stunt, a charge later leveled at the first conductors to dispense with the score. So in using his music yesterday, Mr. Copeland may be said to have reverted to an ancient and time-honored custom. But whether a conductor or a pianist depends or does not depend upon his memory is after all a minor issue. It is the performance itself that matters.

In the case of Mr. Copeland and Mozart yesterday it cannot be said that the pianist was his most distinguished self. Except for an occasional over-use of the pedal it was musically and technically quite impeccable. It was also a little on the cautious side. One prefers Mr. Copeland when he lets himself go with his Frenchmen and Spaniards, and without his notes, if not always with strict adherence to the letter of the text. He was warmly applauded yesterday. And after all, why should he not have been? Besides, the concerto is a most attractive work and far more valuable than the slender Symphony which preceded it and shared with it the advantages of an exceedingly deft orchestral performance.

With Sibelius' Second, Berlioz' "Fantastic" and Tchaikovsky's "Romeo and Juliet" all in a row, and with Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony to come next week, Dr. Koussevitzky is going in for whoop'er-up finishes. And the audience loves them. Yesterday there was a great to-do over the "Romeo," though the performance, eloquent in many respects, was marred by an occasional undue exuberance on the part of the percussion players with a consequent obscuring of the musical thought.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

There was no observance of Christmas on the program played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon, nor did the concert soar to any great heights of eloquence or virtuosity. But all the music was pleasant and the performances were enjoyable.

Mr. Koussevitzky gave the first half of the afternoon to Mozart, starting with the adorable little Symphony in A major (K. 201), composed when Mozart was 18. Then came the E-flat Piano Concerto (K. 482), with George Copeland, Boston pianist, making his first appearance as soloist with this orchestra. The Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovants-china," and the Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet," by Tchaikovsky, were remaining items.

This particular Symphony is one of the most tender expressions that Mozart or anyone else ever succeeded in putting into music. It is to be listened to with the heart as much as one's ears, and because it is so tender and so tiny in scope, it must be played very delicately. There is still argument about the "Dresden china" way of performing Mozart as opposed to a robust treatment that permits Mozart to speak out. In general the latter is correct. But here is an exception, a case where the lightest touch and the utmost clearness are first considerations.

Mr. Koussevitzky fortunately thinks of the Symphony in this way, and uses a considerably reduced body of strings to balance the two oboes and two horns which are the only other instruments of the slender orchestration. Some of the best playing of the afternoon occurred during the Symphony. The lovely tunes and counterpoint of the second movement, especially, were captivating.

Speaking of tunes—melodies, if you insist upon being high-hat about it—the E-flat Piano Concerto is generously bestowed with them. Though the slow movement is rather long and solid for Mozart, the first allegro and finale simply romp along. The main tune of the finale reminds one of that in the last movement of Haydn's Cello Concerto and of the verse that the late Sir Donald Tovey liked to associate with it: "The Town That Voted the Earth Was Flat, Flat as My Hat. Yes Flatter Than That."

The Mozart Concerto was very good to hear again, more so because it has been missing from Symphony concerts since 1933. Yet one who greatly admires the piano art of George Copeland as interpreter of modern French and Spanish music must regretfully record that his performance yesterday was cold and stiff. Mr. Copeland's finger work was intent upon accuracy, but his tone was too small for the orchestra, and he failed to respond to the rhythmic stage of the Concerto. Thus the reading as a whole was one-sided, with the orchestra too prominent. Mr. Copeland was cordially received.

Moussorgsky's "Khovantschina" Prelude is a show-piece for a great orchestra, and can be very effective when the instruments command the fine pianissimo of the Boston Symphony. Music of color and description, the Prelude must be meticulously and imaginatively done for another reason: It is so short and tenuous that its mood is hardly established when the closing measures are reached.

"Romeo and Juliet" stands up extraordinarily well year after year. This reviewer likes to regard it as of the best of Tchaikovsky, admirably proportioned, passionate, turbulent, melodically sensuous, all conceived in a 19th century vein of unbridled emotion. On those constitutionally allergic to Tchaikovsky, "Romeo and Juliet" may have a bad effect, but the rest of us can go on believing it an accurate depiction, in European and Slavic terms, of part of what is in Shakespeare's tragedy.

All Tchaikovsky has long been a specialty with Mr. Koussevitzky; he may be counted upon to make it as exciting as possible. Yesterday, in fact, he overdid it to the point of causing the strings to be a little rough.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:15. Next week's program will be: Mendelssohn: "Italian" Symphony; Ravel: "Mother Goose" Suite; Shostakovitch: Fifth Symphony.—C. W. D.

SYMPHONY TO RE

Nine Conductors

Boston Symphony's First Sixty Years as a Reflection of Nine Divergent Personalities

By EDWARD DOWNES

It has been said that an orchestra can be no greater than its leader. For in an amazingly short space of years, even months, any orchestra becomes a faithful reflection of its conductor's personality. Since its inception, the Boston Symphony has wisely avoided the constant succession of semi-permanent and guest conductors which certain other orchestras have cultivated in a short-sighted quest for quick box-office returns. Practical matters of administration and financing have been conservatively but generously arranged from the start, so that the artistic history of the Boston Symphony may be read in terms of the nine artists who have guided its first 60 years: Georg Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Muck, Fiedler, Monteux, Rabaud and Koussevitzky.

Henschel's opening program, the works with which our orchestra made its bow to the world on Oct. 22, 1881, told a story of uncompromising taste and high ideals. Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," a Haydn Symphony in B flat, airs from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Euridice" and Bruch's "Odysseus" (Anne Louise Cary was the soloist), the Ballet Music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Weber's Festival Overture were a selection which could be heard without complaint today and which soared far above the prevailing triviality of orchestral programs in the '80's.

Though Henschel was a greater musician than conductor (he appeared on his own programs as pianist, composer and singer) he made a vivid impression. He was sharply criticized in a day when criticism ran easily to extremes, but his concerts were more than popular and his musicianship was respected.

The first six conductors, all of whom were brought here by the orchestra's founder and sustainer, Henry Lee Higginson, were German by birth or career—partly because of Higginson's own musical studies in Vienna, partly because the modern conductor was a German creation.

A certain classical austerity, painstaking discipline came to the Boston Symphony with the restrained gestures, the pointed mustache and beard of Wilhelm Gericke. His first program: Beethoven's Third "Lenore" Overture, the Vieuxtemps A minor Violin Concerto, a Bach Prelude, Andante and Gavotte, and Volkmann's D minor Symphony became a pattern which, as one critic put it, "Mr. Gericke seems to regard as no less than sacramental." Almost invariably there were four pieces, beginning with an overture, ending with a symphony, and seldom stepping over the bounds of the standard German repertory. But Gericke was completely engrossed, sometimes almost overwhelmed by his set purpose of making the Boston Symphony the finest in the country. Before he left, he had reached his goal.

Though Artur Nikisch had not yet reached the peak of his fame in 1889, his engagement caused a great flurry in Boston. His poetic manner, his splendid head of hair, his elegance of dress and grace of gesture were worshipped by the "Symphony Girl," as a newspaper writer dubbed the eager feminine attendants on the Friday afternoon rehearsals. The fiery Hungarian became a musical matinee idol.

He was astonished to find at his disposal a virtuoso instrument. "All I need to do is poetize," he said.

Nikisch astonished everyone by conducting without a score. There was no soloist for his opening program. The Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven "Coriolanus" Overture, the Entr'Acte from Schubert's "Rosamunde" and Schumann's Fourth Symphony bespoke the romantic conductor. Some Boston critics complained that Nikisch showed a fine disregard for detail, but New York reproached Boston for its pedantry.

As never before, Music Hall glowed with excitement. Even the dry and forbidding Brahms emerged as fervour and poetry.

In the autumn of 1893, Emil Paur arrived from Germany with two boys and his pianist-wife. Both Mrs. Henschel and Frau Nikisch, a musician of great charm, but debatable vocal powers, had sung at Boston Symphony concerts. Frau Paur was destined to be the last music-making wife of a Boston Symphony conductor in its first 60 years. Paur introduced himself with Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Tchaikovsky's Serenade for Strings in C major and the Overture to "Tannhaeuser," and made an excellent impression.

"Here is no manicured, perfumed darling of Temple Place," wrote Philip Hale, with a parting shot at the romantic he had cordially disliked and consistently attacked. "He does not remember to be graceful in action—he is angular, even triangular—but he is terribly in earnest. . . . If he was more the schoolmaster than the man of imagination, it is the schoolmaster who is sadly needed in Boston."

Paur was an energetic and conscientious musician. Even New York took to the new "bearded Buelow." But he was daring, too. He introduced new works by that terrible iconoclast, Richard Strauss: "Death and Transfiguration," "Thus Spake Zarathustra," "Till Eulenspiegel."

When he returned for second term of office in 1898, Wilhelm Gericke was greeted with warm enthusiasm. His cut-and-dried programs were accepted for the sake of improvement of the orchestra itself during the eight years of his second visit.

It was in 1906 that Mr. Higginson brought over Karl Muck from the Royal Opera House of Berlin, the sixth German conductor of the Boston Symphony. After the graceful wrist of Nikisch, the violent arms of Paur, the military precision of Gericke, it almost seemed as if Muck seemed hardly to move at all. It became his boast in later years, that he never had to change his shirt after a performance.

For his first concert Muck used a type of program new to Boston, one chosen for its unity of styles: the Beethoven Fifth Symphony, Wagner's "Faust Overture," "Siegfried Idyll" and Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Beethoven revealed the classicist; Wagner, the conductor of operatic training, who was and who remained a great Wagnerian.

Muck it was who first decreed that soloists appearing with the orchestra must be accompanied by the orchestra, not their own piano accompanist. Soloists had always been an accepted audience-bait at Symphony concerts. Under Muck their number dwindled. Muck's discipline was as ruthless as could be wished, but his interpretations were the contrary of rigid. A new subtlety and a new breadth of intellectual conception characterized his extraordinarily catholic programs. As to appearance, Muck was the orchestra's first clean-shaven conductor, slight almost to the point of emaciation with military carriage and a hypnotic eye.

If it had not been there before, Muck brought the Boston Symphony to position of the world's first orchestra.

When he was forced to return to his duties in Berlin, the interim conductor was Max Fiedler, who has suffered by comparison with his distinguished colleagues. His programs were generally heroic and often contained provocative novelties. At his debut he directed the love scene from Richard Strauss's opera "Feuersnot." One hopes that Boston Symphony audiences of the day did not grasp the significance of this selection.

Muck's second tenure was interrupted by the war and the anti-German hysteria to which he fell victim.

The 1918 season was opened by a Frenchman, Pierre Monteux, pending the arrival of another Frenchman, Henri Rabaud. Rabaud's repertory of one year showed strong French and Russian influences. In the fall of 1919, Monteux returned as permanent conductor. For his debut he had played the Cesar Franck Symphony, Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, "La Peri" by Dukas and Debussy's "Iberia." The French school, which Monteux knew so intimately continued its sway. If not a vivid personality, he was a thoroughly routined and accurate musician. When a strike among the musicians threatened the existence of the orchestra in the spring of Monteux's first season he proved equal to the occasion, to the training and rebuilding duties which fell upon him. And audience loyalty to the distinguished Frenchman grew.

Innovation

In 1924 the trustees announced a surprising departure from precedent: The appointment of a Russian conductor. Strictly speaking, Serge Koussevitzky had become a cosmopolitan in Europe. An expatriate, resident of France, he conducted his own orchestra in Paris, and had made brilliant guest appearances in England and Spain.

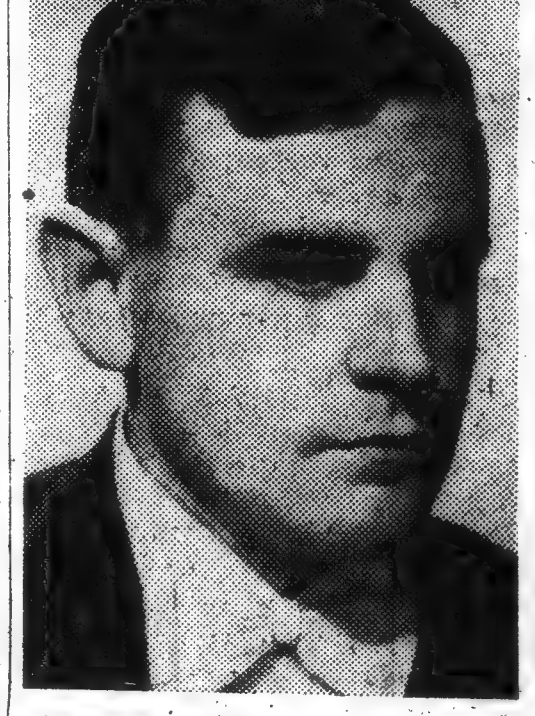
Not even the arrival of Nikisch had been so breathlessly awaited as was the coming of Koussevitzky. All the concerts were subscribed in advance.

Koussevitzky's first program disclosed the man: Vivaldi's D minor Concerto, Berlioz's "Roman Carneval" Overture, the Brahms-Haydn Variations, Honegger's "Pacific 231" (performed for the first time in America) and Scriabine's "Poem of Ecstacy." Italian, French, German, Swiss, Russian. The all-German tradition was gone for good!

Koussevitzky has had few equals in the art of program-building. In spite of much grumbling at the quantity of new music he introduced, his success in Boston and New York was immediate and he has remained longer with the Boston Symphony than any other conductor. He combines many of the finest qualities of his predecessors: the free romanticism of Nikisch, the stubborn devotion to beauty of ensemble of Gericke or Muck, the exploratory spirit of Monteux. Fortunately war cannot threaten his tenure here, for he has changed from a cosmopolitan to an American. He has played an active part in the development of American composition. His finest work, his hope and faith for the future bind him indissolubly to the country of his adoption.

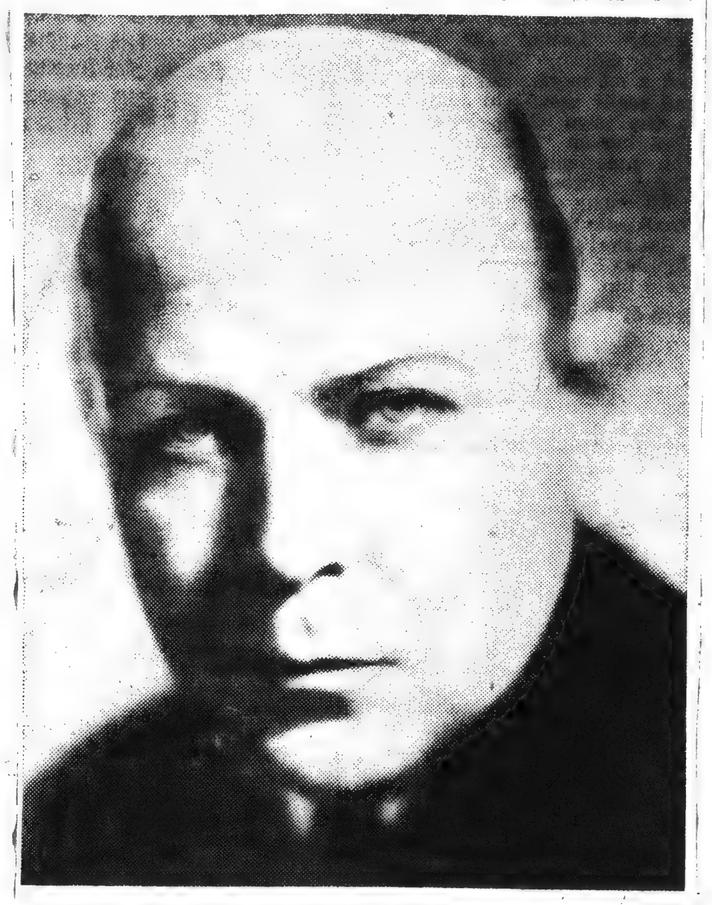
Robert Strassburg will give the fourth in his series of five free lectures at the South End Music School, 32 Rutland street, tomorrow evening at 8.15. The subject will be "Two Titans—Bach and Beethoven."

Improvisor



Alec Templeton, pianist-satirist, who gives a Symphony Hall recital Wednesday evening, Jan. 29.

REPEAT SHOSTAKOVITCH FIFTH



George Copeland, Boston pianist, who plays the Mozart E flat major Concert (K-482) with the Boston Symphony at the concerts of Friday and Saturday, Dec. 27 and 28.

MUSIC

Monday Symphony

The third program of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall before a capacity audience. The program was as follows:

Symphony No. 6 Op. 104.....Sibelius
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72 Beethoven
"Scheherazade," Op. 35..Rimsky-Korsakov

If you can properly suggest that any one person has more fun than any one else at a performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade" by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky may certainly claim the distinction. That may be stretching a point, of course, for the audience can hardly fail to be excited by the tonal magnificence of this slightly self-conscious war horse (and to judge by its reaction after the performance, it was exceedingly excited). The score naturally provides a multitude of special effects that the audience may hear and respond to, but it supplies the conductor, especially if he be on as sure ground as Mr. Koussevitzky, with an even greater number of moments of exaltation.

Mr. Koussevitzky took full advantage of every one, driving his men to further heights of virtuosity in each. The result was comparable to a stupendous but rigidly disciplined avalanche. We must count our blessings for having such a diabolically skillful piece of music as "Scheherazade." If it didn't take such an unsporting advantage of our streak for the emotional and the sensational we should, of course, rave about it. But somehow it leaves us with little but a ringing in our ears and a properly appreciative attitude in considering its technical brilliance—and brilliance it unquestionably is.

On the other hand, the Sibelius 6th symphony, which opened the program, is marked by no brilliance whatever. There is nothing in the way of technical resources which Sibelius has not shown us before and there is hardly a dynamic climax in it. Yet it has an insinuating quality. You find yourself thinking about it and looking forward to hearing it soon again. There is a bucolic pensiveness in the music and an economy of expression which is taken at best for dry scholasticism and at worst for lack of inspiration. One can only answer that by pointing imperiously to the coda to the final movement, certainly one of the sublimest passages in modern music.

Oddly enough, the orchestra was not always at its best in the Sibelius. One is so accustomed to perfection under Mr. Koussevitzky that a ragged attack or lack of balance between the choirs comes as much of a shock as a faulty blast on the tuba would. The errors were, however, all but imperceptible and we bring the subject up because it is so seldom that we can! The rest of the program was given over to the familiar third overture to "Leonore." This program will be repeated at 3 o'clock this afternoon.

R. F. E., JR.

December 30/40

MONDAY SYMPHONY

With the concerts of last evening and this afternoon, the supplementary series of Symphony Concerts reaches the half-way mark. In accordance with his usual practice, Dr. Koussevitzky made his programme by reassembling numbers played at those of Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

First on this well-diversified list is Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, and the other pieces are: Beethoven's Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, and Rimsky-Korsakov's symphonic suite, after the "Arabian Nights," "Scheherazade."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A program of marked contrasts is offered at the third of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Last evening there was an enthusiastic, capacity audience to hear Mr. Koussevitzky conduct the cool, serene Symphony No. 6 of Sibelius; that grandest of all Overtures, Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3, and Rimsky-Korsakov's excursion into the realm of fantasy, the Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade."

No more revealing comment on the absolute beauty of the Sibelius Symphony has been made than an observation by the composer, which is worth repeating time and again. He suggested that where most modern composers attempted to manufacture cocktails of every hue and description, he offered pure, cold water.

This Symphony does not scale great heights in emotion; it does not probe the heart. It has neither breadth nor the charm of a miniature. In orchestration and harmonic treatment is is also moderate. All is moderation. And yet here is still recognizable the hand of the master and his individual style. There is great white beauty in this Symphony. It is something one would grow to love on intimate acquaintance.

Mr. Koussevitzky read it with care but with some overemphasis. The intricate, curious rhythm of the second movement was exciting as, say, an intellectual game might be. But sometimes, as in the first movement, there were momentum and precision lacking. The long rhythmic lines were broken, just perceptibly.

But the triumphant Beethoven Overture was electrifying. From under Mr. Koussevitzky's hand it came slick and polished, its dynamic energy high. It was even too hard and brilliant, like the diamond's fire.

The "Scheherazade" Suite was truly an imaginative spectacle. It had all the spirit of the "Thousand and One Nights." In turn it became rhapsodic, wild fantasy, grotesque humor, sensuous and even cruel. It was lush and wild and stirring.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

CURRENT MUSIC

Mozart at Symphony

George Copeland Soloist With Koussevitzky In Romantic Mozart Concerto; Tchaikovsky

GEORGE COPELAND, Boston pianist who is second to none as a Debussy interpreter, was the soloist yesterday afternoon with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Mozart's E flat major Concerto (K-482). Modern French and Spanish music are the provinces in which Mr. Copeland reigns secure, and with which his name has become identified in the public mind. Such identification can be a destructive thing—as vicious as the type casting in Hollywood or on Broadway. It can limit an artist to a tiny fraction of the musical territories which he would otherwise have been able to conquer.

Mr. Copeland has been an all too willing victim of the label, or call it title if you like, which has been his these many years. He has perfected his mastery of the modern French and Spanish schools and somewhat neglected others. Therefore his friends and admirers were doubly curious yesterday to see what he would do with a Mozart Concerto.

It was an excellent performance, but with limitations. It was an excellent performance, but not a great one. The borderline between "excellent" and "great" is a vague one, sometimes a subjective one, but it was apparent yesterday afternoon. This was not great Mozart in the sense that Mr. Copeland's Debussy or Ravel is great. And yet, curiously enough, the lack did not seem due to limitations inherent in the performer's gifts, but rather to the fact that Mr. Copeland has not pondered Mozart's music as long and lovingly as the composers for whom he is known. On the contrary, he gave the impression that the same concentration and affection lavished on Mozart might make Mr. Copeland's Mozart as fine as his Debussy.

The touch that is alternately velvet and sparkle, sensitive nuance of the melodic line, feeling for a rounded phrase, the ability to make simplicity more telling than weight—these things are there. But the integration of them all was not. The perfection of Mozart style, which we expect from an artist of Mr. Copeland's stature, shone through only at irregular intervals. When it did appear, as in the theme of the last movement, and more frequently in the romantic slow movement, it was unforgettable.

Why, one wonders, was it deemed necessary to improve Mozart by omitting the cadenzas? In works of this period cadenzas have a definite artistic function: emotional release and formal accentuation of the final cadence. Mozart would never have taken the trouble to compose and write down cadenzas for his own works, if he had considered them unimportant.

Early Symphony

The concerto was preceded by an exquisite early symphony. (Early for Mozart, that is. It was his 29th work in the form, and Koechel lists it as his 201st work!) It was at this time that Viennese influence finally decided Mozart for the four movement symphony, as opposed to the three movements which were still customary in Italy. Viennese, too, is the serious tone which crops up again and again throughout the work, the stronger thematic development.

Nevertheless the idiom Mozart uses here is the laughing speech of Italian opera buffa. Even when he is in deep earnest, the adroit brevity of phrase, the nimble vocabulary, point unmistakably to the Italian origin of symphony.

Koussevitzky led this work of Mozart's 'teens with elegance, finish and fine intuition of its spiritual components. The Andante might have profited by a somewhat slower tempo, but the first and last movements in particular were an interpretive triumph.

Slavic Finish

The second half of the program consisted of a virtuoso performance of the Prelude to Moussorgsky's opera "Khovanstchina" and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." Dawn on the Moskva River, the theme of Moussorgsky's Prelude, is painted with the utmost delicacy, with only glints of the barbaric color the composer so loved.

"Romeo and Juliet" has been played by a thousand movie orchestras and much of the audience must know this music by heart. Its remorselessly exhibitionistic agonies, its very public passion, are still irresistibly moving. Whatever may be said of tearing a passion to tatters, this performance was something to make the hair stand on end. It had nothing cheaply sensational about it, but the furious strife and the soaring love theme were worthy of both composer and his subject. As always, true recreation seemed a miracle.

E. D.

Ernest Hutsheson's new book, "A Musical Guide to Richard Wagner's Ring of the Nibelung" will be published by Simon and Schuster this Wednesday. The author is president and director of the Juilliard School of Music and a director of the Metropolitan Opera Association.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

DEC 29 1940

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY

BREAKING a 60-year tradition of the orchestra, and his own tradition of 17 years since has been the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky finally agreed to allow photographs of himself and the orchestra during one of the regular Saturday night programs in Boston's Symphony Hall. With special lighting effects, electricians and photographers scrambling about the huge stage, and before a small, select audience, the famous leader swung into action and these photographs are the result.

IN OPENING a concert, Dr. Koussevitzky walks rapidly onto the stage, mounts the podium, bows to the audience, then, facing the orchestra, he stands motionless until every member is ready, every eye on him. Quickly he takes up the baton, raises both hands, pauses for an instant, and brings both hands down for the start.

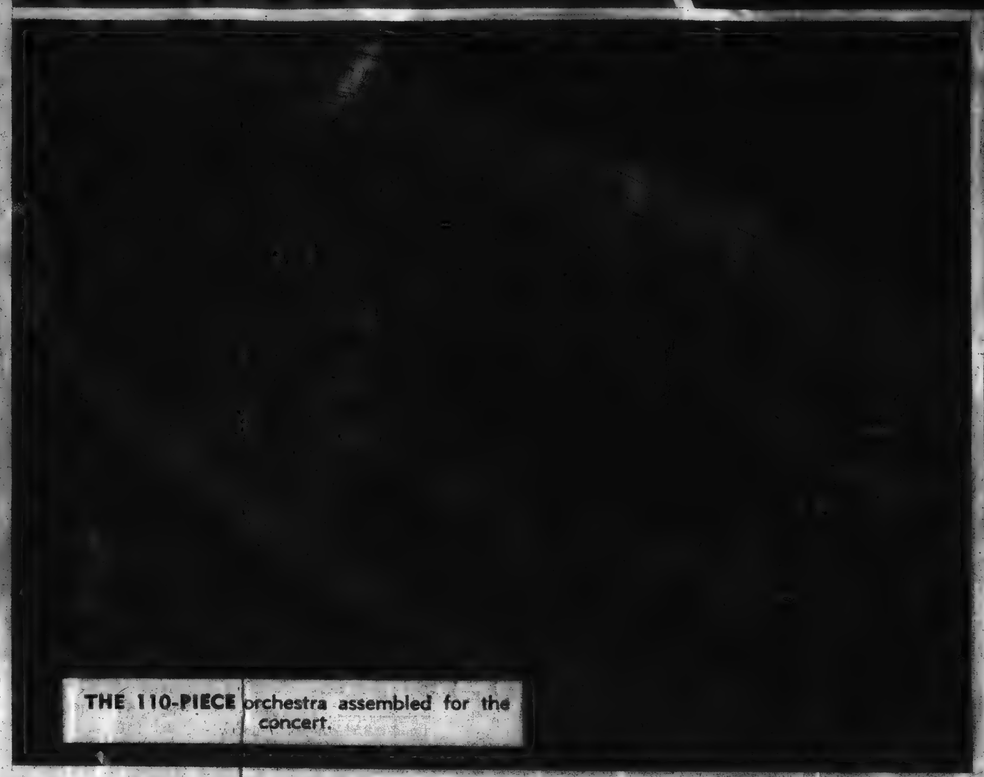
THE 110-PIECE orchestra assembled for the concert.

EXPRESSIVELY — as if the music had carried him from the earth, he brings the symphony to a close.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
DEC 29 1940

IN OPENING a concert, Dr. Koussevitzky walks rapidly onto the stage, mounts the podium, bows to the audience then, facing the orchestra, he stands motionless until every member is ready, every eye on him. Quickly he takes up the baton, raises both hands, pauses for an instant, and brings both hands down for the start.

BREAKING a 60-year tradition of the orchestra, and his own tradition of 17 years since has been the conductor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky finally agreed to allow photographs of himself and the orchestra during one of the regular Saturday night programs in Boston's Symphony Hall. With special lighting effects, electricians and photographers scrambling about the huge stage, and before a small, select audience, the famous leader swung into action and these photographs are the result.



THE 110-PIECE orchestra assembled for the concert.

EXPRESSIVELY — as if the music had carried him from the earth, he brings the symphony to a close.

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE

Back Bay's "MAIN STREET"

Symphony Hall

Among the most notable streets in modern Boston is Massachusetts Avenue, which runs from Edward Everett Square to the Arlington Post Office. On or near this street are located a number of well-known buildings, among them Symphony Hall at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. Here is the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for sixty years, under nine distinguished conductors, has been the delight of Boston music-lovers, and is today second to no other orchestra in the world.

Henry Lee Higginson regularly came to the old Boston Music Hall to hear the Harvard Musical Association concerts, the Musical Fund soirées, and the Germania Orchestra, and soon became enthusiastic for the establishment of a permanent orchestra in Boston. In 1881 he heard Georg Henschel of London conduct for the Harvard Musical concert and soon afterward engaged him as the first conductor of the embryonic Boston Symphony Orchestra. For thirty-six years Major Higginson kept the orchestra going, giving hundreds of thousands of dollars out of his own pocket to the project.

Out of the orchestra development has come in recent years a school for musicians, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which, under the distinguished leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the present conductor of the orchestra, is achieving wide-spread renown.

In many other places, the artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra inspire love of music. For example, the total annual attendance at all concerts has rocketed from 83,000 the first season, in 1881, to 750,000 last year. Against the first season of 20 concerts, the Symphony now has an annual run of 62 symphony concerts and six youth concerts (the latter under Wheeler Beckett) in Boston's 40-year-old Symphony Hall; eight concerts at Harvard; 37 in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and other cities; 58 Pop concerts in Symphony Hall under Arthur Fiedler; 24 summer concerts on the Charles River Esplanade under Mr. Fiedler, and nine in the Berkshires.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
DEC 29 1940

DESCRIPTIONS IN TONE

On the Refusal of Some Composers to Tell the Public the Ideas And Background of Their Program Music

By OLIN DOWNES

CORRESPONDENTS have done us the honor to make rejoinder to remarks recently made in these columns. Thus Mr. Alexander Ross, who quotes chapter and verse in discussing Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony, and program music.

It will be remembered that when Albert Coates conducted the "London" symphony in 1920 the program carried a description of the work and its meaning which could hardly have been issued without the composer's sanction. On a later occasion Mr. Williams asked that this explanation be withdrawn, remarking that he wished the symphony to be heard as "absolute" music—as sounds evoked by general poetical associations in a symphony "by a Londoner."

But the "London" symphony appears to follow closely the explanation afforded by Mr. Coates, and this reviewer felt that the audience at a recent Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall missed a good deal of the significance of the work because Coates's description of it was withheld, in accordance, it was said, with the composer's desire.

* * *

MR. ROSS writes as follows, in a letter which he forwards from San Francisco:

In writing about "program music" you mention the highly questionable program provided by Albert Coates to Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony.

Here in San Francisco this last week-end we also have heard this superb work, and Mr. Alfred Frankenstein, who writes the program notes here, had this to say regarding said "program":

"Vaughan Williams has never sanctioned it; A. E. F. Dickinson's 'Introduction to the Music of R. Vaughan Williams,' half of which is devoted to the 'London' symphony, nubs it completely, and it is by no means insignificant that Arthur Bliss, who knows Vaughan Williams and his work extremely well, remarked to the writer of these lines that he had never seen the Coates 'program.'"

Mr. Frankenstein quotes Mr. Bliss: "Vaughan Williams always insisted that it should be called 'Symphony by a Londoner,' implying, I am sure, that it is no mere descriptive or picturesque work about a great city but the music of a man whose artistic sense was dominated by his living and working there. I do not know, for instance, whether the slow movement was originally designed by Vaughan Williams to represent London at night, but I do know that it conjures up at once the river on the Chelsea Embankment where Vaughan Williams lived, because I lived and worked in the same house with him, and the slow beauty can be traced to no other source."

* * *

IT is easy to understand that Vaughan Williams, the tone-poet, by nature a sensitive and retiring man, may have objected to such a detailed explanation of his music as Mr. Coates made. The fact remains that it is difficult to see where this explanation errs in its indication of the nature of the music and its recital of impressions that sounds of London streets and market places and the flowing Thames and the great clock that strikes the passing hours made upon the composer.

This explanation cannot easily have hurt the symphony in the audience's appreciation, or done violence to its essential poetical idea. On the other hand, the lack of any programmatic explanation when Mr. Koussevitsky played the "London" symphony in New York, with evident thought of the association of the music with the historic city now undergoing its tragic ordeal, deprived the symphony of much of its meaning for the audience assembled.

It is no detraction from the value of the music to recognize this fact, self-evident in the reception of the symphony. And, granting Mr. Williams's objection to detailed explanation of his music, as also his abhorrence of sensationalism or propaganda, it would be reasonable to ask, if he was so set against Coates's description of his work, why he did not protest against it in the first place, or else before repeated performances of the symphony had been given in this country and elsewhere.

* * *

WE still prefer the "London" symphony with its description. We believe that this description affords a key to the composer's imagination, and its expression would bring the public and the symphony closer together.

We do not believe a symphony with a program to be necessarily less great than a symphony without one. A program symphony or symphonic poem is not a degenerate aspect of the classic symphonic form. It is a form of expression, having its own integrity and its own character, which lies between that of the opera and the classic symphony.

In opera the music is motivated by a visible drama, and explained by the text which inspired the composer. The symphony is music primarily of design, though often with an inner drama of its own. And many a symphony is unacknowledged program music of one sort or another.

Beethoven's First, Second, Fourth, Seventh and Eighth symphonies are "absolute" music. His Third, the "Eroica," we know to have been motivated by thought of Napoleon, whom Beethoven idolized as a liberator, but denounced when he accepted the crown. Then the symphony became a hymn to the heroic spirit, as its title made clear. Its intent is not alone that of pure music.

* * *

THE same thing is true of the Fifth. It does not matter whether Schindler, who often exaggerated and often plainly prevaricated, reported that Beethoven had said of the four-note motive, "Thus fate knocks at the door." The import of the symphony is clear. It is the struggle of the individual against fate, and the triumph of the human spirit and will. The Sixth symphony is program music, despite Beethoven's own endeavor to disguise the fact. The Ninth symphony is a program symphony, definitely explained in the choral finale, which Wagner found to be Beethoven's admission that pure symphonic music could go no further without the fertilizing influence of dramatic ideas.

We are no Wagnerites in this matter. We hold that there is an unlimited field for absolute music, and that there is no higher manifestation of the art. But the symphonic form is only one kind of music. To maintain that it is greater than any other kind is to maintain that Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord" is greater than his "Passion According to St. Matthew" or his B minor Mass, which have definite dramatic purpose.

* * *

THERE are all kinds and degrees of program music and comparatively little music of merely formal or "abstract" intentions. Debussy's "L'Après midi d'un Faune" follows as vaguely and tenuously as the poem—although with a musical architecture far more precise and coordinated than the sonorous architecture of Mallarmé—the fantasy of "L'Après-midi." Smetana's noble cycle of symphonic poems, "My Country," which are too seldom heard, have each a definite subject—that of the River Moldau, or the Fortress Vysehnad, and so on. Liszt's "Faust" symphony, the composer's greatest masterpiece, has its three extraordinary character pictures of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

* * *

WAGNER'S "Faust" overture is program music, and a maddening example of what we might have had if in his mature years he had carried out his early idea of composing his "Faust" symphony. And some call Wagner's opera "Tristan and Isolde," an opera virtually without action, a symphonic poem with stage pictures.

Richard Strauss, whose music only assumed its true character and potency when it became avowed narrative, was sometimes as coy as Vaughan Williams in disclaiming programmatic intentions, but he is always the poet-philosopher-dramatist, or what you choose to call it, in tones, whether a friend writes a poem elucidatory of a score after Strauss—or so it is stated—has finished it, as in "Tod und Verklaerung," or generally imaginative, as in "Till Eulenspiegel," or an apostle of the extreme limits of program music, as in "Don Quixote."

* * *

IT is all the same, although Strauss, like Mahler and other composers, has been at times inconsistent in first denying and then affirming various literary and poetical bases for his notes. In the house of art there are many mansions. There need be no attempt to disguise their various forms and purposes.

Neither Debussy, Smetana, Wagner, nor a score of others, felt ashamed to confess programmatic intention when it inspired them as musicians. And the music was none the worse for it.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
DEC 31 1940

Boston Symphony Gives Concert Today

At the "Commuter's Concert" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra scheduled for 3 p. m. today, the program conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offers the "Leonora" Overture No. 3, Beethoven, Symphony No. 6, Op. 104, of Sibelius and the "Scheherazade" symphonic Suite of Rinsky-Korsakoff.

Symphony

Hindemith Premiere At Sanders Theater

Returned from his mid-season vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky presented his audience with a surprise at the Boston Symphony concert in Sanders Theater last evening. It was what the movie producers would call a "sneak preview," with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, of an extraordinary new work, Paul Hindemith's Violoncello Concerto, the first performances of which originally were scheduled for the Symphony Hall programs today and tomorrow. Last night it replaced the previously announced Nocturnes of Debussy and Ravel's "La Valse."

While Mr. Downes will have the final word in his review tomorrow, this listener, frequently out of sympathy with Hindemith's earlier music, must report he found the composition beautiful and enormously bracing. Scholarly though the writing is, this is no "paper music," no stringing out of intellectual exercises. It is music of ideas—vital and original and exciting ideas. And it is not ashamed to show emotion. The second movement, for example, is exquisitely melodic, and the first is tautly dramatic and contains an almost bardic cadenza for the solo instrument. The last movement, with its subtly shifting rhythms and rousing tunes, probably will prove the most popular. Mr. Piatigorsky and Dr. Koussevitzky played the work with breadth and understanding, like the masters they are.

The concert began with a performance of Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and came to a close with Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Rabaud's work, based on a poem by Lenau describing the doomed Faust's vision of a children's procession on St. John's Eve, is gently pastoral, polished music of which the Boston Symphony's incredible strings and woodwinds made the most.

Dr. Koussevitzky worked his accustomed miracle with Brahms's great autumnal symphony. Nothing was lost of its sweeping tragedy or its lyricism or its exaltation.

The next Sanders Theater concert will take place on Feb. 27.

M. H.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 31 19[illegible]

Lenox

Festival Course Will Start Here Jan. 8

LENOX—Through the courtesy of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Lenox is to be included among those towns of Berkshire County eligible for a music of 10 lectures. Miss Katherine Philbrick, under the direction of Madame Samaroff-Stokowski of the laymen's music course of New York, will interpret the records of the major symphonies to be played next summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Philbrick is well known to Lenox for the music appreciation course which she conducted here last winter. She will conduct every other meeting and a local musician will conduct the alternate meetings which will have been outlined by Madame Samaroff-Stokowski. The course offered by the Festival clubs does not take the technicalities out of music but presents them in an entertaining and interesting way.

There will be a nominal charge for this course and 25 members must be assured to make the course possible. Members of the local committee are Mrs. George A. Mole, Mrs. Adelbert I. Newton, Mrs. Lenges Bull and Miss Irene Poirier. Anyone interested, by notifying any member of the committee, will help in the organizing of this Festival group in Lenox and assuring its success. The meetings will be held in the Lenox Library and will open Jan. 8 at 8 PM. The committee will appreciate having their membership or knowing of interested persons before the first meeting.

Zion Herald. Jan. 1, 1941

MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE

Back Bay's "MAIN STREET" 57

Symphony Hall

Among the most notable streets in modern Boston is Massachusetts Avenue, which runs from Edward Everett Square to the Arlington Post Office. On or near this street are located a number of well-known buildings, among them Symphony Hall at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues. Here is the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which for sixty years, under nine distinguished conductors, has been the delight of Boston music-lovers, and is today second to no other orchestra in the world.

Henry Lee Higginson regularly came to the old Boston Music Hall to hear the Harvard Musical Association concerts, the Musical Fund soirées, and the Germania Orchestra, and soon became enthusiastic for the establishment of a permanent orchestra in Boston. In 1881 he heard Georg Henschel of London conduct for the Harvard Musical concert and soon afterward engaged him as the first conductor of the embryonic Boston Symphony Orchestra. For thirty-six years Major Higginson kept the orchestra going, giving hundreds of thousands of dollars out of his own pocket to the project.

Out of the orchestra development has come in recent years a school for musicians, the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, which, under the distinguished leadership of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the present conductor of the orchestra, is achieving wide-spread renown.

In many other places, the artists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra inspire love of music. For example, the total annual attendance at all concerts has rocketed from 83,000 the first season, in 1881, to 750,000 last year. Against the first season of 20 concerts, the Symphony now has an annual run of 62 symphony concerts and six youth concerts (the latter under Wheeler Beckett) in Boston's 40-year-old Symphony Hall; eight concerts at Harvard; 37 in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Cleveland, and other cities; 58 Pop concerts in Symphony Hall under Arthur Fiedler; 24 summer concerts on the Charles River Esplanade under Mr. Fiedler, and nine in the Berkshires.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
DEC 29 1940

DESCRIPTIONS IN TONE

On the Refusal of Some Composers to Tell the Public the Ideas And Background of Their Program Music

By OLIN DOWNES

CORRESPONDENTS have done us the honor to make rejoinder to remarks recently made in these columns. Thus Mr. Alexander Ross, who quotes chapter and verse in discussing Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony, and program music.

It will be remembered that when Albert Coates conducted the "London" symphony in 1920 the program carried a description of the work and its meaning which could hardly have been issued without the composer's sanction. On a later occasion Mr. Williams asked that this explanation be withdrawn, remarking that he wished the symphony to be heard as "absolute" music—as sounds evoked by general poetical associations in a symphony "by a Londoner."

But the "London" symphony appears to follow closely the explanation afforded by Mr. Coates, and this reviewer felt that the audience at a recent Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall missed a good deal of the significance of the work because Coates's description of it was withheld, in accordance, it was said, with the composer's desire.

* * *

MR. ROSS writes as follows, in a letter which he forwards from San Francisco:

In writing about "program music" you mention the highly questionable program provided by Albert Coates to Vaughan Williams's "London" symphony.

Here in San Francisco this last week-end we also have heard this superb work, and Mr. Alfred Frankenstein, who writes the program notes here, had this to say regarding said "program":

"Vaughan Williams has never sanctioned it; A. E. F. Dickinson's 'Introduction to the Music of R. Vaughan Williams,' half of which is devoted to the 'London' symphony, nubs it completely, and it is by no means insignificant that Arthur Bliss, who knows Vaughan Williams and his work extremely well, remarked to the writer of these lines that he had never seen the Coates 'program.'"

Mr. Frankenstein quotes Mr. Bliss: "Vaughan Williams always insisted that it should be called 'Symphony by a Londoner,' implying, I am sure, that it is no mere descriptive or picturesque work about a great city but the music of a man whose artistic sense was dominated by his living and working there. I do not know, for instance, whether the slow movement was originally designed by Vaughan Williams to represent London at night, but I do know that it conjures up at once the river on the Chelsea Embankment where Vaughan Williams lived, because I lived and worked in the same house with him, and the slow beauty can be traced to no other source."

* * *

IT is easy to understand that Vaughan Williams, the tone-poet, by nature a sensitive and retiring man, may have objected to such a detailed explanation of his music as Mr. Coates made. The fact remains that it is difficult to see where this explanation errs in its indication of the nature of the music and its recital of impressions that sounds of London streets and market places and the flowing Thames and the great clock that strikes the passing hours made upon the composer.

This explanation cannot easily have hurt the symphony in the audience's appreciation, or done violence to its essential poetical idea. On the other hand, the lack of any programmatic explanation when Mr. Koussevitzky played the "London" symphony in New York, with evident thought of the association of the music with the historic city now undergoing its tragic ordeal, deprived the symphony of much of its meaning for the audience assembled.

It is no detraction from the value of the music to recognize this fact, self-evident in the reception of the symphony. And, granting Mr. Williams's objection to detailed explanation of his music, as also his abhorrence of sensationalism or propaganda, it would be reasonable to ask, if he was so set against Coates's description of his work, why he did not protest against it in the first place, or else before repeated performances of the symphony had been given in this country and elsewhere.

* * *

WE still prefer the "London" symphony with its description. We believe that this description affords a key to the composer's imagination, and its expression would bring the public and the symphony closer together.

We do not believe a symphony with a program to be necessarily less great than a symphony without one. A program symphony or symphonic poem is not a degenerate aspect of the classic symphonic form. It is a form of expression, having its own integrity and its own character, which lies between that of the opera and the classic symphony.

In opera the music is motivated by a visible drama, and explained by the text which inspired the composer. The symphony is music primarily of design, though often with an inner drama of its own. And many a symphony is unacknowledged program music of one sort or another.

Beethoven's First, Second, Fourth, Seventh and Eighth symphonies are "absolute" music. His Third, the "Eroica," we know to have been motivated by thought of Napoleon, whom Beethoven idolized as a liberator, but denounced when he accepted the crown. Then the symphony became a hymn to the heroic spirit, as its title made clear. Its intent is not alone that of pure music.

* * *

THE same thing is true of the Fifth. It does not matter whether Schindler, who often exaggerated and often plainly prevaricated, reported that Beethoven had said of the four-note motive, "Thus fate knocks at the door." The import of the symphony is clear. It is the struggle of the individual against fate, and the triumph of the human spirit and will. The Sixth symphony is program music, despite Beethoven's own endeavor to disguise the fact. The Ninth symphony is a program symphony, definitely explained in the choral finale, which Wagner found to be Beethoven's admission that pure symphonic music could go no further without the fertilizing influence of dramatic ideas.

We are no Wagnerites in this matter. We hold that there is an unlimited field for absolute music, and that there is no higher manifestation of the art. But the symphonic form is only one kind of music. To maintain that it is greater than any other kind is to maintain that Bach's "Well-Tempered Clavichord" is greater than his "Passion According to St. Matthew" or his B minor Mass, which have definite dramatic purpose.

* * *

THERE are all kinds and degrees of program music and comparatively little music of merely formal or "abstract" intentions. Debussy's "L'Après midi d'un Faune" follows as vaguely and tenuously as the poem—although with a musical architecture far more precise and coordinated than the sonorous architecture of Mallarmé—the fantasy of "L'Après-midi." Smetana's noble cycle of symphonic poems, "My Country," which are too seldom heard, have each a definite subject—that of the River Moldau, or the Fortress Vyzehrad, and so on. Liszt's "Faust" symphony, the composer's greatest masterpiece, has its three extraordinary character pictures of Faust, Gretchen and Mephistopheles.

* * *

WAGNER'S "Faust" overture is program music, and a maddening example of what we might have had if in his mature years he had carried out his early idea of composing his "Faust" symphony. And some call Wagner's opera "Tristan and Isolde," an opera virtually without action, a symphonic poem with stage pictures.

Richard Strauss, whose music only assumed its true character and potency when it became avowed narrative, was sometimes as coy as Vaughan Williams in disclaiming programmatic intentions, but he is always the poet-philosopher-dramatist, or what you choose to call it, in tones, whether a friend writes a poem elucidatory of a score after Strauss—or so it is stated—has finished it, as in "Tod und Verklaerung," or generally imaginative, as in "Till Eulenspiegel," or an apostle of the extreme limits of program music, as in "Don Quixote."

* * *

IT is all the same, although Strauss, like Mahler and other composers, has been at times inconsistent in first denying and then affirming various literary and poetical bases for his notes. In the house of art there are many mansions. There need be no attempt to disguise their various forms and purposes.

Neither Debussy, Smetana, Wagner, nor a score of others, felt ashamed to confess programmatic intention when it inspired them as musicians. And the music was none the worse for it.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
DEC 31 1940

Boston Symphony Gives Concert Today

At the "Commuter's Concert" of the Boston Symphony Orchestra scheduled for 3 p. m. today, the program conducted by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky offers the "Leonora" Overture No. 3, Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, Op. 104, of Sibelius and the "Scheherazade" symphonic Suite of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Symphony

Hindemith Premiere At Sanders Theater

Returned from his mid-season vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky presented his audience with a surprise at the Boston Symphony concert in Sanders Theater last evening. It was what the movie producers would call a "sneak preview," with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, of an extraordinary new work, Paul Hindemith's Violoncello Concerto, the first performances of which originally were scheduled for the Symphony Hall programs today and tomorrow. Last night it replaced the previously announced Nocturnes of Debussy and Ravel's "La Valse."

While Mr. Downes will have the final word in his review tomorrow, this listener, frequently out of sympathy with Hindemith's earlier music, must report he found the composition beautiful and enormously bracing. Scholarly though the writing is, this is no "paper music," no stringing out of intellectual exercises. It is music of ideas—vital and original and exciting ideas. And it is not ashamed to show emotion. The second movement, for example, is exquisitely melodic, and the first is tautly dramatic and contains an almost bardic cadenza for the solo instrument. The last movement, with its subtly shifting rhythms and rousing tunes, probably will prove the most popular. Mr. Piatigorsky and Dr. Koussevitzky played the work with breadth and understanding, like the masters they are.

The concert began with a performance of Rabaud's symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and came to a close with Brahms's Fourth Symphony.

Rabaud's work, based on a poem by Lenau describing the doomed Faust's vision of a children's procession on St. John's Eve, is gently pastoral, polished music of which the Boston Symphony's incredible strings and woodwinds made the most.

Dr. Koussevitzky worked his accustomed miracle with Brahms's great autumnal symphony. Nothing was lost of its sweeping tragedy or its lyricism or its exaltation.

The next Sanders Theater concert will take place on Feb. 27.

M. H.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
DEC 31 1940

Lenox

Festival Course Will Start Here Jan. 8

LENOX—Through the courtesy of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and Mrs. Bruce Crane of Dalton, Lenox is to be included among those towns of Berkshire County eligible for a music of 10 lectures. Miss Katherine Philbrick, under the direction of Madame Samaroff-Stokowski of the laymen's music course of New York, will interpret the records of the major symphonies to be played next summer by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Miss Philbrick is well known to Lenox for the music appreciation course which she conducted here last winter. She will conduct every other meeting and a local musician will conduct the alternate meetings which will have been outlined by Madame Samaroff-Stokowski. The course offered by the Festival clubs does not take the technicalities out of music but presents them in an entertaining and interesting way.

There will be a nominal charge for this course and 25 members must be assured to make the course possible. Members of the local committee are Mrs. George [illegible] Mole, Mrs. Adelbert I. [illegible], Mrs. Lenges Bull and Miss Irene Poirier. Anyone interested, by notifying any member of the committee, will help in the organizing of this Festival group in Lenox and assuring its success. The meetings will be held in the Lenox Library and will open Jan. 8 at 8 PM. The committee will appreciate having their membership or knowing of interested persons before the [illegible] meeting.

JANUARY 2, 1941

Koussevitzky Hails New Work Despite Critics' 'Banal,' 'Thin'

Transcript

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky contends the public is "far ahead of the critics in its responsiveness" to the music of Dimitri Shastakovich, young Russian composer, and adds that "this is not the first time such a thing has happened."

Departing from custom, Koussevitzky will play the Fifth Symphony by Shastakovich for the second time in 10 weeks at Boston Symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday. Sometimes audiences wait as long as two or three years to hear a classic repeated.

"I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness," the conductor remarked in an interview. He continued:

"The critics said Shastakovich's music is banal and contains nothing new, but they've said that before about other new works which were liked by the public, and then, later, they've only had to explain the greatness of those same works."

Boston music reviewers, after hearing the young Russian's symphony played here in October, described it variously as "banal," "vulgar," "thin," sterile," "unoriginal" and "long-winded."

Koussevitzky, a Russian-born American citizen, hailed the work as giving "a feeling of Russian life in the past 25 years" and "as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikowsky or Sibelius."

58

Shostakovitch Again

Koussevitzky Repeats Fifth Symphony o Soviet Master—"Italian" Symphony Hear

THE Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony does not shrink, it grow with acquaintance. Perhaps, too, its performance has in creased in precision, subtlety and fire since Koussevitzk first played it last October. Or have our own ears simply grown sharper to catch the manifold splendors of this extraordinary score? Most probably all three factors combined to produce ever warmer applause yesterday than last fall when the symphony was new to us. In any event, it was both courageous and intelligent of Koussevitzky to have brought up this musical bone of contention a second time within the season, and in the same subscription series.

The first part of the program consisted of Mendelssohn's ingratiating "Italian" Symphony and the deceptively simple Five Children's Pieces, "Ma Mere l'Oye," by Ravel.

Both were excellently performed though there were several traits in the Mendelssohn with which it is possible to disagree. One of the most baffling things about Koussevitzky is that when he infringes on your idea of how a piece should be done, he usually does so so brilliantly that it is impossible to work up very much indignation about it. To say this is perhaps to condone the prima donna conducting about which we hear so much nowadays. But that does not change the truth of the statement.

For example, the first and last movements of the "Italian" Symphony were too fast. This gave the first movement a nervous angularity, far removed from the spirit of Mendelssohn. But it also induced a sweep and impetuosity which are not foreign to Mendelssohn and which are all too seldom evident in performances of the "Italian" Symphony. Whether there are not other ways of infusing such temperament, is another question.

The Saltarello finale was an amazing tour de force. It is a truism to say that hardly another orchestra could have maintained Koussevitzky's speed without sounding hectic and out of breath, without tarnishing the delicate sheen of its tone, without dulling the edge of its precision, without sabotaging its fine scale of dynamic nuance. The Boston Symphony did none of these things. The lacy patterns spun themselves with captivating, with artisticratic ease. It seemed deliciously right, no matter how much conscience might say: "This is too fast, this is too fast!" The Saltarello danced on winged feet.

Naif?

Ravel's Mother Goose Pieces are as sophisticated and as unsophisticated as "Alice in Wonderland." They follow the ancient gallic tradition of decorative art, there is nothing in them to overwhelm or sweep you off your feet. But they delight everybody. They are craftily put together, their simplicity is the result of infinite pains, and they must be cunningly conducted to produce their full effect.

Koussevitzky's Parisian background and his fine ear for timbre and color fit him peculiarly to kindle the subtle lights of this fragile, transparent score.

A Popular Modern

Not only does the Shostakovitch Fifth wear well in repeated hearings, it is a distinctly popular work. And if there are passages which sound at first obvious to the point of banality, these same passages grow less crass as the listener's mind grasps their relation to the architecture of the whole. On the other hand, those portions of the work which appeared confused and chaotic, clarify themselves with remarkable speed.

The tremendous sweep and vitality of this symphony, its white heat of passion, the virtuoso technique of its composer, the strong melodic gift, these things were apparent at the very first performance. Its deeply organic form was not, or was not to most listeners. The interrelation of Shostakovitch's thematic material is among the most interesting aspects of this music.

The principal theme of the first movement, in the abrupt form which opens the symphony, is reminiscent of the bare uncompromising motive of Beethoven's Great Fuge. The transformations which it undergoes, first into the sustained song of violins, then through the contrapuntal mill, with diminution and augmentation and combinations of both, finally to emerge, with the recapitulation, in warmly poetic dialogue between flute and French horn—all are telling emotionally and formally effective.

The scherzo still appears parodistic. Though whether the use of the Austrian Laendler motive was intended to foreshadow a Russian-German alliance is a question which others more competent may answer. Then, since music can never for long be pure caricature, there are many moments of real beauty even in this gruff scherzo.

The slow movement, which opens with a pensive transformation of the motto of the first movement, still seems the greatest of the four. It requires little explanation or comment. Sheer inspiration is the use of the xylophone to reinforce its ecstatic climax.

Perhaps more than any other movement, the finale recalls Tchaikovsky, but it is none the less original for that. All in all, a masterpiece, which may well conquer itself a strong position in the modern repertory.

E. D.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 31 1940

Serge Koussevitzky Contmues Quest For Good Music

Conductor First To Program Many Noted Works

When the history of the past quarter century of musical progress is completely assembled, the name of Koussevitzky will loom large in it.

When Debussy was none too firmly established in the musical world at large, it was Koussevitzky who gave an impetus to his name and fame by inviting him to appear in Moscow as guest conductor of Koussevitzky's own orchestra, in an entirely Debussyan program. Koussewitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third Bushnell orchestral event Tuesday, Jan. 7.

There is no difficulty today in accepting Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" as an enjoyable composition. No wave of protest takes form in mail from radio listeners after its broadcast, which is far from rare. Yet Koussevitzky had to contend with whistling and catcalls when he first had what was termed the "audacity" to play it.

No auditors angrily stomp away from concerts nowadays when Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" is heard. But Koussevitzky had to fight such revolt when he first played that music. Similar facts hold true of Kouseevitzky's pioneering performances of works of Ravel, Prokofieff, Honneger, Roussel, Berg.

Compositions which Koussevitzky had the vision to see as permanent additions to the orchestral repertory have become so. Works which he abandoned after a fair period of trial have failed to gain permanence. He has sought, not the merely new, but the new and good. This season he continues that quest. In the 1940-41 concert year, Kousevitzky will give first performances of music by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Britten, Roy Harris and other significant composers of our own day.

Shostakovitch Again At Symphony Concert

C.S.M.

The Arts in Boston

Dmitri Shostakovitch, composer of the Symphony No. 5 which was performed by way of repeat at the Boston Symphony matinee yesterday, is a musical architect, nobody will deny. The work which Serge Koussevitzky asked his Friday audience to consider again has the build of a symphony, and no apologies or explanations necessary. Certainly it compels attention at the very start, and it holds attention, too, at least half way through. It gives no cause of offense as far as the first movement is concerned, except on that of a kind of pretentiousness and a tendency to bombast. That happens, however, more in the way of oversonority than in the way of inflated ideas, inasmuch as the themes have plenty of appeal as melody and take on masterful handling. Quiet passages occur, too, to relieve the impression of undue noise.

For offset, the brilliant portion of the symphony, the second movement, quite in the scherzo form and style, fairly crackles with Russian humor, first measure to last. But to praise the slow movement which follows would require an advocate with arguments studied out and worded in very particular terms. The Largo lives up technically to its name, possessing breadth, indeed; yet why such unconscionable length? Its conclusion seems like the wind-up of everything. The succeeding final movement causes surprise, as something gratuitously tacked on, notwithstanding structural appropriateness and even necessity.

The Russians come down in two lines. Rubinstein, Glazounoff, and Rachmaninoff represent one. They may be described as facilitarians; for originality, rather thin. Then the other line—Tchcaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Stravinsky. Two thirds, perhaps, in the first and one third in the second, Shostakovitch classifies.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony refuses to stay on the Orchestra's library shelf, and will surely continue to be brought down as long as there remains a conductor who knows what charm is. Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye" begins to have a period sound. After all, though, it bears the composer's own stamp and is less related to Debussy than it was formerly supposed to be. One thing regularly to be counted on in Ravel, he puts a stop to his entertainment a number of notes before the hearer has had enough.

W. P. T.

GREEN MAGAZINE, Boston, Sunday, January 5, 1941

26

Symphony Concert

By LEO GAFFNEY

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY seems to feel deeply about the Fifth Symphony of the young Sovietist, Shostakovitch, for that contemporary work of musical literature was repeated, after only a few weeks, in the concerts over the weekend—which is extraordinary.

The great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems also to feel deeply over the Boston reviewers, who, after two previous efforts, just don't seem to like the Shostakovitch Fifth—which is unfortunate.

There doesn't seem to be any way out of the impasse for the present, for endurance is the only test of art. The Shostakovitch Fifth may be great new music or it may not be. Evidently, it is an acquired taste, like olives—though as far as this brief column is concerned the analogy could get closer with spinach.

OVER the rest of the program there could hardly be dissent: The perfect Mendelssohn Fourth, or "Italian" Symphony, and Ravel's Five Children's Pieces from "Mother Goose."

The Mendelssohn went with ...tant joy of the happy ... looks upon the sweet ...f Nature and finds it ...d that, excepting for ...liant Saltarello dance ...f the last movement, is ...thing Italian about it. ...vel, too, was sheer fun ...liness, clear and good ...wonder of a child. ...kovitch or no, it was a ...cert.

GLOBE—THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1941

Koussevitzky Hits Coolness to Young Russian's Symphony

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky chided Boston critics yesterday for their frigid reception to the Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich, young Soviet Russian composer, by declaring he would "keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness."

The composition will be played for the second time in 10 weeks at the Boston Symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday. His plan was said to be an unusual departure from custom, for audiences frequently wait as much as two or three years to hear a classic repeated.

The Associated Press quoted the noted conductor as saying the symphony, which commemorates the Soviet October, 1917, Revolution, "is as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky or Sibelius."

"This music of Shostakovich gives a feeling of Russian life in the past 25 years," said Dr. Koussevitzky, who was born in Russia, but is now an American citizen.

"So far, the public is far ahead of the critics in its responsiveness to this music, but this is not the first time such a thing has happened."

Cheap Symphony?

The recent battle between Serge Koussevitzky and some of the critics over the fifth symphony of Dimitri Shostakovitch is not new in the history of music or in the career of the young Soviet composer. The former, as Mr. Koussevitzky was not slow to point out, is full of examples of the hideous gaffes made by critics in the past. The latter has been complicated by the curious ups and downs of an artist in Soviet political favor, to which the whims of fashion are as nothing. Nor should the row over Shostakovitch's opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," be forgotten.

Mr. Koussevitzky's contention is that the fifth symphony is a great work of musical art and that he will continue to play it until it is properly appreciated. He has already done so twice at the regular series, at the Monday-Tuesday series, in New York (where he is going to repeat it this week) and on tour.

The objecting critics' point of view is that the symphony is essentially not a first rate work and is in fact basically rather cheap. They maintain, reasonably, that it is not intellectually difficult or startlingly new music and therefore ought to be readily understood by any musical person right off the bat. Mr. Koussevitzky has discovered in it a brilliant vehicle for his own remarkable interpretative talents and the virtuosity of the Boston Symphony. And there the argument, for the time being, must obviously rest.

JANUARY 2, 1941

Koussevitzky Hails New Work Despite Critics' 'Banal,' 'Thin'

Transcript

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky contends the public is "far ahead of the critics in its responsiveness" to the music of Dimitri Shastakovich, young Russian composer, and adds that "this is not the first time such a thing has happened."

Departing from custom, Koussevitzky will play the Fifth Symphony by Shastakovich for the second time in 10 weeks at Boston Symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday. Sometimes audiences wait as long as two or three years to hear a classic repeated.

"I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness," the conductor remarked in an interview. He continued:

"The critics said Shastakovich's music is banal and contains nothing new, but they've said that before about other new works which were liked by the public, and then, later, they've only had to explain the greatness of those same works."

Boston music reviewers, after hearing the young Russian's symphony played here in October, described it variously as "banal," "vulgar," "thin," sterile," "unoriginal" and "long-winded."

Koussevitzky, a Russian-born American citizen, hailed the work as giving "a feeling of Russian life in the past 25 years" and "as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikowsky or Sibelius."

57

Shostakovitch Again

C.S.M.

Koussevitzky Repeats Fifth Symphony o Soviet Master—"Italian" Symphony Hear

THE Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony does not shrink, it grow with acquaintance. Perhaps, too, its performance has i creased in precision, subtlety and fire since Koussevitzk first played it last October. Or have our own ears simply grown sharper to catch the manifold splendors of this extraordinary score? Most probably all three factors combined to produce ever warmer applause yesterday than last fall when the symphony was new to us. In any event, it was both courageous and intelligent of Koussevitzky to have brought up this musical bone of contention a second time within the season, and in the same subscription series.

The first part of the program consisted of Mendelssohn's ingratiating "Italian" Symphony and the deceptively simple Five Children's Pieces, "Ma Mere l'Oye," by Ravel.

Both were excellently performed though there were several traits in the Mendelssohn with which it is possible to disagree. One of the most baffling things about Koussevitzky is that when he infringes on your idea of how a piece should be done, he usually does so so brilliantly that it is impossible to work up very much indignation about it. To say this is perhaps to condone the prima donna conducting about which we hear so much nowadays. But that does not change the truth of the statement.

For example, the first and last movements of the "Italian" Symphony were too fast. This gave the first movement a nervous angularity, far removed from the spirit of Mendelssohn. But it also induced a sweep and impetuosity which are not foreign to Mendelssohn and which are all too seldom evident in performances of the "Italian" Symphony. Whether there are not other ways of infusing such temperament, is another question.

The Saltarello finale was an amazing tour de force. It is a truism to say that hardly another orchestra could have maintained Koussevitzky's speed without sounding hectic and out of breath, without tarnishing the delicate sheen of its tone, without dulling the edge of its precision, without sabotaging its fine scale of dynamic nuance. The Boston Symphony did none of these things. The lacy patterns spun themselves with captivating, with artisticratic ease. It seemed deliciously right, no matter how much conscience might say: "This is too fast, this is too fast!" The Saltarello danced on winged feet.

Naif?

Ravel's Mother Goose Pieces are as sophisticated and as unsophisticated as "Alice in Wonderland." They follow the ancient gallic tradition of decorative art, there is nothing in them to overwhelm or sweep you off your feet. But they delight everybody. They are craftily put together, their simplicity is the result of infinite pains, and they must be cunningly conducted to produce their full effect.

Koussevitzky's Parisian background and his fine ear for timbre and color fit him peculiarly to kindle the subtle lights of this fragile, transparent score.

A Popular Modern

Not only does the Shostakovitch Fifth wear well in repeated hearings, it is a distinctly popular work. And if there are passages which sound at first obvious to the point of banality, these same passages grow less crass as the listener's mind grasps their relation to the architecture of the whole. On the other hand, those portions of the work which appeared confused and chaotic, clarify themselves with remarkable speed.

The tremendous sweep and vitality of this symphony, its white heat of passion, the virtuoso technique of its composer, the strong melodic gift, these things were apparent at the very first performance. Its deeply organic form was not, or was not to most listeners. The interrelation of Shostakovitch's thematic material is among the most interesting aspects of this music.

The principal theme of the first movement, in the abrupt form which opens the symphony, is reminiscent of the bare uncompromising motive of Beethoven's Great Fuge. The transformations which it undergoes, first into the sustained song of violins, then through the contrapuntal mill, with diminution and augmentation and combinations of both, finally to emerge, with the recapitulation, in warmly poetic dialogue between flute and French horn—all are telling emotionally and formally effective.

The scherzo still appears parodistic. Though whether the use of the Austrian Laendler motive was intended to foreshadow a Russian-German alliance is a question which others more competent may answer. Then, since music can never for long be pure caricature, there are many moments of real beauty even in this gruff scherzo.

The slow movement, which opens with a pensive transformation of the motto of the first movement, still seems the greatest of the four. It requires little explanation or comment. Sheer inspiration is the use of the xylophone to reinforce its ecstatic climax.

Perhaps more than any other movement, the finale recalls Tchaikovsky, but it is none the less original for that. All in all, a masterpiece, which may well conquer itself a strong position in the modern repertory.

E. D.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
DEC 31 1940

Serge Koussevitzky Contmues Quest For Good Music

Conductor First To Program Many Noted Works

When the history of the past quarter century of musical progress is completely assembled, the name of Koussevitzky will loom large in it.

When Debussy was none too firmly established in the musical world at large, it was Koussevitzky who gave an impetus to his name and fame by inviting him to appear in Moscow as guest conductor of Koussevitzky's own orchestra, in an entirely Debussyan program. Koussewitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the third Bushnell orchestral event Tuesday, Jan. 7.

There is no difficulty today in accepting Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" as an enjoyable composition. No wave of protest takes form in mail from radio listeners after its broadcast, which is far from rare. Yet Koussevitzky had to contend with whistling and catcalls when he first had what was termed the "audacity" 'to play it.

No auditors angrily stomp away from concerts nowadays when Stravinsky's "Rite of Spring" is heard. But Koussevitzky had to fight such revolt when he first played that music. Similar facts hold true of Kouseevitzky's pioneering performances of works of Ravel, Prokofieff, Honneger, Roussel, Berg.

Compositions which Koussevitzky had the vision to see as permanent additions to the orchestral repertory have become so. Works which he abandoned after a fair period of trial have failed to gain permanence. He has sought, not the merely new, but the new and good. This season he continues that quest. In the 1940-41 concert year, Kousevitzky will give first performances of music by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Britten, Roy Harris and other significant composers of our own day.

Shostakovitch Again At Symphony Concert

C.S.M.

The Arts in Boston

Dmitri Shostakovitch, composer of the Symphony No. 5 which was performed by way of repeat at the Boston Symphony matinee yesterday, is a musical architect, nobody will deny. The work which Serge Koussevitzky asked his Friday audience to consider again has the build of a symphony, and no apologies or explanations necessary. Certainly it compels attention at the very start, and it holds attention, too, at least half way through. It gives no cause of offense as far as the first movement is concerned, except on that of a kind of pretentiousness and a tendency to bombast. That happens, however, more in the way of oversonority than in the way of inflated ideas, inasmuch as the themes have plenty of appeal as melody and take on masterful handling. Quiet passages occur, too, to relieve the impression of undue noise.

For offset, the brilliant portion of the symphony, the second movement, quite in the scherzo form and style, fairly crackles with Russian humor, first measure to last. But to praise the slow movement which follows would require an advocate with arguments studied out and worded in very particular terms. The Largo lives up technically to its name, possessing breadth, indeed; yet why such unconscionable length? Its conclusion seems like the wind-up of everything. The succeeding final movement causes surprise, as something gratuitously tacked on, notwithstanding structural appropriateness and even necessity.

The Russians come down in two lines. Rubinstein, Glazounoff, and Rachmaninoff represent one. They may be described as facilitarians; for originality, rather thin. Then the other line—Tchcaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and Stravinsky. Two thirds, perhaps, in the first and one third in the second, Shostakovitch classifies.

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony refuses to stay on the Orchestra's library shelf, and will surely continue to be brought down as long as there remains a conductor who knows what charm is. Ravel's "Ma Mère l'Oye" begins to have a period sound. After all, though, it bears the composer's own stamp and is less related to Debussy than it was formerly supposed to be. One thing regularly to be counted on in Ravel, he puts a stop to his entertainment a number of notes before the hearer has had enough.

W. P. T.

GLOBE—THURSDAY, JANUARY 2, 1941

Koussevitzky Hits Coolness to Young Russian's Symphony

Conductor Serge Koussevitzky chided Boston critics yesterday for their frigid reception to the Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich, young Soviet Russian composer, by declaring he would "keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness."

The composition will be played for the second time in 10 weeks at the Boston Symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday. His plan was said to be an unusual departure from custom, for audiences frequently wait as much as two or three years to hear a classic repeated.

The Associated Press quoted the noted conductor as saying the symphony, which commemorates the Soviet October, 1917, Revolution, "is as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky or Sibelius."

"This music of Shostakovich gives a feeling of Russian life in the past 25 years," said Dr. Koussevitzky, who was born in Russia, but is now an American citizen.

"So far, the public is far ahead of the critics in its responsiveness to this music, but this is not the first time such a thing has happened."

Cheap Symphony?

The recent battle between Serge Koussevitzky and some of the critics over the fifth symphony of Dimitri Shostakovitch is not new in the history of music or in the career of the young Soviet composer. The former, as Mr. Koussevitzky was not slow to point out, is full of examples of the hideous gaffes made by critics in the past. The latter has been complicated by the curious ups and downs of an artist in Soviet political favor, to which the whims of fashion are as nothing. Nor should the row over Shostakovitch's opera, "Lady Macbeth of Mzensk," be forgotten.

Mr. Koussevitzky's contention is that the fifth symphony is a great work of musical art and that he will continue to play it until it is properly appreciated. He has already done so twice at the regular series, at the Monday-Tuesday series, in New York (where he is going to repeat it this week) and on tour.

The objecting critics' point of view is that the symphony is essentially not a first rate work and is in cheap. They maintain is not intellectually d new music and therefo understood by any mu the bat. Mr. Koussevit it a brilliant vehicle fo interpretative talents the Boston Symphony. ment, for the time b rest.

D. Hill (L the enterta will be in will head thi other com the "natio the period lude Mrs. I Irs. Richard . Hill Mrs. Nichols, M and Mr. H hose who "

GREEN MAGAZINE, Boston, Sunday, January 5, 1941

26

Symphony Concert

By LEO GAFFNEY

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY seems to feel deeply about the Fifth Symphony of the young Sovietist, Shostakovitch, for that contemporary work of musical literature was repeated, after only a few weeks, in the concerts over the weekend—which is extraordinary.

The great conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seems also to feel deeply over the Boston reviewers, who, after two previous efforts, just don't seem to like the Shostakovitch Fifth—which is unfortunate.

There doesn't seem to be any way out of the impasse for the present, for endurance is the only test of art. The Shostakovitch Fifth may be great new music or it may not be. Evidently, it is an acquired taste, like olives—though as far as this brief column is concerned the analogy could get closer with spinach.

OVER the rest of the program there could hardly be dissent: The perfect Mendelssohn Fourth, or "Italian" Symphony, and Ravel's Five Children's Pieces from "Mother Goose."

The Mendelssohn went with the exultant joy of the happy man who looks upon the sweet surface of Nature and finds it good. And that, excepting for the brilliant Saltarello dance rhythm of the last movement, is the only thing Italian about it.

The Ravel, too, was sheer fun and loveliness, clear and good like the wonder of a child.

Shostakovitch or no, it was a swell concert.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
ALLENTOWN, PA.
CALL
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
EXAMINER
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
ANDERSON, IND.
HERALD
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM MOBILE, ALA.
REGISTER
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
INDIANAPOLIS, IND.
STAR
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
DURHAM, N. C.
HERALD
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
REPUBLICAN
JAN 3 - 1941

This Clipping From
ROANOKE, VA.
TIMES
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
MACON, GA.
TELEGRAPH
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
POUGHKEEPSIE, N.Y.
EAGLE NEWS
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BARRE, VT.
TIMES
JAN 3 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NASHUA, N. H.
TELEGRAPH
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
WILMINGTON, DEL.
NEWS
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
SEATTLE, WASH.
POST INTELLIGENCER
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 2 - 1941

Koussevitzky Will Defy Critics In Repeating Shostakovich Works

Challenges Statements That Fifth Symphony of Young Russian Composer Is "Banal," "Vulgar," "Thin" and "Unoriginal"

Boston, Jan. 1.—(AP)—Conductor Serge Koussevitzky differs with Boston's music critics over the Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich, young Soviet Russian composer, and, he said in an interview today, "I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness."

Accordingly he's going to play it for the second time in 10 weeks at the Boston Symphony concerts this Friday and Saturday—a radical departure from custom, inasmuch as audiences frequently wait as much as two or three years to hear a classic repeated.

"Banal," "vulgar," "thin," "sterile," "unoriginal," and "longwinded" were some of the adjectives the Hub critics used to describe the symphony when it was played here in mid-October.

Only Edward Downes, of the Transcript, liked it, and in doing so, he differed with his father, Olin Downes, critic of the New York Times.

However, Koussevitzky says he is "convinced" that the work—which commemorates the Soviet October revolution—"is as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikowsky or Sibelius."

"This music of Shostakovich gives a feeling of Russian life in the past 25 years," said Koussevitzky, who was born in Russia but now is an American citizen.

"The second movement, instead of being banal, suggests the heartiness of a peasant dance," he explained.

"So far, the public is far ahead of the critics in its responsiveness to this music," he added, "but this is not the first time such a thing has happened.

"The critics said Shostakovich's music is banal and contains nothing new, but they've said that before about other new works which were liked by the public, and then, later, they've only had to explain the greatness of those same works."

The critics didn't have much to say about the scheduled repeat performances.

"It looks as if he's going to cram it down our throats," one remarked.

This Clipping From
COLUMBIA, S. C.
STATE
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM DECATUR, ILL.
REVIEW
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
SAN ANTONIO, TEX.
EXPRESS
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BANGOR, ME.
NEWS
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
DES MOINES, IA.
REGISTER
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
DAYTON, OHIO
JOURNAL
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
UTICA, N.Y.
OBSERVER DISPATCH
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
MONTPELIER, VT.
ARGUS
JAN 3 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM BINGHAMTON, N. Y.
SUN
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SOMERSET, PA.
AMERICAN
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUN
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
WEST PALM BEACH, FLA.
POST
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
ST. PETERSBURG, FLA.
TIMES
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
EASTON, PA.
FREE PRESS
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GREENSBURG, PA.
REVIEW
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
KOKOMO, IND.
TRIBUNE
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM JOHNSTOWN, PA.
DEMOCRAT
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
SAN JOSE, CALIF.
MERCURY-HERALD
JAN 3 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM SACRAMENTO, CALIF.
UNION
JAN 4 1941

This Clipping From
MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.
MORNING TRIBUNE
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEWPORT NEWS, VA.
PRESS
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
CINCINNATI, O.
ENQUIRER
JAN 3 - 1941

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
POST-STANDARD
JAN 2 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TROY, N. Y.
MORNING RECORD
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
MANCHESTER, N. H.
LEADER
JAN 2 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

JAN 2 - 1941

Koussevitzky in Sibelius Sixth

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its Tuesday afternoon subscribers a program of great interest and variety yesterday. Repeated from a recent all-Sibelius program in which the Sixth Symphony was heard with the Fifth and the great stirring Second, this No. Six was found of much more ingratiating richness and beauty of tone than was realized at its performance on the birthday celebration. That quotation from the Finnish composer that in this symphony he was offering the world "pure cold water" did not frighten us yesterday nor did the Symphony appear tentative on second hearing. Indeed, it seemed that Dr. Koussevitzky was taking one of his fabled shifts at interpretation and was giving out a performance carefully devised to win all hearers.

Not that Sibelius was losing in dignity; he was being held up to stature with his more impressive symphonies. With apologies to the composer who disavows any intent of description, the gratified ear did as always find mental suggestions: marching as of an old tale and light sweep of winds as to say: "Here is my country. Is it not fine and valorous?" In his last allegro, Sibelius seems to rouse from old poetic memories and slips into classical form. The orchestra was at its responsive best.

With brilliance and fire of the string body and the fine trumpet of Mr. Mager off stage, Beethoven's Leonora No. 3 overture contributed its romance and dramatic sweep. After these numbers Rimsky-Korsakoff's Oriental graces of the Scheherazade Suite were found a bit relaxing. The work, however, is one suited to this commuters' audience, gathered from far and wide throughout New England for a monthly taste at the superb perfections of the Boston Symphony. These occasional visitors have opportunity to hear in the suggestion of tales with which a noble and learned lady entertained her lord and saved her self and future wives from death recurring examples of individual orchestral proficiency. Mr. Burgin, Mr. Bedetti and several of their colleagues had solo prominence.

After the ship is dashed to pieces on the rock (or a community is wiped out in a bomb raid) by virtue of the familiar impactive rhythms, comes the most felicitous writing of the score. The sea smiles again; dimples, coaxes into security; heaves into peace. A contrast of effects.

The next paired Monday-Tuesday concerts of the symphony will be on January 27-28—no program yet announced. A.C.R.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
SUNDAY ITEM TRIBUNE

JAN 5 - 1941

This Clipping From
BUFFALO, N.Y.
COURIER-EXPRESS

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
OAKLAND, CAL.
TRIBUNE

JAN 4 1941

This Clipping From
SYRACUSE, N.Y.
POST-STANDARD

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
ST. PAUL, MINN.
PIONEER-PRESS

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS

JAN 4 - 1941
THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE

JAN 4 - 1941
THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

JAN 4 - 1941

CRITICS REPEAT ATTACKS UPON RUSSIAN'S MUSIC

Boston, Jan. 4.—(AP)—It appeared today that Serge Koussevitzky would have to conduct Dimitri Shostakovitch's "Fifth Symphony" at least a third time to keep his vow of "repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness."

He made the promise after Boston critics, hearing the composition 10 weeks ago, described it as everything from "banal" to "long-winded."

Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through it again last night, but the critics, while praising his conducting, still failed to report any greatness in the "Fifth Symphony."

Cyrus W. Durgin of the Globe said the orchestra's "very magnificence again set one to speculation whether most of the brilliance did not come from the players rather than from the notes."

To which Alexander Williams of the Herald added:

"It is our opinion that Shostakovitch has a vein of cheapness in his artistic imagination which makes his work often pretentious."

Warren Storey Smith said in the Post:

"In spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's protestations that the Soviet composer's work is as great as the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius (a staggeringly large order), the impression persists that the conductor is making more out of the piece than there is in it."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 4 - 1941

Shostakovitch Critics Still Like Koussevitsky

But Conductor Fails to Win Them to Russian's Work

BOSTON, Jan. 3 (AP).—Serge Koussevitzky's conducting of Dimitri Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony won praise from Boston music critics today, but they still dislike the composition.

Koussevitzky led the Boston Symphony Orchestra through the Russian's work for the second time in ten weeks with the assertion that he would "keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness." They had described it previously as "banal," "vulgar," "thin," "sterile" and "long-winded."

Although admitting that "at no time did it come as near to seducing us," Alexander Williams, in "The Herald," asserted: "It is our opinion that Shostakovitch has a vein of cheapness in his artistic imagination which makes his work often pretentious.

Cyrus W. Durgin, of "The Globe," also bowed to the conductor's rendition but said "this very magnificence again sets one to speculating whether most of the brilliance did not come from players and conductors rather than from the notes."

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
MORNING UNION

JAN 4 - 1941

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL

JAN 4 - 1941
THIS CLIPPING FROM LEWISTON, ME.
SUN

JAN 4 - 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM LINCOLN, NEB.
STAR

JAN 3 1941

"Like It, Or Else—"

STAID old Boston is being shaken by a musical battle. Conductor Serge Koussevitzky of the Boston Symphony orchestra is tilting his lance at the music critics. The whole fuss is over the Fifth Symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich, a young Russian composer.

Koussevitzky — who for obvious reasons will hereafter be called Mr. K—says the Fifth Symphony is great music. The critics say it is bad music.

Of course critics are resourceful fellows. They never actually say a thing is "bad." That makes their prose too clear. Instead they say the music of Mr. Shostakovich—hereafter known as Mr. S.—is "banal," "vulgar," "thin," and "sterile." As long as the public has to suffer through these quarrels it would help if the critics would throw away their dictionaries.

At any rate, Mr. K. is going to get an artist's revenge. He played the music of Mr. S. first in mid-October. Now he's going to play it again. "I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness," Mr. K. threatens.

Since both critics and artists have a considerable reputation for stubbornness it looks like Boston music-lovers are in for a long cold winter. Both the critics and the conductor, however, are likely to become painfully acquainted with a fundamental fact if they persist in their quarrel. The American public, if it does not like a thing, has a curious habit of staying away in majestic numbers.

This Clipping From
HOUSTON, TEXAS
POST

JAN 5 - 1941

Koussevitzky a Trifle Rash in Campaign to Sink Boston Critics

Distinguished Doctor Crawls Out on Long Limb in Effort to Make Reviewers Dance to His Music

By HUBERT ROUSSEL

CONDUCTOR SERGEI KOUSSEVITZKY of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been feeling his temperament lately. The other week he astonished his audience at a special concert by sitting down on the podium instead of leaving the stage when the final number was over, and now he has got himself into a public fight with the critics. Dr. Koussevitzky is hot under his dignified collar because the press gentlemen blasted a Russian work, the fifth symphony of Dimitri Shostakovich, which he recently played. The conductor was so incensed that he broke a precedent by putting the composition on the program again within 10 weeks, and slamming it right back at its hecklers.

ROUSSEL

"I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness," he announced in explaining his gesture. That sounded a little autocratic, of course, and the doctor apparently realized it. So he took an old dodge and justified his procedure by saying that "the public is far ahead of the critics in its responsiveness to this music"—meaning, I suppose, that it got a good hand at the premiere. He pointed out that the critics have often been woefully wrong in their first impressions of works that proved great, and inferred that he was giving the boys a fair chance to avoid a similar error in this case.

✦ ✦ ✦

After All, Nobody Is Perfect

NOW the Boston conducter is entirely right about the fallibility of the music reviewers, of course. They are no more gifted with prescient powers than other mortals. They are men who prepare themselves as best they can with a knowledge of music, and who try to judge fairly with the aid of this technical background and their own natural responses at concerts.

But they can certainly be woefully wrong. There are classic examples of such failure. Edouard Hanslick, the Viennese critic, who doubtless gave many a true and correct judgment in his busy career, is famous now only because he rendered himself comic by damning the music of Wagner. And Charles Gounod, when he heard the premiere of the great Cesar Franck D Minor Symphony, pronounced it "the affirmation of incompetence carried to dogma."

But the danger of Koussevitzky's position is that it offers an imperious sweeping aside of the possibility that this weakness is not peculiar to professional critics. In other words, he includes himself out of the natural scheme of existence. He says flatly that while the critics have made and continue to make regrettable errors, a great conductor is bound to be right in his original judgment. Maybe not any conductor but Koussevitzky at least.

✦ ✦ ✦

Overlooking a Few Small Errors

THE answer to that is pretty obvious. If conductors were infallible in their estimation of new music, there would be little for reviewers to do. Their only job would be to write an opinion of the quality of the playing itself, for the beauty, interest and importance of every number presented would be perfectly clear. There is a lot of bad music now kicking around in the world. Koussevitzky will doubtless admit that. And every piece of it is there for the very evident reason that some conductor at some time thought the work was good enough to perform.

When the Boston maestro pits the audience against the critics he is even more open to question. That is loose reasoning indeed, and a conductor of Koussevitzky's long service in American concert halls should know it better than anybody else.

The truth is, of course, that the musical public in this country will applaud practically anything. It is a habit and no warmth of appreciation is necessarily indicated. Indeed, the less an audience understands a selection and the more it is baffled and confused, the more loudly it is likely to clap. This is done because nobody wants his neighbor to think that he didn't get it. You can notice this habit in Houston, and although Boston is much more seasoned in the matter of symphony music, it would be a grave error to assume that its public consists only of connoisseurs and superior intellects.

I know nothing about the nature of the fifth symphony of Shostakovich, but the unanimity with which five of six critics in Boston proclaimed it a washout is some grounds for suspecting that it may be less than a monumental affair. If Koussevitzky is merely out to avenge what he considers an affront to his judgment, and is making his audience the goat, he may find himself caught in the end.

For sooner or later his public will decide that it is weary of being smarter than anybody else (at the expense of suffering through deadly dull concerts) and would like to hear something that sounds like music again. The kind of applause I have mentioned above will stop finally, and Koussevitzky will be left in a very droll and uncomfortable spot.

It is true that the critics have delayed the arrival of some musical masterpieces by failing to recognize them at once. But for every time that has occurred, they have probably killed off several hundred banalities before they could bore large numbers of patient and defenseless people.

Koussevitzky Touch Mellows Shostakovitch B. C.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 11th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mendelssohn.....Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90
Ravel......"Ma mere l'oye"
Shostakovitch.....Symphony No. 5 Op. 47

Mr. Koussevitzky is pushing the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony for all he is worth, and it must be said that no composer could have a more ardent and able champion. He has quite frankly gone overboard for this particular work and he is determined that all of us shall share his enthusiasm. As one of the more vociferous objectors then, this reviewer is not going to have easy sledding.

We have now heard the Shostakovitch 5th three times this season—four, if you count a rehearsal. At no time did it come as near to seducing us as in yesterday's surpassingly fine performance. The first movement is the best, and the conclusion of it after the climax is beautiful music. The scherzo would certainly pass muster, were one not so constantly reminded of Prokofieff and the probability that he would have written a much better and more amusing scherzo.

The slow movement escapes or, rather, bores us. It merely seems as if Shostakovitch knew that he had to have a slow movement in a full-length symphony and consequently sat him down and wrote an especially long and dull one. Obviously if it is as great music as Mr. Koussevitzky believes, this opinion denotes a critical blind spot. And that is all there is to it.

Mr. Koussevitzky managed to work a miracle with the finale yesterday. It can sound terribly cheap; and somehow, great conductor that he is, he avoided this pitfall. It is actually a piece of bombast which we don't happen to admire. But there is no gainsaying that it has popular appeal. It smashed and bashed its way to an ovation yesterday.

What it all boils down to is this: It is our opinion that Shostakovitch has a vein of cheapness in his artistic imagination which makes his work often pretentious. As a modern composer we do not think for a moment that he is worthy to rank with a Prokofieff or a Hindemith. There are others who think otherwise, and so you have a nice aesthetic battle.

The trouble is that Mr. Koussevitzky has the upper hand over those of us who want to go to a concert but do not want to find the Shostakovitch Symphony on the program. He has already taken advantage of that upper hand and dealt us impressive blows with it. Like Finland, to which we may unworthily compare ourselves, there is a limit to our resistance. Already we are sorry to have spoken so harshly in October. Who knows but that in April we shall be hailing the symphony as a masterpiece if only to beg a truce from Mr. Koussevitzky's legions?

Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony is his best—no one will dispute that. It is fresh, gracious music and is the essence of charm, regardless as to whether it is truly "Italian" or not. Actually, it is a lovely piece of German romanticism and brings Mendelssohn closer to Schumann than he was in his oratorios. The Boston Symphony's performance is a sheer delight, and in this connection it may be recalled that they have recorded it.

Ravel's "Ma mere l'oye" shows the composer feeling out the most refined orchestral sonorities and novel and spicy harmonic effects. It should be listened to with the closest attention, for only then can one be sure of hearing the subtleties which so entranced the composer. Again the performance was most sensitive.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 5 - 1941

Last week Serge Koussevitzky played Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony in Boston for the second time in ten weeks. Next Thursday he is going to repeat it in Carnegie Hall, even though he played it here on Nov. 23, making this city's interval even shorter than Boston's. In an interview last week in his orchestra's home city he said he was convinced the work was "as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky or Sibelius."

"I will keep repeating the music until the critics realize its greatness," he said.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the "Mother Goose" Suite of Ravel, and the Fifth Symphony by the Soviet Russian contemporary, Dmitri Shostakovitch, were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted superlative readings of all.

Just such performances as those will be in the mind of oldsters when, 30 years from now, they pontificate to somewhat unbelieving youth: "You ought to have heard the Boston Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky was conductor."

The "Italian" Symphony was last heard in these series six years ago, "Mother Goose" in 1938. Each is a masterpiece of its kind, and each was due for another hearing. We have had equally deft performances of Mendelssohn's best Symphony from Mr. Koussevitzky before, but yesterday it seemed more elegant than usual. The fast movements rippled swiftly along in true Mendelssohn tempi. As for "Mother Goose," its delectable fantasy was perfectly detailed.

Mr. Koussevitzky was well advised to let us all hear the Shostakovitch Fifth again. Even though a score may repeatedly seem unrewarding or prevailingly empty, as has this Symphony to the present writer, debatable music ought to be performed frequently. Only out of repetition and familiarity can any listener evolve a settled conviction. Indeed, it would be interesting, in view of Shostakovitch's acknowledged technical prowess, if Mr. Koussevitzky were to play that composer's Sixth Symphony, unknown on this side of the Atlantic until Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave it first American performances in November.

Yesterday the Fifth was re-created in a blaze of orchestral magnificence. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading spared no effort, no intensity to impress the audience as he has evidently been impressed by the score. The orchestra, hard driven in the fast movements, was extraordinarily precise, clear and produced its gorgeous tone. Thus the Fifth Symphony was surely heard under the best possible auspices.

This very magnificence again set one to speculating whether most of the brilliance did not come from players and conductor rather than from the notes. How would the Fifth sound in perfunctory interpretation? That, to be sure, is a test of essential substance of any music. Beethoven's "Eroica," for example, is still a glorious masterpiece at the hands of an inferior orchestra. But in similar circumstances, how would Shostakovitch fare?

Listening intently, with utmost sympathy, one again observed the excellence of orchestration, the clear texture, the striking effects of massed brass and temolo strings, march episodes of exterior brilliance—all attributable to intellectual calculation. But one was not emotionally moved, not once through all the 45 minutes of the Symphony. The melting beauty of the slow movement was a matter of sound and a fine orchestra, of devices used by composers before Shostakovitch—not of inspired ideas.

Of the four movements, the scherzo-like allegretto is the most viable, and here Shostakovitch wrote pages of real substance and vitality. Whether he intended to depict Russian peasants or merely to create a pattern of sounds, he succeeded. In comparison how empty and repetitive are the first movement and finale, despite their brave outward show of vitality. And how eclectric is the Shostakovitch harmony, ranging from strong dissonance to conservatism.

Relation to the Symphony of Soviet ideology or of a descriptive program about Russian life is of secondary importance. No actual program has been furnished for the Symphony. What counts is what is in the notes and whether the music as a whole is emotionally deep. Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony" is a masterpiece with or without program. So are all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies and "Don Quixote" and the "Leonore" Overture No. 3. With the best will and with full realization of enjoyable pages one cannot find greatness in the Shostakovitch Fifth.

The Friday audience received the Symphony cordially, but it cannot be said there was an ovation. A different story may be told by the proverbially more demonstrative Saturday audience when the program is repeated tonight.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York. Igor Stravinsky will be guest conductor at the next Boston concerts, Jan. 17 and 18, in the following program: Stravinsky: "The Fairy's Kiss," Symphony in C major (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky: Second Symphony, in C minor ("Little Russia").—C. W. D.

GREAT PLAYING BY SYMPHONY

Shostakovitch's Fifth Given Electric Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, or rather the combination of that orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, grows more amazing every day. It seemed as though the climax of orchestral performance, per se, was reached two concerts ago with Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony. But yesterday what was done with the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch was even more astounding, if only because there was less to work with.

In spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's protestations that the Soviet composer's work is as great as the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius (a staggeringly large order), the impression persists that the conductor is making more out of the piece than there is in it. It is possible to imagine a performance of Czerny's "School of Velocity" by Rudolf Serkin that would be quite enchanting as sheer aural sensation.

As was said above, there is the element of performance, qua performance. It will make great music sound better—if it is not carried to the point where the listener is more conscious of the playing than of the music itself, a perfectly possible state of affairs. And it can lend a factitious interest to rather trite and empty musical material.

To get back to Shostakovitch, whose Symphony was heard yesterday for the second time on a Friday afternoon, and for a fifth time all told, in the course of the present season, the more one hears it the more one can free oneself from the politico-aesthetic issues involved. Here is a Russian composer of radical music who turns sharply in his course and, making an obvious bid for popular and official favor, writes, for the 20th anniversary of the October Revolution, a symphony that is fundamentally simple, melodically and harmonically. And eclectic, to boot. There are non-Russian influences here. Mahler is recalled in the Scherzo and also elsewhere. We hear Tchaikovsky in the Finale, and Strauss' favorite motive, the "How dry I am" sequence, is blared forth at the end.

At first the Symphony's occasional vulgarities seemed no more than a truckling to the popular taste. But may they not be programmatic, like the deliberate vulgarities one comes upon in Mahler that proved a stumbling block to that composer's early critics? One can easily imagine here marching hordes, the lifted voice of the Proletariat and all the rest of it. Perhaps Shostakovitch was also like Mahler in writing to a programme and then disclaiming it. Incidentally, there is much of real beauty in the first and third movements, and charm as well as an obviously intended tawdriness, in the Scherzo.

There were also wonders of performance yesterday in the first part of the programme, which offered Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite. Both works were played, it is possible to believe, as they had never been played before. Beauty of tone could go no further than it did in Ravel's closing movement, "Le Jardin Feerique." Such emphasis on tone may be a symptom of decadence on the part of both composer and interpreter. And if so, what of it? We have senses, why not employ them?

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 6 - 1941

Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony To Be Featured

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch is the principal work on the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow evening.

This event, the third of the Bushnell Symphony Series, is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, also has programmed Hindemith's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in which Ruth Posselt, young violinist who appeared here last season with the Hartford Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist. Miss Posselt was acclaimed at that time for her performance of the Mozart Sinfonia Concertante in E flat in which Conductor Leon Barzin was viola soloist.

Also on the program for Tuesday evening is Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 210.)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 5 - 1941

Koussevitzky Leads Boston This Tuesday

Interesting Program Is Announced For Concert At Bushnell Memorial

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch is the feature of the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening of this week. In addition to this modern classic by the brilliant young Russian, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians will present the Mozart Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) and Hindemith's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

The following interesting appreciation of Shostakovitch and his "Fifth Symphony" was written by Leopold Stokowski, the distinguished orchestra conductor who is well known to Hartford audiences:—

"Shostakovitch is an extreme individualist as a musician. He follows no tradition, but is guided by his own inner feeling and musical instincts. Although he is an individualist, he is an artistic descendent of a line of richly endowed musicians who have expressed the spirit of Slavic culture during the last hundred years. The initial pathfinder of these musical pioneers was Glinka, followed by Musorgsky, Borodin, Balakirew, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and later by Stravinsky. Shostakovitch is a direct descendent of all these Russian musical poets, who revolted from the traditions and musical forms of Western Europe, and created new forms of musical expression that are typically Slavic.

"His Fifth Symphony has an immense range of feeling. At one extreme is a kind of ironic humor, boisterous, slightly mocking, sometimes violent, but always friendly and smiling. At the other extreme he reaches high levels of serene beauty and sublime remoteness which take us far from this life that surrounds us. But his music is always warm and human, and filled with intense feeling.

Vigorous Theme.

"The first part of his Fifth Symphony begins with a theme of great vigor, which is the chief motive of the opening movement. The second theme has long lines with a soft tender expression and a swaying rhythm in the background of the accompanying instruments. Later the music becomes more and more agitated with strong, insistent cross-rhythms which build upward to a powerful restatement of the first and second themes combined in masterly counterpoint. At the end the music becomes dreamy again, and the mood as the music fades out is a wonderful example of tenderness and melancholy. In the deep sounding instruments is a soft fatalistic rhythm. Above this are four remarkable solos, first for flute, piccolo, solo violin, and finally celesta.

"The second part is like a Scherzo, with gay, fantastic humor. The rhythm is at times asymetric, in other places turbulent and violent. In the middle the mood is of delicate charm and humor.

C.S.M. 1-2-41

Igor Stravinsky, as guest conductor, will present his new symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Cambridge and Boston, Jan. 16, 17, and 18. These concerts will follow the orchestra's second visit of the season to New York. This Symphony in C major had its first performance in Chicago on Nov. 7. Mr. Stravinsky's program will include also his Divertimento drawn from the ballet, "Le Baiser de la fée," and the seldom-played Second Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

Koussevitzky Touch Mellows Shostakovitch Symphony

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 11th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mendelssohn.....Symphony in A major, "Italian," Op. 90
Ravel......"Ma mere l'oye"
Shostakovitch.....Symphony No. 5 Op. 47

Mr. Koussevitzky is pushing the Shostakovitch 5th Symphony for all he is worth, and it must be said that no composer could have a more ardent and able champion. He has quite frankly gone overboard for this particular work and he is determined that all of us shall share his enthusiasm. As one of the more vociferous objectors then, this reviewer is not going to have easy sledding.

We have now heard the Shostakovitch 5th three times this season—four, if you count a rehearsal. At no time did it come as near to seducing us as in yesterday's surpassingly fine performance. The first movement is the best, and the conclusion of it after the climax is beautiful music. The scherzo would certainly pass muster, were one not so constantly reminded of Prokofieff and the probability that he would have written a much better and more amusing scherzo.

The slow movement escapes or, rather, bores us. It merely seems as if Shostakovitch knew that he had to have a slow movement in a full-length symphony and consequently sat him down and wrote an especially long and dull one. Obviously if it is as great music as Mr. Koussevitzky believes, this opinion denotes a critical blind spot. And that is all there is to it.

Mr. Koussevitzky managed to work a miracle with the finale yesterday. It can sound terribly cheap; and somehow, great conductor that he is, he avoided this pitfall. It is actually a piece of bombast which we don't happen to admire. But there is no gainsaying that it has popular appeal. It smashed and bashed its way to an ovation yesterday.

What it all boils down to is this: It is our opinion that Shostakovitch has a vein of cheapness in his artistic imagination which makes his work often pretentious. As a modern composer we do not think for a moment that he is worthy to rank with a Prokofieff or a Hindemith. There are others who think otherwise, and so you have a nice aesthetic battle.

The trouble is that Mr. Koussevitzky has the upper hand over those of us who want to go to a concert but do not want to find the Shostakovitch Symphony on the program. He has already taken advantage of that upper hand and dealt us impressive blows with it. Like Finland, to which we may unworthily compare ourselves, there is a limit to our resistance. Already we are sorry to have spoken so harshly in October. Who knows but that in April we shall be hailing the symphony as a masterpiece if only to beg a truce from Mr. Koussevitzky's legions?

Mendelssohn's Italian Symphony is his best—no one will dispute that. It is fresh, gracious music and is the essence of charm, regardless as to whether it is truly "Italian" or not. Actually, it is a lovely piece of German romanticism and brings Mendelssohn closer to Schumann than he was in his oratorios. The Boston Symphony's performance is a sheer delight, and in this connection it may be recalled that they have recorded it.

Ravel's "Ma mere l'oye" shows the composer feeling out the most refined orchestral sonorities and novel and spicy harmonic effects. It should be listened to with the closest attention, for only then can one be sure of hearing the subtleties which so entranced the composer. Again the performance was most sensitive.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 5 - 1941

Last week Serge Koussevitzky played Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony in Boston for the second time in ten weeks. Next Thursday he is going to repeat it in Carnegie Hall, even though he played it here on Nov. 23, making this city's interval even shorter than Boston's. In an interview last week in his orchestra's home city he said he was convinced the work was "as great as any of the great symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky or Sibelius."

"I will keep repeating the music until the critics realise its greatness," he said.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, the "Mother Goose" Suite of Ravel, and the Fifth Symphony by the Soviet Russian contemporary, Dmitri Shostakovitch, were played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. Serge Koussevitzky conducted superlative readings of all.

Just such performances as those will be in the mind of oldsters when, 30 years from now, they pontificate to somewhat unbelieving youth: "You ought to have heard the Boston Symphony when Serge Koussevitzky was conductor."

The "Italian" Symphony was last heard in these series six years ago, "Mother Goose" in 1938. Each is a masterpiece of its kind, and each was due for another hearing. We have had equally deft performances of Mendelssohn's best Symphony from Mr. Koussevitzky before, but yesterday it seemed more elegant than usual. The fast movements rippled swiftly along in true Mendelssohn tempi. As for "Mother Goose," its delectable fantasy was perfectly detailed.

Mr. Koussevitzky was well advised to let us all hear the Shostakovitch Fifth again. Even though a score may repeatedly seem unrewarding or prevailingly empty, as has this Symphony to the present writer, debatable music ought to be performed frequently. Only out of repetition and familiarity can any listener evolve a settled conviction. Indeed, it would be interesting, in view of Shostakovitch's acknowledged technical prowess, if Mr. Koussevitzky were to play that composer's Sixth Symphony, unknown on this side of the Atlantic until Mr. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave it first American performances in November.

Yesterday the Fifth was re-created in a blaze of orchestral magnificence. Mr. Koussevitzky's reading spared no effort, no intensity to impress the audience as he has evidently been impressed by the score. The orchestra, hard driven in the fast movements, was extraordinarily precise, clear and produced its gorgeous tone. Thus the Fifth Symphony was surely heard under the best possible auspices.

This very magnificence again set one to speculating whether most of the brilliance did not come from players and conductor rather than from the notes. How would the Fifth sound in perfunctory interpretation? That, to be sure, is a test of essential substance of any music. Beethoven's "Eroica," for example, is still a glorious masterpiece at the hands of an inferior orchestra. But in similar circumstances, how would Shostakovitch fare?

Listening intently, with utmost sympathy, one again observed the excellence of orchestration, the clear texture, the striking effects of massed brass and temolo strings, march episodes of exterior brilliance—all attributable to intellectual calculation. But one was not emotionally moved, not once through all the 45 minutes of the Symphony. The melting beauty of the slow movement was a matter of sound and a fine orchestra, of devices used by composers before Shostakovitch—not of inspired ideas.

Of the four movements, the scherzo-like allegretto is the most viable, and here Shostakovitch wrote pages of real substance and vitality. Whether he intended to depict Russian peasants or merely to create a pattern of sounds, he succeeded. In comparison how empty and repetitive are the first movement and finale, despite their brave outward show of vitality. And how eclectric is the Shostakovitch harmony, ranging from strong dissonance to conservatism.

Relation to the Symphony of Soviet ideology or of a descriptive program about Russian life is of secondary importance. No actual program has been furnished for the Symphony. What counts is what is in the notes and whether the music as a whole is emotionally deep. Vaughan Williams' "A London Symphony" is a masterpiece with or without program. So are all the Beethoven and Brahms symphonies and "Don Quixote" and the "Leonore" Overture No. 3. With the best will and with full realization of enjoyable pages one cannot find greatness in the Shostakovitch Fifth.

The Friday audience received the Symphony cordially, but it cannot be said there was an ovation. A different story may be told by the proverbially more demonstrative Saturday audience when the program is repeated tonight.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York. Igor Stravinsky will be guest conductor at the next Boston concerts, Jan. 17 and 18, in the following program: Stravinsky: "The Fairy's Kiss," Symphony in C major (first time in Boston); Tchaikovsky: Second Symphony, in C minor ("Little Russia").—C. W. D.

GREAT PLAYING BY SYMPHONY

Shostakovitch's Fifth Given Electric Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, or rather the combination of that orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky, grows more amazing every day. It seemed as though the climax of orchestral performance, per se, was reached two concerts ago with Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony. But yesterday what was done with the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch was even more astounding, if only because there was less to work with.

In spite of Dr. Koussevitzky's protestations that the Soviet composer's work is as great as the symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tchaikovsky and Sibelius (a staggeringly large order), the impression persists that the conductor is making more out of the piece than there is in it. It is possible to imagine a performance of Czerny's "School of Velocity" by Rudolf Serkin that would be quite enchanting as sheer aural sensation.

As was said above, there is the element of performance, qua performance. It will make great music sound better—if it is not carried to the point where the listener is more conscious of the playing than of the music itself, a perfectly possible state of affairs. And it can lend a factitious interest to rather trite and empty musical material.

To get back to Shostakovitch, whose Symphony was heard yesterday for the second time on a Friday afternoon, and for a fifth time all told, in the course of the present season, the more one hears it the more one can free oneself from the politico-aesthetic issues involved. Here is a Russian composer of radical music who turns sharply in his course and, making an obvious bid for popular and official favor, writes, for the 20th anniversary of the October Revolution, a symphony that is fundamentally simple, melodically and harmonically. And eclectic, to boot. There are non-Russian influences here. Mahler is recalled in the Scherzo and also elsewhere. We hear Tchaikovsky in the Finale, and Strauss' favorite motive, the "How dry I am" sequence, is blared forth at the end.

At first the Symphony's occasional vulgarities seemed no more than a truckling to the popular taste. But may they not be programmatic, like the deliberate vulgarities one comes upon in Mahler that proved a stumbling block to that composer's early critics? One can easily imagine here marching hordes, the lifted voice of the Proletariat and all the rest of it. Perhaps Shostakovitch was also like Mahler in writing to a programme and then disclaiming it. Incidentally, there is much of real beauty in the first and third movements, and charm as well as an obviously intended tawdriness, in the Scherzo.

There were also wonders of performance yesterday in the first part of the programme, which offered Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony and Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite. Both works were played, it is possible to believe, as they had never been played before. Beauty of tone could go no further than it did in Ravel's closing movement, "Le Jardin Feerique." Such emphasis on tone may be a symptom of decadence on the part of both composer and interpreter. And if so, what of it? We have senses, why not employ them?

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 6 - 1941

Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony To Be Featured

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch is the principal work on the program to be presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tomorrow evening.

This event, the third of the Bushnell Symphony Series, is scheduled to begin at 8:15.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, also has programmed Hindemith's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra in which Ruth Posselt, young violinist who appeared here last season with the Hartford Symphony Orchestra, will be the soloist. Miss Posselt was acclaimed at that time for her performance of the Mozart Sinfonia Concertante in E flat in which Conductor Leon Barzin was viola soloist.

Also on the program for Tuesday evening is Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 210.)

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 5 - 1941

61

Koussevitzky Leads Boston This Tuesday

Interesting Program Is Announced For Concert At Bushnell Memorial

The Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch is the feature of the program which the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform at the Bushnell Memorial on Tuesday evening of this week. In addition to this modern classic by the brilliant young Russian, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and his musicians will present the Mozart Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) and Hindemith's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," with Ruth Posselt as soloist.

The following interesting appreciation of Shostakovitch and his "Fifth Symphony" was written by Leopold Stokowski, the distinguished orchestra conductor who is well known to Hartford audiences:—

"Shostakovitch is an extreme individualist as a musician. He follows no tradition, but is guided by his own inner feeling and musical instincts. Although he is an individualist, he is an artistic descendent of a line of richly endowed musicians who have expressed the spirit of Slavic culture during the last hundred years. The initial pathfinder of these musical pioneers was Glinka, followed by Musorgsky, Borodin, Balakirew, Cui, Rimsky-Korsakoff, and later by Stravinsky. Shostakovitch is a direct descendent of all these Russian musical poets, who revolted from the traditions and musical forms of Western Europe, and created new forms of musical expression that are typically Slavic.

"His Fifth Symphony has an immense range of feeling. At one extreme is a kind of ironic humor, boisterous, slightly mocking, sometimes violent, but always friendly and smiling. At the other extreme he reaches high levels of serene beauty and sublime remoteness which take us far from this life that surrounds us. But his music is always warm and human, and filled with intense feeling.

Vigorous Theme.

"The first part of his Fifth Symphony begins with a theme of great vigor, which is the chief motive of the opening movement. The second theme has long lines with a soft tender expression and a swaying rhythm in the background of the accompanying instruments. Later the music becomes more and more agitated with strong, insistent cross-rhythms which build upward to a powerful restatement of the first and second themes combined in masterly counterpoint. At the end the music becomes dreamy again, and the mood as the music fades out is a wonderful example of tenderness and melancholy. In the deep sounding instruments is a soft fatalistic rhythm. Above this are four remarkable solos, first for flute, piccolo, solo violin, and finally celesta.

"The second part is like a Scherzo, with gay, fantastic humor. The rhythm is at times asymetric, in other places turbulent and violent. In the middle the mood is of delicate charm and humor.

C.S.M. 1-2-41

Igor Stravinsky, as guest conductor, will present his new symphony at the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts in Cambridge and Boston, Jan. 16, 17, and 18. These concerts will follow the orchestra's second visit of the season to New York. This Symphony in C major had its first performance in Chicago on Nov. 7. Mr. Stravinsky's program will include also his Divertimento drawn from the ballet, "Le Baiser de la fée," and the seldom-played Second Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 7 - 1941

Koussevitzky Here Tonight At Memorial

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brilliant Program of Bushnell Series

One of the most interesting symphony programs yet arranged for Hartford, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Bushnell Memorial tonight, starting at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the third event of the current Bushnell Symphony Series.

The program announced for tonight's concert includes Mozart's "Symphony in A major," (Koechel No. 201); Hindemith's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and, as the feature of the evening, the now celebrated "Fifth Symphony" of Shostakovitch.

Regarding the last-named work, Noel Strauss wrote recently in the New York Times:—

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, capped its resplendent performances yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a most searching unfoldment of the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the work by his youthful compatriot was so deeply sympathetic, intense and vital, that it laid bare the complete message of a composition which henceforth must be recognized as one of the outstanding orchestral creations of the present time.

"Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony received its fourth presentation in the city at this concert. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed this masterpiece with such compelling virtuosity and impressiveness that it scored a big ovation for them, leaving no doubt that the symphony had finally succeeded in making its real virtues apparent."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1941

Koussevitzky Calls Music Necessity

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less, a necessity."

That is the conviction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who leads his Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight.

The program, scheduled to start at 8:15, includes Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201); Hindemith's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

Paul Hindemith, one of most distinguished of mod composers, will be in the audie this evening to hear the perfor ance.

Commenting further upon need for good music, Dr. Kou vitzky said, "Great music mal life complete. It combines w something else. Do you know am convinced that what makes life full is the experience tragedy in some form, and ris to its challenge. The great co posers all have had their tri by tragedy. Their greatest mu is the utterance which the e perience has drawn from th souls. And very often the mu itself is not tragic. It may quite the opposite, because t composer has had the greatn of soul not to expose his priva concerns to the world.

"In great music there is t bond of the most profound sy pathy between genius and t rest of humanity. The genius e presses what is in the souls the rest, better than they can. W musicians draw out what t great composers have attempt to express within the limitatio of musical notes printed on p per. We sense, and we continual develop, what we sense the Through the intermediary of t conductor, if you please, t composer, the musicians and t listeners are brought together communion with life."

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 8 - 1941

Has Conducted Noted Orchestra For 25 Years

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Serge Koussevitsky, who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in the Frank Loomis Palmer auditorium at Connecticut college tonight, has conducted the famous orchestra for more than a quarter of a century.

Under his direction the famed precision, ensemble, and tonal beauty of the great orchestra excel, in this its 60th season, even the most glorious days of its illustrious past. His extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation have brought to new heights of perfection this body of musicians for many years reputed to be the finest organization of its kind in the world.

Koussevitzky's vision and energy have done much to make available the masterpieces of the modern composers. In the world of music it is felt that when the history of the past quarter of a century of musical progress is completely assembled, assayed, and recorded, the name of Koussevitzky will loom large in it. Debussy, Ravel, Prokofieff, Honneger, Roussel, and Berg are among the composers whose fame was given invaluable impetus by the Russian conductor's pioneering performances.

The career of Serge Koussevitzky is an impressive one. Born in an obscure Russian province with no musical life about him, through his own efforts he became while very young a virtuoso of the double-bass, known throughout Europe. After the revolution, fleeing restriction, he established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky" with his own orchestra in Paris. He lived in Germany and France, and visited England, identifying himself closely with the musical cultures of each country, and others as well. In the years to follow, America's composers and America's musical point of view became equally familiar to him.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 5 - 1941

conduct the Philadelphia Orchestra Tuesday night
Lower left: Hortense Monath, pianist, soloist today right: Ruth Posselt, violinist, soloist with the Boston
Thursday night

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 7 - 1941

Boston Symphony to Give Third of College Concerts; Koussevitzky to Lead

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock, in the Frank Loomis Palmer auditorium at Connecticut college, as the third concert in the Connecticut college concert series. The house has been sold out for the entire series.

New London is privileged to be included for the first time in the concerts which Dr. Koussevitsky has scheduled outside of Boston. This year the orchestra is celebrating its 60th birthday under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky.

The inception of the Boston Symphony orchestra goes back to the realization of a young Bostonian student of music in Vienna, Henry Lee Higginson, that America should have a symphony orchestra of the high standard which one could hear in the old world. It was 20 years before this dream became a reality, in 1881, with Georg Henschel as the first conductor of a group of 60 musicians, known as the Boston Symphony orchestra. Four years later, Henschel left a promising, if not yet a perfect orchestra, in the hands of his successor, Wilhelm Gericke, who was a tireless and exacting drill master and succeeded in giving needed polish to the orchestra. The orchestra's debut in New York under his direction may be put down as the first real step in its ascendency to world eminence. Gericke left in 1889, was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur, and came back to the orchestra several years later for a second term.

Dr. Karl Muck came from Berlin to succeed Gericke in 1906, and except for an interim (1908-1912) when Max Fiedler took the lead, carried the orchestra season by season to new and sweeping victories. The World War did not pass without leaving its mark, and in 1918 the orchestra was relinquished to the care of a board of trustees and its first French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Except for a portion of one season, when Henri Rabaud conducted, Mr. Monteux took charge for five years and his notable extension of the repertory brought enduring gratitude of many listeners.

Dr. Koussevitzky was engaged in 1924 and has led the orchestra for more than a quarter of its history, far exceeding the tenure of any previous leader, and the way in which he has brought the orchestra to new heights of eloquence and renown is too familiar to need retelling.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the following program for the concert tomorrow night:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, No. 88
- Adagio; Allegro
- Largo
- Menuetto; Trio
- Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Beethoven—Overture to Leonore No. 3, Op. 72

Sibelius—Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43
- Allegretto
- Tempo andante, ma rubato
- Vivacissimo; Lento e suave
- Finale: Allegro moderato

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1941

Ruth Posselt Soloist With Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Conducts Mozart And Moderns

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Most of the world's present tribulations can be traced, when you stop to think about it, to the passionate purposes of messianic leaders, at once to revolutionize and to preserve—for the ostensible benefit of youth, who cannot be trusted to decide what should be revolutionized and what preserved. The hunch grows that no one over 40 is going to have much to say about the outcome.

This hunch developed while listening to Ruth Posselt play the Hindemith violin concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial last night it grew into a conviction that only way for us oldsters—ning anybody over 30—to get of the intellectual rubble of , hate, prejudice, academic a and outright witchcraft ld be to go straightway jump he lake.

n oldster would have wooed easily won favors of the haikowsky Concerto or Men-ohn's or prayed for the beni- of the lone concertos of Bee-en, Brahms or Sibelius. Only ungster with plenty of scrap self-confidence would have llenged the saturnine and un-promising Hindemith.

tlesome Soloist

iss Posselt was enchanting to at, quite apart from her play- Poised, sincere, and above mettlesome, she imparted a ng conviction to the artistic hs as she found them.

here was something haunting t her countenance. Even if missed her previous appear- in Hartford, as the writer you knew you had seen her e—many times. Her face is he coin of the realm, as refer- to any silver piece will prove. young Columbia gazing out the auditorium, during s, with the ancient wisdom e very young was an inspir- ight.

e played the Concerto beau- y. Do not take my word for it. Can there be any doubt that is what Dr. Koussevitzky was saying to her after the slow movement? Does one have to guess that the beaming conductor in leaving the podium told Burgin what a lucky fellow he was? And mayn't the soloist observe the custom of shaking hands with the concertmaster even though they're married?

Demands Easily Met

The heavy technical demands of the Concerto were handily met. Miss Posselt has a tone of such fibre as easily to make itself heard even against a heavy brass choir. She shaped it in the bold, rough-hewn designs that this music calls for and in the few instances where the text permits added considerable warmth. The difficult and angular cadenza with its forbidding intervals in double stops was negotiated with fine success.

No service has been done Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony promoting it as a work that needs many repetitions to be appreciated for its proper ranking "with Beethoven, Brahms and Sibelius." Although repeated hearing will disclose new virtues in any music worth the name of art, this symphony of Shostakovitch is perfectly intelligible as to its major burden. It is not only simple in its design and substance but praiseworthily transparent.

Simplicity of Symphony

Simplicity is its keynote, for while some parts are quiet and simple, others are noisy and still simple. The alla marcia in the first movement is a childish march for all its din.

Puzzling only is the ability of Moscow to make a political case of such a talent as Shostakovitch. The dogma of this symphony is quite beyond me. The first movement is Russian as Moussorgsky, the slow movement is as Russian and as old as Kiev and the Volga, the final allegro as Russian as any market-place music by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The allegretto is as sardonic as the earlier Shostakovitch. It is only in this movement that the imagination lays hold of anything at all communistic. The ingenuous spelling out of one of the themes by the solo violin and harps has about

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
JAN 10 1941

BOSTONIANS BRING HINDEMITH WORK

Ruth Posselt Is Soloist in New Violin Concerto.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If his "Mattis der Maler" and "St. Francis" left any lingering doubts, a new violin concerto, introduced at last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, settled the matter for Paul Hindemith. He is a romanticist and no blushes are in order. He is also a melodist—of a kind. And there's the rub. Listening to Ruth Posselt's violin and Serge Koussevitzky's ensemble in an exceedingly well integrated performance of the evening's novelty, which achieved its baptism in Boston last April, this reviewer was unable to escape the feeling that to Mr. Hindemith the Hindemith melodies must be much more melodic than they are to the rank and file of melody lovers.

It would be impossible to construe the second movement (Langsam) of this concerto as other than an extended statement of a lush theme—that is, lush to the composer. And in both of the other movements (Maessig bewegte Halbe and Lebhaft), both the solo line and the orchestral writing bring into prominence ideas that clearly are treated for their melodic value. If the work remains for most listeners rather arid and a little strained in its intervals, with interest focused chiefly on the adeptness of the craftsmanship, this may well be because the Hindemith melos is so personal as to be lacking in the common touch. At any rate, this concerto represents exceedingly good writing and fundamentally good Hindemith. Miss Posselt was rightly applauded for a difficult task well achieved. She could scarcely have been more fortunate in the orchestral collaboration.

Mr. Koussevitzky permitted no opportunity for brilliant execution to escape him. Substituting Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony for the scheduled A major Symphony of Mozart (No. 201 of Koechel's catalogue) he began the evening with a flood of tonal sunlight such as the Bostonians [illegible] the [illegible] closed it, with [illegible] ning performance of the Shostakovitch Fifth Symphony, the enormously clever showmanship of which he converts into a veritable tour de force. The applause was commensurate to the stimulations of the playing.

Symphony on the same program with a Concerto whose movements are designated mässig bewegte Halbe, langsam, lebhaft, and free Americans object neither to dissonance, doctrine nor dialect. That must be the sort of thing Dr. Koussevitzky enjoys.

One musn't forget the Mozart Symphony. It was Koechel No. 201 in A major, a seldom heard work, and not a very important one even if Mozart did write it.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in his usual enlightening and stimulating manner. His astute guidance in the Concerto was such as to encourage and sustain both orchestra and soloist. This was one of the best concerts the Bostonians have ever given us.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
JAN 30 1941

Right Instrument, Wrong Teacher

CINCINNATI.—(AP)—Dr. Leonard Watson of the Cincinnati Symphony tells this story about a student of Serge Koussevitzky, the present-day double bass virtuso.

The pupil arrived and unwrapped his instrument.

"All right," said the teacher, after customary preliminaries, "get your bow and let's see what you can do."

"Bow? But I haven't a bow. I want to learn to pick it," said the youth.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
COURANT
JAN 7 - 1941

Koussevitzky Here Tonight At Memorial

Leads Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brilliant Program of Bushnell Series

One of the most interesting symphony programs yet arranged for Hartford, will be performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Bushnell Memorial tonight, starting at 8:15 o'clock. This will be the third event of the current Bushnell Symphony Series.

The program announced for tonight's concert includes Mozart's "Symphony in A major," (Koechel No. 201); Hindemith's "Concerto for Violin and Orchestra," with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and, as the feature of the evening, the now celebrated "Fifth Symphony" of Shostakovitch.

Regarding the last-named work, Noel Strauss wrote recently in the New York Times:—

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Serge Koussevitzky, capped its resplendent performances yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall with a most searching unfoldment of the Fifth Symphony by Shostakovitch. Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of the work by his youthful compatriot was so deeply sympathetic, intense and vital, that it laid bare the complete message of a composition which henceforth must be recognized as one of the outstanding orchestral creations of the present time.

"Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony received its fourth presentation in the city at this concert. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men performed this masterpiece with such compelling virtuosity and impressiveness that it scored a big ovation for them, leaving no doubt that the symphony had finally succeeded in making its real virtues apparent."

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 7 - 1941

Koussevitzky Calls Music Necessity

"Great music is a necessity of life. Nothing less, a necessity."

That is the conviction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who leads his Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Bushnell Memorial tonight.

The program, scheduled to start at 8:15, includes Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201); Hindemith's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, with Ruth Posselt as soloist; and the Fifth Symphony of Shostakovitch.

Paul Hindemith, one of the most distinguished of modern composers, will be in the audience this evening to hear the performance.

Commenting further upon the need for good music, Dr. Kousevitzky said, "Great music makes life complete. It combines with something else. Do you know, I am convinced that what makes a life full is the experience of tragedy in some form, and rising to its challenge. The great composers all have had their trials by tragedy. Their greatest music is the utterance which the experience has drawn from their souls. And very often the music itself is not tragic. It may be quite the opposite, because the composer has had the greatness of soul not to expose his private concerns to the world.

"In great music there is the bond of the most profound sympathy between genius and the rest of humanity. The genius expresses what is in the souls of the rest, better than they can. We musicians draw out what the great composers have attempted to express within the limitations of musical notes printed on paper. We sense, and we continually develop, what we sense there. Through the intermediary of the conductor, if you please, the composer, the musicians and the listeners are brought together in communion with life."

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 8 - 1941

Has Conducted Noted Orchestra For 25 Years

SERGE KOUSSEVITSKY

Serge Koussevitsky, who will lead the Boston Symphony orchestra in its concert in the Frank Loomis Palmer auditorium at Connecticut college tonight, has conducted the famous orchestra for more than a quarter of a century.

Under his direction the famed precision, ensemble, and tonal beauty of the great orchestra excel, in this its 60th season, even the most glorious days of its illustrious past. His extraordinary powers of sympathetic and inspired interpretation have brought to new heights of perfection this body of musicians for many years reputed to be the finest organization of its kind in the world.

Koussevitzky's vision and energy have done much to make available the masterpieces of the modern composers. In the world of music it is felt that when the history of the past quarter of a century of musical progress is completely assembled, assayed, and recorded, the name of Koussevitzky will loom large in it. Debussy, Ravel, Prokofieff, Honneger, Roussel, and Berg are among the composers whose fame was given invaluable impetus by the Russian conductor's pioneering performances.

The career of Serge Koussevitzky is an impressive one. Born in an obscure Russian province with no musical life about him, through his own efforts he became while very young a virtuoso of the double-bass, known throughout Europe. After the revolution, fleeing restriction, he established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky" with his own orchestra in Paris. He lived in Germany and France, and visited England, identifying himself closely with the musical cultures of each country, and others as well. In the years to follow, America's composers and America's musical point of view became equally familiar to him.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 5 - 1941

...Philadelphia Orchestra ...
...rtense Monath, pianist ...
...elt, violinist, soloist ...

This Clipping From
NEW LONDON, CONN.
DAY
JAN 7 - 1941

Boston Symphony to Give Third of College Concerts; Koussevitzky to Lead

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, will be heard tomorrow evening at 8:30 o'clock, in the Frank Loomis Palmer auditorium at Connecticut college, as the third concert in the Connecticut college concert series. The house has been sold out for the entire series.

New London is privileged to be included for the first time in the concerts which Dr. Koussevitsky has scheduled outside of Boston. This year the orchestra is celebrating its 60th birthday under the direction of Dr. Koussevitsky.

The inception of the Boston Symphony orchestra goes back to the realization of a young Bostonian student of music in Vienna, Henry Lee Higginson, that America should have a symphony orchestra of the high standard which one could hear in the old world. It was 20 years before this dream became a reality, in 1881, with Georg Henschel as the first conductor of a group of 60 musicians, known as the Boston Symphony orchestra. Four years later, Henschel left a promising, if not yet a perfect orchestra, in the hands of his successor, Wilhelm Gericke, who was a tireless and exacting drill master and succeeded in giving needed polish to the orchestra. The orchestra's debut in New York under his direction may be put down as the first real step in its ascendency to world eminence. Gericke left in 1889, was succeeded by Arthur Nikisch and Emil Paur, and came back to the orchestra several years later for a second term.

Dr. Karl Muck came from Berlin to succeed Gericke in 1906, and except for an interim (1908-1912) when Max Fiedler took the lead, carried the orchestra season by season to new and sweeping victories. The World War did not pass without leaving its mark, and in 1918 the orchestra was relinquished to the care of a board of trustees and its first French conductor, Pierre Monteux. Except for a portion of one season, when Henri Rabaud conducted, Mr. Monteux took charge for five years and his notable extension of the repertory brought enduring gratitude of many listeners.

Dr. Koussevitzky was engaged in 1924 and has led the orchestra for more than a quarter of its history, far exceeding the tenure of any previous leader, and the way in which he has brought the orchestra to new heights of eloquence and renown is too familiar to need retelling.

Dr. Koussevitzky has chosen the following program for the concert tomorrow night:

Haydn—Symphony in G major, No. 88
Adagio; Allegro
Largo
Menuetto; Trio
Finale: Allegro con spirito.

Beethoven—Overture to Leonore No. 3, Op. 72

Sibelius—Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 43
Allegretto
Tempo andante, ma rubato
Vivacissimo; Lento e suave
Finale: Allegro moderato

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 8 - 1941

Ruth Posselt Soloist With Boston Symphony

Koussevitzky Conducts Mozart And Moderns

By CARL E. LINDSTROM

Most of the world's present tribulations can be traced, when you stop to think about it, to the passionate purposes of messianic leaders, at once to revolutionize and to preserve—for the ostensible benefit of youth, who cannot be trusted to decide what should be revolutionized and what preserved. The hunch grows that no one over 40 is going to have much to say about the outcome.

This hunch developed while listening to Ruth Posselt play the Hindemith violin concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Bushnell Memorial last night and it grew into a conviction that the only way for us oldsters—meaning anybody over 30—to get rid of the intellectual rubble of fear, hate, prejudice, academic dicta and outright witchcraft would be to go straightway jump in the lake.

An oldster would have wooed the easily won favors of the Tschaikowsky Concerto or Mendelssohn's or prayed for the benison of the lone concertos of Beethoven, Brahms or Sibelius. Only a youngster with plenty of scrap and self-confidence would have challenged the saturnine and uncompromising Hindemith.

Mettlesome Soloist

Miss Posselt was enchanting to look at, quite apart from her playing. Poised, sincere, and above all, mettlesome, she imparted a ringing conviction to the artistic truths as she found them.

There was something haunting about her countenance. Even if you missed her previous appearance in Hartford, as the writer did, you knew you had seen her before—many times. Her face is on the coin of the realm, as reference to any silver piece will prove. This young Columbia gazing out over the auditorium, during pauses, with the ancient wisdom of the very young was an inspiring sight.

She played the Concerto beautifully. Do not take my word for it. Can there be any doubt that is what Dr. Koussevitzky was saying to her after the slow movement? Does one have to guess that the beaming conductor in leaving the podium told Burgin what a lucky fellow he was? And mayn't the soloist observe the custom of shaking hands with the concertmaster even though they're married?

Demands Easily Met

The heavy technical demands of the Concerto were handily met. Miss Posselt has a tone of such fibre as easily to make itself heard even against a heavy brass choir. She shaped it in the bold, rough-hewn designs that this music calls for and in the few instances where the text permits added considerable warmth. The difficult and angular cadenza with its forbidding intervals in double stops was negotiated with fine success.

No service has been done Shostakovitch's Fifth Symphony promoting it as a work that needs many repetitions to be appreciated for its proper ranking "with Beethoven, Brahms and Sibelius." Although repeated hearing will disclose new virtues in any music worth the name of art, this symphony of Shostakovitch is perfectly intelligible as to its major burden. It is not only simple in its design and substance but praiseworthily transparent.

Simplicity of Symphony

Simplicity is its keynote, for while some parts are quiet and simple, others are noisy and still simple. The alla marcia in the first movement is a childish march for all its din.

Puzzling only is the ability of Moscow to make a political case of such a talent as Shostakovitch. The dogma of this symphony is quite beyond me. The first movement is Russian as Moussorgsky, the slow movement is as Russian and as old as Kiev and the Volga, the final allegro as Russian as any market-place music by Rimsky-Korsakoff. The allegretto is as sardonic as the earlier Shostakovitch. It is only in this movement that the imagination lays hold of anything at all communistic. The ingenuous spelling out of one of the themes by the solo violin and harps has about the same tone as the Soviet Primer of some years back.

I liked the Symphony for its quiet colorings in shades of gray, its sadness, its melodic fecundity and some daringly simple modulations; for the proclamative horns in the second movement; and for the pensive lyricism sustained to the rich polyphony of the closing section of the Largo.

The audience was a bit restive between movements but this may have signified only that the Symphony was a long one.

The world isn't too badly off when we can hear a communistic Symphony on the same program with a Concerto whose movements are designated mässig bevegte Halbe, langsam, lebhaft, and free Americans object neither to dissonance, doctrine nor dialect. That must be the sort of thing Dr. Koussevitzky enjoys.

One musn't forget the Mozart Symphony. It was Koechel No. 201 in A major, a seldom heard work, and not a very important one even if Mozart did write it.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted in his usual enlightening and stimulating manner. His astute guidance in the Concerto was such as to encourage and sustain both orchestra and soloist. This was one of the best concerts the Bostonians have ever given us.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
JAN 10 1941

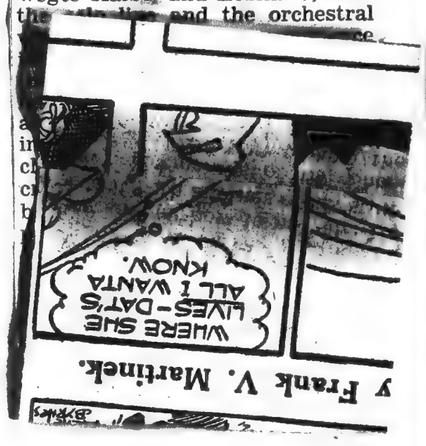
BOSTONIANS BRING HINDEMITH WORK

Ruth Posselt Is Soloist in New Violin Concerto.

By OSCAR THOMPSON.

If his "Mattis der Maler" and "St. Francis" left any lingering doubts, a new violin concerto, introduced at last night's Boston Symphony concert in Carnegie Hall, settled the matter for Paul Hindemith. He is a romanticist and no blushes are in order. He is also a melodist—of a kind. And there's the rub. Listening to Ruth Posselt's violin and Serge Koussevitzky's ensemble in an exceedingly well integrated performance of the evening's novelty, which achieved its baptism in Boston last April, this reviewer was unable to escape the feeling that to Mr. Hindemith the Hindemith melodies must be much more melodic than they are to the rank and file of melody lovers.

It would be impossible to construe the second movement (Langsam) of this concerto as other than an extended statement of a lush theme—that is, lush to the composer. And in both of the other movements (Maessig bewegte Halbe, and Lebhaft), both the [illegible] and the orchestral



This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
JAN 30 1941

Right Instrument, Wrong Teacher

CINCINNATI.—(AP)—Dr. Leonard Watson of the Cincinnati Symphon, tells this story about a student of Serge Koussevitzky, the present-day double bass virtuso.

The pupil arrived and unwrapped his instrument.

"All right," said the teacher, after customary preliminaries, "get your bow and let's see what you can do."

"Bow? But I haven't a bow. I want to learn to pick it," said the youth.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1941

Mitropoulos Makes Mahler Momentous

Tremendous Ovation at Farewell—Boston Symphony Plays Sibelius—Music and Films

By MILES KASTENDIECK

That Dimitri Mitropoulos conquered New York in his month's stay as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony was made very apparent by the great ovation he received at the close of the concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Such a demonstration has not occurred in years: it topped the crescendo of the Mahler First Symphony which is an exultant outburst in itself.

People who might have shyed away from a program billing the music of Roussel and Mahler needed only to note who was conducting to be reassured. During his stay Mitropoulos has succeeded with exceptional consistency in making the unfamiliar interesting. He chose wisely in bringing such music to the fore if only as a relief from the standard repertoire. After hearing the Mahler yesterday, many must have been converted, though possibly only for the moment, because of a stunning performance. But the man who can win an audience to Mahler is worth special note.

One of the reasons for this outstanding achievement lay in a similar command of the orchestra by the composer as by the conductor. How otherwise could the wry humor of the third movement with its irony and burlesque have been so perfectly interpreted? Now whether Mitropoulos could fathom the depths of Mahler's Ninth still remains a question. Of the First, he is surely a master.

The Philharmonic excelled itself: the men played with a virtuosity as stimulating as the interpretation. They played as though they enjoyed being put on their mettle and they applauded the conductor as enthusiastically as the audience. The month has been a happy one for all.

Three for Sibelius

Long considered a prophet of Sibelius, Serge Koussevitzky paid special homage to the 75-year-old composer by playing three of his seven symphonies at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. Least known was the Sixth, somewhat more familiar was the Seventh, downright popular was the Second. Probably the Second met with the most favor: it was the most obvious by far. Some affectation crept into its interpretation, but this was submerged in the sweep of a superb performance.

It will take years perhaps for people to like the Sixth equally well. This is music into which one grows with the years. In mood and in utterance it is calm, peaceful, poised: its still water runs deep. The Seventh has a loftier mood though similar to the Sixth in style. If it is easier to grasp the reason may lie in the fact that it is more often heard. The beautiful texture of the music was matched in the performances though one wonders if they were the ultimate revelation of this Sibelius.

Koussevitzky Jan. 12 O. K.'s Templeton

What makes one man laugh may leave another completely unamused, as everyone will agree. But few blanks on laughter response are ever drawn by Alec Templeton, the amazing blind pianist, composer and humorist, who gives a program in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 29.

Last year when his Boston audience shouted in glee at his keyboard antics, included was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who literally laughed until the tears rolled down his cheeks. But at the same time, he was so impressed with Templeton's ability as a serious pianist, that he tried to engage him as soloist with the orchestra. A conflict in dates interfered. Which is one proof that Alec is our greatest entertainer among pianists, and our greatest pianist among entertainers.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1941. -N.Y. TIMES

MAHLER WORK LED BY MITROPOULOS

Guest Conductor Directs the Philharmonic in Symphony in D at Carnegie Hall

PRESENTS VERRALL MUSIC

New Version of Composition by American and a Transcription From Bach Are Offered

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Dimitri Mitropoulos began his final week as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, and there were the usual amenities. The players arose when he entered on the stage for the beginning of the concert. When he was recalled for bows at the close of the first and last works, he asked the men to rise, but several times they refused, preferring to join the audience in applauding. The audience, for its part, behaved as if Mr. Mitropoulos had become a warm and respected friend.

There has been some grumbling about the make-up of Mr. Mitropoulos's programs, and there is room for criticism. But in fairness to Mr. Mitropoulos, it should be emphasized that some things were beyond his control; works that he might have liked to lead were, as it were, spoken for. Whatever the difficulties, Mr. Mitropoulos has managed to prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that he has an immense flair for leading an orchestra.

Unity of Leader and Men

The results last night were proof that Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra, after a sojourn together of less than a month, understand each other perfectly. The playing last night was meticulously clean-cut, crisp and incisive. The attacks, and particularly the releases, were achievements in military precision. The tone was vibrant and transparent. One had the feeling that in the beginning Mr. Mitropoulos was led to the orchestra by the sheer sensuousness and variety of its tonal possibilities; that appreciation seems to underlie his performances.

Last night's program was not one to appeal to conservatives who treasure the conventional three B's or music of similar tried-and-true stature. There was Bach, of course —a transcription by Mr. Mitropoulos of the Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. There was a first performance of a new version of a Concert Piece for Strings and Horn by John Verrall, American composer. There was what might be called a revival of Mahler's First symphony, in D.

The most ponderable achievement of the evening was the Mahler symphony, which merits more frequent performance. Written in the composer's twenties, it is encompassed with an amazing mastery of the orchestral apparatus. Its themes are simple and song-like, and the form is not swollen, as it becomes in later Mahler symphonies. Though there are pages of the irony and fury that became more deep-seated and agitated later on, the work also has a pastoral feeling. It is as if a profoundly simple nature had not yet been lacerated into cries of unutterable grief. Mahler, certainly in this symphony, is anything but forbidding.

Fury With Impeccable Control

Mr. Mitropoulos kept his orchestra in leash, and only in the last movement did he permit it to surge and crash and lay about it with stormy intensity. Even here the fury was under impeccable control. For the most part, the conductor kept the work graded on a subtle scale of color values, which helped to give it strength and dignity. Mr. Mitropoulos chose to have his intermission in the middle of the Mahler symphony. It is true that the composer asked for a long pause at this point, but some ardent Mahlerites were not pleased to have so complete a break.

The Verrall score is skillfully wrought, with some shrewd writing for the strings and with less effective employment of the horns. The work is in four movements. The ideas, rather juiceless in quality, are manipulated conservatively. Mr. Mitropoulos led the work with lift and energy. Mr. Verrall joined the conductor at the end for several bows. The 32-year-old composer, who was born in Iowa, is now teaching in St. Paul.

As for the Bach transcription, one might say to Mr. Mitropoulos, "Et tu, Brute?" For there is an overabundance of Bach arrangements. Mr. Mitropoulos's is inclined to be showy and violent in contrasts. But the question of the taste of this transcription aside, it was a perfect vehicle for the conductor's talents. How he made the orchestra sound with it!

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN JEWISH OUTLOOK
PITTSBURGH, PA
12/13/40

Boston Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players, one of the "finest organizations of its kind in the world today," having reached new heights under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its annual pair of concerts in Pittsburgh this week at Syria Mosque on Saturday night, December 14, and Sunday afternoon, December 15. Both programs will include Dr. Koussevitzky's usual share of modern works.

More Mitropoulos Novelties

C.S.M. Jan. 11

By Pitts Sanborn

New York

Continuing as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos has set before Carnegie Hall audiences more unfamiliar music. At the concerts of Jan. 2-3, Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Overture to "The Merchant of Venice" and Nicolas Nabokoff's "Sinfonia Biblica" made the first half of the program. The overture was introduced to America at a Stadium Concert in this city on June 18, 1939, but seems not to have been played again anywhere in the United States until these occasions. The "Sinfonia Biblica" was on the second an absolute "first time."

Shylock's rage over the loss of his daughter and his ducats as set forth by Solanio in Act II, Scene VII, of Shakespeare's comedy has been said to contain the gist of the overture, but there is a contrasting lyric section, with violin solo, that doubtless represents Portia. For most listeners the overture unquestionably is too long and it bears effective witness to its composer's capacious memory, especially of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. It was played with tremendous spirit.

* * *

Mr. Nabokoff, who was present at the première of his symphony to bow acknowledgments, insists that the work "strives mainly and essentially to be a piece of music first of all, the Old Testament being the stimulus which urged me to write this music." He also states that "all four movements have common musical material, and all the themes can be traced back to the first two themes of the first movement."

The four movements are named respectively "Ecclesiasticus," "Solomon," "Absalom," and "Hosannah." If the "Solomon" section, in which the composer seeks to reflect the mood of the "Song of Songs," seems in view of its subject somewhat acrid and astringent, the flight of Absalom in the following section is full of drama and excitement. Mr. Mitropoulos, to whom the piece is dedicated, appeared to take great pleasure in conducting it. Jascha Heifetz in the Beethoven Violin Concerto filled out the program.

* * *

At the concerts of Jan. 4-5, Mr. Mitropoulos brought forward another work that was doubtless new to most of its hearers, though Fritz Busch had made it known here a dozen years ago when acting as guest conductor for the Symphony Society. It is Max Reger's "Four Tone Poems for Large Orchestra after Pictures by Arnold Böcklin." In these the burly Reger is more genially disposed than usual. Indeed, the first, "The Fiddling Hermit," though perilously long drawn out, has real atmosphere and charm in its modal manner and archaic suggestion. And the second, "In the Sport of the Waves," is pleasant as long as the sport is briskly paced.

Afterwards came a reversion to music we all know, or ought to—Liszt's E flat Piano Concerto and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole." Dalies Frantz was the soloist, technically uneven and in the "Quasi adagio" sentimental beyond the considerable excuse supplied by the music. However, he and Mr. Mitropoulos between them raised a terrific din before the concerto was over. The "Rapsodie Espagnole," though, had a thoroughly fine performance, both Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra appearing to decided advantage.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 12 1941

Musical America

The great American pastime, discussion, was pursued the other day in New York with music for a subject. Three prominent men wondered aloud whether America was musically mature. They decided that it was not. Aaron Copland, one of the speakers, said that constant repetition of familiar masterpieces is a sign of musical immaturity. Most radio listeners will agree with him, for the program arrangers of radio most often play safe, and choose the "best" that has become tedious from repetition.

They might imitate Koussevitsky, who is determined to make the public and critics like Shostakovitch, and repeat a few commendable, although unfamiliar, pieces until the listeners become accustomed to the new idiom. The program arrangers go on the assumption that one can't go wrong with a Beethoven symphony. One can go sour on it, however, if it is played too often.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WEIRTON, W. VA.
TIMES
JAN 9- 1941

His 'Music' Once Brought Cops In a Hurry

By TALBOT LAKE

THE arrival of Darius Milhaud, French composer, in the United States causes us to think that time does fly. He was one of the early modern composers, writers of the screamy, scraping cacophony that one hears occasionally in a symphony concert.

When Milhaud's compositions were played in Paris, they called out the police. We were in the staid city of Philadelphia when music of a similar genre was first played there. Again it called for the cops.

Today, as we listened to the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the closing piece was a Sinfoneta by a man with a long name full of z's, x's and y's. It was just as screamy as the kind that Milhaud composes. But we heard no signs of riot in Carnegie Hall. There was only loud applause. Probably few people will write in to say that the orchestra had caterwauled. The music of Milhaud and gentlemen like him is acceptable now, or at least borne with patience and fairness.

Milhaud is a big, soft, fat man. He comes from the south of France and has been in the U. S. since July teaching music at Mills College in California. He was here last three years ago. His wife, Mme. Madelaine Milhaud, is a leading French actress and when they gave a performance of his most recent composition, "Medee," in New York, she read the libretto.

Incidentally, that piece has one other performance to its credit, a memorable one. It was played in Paris just before the Nazis arrived. It closed the next night. It was the first and last opera of the war to be given in the free French city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing [redacted] Pastorale." Milhaud himself likes jazz. He is especially fond of music by Gershwin, whose work was an early influence.

"Jazz music," Milhaud says, "came along like a wild fresh wind, clearing the air of the miasma of musical preciousness. It was new and fresh, and it did a great service."

The extent to which the U. S. accepts such modern music is amply illustrated by the fact that people from small towns, coming to larger cities to study music, are not feazed by this wild tootling and scraping. In fact, they almost seem to like it.

Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
JAN 13 1941

Mitropoulos Makes Mahler Momentous

Tremendous Ovation at Farewell—Boston Symphony Plays Sibelius—Music and Films

By MILES KASTENDIECK

That Dimitri Mitropoulos conquered New York in his month's stay as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony was made very apparent by the great ovation he received at the close of the concert in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. Such a demonstration has not occurred in years: it topped the crescendo of the Mahler First Symphony which is an exultant outburst in itself.

People who might have shyed away from a program billing the music of Roussel and Mahler needed only to note who was conducting to be reassured. During his stay, Mitropoulos has succeeded with exceptional consistency in making the unfamiliar interesting. He chose wisely in bringing such music to the fore if only as a relief from the standard repertoire. After hearing the Mahler yesterday, many must have been converted, though possibly only for the moment, because of a stunning performance. But the man who can win an audience to Mahler is worth special note.

One of the reasons for this outstanding achievement lay in a similar command of the orchestra by the composer as by the conductor. How otherwise could the wry humor of the third movement with its irony and burlesque have been so perfectly interpreted? Now whether Mitropoulos could fathom the depths of Mahler's Ninth still remains a question. Of the First, he is surely a master.

The Philharmonic excelled itself: the men played with a virtuosity as stimulating as the interpretation. They played as though they enjoyed being put on their mettle and they applauded the conductor as enthusiastically as the audience. The month has been a happy one for all.

Three for Sibelius

Long considered a prophet of Sibelius, Serge Koussevitzky paid special homage to the 75-year-old composer by playing three of his seven symphonies at the Boston Symphony matinee in Carnegie Hall on Saturday. Least known was the Sixth, somewhat more familiar was the Seventh, downright popular was the Second. Probably the Second met with the most favor: it was the most obvious by far. Some affectation crept into its interpretation, but this was submerged in the sweep of a superb performance.

It will take years perhaps for people to like the Sixth equally well. This is music into which one grows with the years. In mood and in utterance it is calm, peaceful, poised: its still water runs deep. The Seventh has a loftier mood though similar to the Sixth in style. If it is easier to grasp the reason may lie in the fact that it is more often heard. The beautiful texture of the music was matched in the performances though one wonders if they were the ultimate revelation of this Sibelius.

Koussevitzky Jan. 12 O. K.'s Templeton

What makes one man laugh may leave another completely unamused, as everyone will agree. But few blanks on laughter response are ever drawn by Alec Templeton, the amazing blind pianist, composer and humorist, who gives a program in Symphony Hall on Wednesday evening, Jan. 29.

Last year when his Boston audience shouted in glee at his keyboard antics, included was Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who literally laughed until the tears rolled down his cheeks. But at the same time, he was so impressed with Templeton's ability as a serious pianist, that he tried to engage him as soloist with the orchestra. A conflict in dates interfered. Which is one proof that Alec is our greatest entertainer among pianists, and our greatest pianist among entertainers.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 9, 1941. -N.Y. TIMES

MAHLER WORK LED BY MITROPOULOS

Guest Conductor Directs the Philharmonic in Symphony in D at Carnegie Hall

PRESENTS VERRALL MUSIC

New Version of Composition by American and a Transcription From Bach Are Offered

By HOWARD TAUBMAN

Dimitri Mitropoulos began his final week as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last night, and there were the usual amenities. The players arose when he entered on the stage for the beginning of the concert. When he was recalled for bows at the close of the first and last works, he asked the men to rise, but several times they refused, preferring to join the audience in applauding. The audience, for its part, behaved as if Mr. Mitropoulos had become a warm and respected friend.

There has been some grumbling about the make-up of Mr. Mitropoulos's programs, and there is room for criticism. But in fairness to Mr. Mitropoulos, it should be emphasized that some things were beyond his control; works that he might have liked to lead were, as it were, spoken for. Whatever the difficulties, Mr. Mitropoulos has managed to prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that he has an immense flair for leading an orchestra.

Unity of Leader and Men

The results last night were proof that Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra, after a sojourn together of less than a month, understand each other perfectly. The playing last night was meticulously clean-cut, crisp and incisive. The attacks, and particularly the releases, were achievements in military precision. The tone was vibrant and transparent. One had the feeling that in the beginning Mr. Mitropoulos was led to the orchestra by the sheer sensuousness and variety of its tonal possibilities; that appreciation seems to underlie his performances.

Last night's program was not one to appeal to conservatives who treasure the conventional three B's or music of similar tried-and-true stature. There was Bach, of course—a transcription by Mr. Mitropoulos of the Organ Fantasia and Fugue in G minor. There was a first performance of a new version of a Concert Piece for Strings and Horn by John Verrall, American composer. There was what might be called a revival of Mahler's First symphony, in D.

The most ponderable achievement of the evening was the Mahler symphony, which merits more frequent performance. Written in the composer's twenties, it is encompassed with an amazing mastery of the orchestral apparatus. Its themes are simple and song-like, and the form is not swollen, as it becomes in later Mahler symphonies. Though there are pages of the irony and fury that became more deep-seated and agitated later on, the work also has a pastoral feeling. It is as if a profoundly simple nature had not yet been lacerated into cries of unutterable grief. Mahler, certainly in this symphony, is anything but forbidding.

Fury With Impeccable Control

Mr. Mitropoulos kept his orchestra in leash, and only in the last movement did he permit it to surge and crash and lay about it with stormy intensity. Even here the fury was under impeccable control. For the most part, the conductor kept the work graded on a subtle scale of color values, which helped to give it strength and dignity. Mr. Mitropoulos chose to have his intermission in the middle of the Mahler symphony. It is true that the composer asked for a long pause at this point, but some ardent Mahlerites were not pleased to have so complete a break.

The Verrall score is skillfully wrought, with some shrewd writing for the strings and with less effective employment of the horns. The work is in four movements. The ideas, rather juiceless in quality, are manipulated conservatively. Mr. Mitropoulos led the work with lift and energy. Mr. Verrall joined the conductor at the end for several bows. The 32-year-old composer, who was born in Iowa, is now teaching in St. Paul.

As for the Bach transcription, one might say to Mr. Mitropoulos, "Et tu, Brute?" For there is an overabundance of Bach arrangements. Mr. Mitropoulos's is inclined to be showy and violent in contrasts. But the question of the taste of this transcription aside, it was a perfect vehicle for the conductor's talents. How he made the orchestra sound with it!

THIS CLIPPING FROM AMERICAN JEWISH OUTLOOK
PITTSBURGH, PA
12/13/40

Boston Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra of 110 players, one of the "finest organizations of its kind in the world today," having reached new heights under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its annual pair of concerts in Pittsburgh this week at Syria Mosque on Saturday night, December 14, and Sunday afternoon, December 15. Both programs will include Dr. Koussevitzky's usual share of modern works.

More Mitropoulos Novelties

By Pitts Sanborn

New York, Jan. 11

Continuing as guest conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony, Dimitri Mitropoulos has set before Carnegie Hall audiences more unfamiliar music. At the concerts of Jan. 2-3, Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco's Overture to "The Merchant of Venice" and Nicolas Nabokoff's "Sinfonia Biblica" made the first half of the program. The overture was introduced to America at a Stadium Concert in this city on June 16, 1939, but seems not to have been played again anywhere in the United States until these occasions. The "Sinfonia Biblica" was on the second an absolute "first time."

Shylock's rage over the loss of his daughter and his ducats as set forth by Solanio in Act II, Scene VII, of Shakespeare's comedy has been said to contain the gist of the overture, but there is a contrasting lyric section, with violin solo, that doubtless represents Portia. For most listeners the overture unquestionably is too long and it bears effective witness to its composer's capacious memory, especially of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Schéhérazade" and Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. It was played with tremendous spirit.

Mr. Nabokoff, who was present at the premiere of his symphony to bow acknowledgments, insists that the work "strives mainly and essentially to be a piece of music first of all, the Old Testament being the stimulus which urged me to write this music." He also states that "all four movements have common musical material, and all the themes can be traced back to the first two themes of the first movement."

The four movements are named respectively "Ecclesiasticus," "Solomon," "Absalom," and "Hosannah." If the "Solomon" section, in which the composer seeks to reflect the mood of the "Song of Songs," seems in view of its subject somewhat acrid and astringent, the flight of Absalom in the following section is full of drama and excitement. Mr. Mitropoulos, to whom the piece is dedicated, appeared to take great pleasure in conducting it. Jascha Heifetz in the Beethoven Violin Concerto filled out the program.

* * *

At the concerts of Jan. 4-5, Mr. Mitropoulos brought forward another work that was doubtless new to most of its hearers, though Fritz Busch had made it known here a dozen years ago when acting as guest conductor for the Symphony Society. It is Max Reger's "Four Tone Poems for Large Orchestra after Pictures by Arnold Böcklin." In these the burly Reger is more genially disposed than usual. Indeed, the first, "The Fiddling Hermit," though perilously long drawn out, has real atmosphere and charm in its modal manner and archaic suggestion. And the second, "In the Sport of the Waves," is pleasant as long as the sport is briskly paced.

Afterwards came a reversion to music we all know, or ought to—Liszt's E flat Piano Concerto and Ravel's "Rapsodie Espagnole," Dalies Frantz was the soloist, technically uneven and in the "Quasi adagio" sentimental beyond the considerable excuse supplied by the music. However, he and Mr. Mitropoulos between them raised a terrific din before the concerto was over. The "Rapsodie Espagnole," though, had a thoroughly fine performance, both Mr. Mitropoulos and the orchestra appearing to decided advantage.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
JAN 12 1941

Musical America

The great American pastime, discussion, was pursued the other day in New York with music for a subject. Three prominent men wondered aloud whether America was musically mature. They decided that it was not. Aaron Copland, one of the speakers, said that constant repetition of familiar masterpieces is a sign of musical immaturity. Most radio listeners will agree with him, for the program arrangers of radio most often play safe, and choose the "best" that has become tedious from repetition.

They might imitate Koussevitsky, who is determined to make the public and critics like Shostakovitch, and repeat a few commendable, although unfamiliar, pieces until the listeners become accustomed to the new idiom. The program arrangers go on the assumption that one can't go wrong with a Beethoven symphony. One can go sour on it, however, if it is played too often.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
WEIRTON, W. VA.
TIMES
JAN 9- 1941

His 'Music' Once Brought Cops In a Hurry

By TALBOT LAKE

THE arrival of Darius Milhaud, French composer, in the United States causes us to think that time does fly. He was one of the early modern composers, writers of the screamy, scraping cacophony that one hears occasionally in a symphony concert.

When Milhaud's compositions were played in Paris, they called out the police. We were in the staid city of Philadelphia when music of a similar genre was first played there. Again it called for the cops.

Today, as we listened to the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, the closing piece was a Sinfoneta by a man with a long name full of z's, x's and y's. It was just as screamy as the kind that Milhaud composes. But we heard no signs of riot in Carnegie Hall. There was only loud applause. Probably few people will write in to say that the orchestra had caterwauled. The music of Milhaud and gentlemen like him is acceptable now, or at least borne with patience and fairness.

Milhaud is a big, soft, fat man. He comes from the south of France and has been in the U. S. since July teaching music at Mills College in California. He was here last three years ago. His wife, Mme. Madelaine Milhaud, is a leading French actress and when they gave a performance of his most recent composition, "Medee," in New York, she read the libretto.

Incidentally, that piece has one other performance to its credit, a memorable one. It was played in Paris just before the Nazis arrived. It closed the next night. It was the first and last opera of the war to be given in the free French city.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is playing [illegible] Pastorale." Milhaud himself likes jazz. He is especially fond of music by Gershwin, whose work was an early influence.

"Jazz music," Milhaud says, "came along like a wild fresh wind, clearing the air of the miasma of musical preciousness. It was new and fresh, and it did a great service."

The extent to which the U. S. accepts such modern music is amply illustrated by the fact that people from small towns, coming to larger cities to study music, are not feazed by this wild tooting and scraping. In fact, they almost seem to like it.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 12 1941

SIBELIUS PROGRAM AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony in Compositions by Finnish Master

7TH SYMPHONY IS HEARD

Second and Sixth Works in the Same Musical Form Also Are Interpreted by Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES

Apropos of the seventy-fifth birthday of Jean Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted the entire program of their concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to his music. The program was exceptional, even in these days of universal recognition of Sibelius and the nation-wide anniversary performances of his composition. For Dr. Koussevitzky, in contradistinction to the great number of conductors who have contented themselves with the tried and true Sibelius of the early symphonies and tone-poems, and who, of all conductors in America has stood alone in his propagation of all the Sibelius symphonies, played yesterday the Sixth, the Seventh, and the Second works in that form.

The Second, a sure-fire symphony today with all audiences and a magnificent work of the early period, is nevertheless far from the concentrated originality of the last four of the symphonies. And if the perfect Sibeliusite had been consulted, he would have said, "let us have the Fourth symphony as well as Six and Seven," and then his cup would have been full, since the Fifth is the only one of the latter symphonies which has had a great degree of attention in recent months, and the Fourth is not only the greatest of the seven, but certainly one of the greatest and most original works in modern music.

Sixth Symphony Offered

But it was an exceptional privilege to hear the Sixth Symphony, which, if memory serves us properly, has been played only once before in New York, and then by Koussevitzky. It is the most transparent, the most serene and joyous of all the symphonies, and of such apparent spontaneity that were it not for the logic and concentration of the form it would appear as a symphonic improvisation.

The symphony is the purest kind of music making. The four short movements are not interrelated by some special thematic scheme so much as they are extremely integrated in the prevalent character of the music, the economy of the material, and the prevailing mood. There are familiar landmarks of Sibelius's style, but here, as elsewhere, each idea is pursued to ultimates of its own.

Thus Sibelius has said that he is the "slave" of his themes. Certainly he has escaped completely, in this work, the German rules of battle-doring and shuttle-cocking thematic fragments in the fixed divisions of the classic sonata form. His themes carry their development within themselves. The theme is a germinal substance which grows, so to speak, after laws of its own species, in the symphonic soil. One fragment permeates a whole movement. Another is a shorter and more temporal growth.

The four movements of the Sixth are so consequent each upon the other that it is easy to understand why Sibelius made the Seventh symphony, in its final revision, in one movement. This was the inevitable evolution of the kind of thought and development that the Sixth, though it is a work in a different emotional vein, had predicated. And if one asked—not for a meaning, unless serenity, beauty itself, the beauty that is not of the salon or of anything but the free air and earth, could be called a "meaning"—but for some suggestive analogy to give a clue to the character of this work, the nearest clue to be logically supplied would be a picture of the forests and fens, the rocks and the pines and skies of Finland herself, with a thought, perhaps, of fragments of sublimated folk-song, and at the last a vista, gradually fading in the distance, of this panorama. No symphony could have a simpler ending. It comes with ever more tranquility and finality with a phrase in thirds which narrows down to a simple unison of first and second violins. We can conceive of no conclusion more complete, more poetical, in its simplicity.

The Seventh symphony is better known than Number Six; its beauty and nobility grow with every repetition. Simplicity again is the watchword, or rather the essence of the work, since Sibelius, in contradistinction to the great majority of modern composers, cliques, propagandists, "schools," never writes a symphony according to preconceived theory, but inevitably in response to an expressive need.

We know little that is more original and more haunting in the beauty of the thought, and in formal balance, than the preparation for what is actually the theme of the whole symphony—the sculptured phrase of the solo trombone, which enters, like some pilgrim from the skies, and returns on two principal occasions in the course of the work—the first repetition being with a quality of sternness and majesty over rolling chromatic scales of the strings, the second repetition and final appearance bringing the sunset glow of the final pages with echoes of thematic fragments against a harmonic background that is like an evening sky.

The last two of the Sibelius symphonies, as it happens, are the symphonies of a time of tranquillity and ripeness of the composer's art. They grow as truly from the earlier works as leaves from a tree. They represent a wholly exceptional continuity of development and that consistency is the result of the complete originality and independence that Sibelius has shown of all the schools, the cliques and the mutual admiration societies of the composers of Europe.

It was no doubt in part for concert purposes, but as it happens, with dramatic coincidence, that the concert ended with the Second Symphony, a work begotten of national romanticism and the days of Finland's rebellion against foreign tyranny of the early 1900's. The source of the emotion of the symphony does not matter, but the spirit does.

Hailing as it does from the early period, it is astonishing how deeply the symphony moves us today, in spite of its conventional harmonic idiom and its derivations, and even approaches to banality. This is because it speaks with such greatness and sincerity of things that really matter.

To hear this heroic symphony is to note Sibelius not wholly freed from German convention, nevertheless already a giant among his fellows, composing with a seven-league stride that they neither knew nor conceived, and gifted with a virility, a fresh northern sense of beauty and a power of form unhappily denied punier though wishful colleagues.

The performances yesterday were of the most exceptional sort. Few are the conductors to be trusted with the later Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitzky, so far as we may know from limited opportunities of hearing the later scores, still caviar to the general, excels the more in the challenge they offer to musicianship, sensibility, insight, and the qualities of a born leader. The orchestra played impeccably, and at the same time with a flexibility and apparent spontaneity in expression hardly to be overpraised.

It goes almost without saying that at the end of the finale, when the portals of the skies swing asunder and the great chant of victory and defiance is heard, that the audience crashed into applause and cheers.

But this is also important: the same audience applauded and also cheered, if on a smaller scale, the Seventh Symphony, which is another, and subtler, story. It is apparent that Sibelius has come so much into his own that other conductors need not fear to follow the lead, in producing his late works, of Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 13 1941

Honor Sibelius

Celebrating, though a little late, the 75th anniversary of the birth of Jean Sibelius, which occurred on Dec. 8, 1865, Serge Koussevitzky devoted the Boston Symphony's program Saturday at Carnegie Hall to three symphonies by the Finnish master—the Sixth, the Seventh and the Second. It was a particular pleasure to hear the Sixth, which has been neglected here. Though not one of the more striking of the set, it has in its quieter way marked character.

Still, three symphonies in succession by one composer, and he a modern, is something of an ordeal, even when the officiating orchestra is the magnificent Boston Symphony. Here stand combined the disadvantages of a one-composer program and an all-symphony program. The tribute to Sibelius would have been even more impressive had it been spread out over more than a single concert. P.S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL
& AMERICAN
JAN 12 1941

Vast Audience Enjoys 'Festival' of Sibelius

By GRENA BENNETT

Another page was added to this season's Sibelius Festival at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted an entire [illegible] to works by Finland's great composer.

As a general thing, a one-composer program is a difficult problem for both the performer and the listener, for often there is a similarity in the substance of the scores and that spells for a lack in variety.

But Sibelius is versatile in expressing his thoughts in notes and also in the treatment of his ideas, and yesterday's list afforded grateful opportunities for the instrumentalists, guided by a masterly conductor, and unalloyed pleasure for an audience that completely filled the hall.

Three symphonies were presented, the program opening with the infrequently played Sixth, a work drawn in subdued colors, tenderly imaginative, reserved in its dramatic proclamations and profound in emotional inference. It was given a conscientious and revealing interpretation.

The Seventh followed and was presented without a pause. That symphony has been described as "the summit of the composer's powers in respect of fecundity of invention and subtlety and intricacy of design." The concert ended with the No. 2 symphony with its leanings toward sober, sombre folk tunes of the North.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 14 1941

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had celebrated Jean Sibelius' 75th birthday in their home concerts last month by playing his sixth, seventh and second symphonies, repeated them Saturday in their second matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall, writes Francis D. Perkins in the New York Herald-Tribune. Those who wished also to hear the noted Finnish composer's first symphony had only to wait a few hours before going to the National Broadcasting Company's Studio 8H, or turning on the radio and listening to the NBC Symphony's second program under Alfred Wallenstein's direction. This was probably one of the few times in local musical annals that four symphonies by a single living composer were played here within one day.

The principal orchestral programs offered here during the official Sibelius Week in December gave the impression that Sibelius had written only two symphonies, the first and the second. Dr. Koussevitzky made a more representative and informative choice, contrasting the second symphony, composed at the turn of the century, with the composer's last two works in this form, completed in 1923 and 1924.

The second symphony has become almost too popular within the last few years; the seventh is heard not infrequently, but the sixth has had only one previous performance in Carnegie Hall, [illegible]at was 11 years ago, also under Dr. Koussevitzky, Leopold Stokowski had brought it to Philadelphia five years before that, but had withheld it from his New York concerts.

There are features enough common to the second and sixth symphonies which reveal that they are the work of the same hand. But it is not hard to see why the earlier work is popular, and why the later may never become a hard-ridden symphonic warhorse. The late Sibelian agglutinative thematic structure, here exhibited in its fullest development, does not provide an immediately memorable, sharply defined tune such as that which strides to a climax in the finale of the second symphony. Vivid displays of orchestral color are few; so are marked dynamic contrasts; the composer here waxes neither tragic nor triumphant. It begins quietly, it ends quietly, and never becomes vociferous.

[illegible] also in the symphonies by Prokofieff and Schubert which preceded it; and Mr. Wallenstein showed himself equally at ease in the limpid Schubert score and in the witty pages of Prokofieff.

Although he is still young in his career, Mr. Wallenstein has proved himself an artist to be reckoned with; and it may well be that in the person of Mr. Wallenstein an American musician will rise to eminence in a field where at present we are in debt to many other countries.

Dimitri Mitropulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, yesterday afternoon concluded four weeks of guest appearances as conductor of the Philharmonic. His farewell program listed Roussel's Third Symphony and Mahler's First. The Frenchman fared better than the Bohemian, the latter being slipshod in spots. However, Mr. Mitropolous brought everything together for the finale, and the audience testified to his popularity here with a rousing ovation.

A concert by Otto Klemperer and the New York City Symphony concluded the orchestral offerings of the week end. Under Dr. Klemperer's skillful direction the orchestra performed ably in Mozart's G Minor Symphony and Tschaikowsky's Pathetique. Miss Susanne Fisher was a pleasant, if not exciting soprano soloist in three Mozart arias.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
JAN 13 1941

Sibelius Promi[illegible] In Week-End C[illegible]

By John [illegible]

The works of Jean Sibelius figured prominently in the week-end's orchestral schedule, four of the Finnish master's symphonies being performed in concerts by the Boston and NBC Symphony orchestras. Three of these, the Second, Sixth and Seventh, were played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, while the young American conductor, Alfred Wallenstein, brought his concert in Radio City to a close with Sibelius' First.

On such an occasion a comparison, however odious, is inevitable in the reviewer's mind; and it is a pleasure to report that Mr. Wallenstein was not altogether overshadowed by the great Boston conductor. True, Dr. Koussevitzky is a mature craftsman, rich in years and ripe in experience; and on the fingers of a leper's hand may be counted those men who can match the strength, the vigor, the crystal clarity and the fiery splendor of his luminous readings of Saturday afternoon.

Yet Mr. Wallenstein is not less a sincere, thoughtful artist. His conducting Saturday evening was crisp, vigorous, authoritative, his concept of the business at hand clear and well integrated. Under his baton the

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1941

Koussevitzky Presents Three Sibelius Works

Boston Symphony Concert Offers Sixth, Seventh and Second Symphonies

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had celebrated Jean Sibelius's seventy-fifth birthday in their home concerts last month by playing his sixth, seventh and second symphonies, repeated them Saturday in their second matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. Those who wished also to hear the noted Finnish composer's first symphony had only to wait a few hours before going to the National Broadcasting Company's Studio 8H, or turning on the radio and listening to the NBC Symphony's second program under Alfred Wallenstein's direction. This was probably one of the few times in local musical annals that four symphonies by a single living composer were played here within one day.

The principal orchestral programs offered here during the official Sibelius Week in December gave the impression that Sibelius had written only two symphonies, the first and the second. Dr. Koussevitzky made a more representative and informative choice, contrasting the second symphony, composed at the turn of the century, with the composer's last two works in this form, completed in 1923 and 1924.

The second symphony has become almost too popular within the last few years; the seventh is heard not infrequently, but the sixth has had only one previous performance in Carnegie Hall. That was eleven years ago, also under Dr. Koussevitzky. Leopold Stokowski had brought it to Philadelphia five years before that, but had withheld it from his New York concerts.

There are features enough common to the second and sixth symphonies which reveal that they are the work of the same hand. But it is not hard to see why the earlier work is poular, and why the later may never become a hard-ridden symphonic warhorse. The late Sibelian agglutinative thematic structure, here exhibited in its fullest development, does not provide an immediately memorable, sharply defined tune such as that which strides to a climax in the finale of the second symphony. Vivid displays of orchestral color are few; so are marked dynamic contrasts; the composer here waxes neither tragic nor triumphant. It begins quietly, it ends quietly, and never becomes vociferous.

To quote from Cecil Gray—it is hard to write much about Sibelius without calling upon Britain's arch-Sibelian—the impression which the sixth symphony makes at a first hearing may be somewhat negative. As compared with the second symphony, or the warm-hued seventh, it may seem to be generally pale music. Yet, in spite of measures which still might seem inconclusive after further acquaintance, it has an appeal of its own. It suggests that, with its subtle variety of usually subdued tints, its ingenuity of structure, its unobtrusive melodic ideas and relative calmness of mood, it may come to be regarded as one of the composer's most significant and individual contributions.

The orchestra, in its usual admirable form, played the sixth symphony with the clarity and finesse of shading which it requires, and, throughout the program, displayed the executive qualities which lead many to rank it as the foremost American organization in its field. Dr. Koussevitzky's readings showed a realization of the essential differences, as well as the similarities, which characterize the three works. The house was sold out in advance.

In their evening broadcast Mr. Wallenstein and the NBC Symphony Orchestra prefaced the Sibelius first symphony with Schubert's fifth symphony, in B flat, and Prokofieff's Classical Symphony. The latter was interpreted with praiseworthy crispness and delicacy. Meanwhile, at Carnegie Hall, Dimitri Mitropoulos was conducting his last concert but one of the season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, offering Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven's quartet in C sharp minor, arranged for full string orchestra; Roussel's third symphony, in G minor, and the second suite from Alfredo Casella's opera "La Donna Serpente."

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 12 1941

SIBELIUS PROGRAM AT CARNEGIE HALL

Koussevitzky Conducts Boston Symphony in Compositions by Finnish Master

7TH SYMPHONY IS HEARD

Second and Sixth Works in the Same Musical Form Also Are Interpreted by Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES

Apropos of the seventy-fifth birthday of Jean Sibelius, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted the entire program of their concert yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall to his music. The program was exceptional, even in these days of universal recognition of Sibelius and the nation-wide anniversary performances of his composition. For Dr. Koussevitzky, in contradistinction to the great number of conductors who have contented themselves with the tried and true Sibelius of the early symphonies and tone-poems, and who, of all conductors in America has stood alone in his propagation of all the Sibelius symphonies, played yesterday the Sixth, the Seventh, and the Second works in that form.

The Second, a sure-fire symphony today with all audiences and a magnificent work of the early period, is nevertheless far from the concentrated originality of the last four of the symphonies. And if the perfect Sibeliusite had been consulted, he would have said, "let us have the Fourth symphony as well as Six and Seven," and then his cup would have been full, since the Fifth is the only one of the latter symphonies which has had a great degree of attention in recent months, and the Fourth is not only the greatest of the seven, but certainly one of the greatest and most original works in modern music.

Sixth Symphony Offered

But it was an exceptional privilege to hear the Sixth Symphony, which, if memory serves us properly, has been played only once before in New York, and then by Koussevitzky. It is the most transparent, the most serene and joyous of all the symphonies, and of such apparent spontaneity that were it not for the logic and concentration of the form it would appear as a symphonic improvisation.

The symphony is the purest kind of music making. The four short movements are not interrelated by some special thematic scheme so much as they are extremely integrated in the prevalent character of the music, the economy of the material, and the prevailing mood. There are familiar landmarks of Sibelius's style, but here, as elsewhere, each idea is pursued to ultimates of its own.

Thus Sibelius has said that he is the "slave" of his themes. Certainly he has escaped completely, in this work, the German rules of battle-doring and shuttle-cocking thematic fragments in the fixed divisions of the classic sonata form. His themes carry their development within themselves. The theme is a germinal substance which grows, so to speak, after laws of its own species, in the symphonic soil. One fragment permeates a whole movement. Another is a shorter and more temporal growth.

The four movements of the Sixth are so consequent each upon the other that it is easy to understand why Sibelius made the Seventh symphony, in its final revision, in one movement. This was the inevitable evolution of the kind of thought and development that the Sixth, though it is a work in a different emotional vein, had predicated. And if one asked—not for a meaning, unless serenity, beauty itself, the beauty that is not of the salon or of anything but the free air and earth, could be called a "meaning"—but for some suggestive analogy to give a clue to the character of this work, the nearest clue to be logically supplied would be a picture of the forests and fens, the rocks and the pines and skies of Finland herself, with a thought, perhaps, of fragments of sublimated folk-song, and at the last a vista, gradually fading in the distance, of this panorama. No symphony could have a simpler ending. It comes with ever more tranquility and finality with a phrase in thirds which narrows down to a simple unison of first and second violins. We can conceive of no conclusion more complete, more poetical, in its simplicity.

The Seventh symphony is better known than Number Six; its beauty and nobility grow with every repetition. Simplicity again is the watchword, or rather the essence of the work, since Sibelius, in contradistinction to the great majority of modern composers, cliques, propagandists, "schools," never writes a symphony according to preconceived theory, but inevitably in response to an expressive need.

We know little that is more original and more haunting in the beauty of the thought, and in formal balance, than the preparation for what is actually the theme of the whole symphony—the sculptured phrase of the solo trombone, which enters, like some pilgrim from the skies, and returns on two principal occasions in the course of the work—the first repetition being with a quality of sternness and majesty over rolling chromatic scales of the strings, the second repetition and final appearance bringing the sunset glow of the final pages with echoes of thematic fragments against a harmonic background that is like an evening sky.

The last two of the Sibelius symphonies, as it happens, are the symphonies of a time of tranquillity and ripeness of the composer's art. They grow as truly from the earlier works as leaves from a tree. They represent a wholly exceptional continuity of development and that consistency is the result of the complete originality and independence that Sibelius has shown of all the schools, the cliques and the mutual admiration societies of the composers of Europe.

It was no doubt in part for concert purposes, but as it happens, with dramatic coincidence, that the concert ended with the Second Symphony, a work begotten of national romanticism and the days of Finland's rebellion against foreign tyranny of the early 1900's. The source of the emotion of the symphony does not matter, but the spirit does.

Hailing as it does from the early period, it is astonishing how deeply the symphony moves us today, in spite of its conventional harmonic idiom and its derivations, and even approaches to banality. This is because it speaks with such greatness and sincerity of things that really matter.

To hear this heroic symphony is to note Sibelius not wholly freed from German convention, nevertheless already a giant among his fellows, composing with a seven-league stride that they neither knew nor conceived, and gifted with a virility, a fresh northern sense of beauty and a power of form unhappily denied punier though wishful colleagues.

The performances yesterday were of the most exceptional sort. Few are the conductors to be trusted with the later Sibelius. Dr. Koussevitzky, so far as we may know from limited opportunities of hearing the later scores, still caviar to the general, excels the more in the challenge they offer to musicianship, sensibility, insight, and the qualities of a born leader. The orchestra played impeccably, and at the same time with a flexibility and apparent spontaneity in expression hardly to be overpraised.

It goes almost without saying that at the end of the finale, when the portals of the skies swing asunder and the great chant of victory and defiance is heard, that the audience crashed into applause and cheers.

But this is also important: the same audience applauded and also cheered, if on a smaller scale, the Seventh Symphony, which is another, and subtler, story. It is apparent that Sibelius has come so much into his own that other conductors need not fear to follow the lead, in producing his late works, of Koussevitzky.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
JAN 13 1941

Honor Sibelius

Celebrating, though a little late, the 75th anniversary of the birth of Jean Sibelius, which occurred on Dec. 8, 1865, Serge Koussevitzky devoted the Boston Symphony's program Saturday at Carnegie Hall to three symphonies by the Finnish master—the Sixth, the Seventh and the Second. It was a particular pleasure to hear the Sixth, which has been neglected here. Though not one of the more striking of the set, it has in its quieter way marked character.

Still, three symphonies in succession by one composer, and he a modern, is something of an ordeal, even when the officiating orchestra is the magnificent Boston Symphony. Here stand combined the disadvantages of a one-composer program and an all-symphony program. The tribute to Sibelius would have been even more impressive had it been spread out over more than a single concert. P.S.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUNDAY JOURNAL
& AMERICAN
JAN 12 1941

Vast Audience Enjoys 'Festival' of Sibelius

By GRENA BENNETT

Another page was added to this season's Sibelius Festival at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon when Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra devoted an entire [illegible] to works by Finland's great composer.

As a general thing, a one-composer program is a difficult problem for both the performer and the listener, for often there is a similarity in the substance of the scores and that spells for a lack in variety.

But Sibelius is versatile in expressing his thoughts in notes and also in the treatment of his ideas, and yesterday's list afforded grateful opportunities for the instrumentalists, guided by a masterly conductor, and unalloyed pleasure for an audience that completely filled the hall.

Three symphonies were presented, the program opening with the infrequently played Sixth, a work drawn in subdued colors, tenderly imaginative, reserved in its dramatic proclamations and profound in emotional inference. It was given a conscientious and revealing interpretation.

The Seventh followed and was presented without a pause. That symphony has been described as "the summit of the composer's powers in respect of fecundity of invention and subtlety and intricacy of design." The concert ended with the No. 2 symphony with its leanings toward sober, sombre folk tunes of the North.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 14 1941

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had celebrated Jean Sibelius' 75th birthday in their home concerts last month by playing his sixth, seventh and second symphonies, repeated them Saturday in their second matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall, writes Francis D. Perkins in the New York Herald-Tribune. Those who wished also to hear the noted Finnish composer's first symphony had only to wait a few hours before going to the National Broadcasting Company's Studio 8H, or turning on the radio and listening to the NBC Symphony's second program under Alfred Wallenstein's direction. This was probably one of the few times in local musical annals that four symphonies by a single living composer were played here within one day.

The principal orchestral programs offered here during the official Sibelius Week in December gave the impression that Sibelius had written only two symphonies, the first and the second. Dr. Koussevitzky made a more representative and informative choice, contrasting the second symphony, composed at the turn of the century, with the composer's last two works in this [illegible] 10 years.

[illegible] for new homes exists, and applications being submitted to the FHA indicate that this demand is still alive.

The FHA official pointed out that although there naturally has been a seasonal decline from the peak business of the Summer and early Fall applications still continue to show sharp increases over last year's level. This indicates that new residential construction during the coming weeks will reach the highest Winter level seen in this section in more than

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
JAN 13 1941

Sibelius Prominent In Week-End Concerts

By John Briggs

The works of Jean Sibelius figured prominently in the week-end's orchestral schedule, four of the Finnish master's symphonies being performed in concerts by the Boston and NBC Symphony orchestras. Three of these, the Second, Sixth and Seventh, were played by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, while the young American conductor, Alfred Wallenstein, brought his concert in Radio City to a close with Sibelius' First.

On such an occasion a comparison, however odious, is inevitable in the reviewer's mind; and it is a pleasure to report that Mr. Wallenstein was not altogether overshadowed by the great Boston conductor. True, Dr. Koussevitzky is a mature craftsman, rich in years and ripe in experience; and on the fingers of a leper's hand may be counted those men who can match the strength, the vigor, the crystal clarity and the fiery splendor of his luminous readings of Saturday afternoon.

Yet Mr. Wallenstein is not less a sincere, thoughtful artist. His conducting Saturday evening was crisp, vigorous, authoritative, his concept of the business at hand clear and well integrated. Under his baton the men of the NBC Symphony acquitted themselves with distinction, not only in the Sibelius, but also in the symphonies by Prokofieff and Schubert which preceded it; and Mr. Wallenstein showed himself equally at ease in the limpid Schubert score and in the witty pages of Prokofieff.

Although he is still young in his career, Mr. Wallenstein has proved himself an artist to be reckoned with; and it may well be that in the person of Mr. Wallenstein an American musician will rise to eminence in a field where at present we are in debt to many other countries.

Dimitri Mitropulos, conductor of the Minneapolis Symphony, yesterday afternoon concluded four weeks of guest appearances as conductor of the Philharmonic. His farewell program listed Roussel's Third Symphony and Mahler's First. The Frenchman fared better than the Bohemian, the latter being slipshod in spots. However, Mr. Mitropolous brought everything together for the finale, and the audience testified to his popularity here with a rousing ovation.

A concert by Otto Klemperer and the New York City Symphony concluded the orchestral offerings of the week end. Under Dr. Klemperer's skillful direction the orchestra performed ably in Mozart's G Minor Symphony and Tschaikowsky's Pathetique. Miss Susanne Fisher was a pleasant, if not exciting soprano soloist in three Mozart arias.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
JAN 13 1941

Koussevitzky Presents Three Sibelius Works

Boston Symphony Concert Offers Sixth, Seventh and Second Symphonies

By Francis D. Perkins

Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who had celebrated Jean Sibelius's seventy-fifth birthday in their home concerts last month by playing his sixth, seventh and second symphonies, repeated them Saturday in their second matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall. Those who wished also to hear the noted Finnish composer's first symphony had only to wait a few hours before going to the National Broadcasting Company's Studio 8H, or turning on the radio and listening to the NBC Symphony's second program under Alfred Wallenstein's direction. This was probably one of the few times in local musical annals that four symphonies by a single living composer were played here within one day.

The principal orchestral programs offered here during the official Sibelius Week in December gave the impression that Sibelius had written only two symphonies, the first and the second. Dr. Koussevitzky made a more representative and informative choice, contrasting the second symphony, composed at the turn of the century, with the composer's last two works in this form, completed in 1923 and 1924.

The second symphony has become almost too popular within the last few years; the seventh is heard not infrequently, but the sixth has had only one previous performance in Carnegie Hall. That was eleven years ago, also under Dr. Koussevitzky. Leopold Stokowski had brought it to Philadelphia five years before that, but had withheld it from his New York concerts.

There are features enough common to the second and sixth symphonies which reveal that they are the work of the same hand. But it is not hard to see why the earlier work is poular, and why the later may never become a hard-ridden symphonic warhorse. The late Sibelian agglutinative thematic structure, here exhibited in its fullest development, does not provide an immediately memorable, sharply defined tune such as that which strides to a climax in the finale of the second symphony. Vivid displays of orchestral color are few; so are marked dynamic contrasts; the composer here waxes neither tragic nor triumphant. It begins quietly, it ends quietly, and never becomes vociferous.

To quote from Cecil Gray—it is hard to write much about Sibelius without calling upon Britain's arch-Sibelian—the impression which the sixth symphony makes at a first hearing may be somewhat negative. As compared with the second symphony, or the warm-hued seventh, it may seem to be generally pale music. Yet, in spite of measures which still might seem inconclusive after further acquaintance, it has an appeal of its own. It suggests that, with its subtle variety of usually subdued tints, its ingenuity of structure, its unobtrusive melodic ideas and relative calmness of mood, it may come to be regarded as one of the composer's most significant and individual contributions.

The orchestra, in its usual admirable form, played the sixth symphony with the clarity and finesse of shading which it requires, and, throughout the program, displayed the executive qualities which lead many to rank it as the foremost American organization in its field. Dr. Koussevitzky's readings showed a realization of the essential differences, as well as the similarities, which characterize the three works. The house was sold out in advance.

In their evening broadcast Mr. Wallenstein and the NBC Symphony Orchestra prefaced the Sibelius first symphony with Schubert's fifth symphony, in B flat, and Prokofieff's Classical Symphony. The latter was interpreted with praiseworthy crispness and delicacy. Meanwhile, at Carnegie Hall, Dimitri Mitropoulos was conducting his last concert but one of the season with the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra, offering Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven's quartet in C sharp minor, arranged for full string orchestra; Roussel's third symphony, in G minor, and the second suite from Alfredo Casella's opera "La Donna Serpente."

65

New Symphony from Stravinsky

Composer Will Conduct This Week's Performances

By Winthrop P. Tryon

If Igor Stravinsky were a serious composer, the world might know how to take him. If his music were not a continual variation on "Pétrouchka," journalists who discuss it might arrive at some fixed conclusions. Comedy can hardly be the sole motive of his doings, yet it seems to be an important enough one to keep people in a state of curious suspense about him. Nobody knows just when the laugh will come, though come it will; and listeners, not to get caught, must refrain from settling down into a too sober mood.

With him, indeed, a surprise is always preparing. Nor does Mr. Stravinsky as citizen disclose himself a much different type from Mr. Stravinsky as composer. Inventor of surprises, he avoids being surprised himself; and if he sometimes appears to put himself at hazard, that just serves to trap the unwary.

A fairly safe method of approach, perhaps, for a person meeting him to adopt is to make a remark a little the opposite of what one means. Then if it gets turned back, the equation finds balance and all stands as before. When I happened to hear the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra practice some measures of the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 2 under Mr. Stravinsky's baton, in preparation for this week's concerts, I was struck with the "modernness" of the music. I could scarcely help thinking the neglected work contained something prophetic of today, notwithstanding its rather gray aspect in point of melody and tune. Speaking later with Mr. Stravinsky, I ventured the exaggeration that the Second Symphony was a better job than the Sixth and ought to replace that great favorite in the repertory.

* * *

"Oh, you like it," he answered, "because you have never heard it before. I am presenting it all around the country where I travel as visiting conductor, but I know the difference between it and the Sixth as a composition."

Thereupon he warmly expressed his liking for the Symphony No. 6, which we know as the "Pathetic;" and any praise he gave it could never surpass what I would be ready to bestow on it any day.

"The only trouble with the Sixth," he observed, "is in being performed everywhere and all the time."

For another risk, I reminded Mr. Stravinsky of his telling me when he first came to the United States 16 years ago this very month that he had abandoned the "Pétrouchka" style of composing and was making a new start on old-school methods. To which he replied:

"Oh, no; nothing of the sort. I kept right on doing what I always did."

He impressed me, at my original encounter with him, as really joking; nevertheless I took down his words and duly reported them. The musical world certainly has got the impression that he made a big swing back there, that he returned to the eighteenth century and to Bach for a fresh beginning, and that he became a classicist, neo-classicist, or what you will. With the same fun in his eye as before, he now says:

"I never change. I go ahead."

* * *

Once a work is scored and published, the composer's comment goes for little. Thereafter the writing abides or fades out, in proportion to its merits. Now Mr. Stravinsky offers to the attention of Bostonians this week the Symphony in C which he contributed to the recent celebration of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary. The symphony stands in manuscript, or what amounts to the same thing, in photostatic print, and it may or may not look hereafter as it reads today. But possible changes allowed for, the pages present a generally classic appearance, though certain of the staffs here and there show extremely advanced traits. The instrumental layout differs somewhat from Beethoven's, though hardly enough to call for explanation. No plan for big noise or for immensity of any sort comes to view. A reader feels the atmosphere, rather than of a grand orchestra, of an ensemble where each string division and each wind instrument holds its own individuality.

The first movement, one might say, takes off from a century and a half ago, as though the purpose were to start artistic progress over again, to remake musical history, and to rediscover the orchestra and design a form for it anew. Certain requirements are set, however, that would have been out of the question in other times, such as staccato for horns and exquisite detail for the woodwinds. Then the violin contingent, far from being there just to fill in sonority, remains silent when not needed.

* * *

Humorous touches, we may be sure, abound, now for flute, now clarinet, now oboe, and now bassoon. For Mr. Stravinsky stays, as he began, a man of the stage. He knows how to sound a strain of melody that the ear remembers. Somewhat on this line Miss Nadia Boulanger, teacher of composing, made remark to me the other day when I found her in the midst of preparing a lecture on the Stravinsky Symphony in C. "Perhaps you think," said she, "that the artist in a case like this is following nature. But I do not think so. For I believe that art comes first and nature afterwards."

Miss Boulanger must have meant that we really get at nature only when the artist provides a flash of interpretation wherewith we secure a glimpse of it. More particularly, she gave me a word of inside instruction, proceeding from her experience as a conductor, in regard to Mr. Stravinsky's management of rhythm. For in the rhythmic realm the Symphony in C, in its remarkable third movement, which is more or less a scherzo, achieves some novel effects. "The music must be directed," she said, marking patterns out in the air with her hand, "exactly as the notation prescribes. If a fast one-two-three is followed by a slow one-two, the conductor must not break up the one-two into a one-two-three-four just for convenience's sake, but must obey all indications."

Going Over the Score of Stravinsky's Symphony in C Major

Nadia Boulanger and the composer examine the new work which will be presented at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge and Boston. Mlle. Boulanger will lecture on the symphony tomorrow at 4:30 p. m. at 49 Beacon Street, under the auspices of the Longy School of Music.

CSM Jan 14

Stravinsky Feast

Jan 17

French-Russian Composer Conducts His New Symphony in C Major With Boston Symphony

A TITAN of modern musics stood yesterday afternoon on the stage of Symphony Hall, a tragically shrunken form. It was Igor Stravinsky, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his latest Symphony in C major, an arid and pretentious piece of craftsmanship. Or so it seemed at second hearing. Early impressions of a work of art are notoriously unreliable. But first and second hearings are all we have to go on here, and to be honest, they were extremely dull. All that seems to be left of the Stravinsky of a quarter century ago, is his indomitable rhythmic vitality. The C major Symphony was politely applauded, for after all Stravinsky is, or was, a great composer. And, of course, his symphony is in the best possible taste. But who, in the berserk days of Stravinsky's youth would have dreamed of characterizing the "Sacre du Printemps" or even "Oiseau de Feu" or "Petroushka" as being in good taste? They did not need to be, and nobody cared whether they were or not, for they had the flame of genius. Who ever thinks of Beethoven or Michalangelo or a gothic cathedral as being in good taste? When taste becomes a major question in a work of art, decadence begins.

In the kaleidoscopic career of Stravinsky's post-war eclecticism everything—neo-romantic, neo-classical, neo-Tchaikovsky — has been in good taste. But the destructive power of snobbish Parisian aesthetics of the past 30 years is nowhere more evident than in Stravinsky's new symphony, composed "to the glory of God and dedicated to the Chicago Symphony Orchestra."

In his symphony Stravinsky has followed the classical pattern. Whether his dedication is also part of this pattern might be hard, even say, though
Haydn bega
"In nomine
with "Laus D

The relati than that.
recapture in attitudes and late 18th with mild
nance, it is
and so conservative in its demeanor that, to the naive, it may sound paradoxically radical —though this is a radicalism which wears a little with repitition. The objectivity of calssicism is carried to extremes. With the best will in the world, this listener could discover no warmth, no emotion, no humor at all in Stravinsky's latest work.

The symphony would seem to leave God just about where it found him.

The program opened with a Divertimento from Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee"—music which goes well enough to accompany the gyrations of ballerinas and premiers danseurs, but which has only the faintest possible interest on the concert stage. Like all of Stravinsky's late works, it is adroit, sleek, it abounds in clever effects, rhythms are consistently interesting, and from beginning to end of the score nothing happens. Perhaps that is what Stravinsky intended. It appears to be consciously superficial, decorative music. But it is not even successfully diverting, and why such a score should find its way into Boston Symphony programs is just one of those riddles.

The best received, and by far the most interesting music on the program was Tchaikovsky's weak Second Symphony. If it is inconsequential as a symphony. it is not inconsequential in Tchaikovsky's evolution. And the last two movements contain much simply, honestly felt and skilfully orchestrated music. Stravinsky's pre-occupation with Tchaikovsky is well known. He has often conducted the Second Symphony elsewhere, and one was grateful to him yesterday for bringing back to us a work which is almost never played.

E. D.

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
JAN 15 1941

Boston Symphony to Give Sesquicentennial Concert

Orchestra Performance to Climax 3-Day Celebration at University in October

Plans for a gala three-day celebration to be climaxed by a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were completed here today as a part of the University of Vermont observance of the Sesquicentennial.

The celebration, scheduled to take place on Oct. 3, 4, 5, will feature the symphony performance under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Memorial Auditorium on Sunday evening, Oct. 5, according to Dr. Harry F. Perkins, chairman of arrangements who met recently with committee members to complete plans.

Other Outstanding Events

The program outlined also includes many other outstanding events such as individual meetings of different colleges of the University on Friday to which each college is inviting eminent scholars in various fields. Departmental exhibits will be displayed.

The College of Medicine is planning to hold its meeting in conjunction with the Vermont State Medical group.

Although many colleges of the University have scheduled banquets for the evening of Oct. 3, a large general meeting to be led by prominent men and women, widely recognized authorities in different fields, will also be held for the purpose of summarizing and co-ordinating the work of the individual college meetings.

Scheduled for Saturday morning, Oct. 4 at 10 o'clock, the official convocation will be followed by the dedication of the new Waterman Memorial building at 11:30 with a football game and open house at Southwick slated for the afternoon and a reception and dance also at Southwick planned as evening entertainment.

Special vesper services will be held on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 5, following which Fleming Museum will hold open house. The Symphony concert is to be heard in Memorial Auditorium Sunday evening.

65

New Symphony from Stravinsky

Composer Will Conduct This Week's Performances

By Winthrop P. Tryon

If Igor Stravinsky were a serious composer, the world might know how to take him. If his music were not a continual variation on "Pétrouchka," journalists who discuss it might arrive at some fixed conclusions. Comedy can hardly be the sole motive of his doings, yet it seems to be an important enough one to keep people in a state of curious suspense about him. Nobody knows just when the laugh will come, though come it will; and listeners, not to get caught, must refrain from settling down into a too sober mood.

With him, indeed, a surprise is always preparing. Nor does Mr. Stravinsky as citizen disclose himself a much different type from Mr. Stravinsky as composer. Inventor of surprises, he avoids being surprised himself; and if he sometimes appears to put himself at hazard, that just serves to trap the unwary.

A fairly safe method of approach, perhaps, for a person meeting him to adopt is to make a remark a little the opposite of what one means. Then if it gets turned back, the equation finds balance and all stands as before. When I happened to hear the men of the Boston Symphony Orchestra practice some measures of the Tchaikowsky Symphony No. 2 under Mr. Stravinsky's baton, in preparation for this week's concerts, I was struck with the "modernness" of the music. I could scarcely help thinking the neglected work contained something prophetic of today, notwithstanding its rather gray aspect in point of melody and tune. Speaking later with Mr. Stravinsky, I ventured the exaggeration that the Second Symphony was a better job than the Sixth and ought to replace that great favorite in the repertory.

* * *

"Oh, you like it," he answered, "because you have never heard it before. I am presenting it all around the country where I travel as visiting conductor, but I know the difference between it and the Sixth as a composition."

Thereupon he warmly expressed his liking for the Symphony No. 6, which we know as the "Pathetic;" and any praise he gave it could never surpass what I would be ready to bestow on it any day.

"The only trouble with the Sixth," he observed, "is in being performed everywhere and all the time."

For another risk, I reminded Mr. Stravinsky of his telling me when he first came to the United States 16 years ago this very month that he had abandoned the "Pétrouchka" style of composing and was making a new start on old-school methods. To which he replied:

"Oh, no; nothing of the sort. I kept right on doing what I always did."

He impressed me, at my original encounter with him, as really joking; nevertheless I took down his words and duly reported them. The musical world certainly has got the impression that he made a big swing back there, that he returned to the eighteenth century and to Bach for a fresh beginning, and that he became a classicist, neo-classicist, or what you will. With the same fun in his eye as before, he now says:

"I never change. I go ahead."

* * *

Once a work is scored and published, the composer's comment goes for little. Thereafter the writing abides or fades out, in proportion to its merits. Now Mr. Stravinsky offers to the attention of Bostonians this week the Symphony in C which he contributed to the recent celebration of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth anniversary. The symphony stands in manuscript, or what amounts to the same thing, in photostatic print, and it may or may not look hereafter as it reads today. But possible changes allowed for, the pages present a generally classic appearance, though certain of the staffs here and there show extremely advanced traits. The instrumental layout differs somewhat from Beethoven's, though hardly enough to call for explanation. No plan for big noise or for immensity of any sort comes to view. A reader feels the atmosphere, rather than of a grand orchestra, of an ensemble where each string division and each wind instrument holds its own individuality.

The first movement, one might say, takes off from a century and a half ago, as though the purpose were to start artistic progress over again, to remake musical history, and to rediscover the orchestra and design a form for it anew. Certain requirements are set, however, that would have been out of the question in other times, such as staccato for horns and exquisite detail for the woodwinds. Then the violin contingent, far from being there just to fill in sonority, remains silent when not needed.

* * *

Humorous touches, we may be sure, abound, now for flute, now clarinet, now oboe, and now bassoon. For Mr. Stravinsky stays, as he began, a man of the stage. He knows how to sound a strain of melody that the ear remembers. Somewhat on this line Miss Nadia Boulanger, teacher of composing, made remark to me the other day when I found her in the midst of preparing a lecture on the Stravinsky Symphony in C. "Perhaps you think," said she, "that the artist in a case like this is following nature. But I do not think so. For I believe that art comes first and nature afterwards."

Miss Boulanger must have meant that we really get at nature only when the artist provides a flash of interpretation wherewith we secure a glimpse of it. More particularly, she gave me a word of inside instruction, proceeding from her experience as a conductor, in regard to Mr. Stravinsky's management of rhythm. For in the rhythmic realm the Symphony in C, in its remarkable third movement, which is more or less a scherzo, achieves some novel effects. "The music must be directed," she said, marking patterns out in the air with her hand, "exactly as the notation prescribes. If a fast one-two-three is followed by a slow one-two, the conductor must not break up the one-two into a one-two-three-four just for convenience's sake, but must obey all indications."

Going Over the Score of Stravinsky's Symphony in C Major

Nadia Boulanger and the composer examine the new work which will be presented at this week's concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge and Boston. Mlle. Boulanger will lecture on the symphony tomorrow at 4:30 p. m. at 49 Beacon Street, under the auspices of the Longy School of Music.

CSM Jan 14

Stravinsky Feast

Jan 17

French-Russian Composer Conducts His New Symphony in C Major With Boston Symphony

A TITAN of modern musics stood yesterday afternoon on the stage of Symphony Hall, a tragically shrunken form. It was Igor Stravinsky, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra in his latest Symphony in C major, an arid and pretentious piece of craftsmanship. Or so it seemed at second hearing. Early impressions of a work of art are notoriously unreliable. But first and second hearings are all we have to go on here, and to be honest, they were extremely dull. All that seems to be left of the Stravinsky of a quarter century ago, is his indomitable rhythmic vitality. The C major Symphony was politely applauded, for after all Stravinsky is, or was, a great composer. And, of course, his symphony is in the best possible taste. But who, in the berserk days of Stravinsky's youth would have dreamed of characterizing the "Sacre du Printemps" or even "Oiseau de Feu" or "Petroushka" as being in good taste? They did not need to be, and nobody cared whether they were or not, for they had the flame of genius. Who ever thinks of Beethoven or Michalangelo or a gothic cathedral as being in good taste? When taste becomes a major question in a work of art, decadence begins.

In the kaleidoscopic career of Stravinsky's post-war eclecticism everything—neo-romantic, neo-classical, neo-Tchaikovsky — has been in good taste. But the destructive power of snobbish Parisian aesthetics of the past 30 years is nowhere more evident than in Stravinsky's new symphony, composed "to the glory of God and dedicated to the Chicago Symphony Orchestra."

In his symphony Stravinsky has followed the classical pattern. Whether his dedication is also part of this pattern might be hard, even for Stravinsky, to say, though we do know that Haydn began every work with "In nomine Domini" and ended with "Laus Deo."

The relationship goes deeper than that. It is an attempt to recapture in 20th century terms attitudes and procedures of the late 18th century. Peppered with mild Stravinskian dissonance, it is soberly orchestrated and so conservative in its demeanor that, to the naive, it may sound paradoxically radical —though this is a radicalism which wears a little with repitition. The objectivity of calssicism is carried to extremes. With the best will in the world, this listener could discover no warmth, no emotion, no humor at all in Stravinsky's latest work.

The symphony would seem to leave God just about where it found him.

The program opened with a Divertimento from Stravinsky's "Baiser de la Fee"—music which goes well enough to accompany the gyrations of ballerinas and premiers danseurs, but which has only the faintest possible interest on the concert stage. Like all of Stravinsky's late works, it is adroit, sleek, it abounds in clever effects, rhythms are consistently interesting, and from beginning to end of the score nothing happens. Perhaps that is what Stravinsky intended. It appears to be consciously superficial, decorative music. But it is not even successfully diverting, and why such a score should find its way into Boston Symphony programs is just one of those riddles.

The best received, and by far the most interesting music on the program was Tchaikovsky's weak Second Symphony. If it is inconsequential as a symphony, it is not inconsequential in Tchaikovsky's evolution. And the last two movements contain much simply, honestly felt and skilfully orchestrated music. Stravinsky's pre-occupation with Tchaikovsky is well known. He has often conducted the Second Symphony elsewhere, and one was grateful to him yesterday for bringing back to us a work which is almost never played.

E. D.

This Clipping From
BURLINGTON, VT.
NEWS
JAN 15 1941

...ript's W... ...rt ...e

...ere ...

...-day celebration to be climaxed by a concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were completed here today as a part of the University of Vermont observance of the Sesquicentennial.

The celebration, scheduled to take place on Oct. 3, 4, 5, will feature the symphony performance under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky at the Memorial Auditorium on Sunday evening, Oct. 5, according to Dr. Harry F. Perkins, chairman of arrangements who met recently with committee members to complete plans.

Other Outstanding Events

The program outlined also includes many other outstanding events such as individual meetings of different colleges of the University on Friday to which each college is inviting eminent scholars in various fields. Departmental exhibits will be displayed.

The College of Medicine is planning to hold its meeting in conjunction with the Vermont State Medical group.

Although many colleges of the University have scheduled banquets for the evening of Oct. 3, a large general meeting to be led by prominent men and women, widely recognized authorities in different fields, will also be held for the purpose of summarizing and co-ordinating the work of the individual college meetings.

Scheduled for Saturday morning, Oct. 4 at 10 o'clock, the official convocation will be followed by the dedication of the new Waterman Memorial building at 11:30 with a football game and open house at Southwick slated for the afternoon and a reception and dance also at Southwick planned as evening entertainment.

Special vesper services will be held on Sunday afternoon, Oct. 5, following which Fleming Museum will hold open house. The Symphony concert is to be heard in Memorial Auditorium Sunday evening.

Stravinsky's New Symphony Is Fascinating and Original

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 12th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Igor Stravinsky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Divertimento from "Le baiser de la fee" Stravinsky
Symphony in C major.....Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 in C minor Op. 17 Tchaikovsky

Stravinsky's new Symphony is his most important work since the Symphony of Psalms. It differs, too, from the bulk of his music in that it is not written to a subject and does not require a chorus or a soloist and is content with the normal instrumentation of a symphony. In form it is easy to grasp with a little attention to the themes as they emerge. Any one familiar with the classical symphonic forms will not find himself confused by the architecture of this new and remarkable work. It is true that the notion of a minuet, passe-pied and fugue for the usual scherzo is novel, but it is not at all bewildering.

Yet the Symphony was evidently regarded by a large majority of yesterday's public as difficult and abstruse. In the lobbies during the intermission there was much shaking of heads, some downright annoyance and incredulity, a modicum of hearty enthusiasm. Count us among the last named. The Symphony seemed to us a fascinating and original work. We eagerly await another chance this evening to hear it again.

If the Symphony is classical in design for the most part, it is not so in matter. It is not such dissonant music as Stravinsky, himself, and many other composers have written. But, on the other hand, the harmonies are astringent rather than soothing. There is often a deliberate touch of archaism, as in the charming slow movement with its interweaving wind voices.

More often than not the thematic material is decidedly wry, as in the curious subject for the fugue in the third movement. The important theme in the first movement, most often heard on the oboe, is another example of this tendency which gives a distinctive character to the whole work. Rhythmically the Symphony never fails to be effective, whether the rhythms are simple and dance-like or highly complicated.

The first three movements should, after at least a second hearing, offer no particular difficulty to the ear, and the listener can then decide for himself whether he is attracted or repelled by the music. Some may feel that there is a certain emotional sameness, an insufficiency of contrast. But the Symphony, it should be noted, is short, and the contrast is intellectual rather than emotional. Had the composer wanted the other sort of change, common enough in classical music, he could easily have written that way. The fact that he did not suggests that he had good reason for concentrating the emotional content as he did.

The finale may always prevent the Symphony from enjoying great popularity. The alternation of dissonant, lugubrious slow material with a restless fast section and the spare, simple conclusion will never make the public stamp and cheer and go out singing. On the other hand it is clearly the right conclusion for this work; and, for all his expressed admiration for him, it is well to remember that Stravinsky is not Tchaikowsky.

Previously we heard Stravinsky's ingenious and delightful tribute to the latter, the Divertimento from "Le baiser de la fee," not at all a bad preparation. Mr. Stravinsky is inclined to take this suite more seriously than are other conductors, who spruce it up and deliver it almost as if it were a parody of Tchaikowsky. The charm of the piece lies not only in the way that the old material is treated but in the perky rhythms and the bright instrumentation. It is not a little like cleaning up grandfather's portrait and discovering that the old gentleman was actually a lively and handsome fellow.

Maybe this sounds irreverent, but any one would be excused for being so after listening to that ridiculous finale of Tchaikowsky's 2d Symphony. There is much to beguile one, though, in the first three movements. The military andantino, especially, is delightful. It is neither a rondo nor a set of variations, but takes on a little of both and is a very pleasant piece of music. Mr. Stravinsky conducted rather modestly; but the orchestra, wise in its ways, gave him better playing than that.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Stanley Chapple will be the guest-conductor and will offer the following program: Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings; Delius' "Paris"; Bax's overture to a Picaresque Comedy; Brahms' fourth symphony.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Igor Stravinsky conducted his new Symphony in C major for the first time here at the Boston Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon. The Russian-born composer, who is guest conductor of the orchestra for the second consecutive year, also performed the Divertimento drawn from his ballet music "The Fairy's Kiss," and the Second ("Little Russia") Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

In a way, Stravinsky as a creator is unpredictable. It is hard to surmise how his style may change from one piece to the next. Therefore his Symphony had aroused curiosity. Would it resemble the impish trivialities of "Card Game," his last new score heard in Boston, or would it be a striking out into unexplored territory of rhythm and dissonance?

It is certainly not much like "Card Game." In fact, it begins in striking manner and suggests that Stravinsky has something new to say. For a time the first movement makes you suspect a return to the bright colors, the uninhibited whoop-'er-up of "Petrouchka." But no composer can go back to his youth and still write music with life in the notes; the vision of "Petrouchka" soon fades. For the remainder of the four movements, emphasis is mainly upon rhythmic patterns, to which melody and harmonic color seem only incidental.

This reviewer is free to admit that he obtained from a first hearing only assorted impressions, not an idea of the Symphony as a whole. Here again you have the sort of complex new music with which acquaintance can be made only after several performances. So bearing in mind that first impressions in this case are likely to be altered, one can say without trying to pontificate, that the Symphony is vaguely fascinating, rather dry, energetic, harmonically peppery but not a mass of indigestible dissonance.

Perhaps another conductor would make it sound measurably different. Stravinsky as conductor is intent only upon rhythm and tempo. Tone quality apparently does not interest him, and his only nuances are accents. While rhythms vary and are complicated, they are so strung together that there is actually little contrast either of meter or pace. Mostly you have an effect of mechanical regularity, which may have been just what Stravinsky wanted.

On the other hand his performance of "The Fairy's Kiss" was much more refined than the one he gave at Sanders Theatre five years ago. "The Fairy's Kiss," a tribute to Tchaikovsky (a composer much admired by Stravinsky) and involving themes by Tchaikovsky, is something like "The Nutcracker Suite"; naive, charming, banal if you like, but a lot of fun and a clever blend of instrumental color.

That it remained for a guest conductor to give the only Boston Symphony performance of Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony since 1897, does not speak well for the liberality of the gentlemen who have been regular directors of the orchestra in the past 43 years. Nor will argument that the work is second-rate Tchaikovsky serve as convincing reason. Indeed it is second-rate Tchaikovsky, an early composition, very repetitive, with a noisy finale of smash-banging drums and cymbals.

There are lovely tunes, however, in each of the four movements, a good deal of delicate scoring and a Russian flavor not to be found to the same extent in any of the other five Tchaikovsky symphonies unless in the Third. Here, surely, are sufficient merits to warrant occasional performance.

Without knowing the Second a little, concert-goers do not have a complete picture of Tchaikovsky's development as reflected by the symphonies. An important feature of the Second is complete absence of that dark introspection and emotional instability which give the too-often heard Fourth, Fifth and Sixth their entire character.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:15. Next week Stanley Chapple, the English musician, will conduct the orchestra for the first time here, playing Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Delius' "Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)," Overture to a Picaresque Comedy (new to these concerts) by Bax, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.

JAN 18 1941

BOTH the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras brought novelties by eminent musicos to Carnegie Hall last week. The Philadelphia group presented Sergei Rachmaninoff's three symphonic dances, the first orchestral music he has written in this country. The dances were composed in Huntington, Long Island, but they didn't reflect the hoofing that Mr. Rachmaninoff may have seen out that way. They were typical Rachmaninoff—soundly constructed, richly scored, and prevailingly sombre. It may be that the second in the set—a pensive waltz—will have a career of its own. Eugene Ormandy, one of the best of Rachmaninoffians, conducted them handsomely.

The Boston Symphony introduced Paul Hindemith's violin concerto, played brilliantly by Miss Ruth Posselt and directed with immense conviction by Serge Koussevitzky. As Hindemith music goes, this concerto is almost sentimental, with broad themes and shrewd finales for each of the three movements. Most of it, however, is ingenious rather than appealing.

Orchestras in New York

By Pitts Sanborn

New York

With two orchestras from other cities visiting us and our local orchestras actively carrying on, Carnegie Hall has been of late a busier spot than ever. The Philadelphia Orchestra, on the evening of Jan. 7, introduced to New York Sergei Rachmaninoff's "Symphonic Dances," to which it had accorded a world première the previous week in Philadelphia. Eugene Ormandy conducted.

The dances impressed through careful workmanship and telling orchestration. The saxophone solo in the first, the Viennese touch in the second, and the use of the "Dies Irae" in the third and last all occasioned remark. The composer, who was in the audience, was called to the platform to bow. The Cailliet transcription of Buxtehude's Passacaglio for organ opened the concert in sonorous fashion. The remaining number was the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti, not quite at his best, as soloist.

On the following evening Dimitri Mitropoulos again conducted as guest of the Philharmonic-Symphony a concert that was repeated on the afternoon of the tenth. The conductor's own arrangement of Bach's "greater" Organ Fantasy and Fugue in G minor began proceedings. The first performance of a new version of a Concert Piece for String and Horn by John Verrall followed. And lastly came Mahler's First Symphony—quite the feature of the concert because it is heard here none too often and Mr. Mitropoulos evidently threw himself with enthusiasm into the task of bringing out the best that is in it.

* * *

The Greek conductor concluded his Philharmonic-Symphony guesting with the evening concert of the eleventh and the matinée the next day. The only works at these concerts that he had not conducted here before were Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, which he read in a distinctly heroic vein, and Roussel's Third Symphony, a work that lends itself well to his emphatic and forceful style, though musically it hardly represents the best of which Roussel was capable. At the conclusion of the matinée the audience rewarded Mr. Mitropoulos with an ovation that he must have found most heartening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave its Manhattan concerts on the evening of the ninth and the afternoon of the eleventh to its usual capacity audiences. On the former occasion a delightful performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony preceded the first local hearing of Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist. In spite of an excellent setting forth by all concerned and of the composer's formidable equipment as a technician, the work sounded in large part pretty dry and unprofitable. On the other hand, the number that rounded off the program, Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, gains in impressiveness with repetition.

At the matinée Dr. Koussevitzky celebrated the seventy-fifth birthday of Jean Sibelius by devoting the entire program to symponies by the distinguished Finn. The Sixth and Seventh came before the intermission, the Second after it. Thus it was possible to hear a superior performance of the Sixth, much neglected hereabouts, and to study the progress of the composer's style in both that and the Seventh. And, naturally, the popularity of the Second becomes particularly apparent when it is played so superbly. Still, three symphonies on one program put a heavy burden on the attention, and more than that when they are by a single composer and he a modern. The Sibelius celebration would have meant still more to some listeners had it been divided between two concerts.

* * *

STRAVINSKY'S SECOND HEARD

Composer Conducts Symphony in Own Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, conducted by Igor Stravinsky, was rich in interest. By way of novelty it offered Mr. Stravinsky's (Second) Symphony in C major, completed last August in California, and Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony in C minor, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra only once before, in 1897 (!), while the performance of the Divertimento from Mr. Stravinsky's Ballet, "The Fairy's Kiss" was only the second in Symphony Hall.

Any judgment here delivered upon the new Symphony is subject to later revision. Mr. Stravinsky's music is not always easy to grasp, or perhaps to like, at first hearing, though this Symphony is neither forbidding nor particularly complex. The first movement begins promisingly and this reviewer found himself thinking that here might be a contemporary symphony to be admired without reservation.

Possibly after more hearings this attitude would persist throughout the work. Yesterday, however, the three succeeding movements brought little feeling of contrast and variety and they did bring a disturbing sense of patchiness. Granted that the Symphony is thematically well integrated, something not always apparent to the listening ear, it still sounds episodic. There is no emotion, even in the rather pleasant second movement. Mr. Stravinsky does not emote. And the prevailing emphasis seems to be upon rhythm and accent, Mr. Stravinsky's two principal concerns as conductor. As in the ballets, "Apollo Musagetes" and the "Card Game," there are reminders of Italian opera—Bellinian blandness and Rossinian chatter.

That the composer of "The Rite of Spring," which once provoked riots, even if it is now included in Walt Disney's "Fantasia," should have written "The Fairy's Kiss" is a bit as though Wagner had stopped work on "The Ring" to write "La Traviata" or if it had been discovered that Brahms, not Bizet, was the author of "Carmen." But of course we long ago found out that Mr. Stravinsky's genius may assume almost any form. In the case of "The Fairy's Kiss," the themes are either Tchaikovsky originals of Tchaikovsky copies. The harmony is 19th century and the orchestration largely that. It is also enormously clever. Without losing any of its charm and grace, this Divertimento yesterday seemed to have more backbone than when Dr. Koussevizky introduced it here in 1936.

And how has it happened that we have had to wait so long to hear Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony, a fresh, youthful work that had the advantage of a later revision and one in which folksongs of little Russia play a prominent part?

Stravinsky's New Symphony Is Fascinating and Origin[illegible]

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 12th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Igor Stravinsky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Divertimento from "Le baiser de la fee" ..... Stravinsky
Symphony in C major ..... Stravinsky
Symphony No. 2 in C minor Op. 17 ..... Tchaikovsky

Stravinsky's new Symphony is his most important work since the Symphony of Psalms. It differs, too, from the bulk of his music in that it is not written to a subject and does not require a chorus or a soloist and is content with the normal instrumentation of a symphony. In form it is easy to grasp with a little attention to the themes as they emerge. Any one familiar with the classical symphonic forms will not find himself confused by the architecture of this new and remarkable work. It is true that the notion of a minuet, passe-pied and fugue for the usual scherzo is novel, but it is not at all bewildering.

Yet the Symphony was evidently regarded by a large majority of yesterday's public as difficult and abstruse. In the lobbies during the intermission there was much shaking of heads, some downright annoyance and incredulity, a modicum of hearty enthusiasm. Count us among the last named. The Symphony seemed to us a fascinating and original work. We eagerly await another chance this evening to hear it again.

If the Symphony is classical in design for the most part, it is not so in matter. It is not such dissonant music as Stravinsky, himself, and many other composers have written. But, on the other hand, the harmonies are astringent rather than soothing. There is often a deliberate touch of archaism, as in the charming slow movement with its interweaving wind voices.

More often than not the thematic material is decidedly wry, as in the curious subject for the fugue in the third movement. The important theme in the first movement, most often heard on the oboe, is another example of this tendency which gives a distinctive character to the whole work. Rhythmically the Symphony never fails to be effective, whether the rhythms are simple and dance-like or highly complicated.

The first three movements should, after at least a second hearing, offer no particular difficulty to the ear, and the listener can then decide for himself whether he is attracted or repelled by the music. Some may feel that there is a certain emotional sameness, an insufficiency of contrast. But the Symphony, it should be noted, is short, and the contrast is intellectual rather than emotional. Had the composer wanted the other sort of change, common enough in classical music, he could easily have written that way. The fact that he did not suggests that he had good reason for concentrating the emotional content as he did.

The finale may always prevent the Symphony from enjoying great popularity. The alternation of dissonant, lugubrious slow material with a restless fast section and the spare, simple conclusion will never make the public stamp and cheer and go out singing. On the other hand it is clearly the right conclusion for this work; and, for all his expressed admiration for him, it is well to remember that Stravinsky is not Tchaikowsky.

Previously we heard Stravinsky's ingenious and delightful tribute to the latter, the Divertimento from "Le baiser de la fee," not at all a bad preparation. Mr. Stravinsky is inclined to take this suite more seriously than are other conductors, who spruce it up and deliver it almost as if it were a parody of Tchaikowsky. The charm of the piece lies not only in the way that the old material is treated but in the perky rhythms and the bright instrumentation. It is not a little like cleaning up grandfather's portrait and discovering that the old gentleman was actually a lively and handsome fellow.

Maybe this sounds irreverent, but any one would be excused for being so after listening to that ridiculous finale of Tchaikowsky's 2d Symphony. There is much to beguile one, though, in the first three movements. The military andantino, especially, is delightful. It is neither a rondo nor a set of variations, but takes on a little of both and is a very pleasant piece of music. Mr. Stravinsky conducted rather modestly; but the orchestra, wise in its ways, gave him better playing than

The concert will be repeated today at 2:30. Next week Stanley Chapple will be the guest-conductor and will offer the following program: Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings; Delius' "Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)," Overture to a Picaresque Comedy (new to these concerts) by Bax, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. C. W. D.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Igor Stravinsky conducted his new Symphony in C major for the first time here at the Boston Symphony concert, yesterday afternoon. The Russian-born composer, who is guest conductor of the orchestra for the second consecutive year, also performed the Divertimento drawn from his ballet music "The Fairy's Kiss," and the Second ("Little Russia") Symphony by Tchaikovsky.

In a way, Stravinsky as a creator is unpredictable. It is hard to surmise how his style may change from one piece to the next. Therefore his Symphony had aroused curiosity. Would it resemble the impish trivialities of "Card Game," his last new score heard in Boston, or would it be a striking out into unexplored territory of rhythm and dissonance?

It is certainly not much like "Card Game." In fact, it begins in striking manner and suggests that Stravinsky has something new to say. For a time the first movement makes you suspect a return to the bright colors, the uninhibited whoop-'er up of "Petrouchka." But no composer can go back to his youth and still write music with life in the notes; the vision of "Petrouchka" soon fades. For the remainder of the four movements, emphasis is mainly upon rhythmic patterns, to which melody and harmonic color seem only incidental.

This reviewer is free to admit that he obtained from a first hearing only assorted impressions, not an idea of the Symphony as a whole. Here again you have the sort of complex new music with which acquaintance can be made only after several performances. So bearing in mind that first impressions in this case are likely to be altered, one can say without trying to pontificate, that the Symphony is vaguely fascinating, rather dry, energetic, harmonically peppery but not a mass of indigestible dissonance.

Perhaps another conductor would make it sound measurably different. Stravinsky as conductor is intent only upon rhythm and tempo. Tone quality apparently does not interest him, and his only nuances are accents. While rhythms vary and are complicated, they are so strung together that there is actually little contrast either of meter or pace. Mostly you have an effect of mechanical regularity, which may have been just what Stravinsky wanted.

On the other hand his performance of "The Fairy's Kiss" was much more refined than the one he gave at Sanders Theatre five years ago. "The Fairy's Kiss," a tribute to Tchaikovsky (a composer much admired by Stravinsky) and involving themes by Tchaikovsky, is something like "The Nutcracker Suite"; naive, charming, banal if you like, but a lot of fun and a clever blend of instrumental color.

That it remained for a guest conductor to give the only Boston Symphony performance of Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony since 1897, does not speak well for the liberality of the gentlemen who have been regular directors of the orchestra in the past 43 years. Nor will argument that the work is second-rate Tchaikovsky serve as convincing reason. Indeed it is second-rate Tchaikovsky, an early composition, very repetitive, with a noisy finale of smash-banging drums and cymbals.

There are lovely tunes, however, in each of the four movements, a good deal of delicate scoring and a Russian flavor not to be found to the same extent in any of the other five Tchaikovsky symphonies unless in the Third. Here, surely, are sufficient merits to warrant occasional performance.

Without knowing the Second a little, concert-goers do not have a complete picture of Tchaikovsky's development as reflected by the symphonies. An important feature of the Second is complete absence of that dark introspection and emotional instability which give the too-often heard Fourth, Fifth and Sixth their entire character.

The program will be repeated tonight at 8:15. Next week Stanley Chapple, the English musician, will conduct the orchestra for the first time here, playing Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Delius' "Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)," Overture to a Picaresque Comedy (new to these concerts) by Bax, and Brahms' Fourth Symphony. C. W. D.

This Clipping From
NEW YORKER
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JAN 18 1941

BOTH the Philadelphia and Boston orchestras brought novelties by eminent musicos to Carnegie Hall last week. The Philadelphia group presented Sergei Rachmaninoff's three symphonic dances, the first orchestral music he has written in this country. The dances were composed in Huntington, Long Island, but they didn't reflect the hoofing that Mr. Rachmaninoff may have seen out that way. They were typical Rachmaninoff—soundly constructed, richly scored, and prevailingly sombre. It may be that the second in the set—a pensive waltz—will have a career of its own. Eugene Ormandy, one of the best of Rachmaninoffians, conducted them handsomely.

The Boston Symphony introduced Paul Hindemith's violin concerto, played brilliantly by Miss Ruth Posselt and directed with immense conviction by Serge Koussevitzky. As Hindemith music goes, this concerto is almost sentimental, with broad themes and shrewd finales for each of the three movements. Most of it, however, is ingenious rather than appealing.

Orchestras in New York

By Pitts Sanborn

New York

With two orchestras from other cities visiting us and our local orchestras actively carrying on, Carnegie Hall has been of late a busier spot than ever. The Philadelphia Orchestra, on the evening of Jan. 7, introduced to New York Sergei Rachmaninoff's "Symphonic Dances," to which it had accorded a world première the previous week in Philadelphia. Eugene Ormandy conducted.

The dances impressed through careful workmanship and telling orchestration. The saxophone solo in the first, the Viennese touch in the second, and the use of the "Dies Irae" in the third and last all occasioned remark. The composer, who was in the audience, was called to the platform to bow. The Cailliet transcription of Buxtehude's Passacaglio for organ opened the concert in sonorous fashion. The remaining number was the Brahms Violin Concerto, with Joseph Szigeti, not quite at his best, as soloist.

On the following evening Dimitri Mitropoulos again conducted as guest of the Philharmonic-Symphony a concert that was repeated on the afternoon of the tenth. The conductor's own arrangement of Bach's "greater" Organ Fantasy and Fugue in G minor began proceedings. The first performance of a new version of a Concert Piece for String and Horn by John Verrall followed. And lastly came Mahler's First Symphony—quite the feature of the concert because it is heard here none too often and Mr. Mitropoulos evidently threw himself with enthusiasm into the task of bringing out the best that is in it.

* * *

The Greek conductor concluded his Philharmonic-Symphony guesting with the evening concert of the eleventh and the matinée the next day. The only works at these concerts that he had not conducted here before were Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, which he read in a distinctly heroic vein, and Roussel's Third Symphony, a work that lends itself well to his emphatic and forceful style, though musically it hardly represents the best of which Roussel was capable. At the conclusion of the matinée the audience rewarded Mr. Mitropoulos with an ovation that he must have found most heartening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave its Manhattan concerts on the evening of the ninth and the afternoon of the eleventh to its usual capacity audiences. On the former occasion a delightful performance of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony preceded the first local hearing of Paul Hindemith's Violin Concerto, with Ruth Posselt as soloist. In spite of an excellent setting forth by all concerned and of the composer's formidable equipment as a technician, the work sounded in large part pretty dry and unprofitable. On the other hand, the number that rounded off the program, Shostakovich's Fifth Symphony, gains in impressiveness with repetition.

At the matinée Dr. Koussevitzky celebrated the seventy-fifth birthday of Jean Sibelius by devoting the entire program to symponies by the distinguished Finn. The Sixth and Seventh came before the intermission, the Second after it. Thus it was possible to hear a superior performance of the Sixth, much neglected hereabouts, and to study the progress of the composer's style in both that and the Seventh. And, naturally, the popularity of the Second becomes particularly apparent when it is played so superbly. Still, three symphonies on one program put a heavy burden on the attention, and more than that when they are by a single composer and he a modern. The Sibelius celebration would have meant still more to some listeners had it been divided between two concerts.

STRAVINSKY'S SECOND HEARD

Composer Conducts Symphony in Own Work

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Yesterday's Symphony Concert, conducted by Igor Stravinsky, was rich in interest. By way of novelty it offered Mr. Stravinsky's (Second) Symphony in C major, completed last August in California, and Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony in C minor, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra only once before, in 1897 (!), while the performance of the Divertimento from Mr. Stravinsky's Ballet "The Fairy's Kiss" was only the second in Symphony Hall.

Any judgment here delivered upon the new Symphony is subject to later revision. Mr. Stravinsky's music is not always easy to grasp, or perhaps to like, at first hearing, though this Symphony is neither forbidding nor particularly complex. The first movement begins promisingly and this reviewer found himself thinking that here might be a contemporary symphony to be admired without reservation.

Possibly after more hearings this attitude would persist throughout the work. Yesterday, however, the three succeeding movements brought little feeling of contrast and variety and they did bring a disturbing sense of patchiness. Granted that the Symphony is thematically well integrated, something not always apparent to the listening ear, it still sounds episodic. There is no emotion, even in the rather pleasant second movement. Mr. Stravinsky does not emote. And the prevailing emphasis seems to be upon rhythm and accent, Mr. Stravinsky's two principal concerns as conductor. As in the ballets, "Apollo Musagetes" and the "Card Game," there are reminders of Italian opera—Bellinian blandness and Rossinian chatter.

That the composer of "The Rite of Spring," which once provoked riots, even if it is now included in Walt Disney's "Fantasia," should have written "The Fairy's Kiss" is a bit as though Wagner had stopped work on "The Ring" to write "La Traviata" or if it had been discovered that Brahms, not Bizet, was the author of "Carmen." But of course we long ago found out that Mr. Stravinsky's genius may assume almost any form. In the case of "The Fairy's Kiss," the themes are either Tchaikovsky originals of Tchaikovsky copies. The harmony is 19th century and the orchestration largely that. It is also enormously clever. Without losing any of its charm and grace, this Divertimento yesterday seemed to have more backbone than when Dr. Koussevitzky introduced it here in 1935.

And how has it happened that we have had to wait so long to hear Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony, a fresh, youthful work that had the advantage of a later revision and one in which folksongs of little Russia play a prominent part?

This Clipping From
RICHMOND, VA.
TIMES DISPATCH
JAN 19 1941

Music Builds Dream Castle In Berkshires

Farm Now Scene Of Symphony Festival

By Adelaide Kerr
Associated Press Feature Writer

Once a friend said of Gertrude Robinson Smith: "Lots of people build castles in Spain but Gertrude builds castles and then moves in."

The castle which Gertrude Robinson Smith helped build stands on a farm in the Berkshires near Stockbridge, Mass. It is a great shinning shed of silvery steel, home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. A leading New York music critic has predicted that it is "destined to become . . . the most important festival of summer music in the world."

In the six years since Miss Robinson Smith helped bring the festival to life and served as its president, it has moved from a farm horse show ring to the $90,000 shed, and has grown from audiences of 5,000 to last summer's total of nearly 70,000.

'Music Under the Moon'

In 1934 Miss Robinson Smith—silver-haired, jolly member of a New York social register family—was summering in Stockbridge. Henry Hadley, American composer and conductor, approached her with a plan of giving symphonic music outdoors in the Berkshires. She called some friends together, they formed committees and pitched in to raise the required funds.

Three months later, Dr. Hadley, standing in a newly built shell in the horse show ring of the old Dan Hanna farm near Stockbridge, lifted his baton to conduct 65 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in the festival's first concert. "Music under the moon" was launched, supported by popular subscription to the tune of $5 for the season's three concerts.

A Storm Made History

When ill health forced Dr. Hadley to resign after the festival's second year, Miss Robinson Smith secured Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for the following season's concerts. The festival moved to Tanglewood (the estate where Nathanial Hawthorne once lived and wrote) and gave its concerts in a huge tent.

Then, in 1937, the concerts and the elements tangled. While Koussevitzky conducted an all-Wagner program, a thunderstorm broke, rain fell in torrents, water poured down the aisles under the tent top and interrupted the music.

That night Gertrude Robinson Smith drafted a circular which launched the campaign for the building of her dream castle.

By August, 1938, the great fan-shaped steel shed, covering an acre and a half and seating 6,000, was completed. Last summer audiences overflowed its capacity for nine concerts.

Miss Robinson Smith has done more than mother the festival. She wears on her tailored frocks the red rosette of the Legion of Honor, which France bestowed upon her for work in World War I. She founded and ran the French theatre at the New York Hotel Barbizon Plaza for four years and presided over the American Woman's Association for 17 years.

Modest of Her Deeds

She "plays down" her part in building the festival. "It was the committee and the board who were wonderful," she will tell you. But that isn't the way the Stockbridge city fathers see it. Not long ago they wrote her:

"The selectmen of Stockbridge wish to bestow upon you the honor of being the outstanding citizen of our present generation . . . In future generations your name and what it stands for will be cherished and honored with our other great educators and benefactors."

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
JAN 22 1941

Tanglewood Movies

Bartlett Hendricks of the Berkshire Museum staff showed colored motion pictures of Tanglewood this afternoon to trustees of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival and a few officers of the Berkshire Hills Conference. The pictures included views of the Festival and activities of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Berkshire Music Center. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra, who is spending a vacation at his home in Lenox, motored over for the pictures.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
CHARLOTTSVILLE, VA.
PROGRESS
JAN 20 1941

Berkshire Symphonic Festival Is Praised By Music Critics

By Adelaide Kerr
Associated Press Feature Writer

Once a friend said of Gertrude Robinson Smith: "Lots of people build castles in Spain but Gertrude builds castles and then moves in."

The castle which Gertrude Robinson Smith helped build stands on a farm in the Berkshires near Stockbridge, Mass. It is a great shinning shed of silvery steel, home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. A leading New York music critic has predicted that it is "destined to become. . .the most important festival of summer music in the world."

In the six years since Miss Robinson Smith helped bring the festival to life and served as its president, it has moved from a farm horse show ring to the $90,000 shed, and has grown from audiences of 5,000 to last summer's total of nearly 70,000.

In 1934 Miss Robinson Smith—silver-haired, jolly member of a New York social register family—was summering in Stockbridge. Henry Hadley, American composer and conductor, approached her with a plan of giving symphonic music outdoors in the Berkshires. She called some friends together, they formed committees and pitched in to raise the required funds.

Three months later, Dr. Hadley, standing in a newly built shell in the horse show ring of the old Dan Hanna farm near Stockbridge, lifted his baton to conduct 65 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in the festival's first concert. "Music under the moon" was launched, supported by popular subscription to the tune of $5 for the season's three concerts.

When ill health forced Dr. Hadley to resign after the festival's second year, Miss Robinson Smith secured Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for the following season's concerts. The festival moved to Tanglewood (the estate where Nathanial Hawthorne once lived and wrote) and gave its concerts in a huge tent.

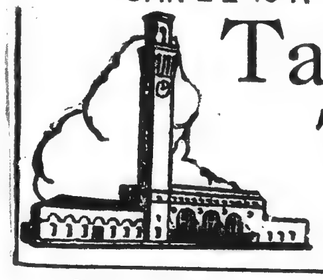
Then, in 1937, the concerts and the elements tangled. While Koussevitsky conducted an all-Wagner program, a thunderstorm broke, rain fell in torrents, water poured down the aisles under the tent top and interrupted the music.

That night Gertrude Robinson Smith drafted a circular which launched the campaign for the building of her dream castle.

By August, 1938, the great fan-shaped steel shed, covering an acre and a half and seating 6,000, was completed. Last summer audiences overflowed its capacity for nine concerts.

Miss Robinson Smith has done more than mother the festival. She wears on her tailored frocks the red rosette of the Legion of Honor, which France bestowed upon her for work in World War I. She founded and ran the French theatre at the New York Hotel Barbizon Plaza for four years and presided over the American Woman's Association for 17 years.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
JAN 22 1941



Tall Tower Topics

BY THE MAN IN THE TOWER

Good Evening.

WITH SLIGHT VARIATIONS

Here's to the city of Boston,
Home of the bean and broiled scrod,
Where Koussevitzky leads his band
And Back Bay-ers sit and nod,
As Stravinsky and Prokofieff
Creep up on Beethoven and Bach,
And lobster men mingle with halibut men
And coast guard cutters dock.

Good Night.

This Clipping From
NASHVILLE, TENN.
MORNING TENNESSEAN
JAN 19 1941

67

A Music Lover's Dream Assumes Reality

Member of a New York social register family, Gertrude Robinson Smith has been honored by village and nation.

By ADELAIDE KERR
(AP Feature Writer)

ONCE a friend said of Gertrude Robinson Smith: "Lots of people build castles in Spain, but Gertrude builds castles and then moves in."

The castle which Gertrude Robinson Smith helped build stands on a farm in the Berkshires near Stockbridge, Mass. It is a great shining shed of silvery steel, home of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival. A leading New York music critic has predicted that it is "destined to become . . . the most important festival of summer music in the world."

In the six years since Miss Robinson Smith helped bring the festival to life and served as its president, it has moved from a farm horse show ring to the $90,000 shed, and has grown from audiences of 5,000 to last summer's total of nearly 70,000.

In 1934 Miss Robinson Smith—silver-haired, jolly member of a New York social register family—was summering in Stockbridge. Henry Hadley, American composer and conductor, approached her with a plan of giving symphonic music outdoors in the Berkshires. She called some friends together, they formed committees and pitched in to raise the required funds.

Three months later, Dr. Hadley, standing in a newly built shell in the horse show ring of the old Dan Hanna farm near Stockbridge, lifted his baton to conduct 65 members of the New York Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra in the festival's first concert. "Music under the moon" was launched, supported by popular subscription to the tune of $5 for the season's three concerts.

When ill health forced Dr. Hadley to resign after the festival's second year, Miss Robinson Smith secured Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony for the following season's concerts. The festival moved to Tanglewood (the estate where Nathaniel Hawthorne once lived and wrote) and gave its concerts in a huge tent.

Then, in 1937, the concerts and the elements tangled. While Koussevitzky conducted an all-Wagner program, a thunderstorm broke, rain fell in torrents, water poured down the aisles under the tent top and interrupted the music.

This Clipping From BUFFALO, N.Y.
NEWS
JAN 25 1941

Shostakovich Taken From Program

BECAUSE of difficulty in obtaining the music, the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra will be unable to play the much-discussed Shostakovich Fifth Symphony at the next concert, Feb. 6, as previously announced. The Beethoven Fifth Symphony, however, will definitely be heard at the coming concert.

The orchestra, under Franco Autori, will go out to the Amherst Central High School on the afternoon of Feb. 3 to give a children's concert under the auspices of the Amherst Children's Program Committee.

For the next "pop" concert, on Feb. 16, Wilson Woodbeck, Negro baritone, will be the soloist. Mr. Woodbeck began his musical training in Buffalo, when he was a railroad porter. He is now living in New York City where he is continuing his studies under Evan Evans of the Juilliard School of Music.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 22 1941

Taken by Death

HENRI L. BERGER

Henri L. Berger, Violinist, Dead

Henri L. Berger, 74, well known violinist and former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died Tuesday afternoon at Hartford Hospital.

Mr. Berger made his home at 330 Laurel St.. He was born in Lyons, France, Oct. 15, 1866, studied in Paris and played in various orchestral groups there before coming to this country as a young man.

For 35 years he was a violinist in the Boston Symphony and retired 23 years ago, when he came to Hartford. For a time he taught violin in the Hartford School of Music and later taught his own group of pupils. Several years ago he gave up teaching and made several trips to Europe with his wife, Mrs. Florence Paull Berger, visiting England, France and other countries on the continent. Mrs. Berger is curator of the Wadsworth Atheneum.

Besides his wife, Mr. Berger leaves a brother in Boston.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 22 1941

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Heard In Third Concert at Metropolitan

By G. Y. Loveridge

The Boston Symphony Orchestra presented its third concert and second guest conductor of the season in Metropolitan Theatre last night.

The occupant of the podium was Stanley Chapple, a large and emphatic Englishman, who assisted Serge Koussevitzky at the Berkshire Music Centre last summer. Mr. Chapple was given a heartening welcome by the Providence audience.

The program was the Introduction and Allegro for Strings, by Elgar; Mars, Venus and Jupiter, from "The Planets," by Holst, and the fourth symphony in E minor, Op. 98, by Brahms.

It is a sourly solemn thought, an heretical thought, but we received no particular exhiliration from the goings-on. There were approximately 100 virtuosos of strings, wind and percussion, and they were exercising their virtuosity under the direction of a well-recommended leader and upon the compositions of eminent creative minds, yet we came out by the same door as in we went, to borrow an expression from that esteemed Persian, Edward Fitzgerald.

As a matter of fact, this situation is commoner than is generally admitted; there are scores of merely polished performances of music, be it swing or symphonic, to every one that contains even a firefly's worth of incandescence. Last night's playing was not all polished, either. In the second of the three movements from "The Planets," for instance, the wind instruments were more than once notably out of step, and the last part of the Elgar item conveyed an excitement that was a trifle more confused than orderly.

For the most part, the concert proceeded with uneventful decorum and precision. After one had heard the Elgar, one had heard it. The Holst was often sonorous. The score of the Mars section calls for an organ, which was omitted without causing any sense of incompleteness; there were other places where many of the instruments playing could not be distinguished. Venus was the most engaging of the planets on view.

Mr. Chapple paraded the Brahms symphony (which requires about 45 minutes to pass a given point) in a determined and sincere manner, but not compellingly. The second movement seemed to us considerably too slow; the others were adequately paced and enjoyed often distinguished execution.

* * *

ARTHUR CARRON

Arthur Carron, tenor, was heard by the Woonsocket Civic Music Association subscribers last evening in the ballroom of the Hotel Blackstone, at Woonsocket.

The program:

I.

Rend'il sereno al ciglio ..... Handel
Lungi dal Caro Bene ..... Secchi
Phyllis Has Such Charming Graces ..... Arr. by Lane Wilson
Gal il sole del Gange ..... Scarlatti
If With All Your Hearts (Elijah) ..... Mendelssohn

II.

Nell ..... Faure
Bonjour, Suzon ..... Delibes
Si me vers ..... Hahn
Aria: La fleur que tu m'avais jetee (Carmen) ..... Bizet

III.

Life and Death ..... Coleridge-Taylor
Go Lovely Rose ..... Roger Quilter
Sigh No More ..... W. A. Aikin
In Summertime on Bredon .. Graham Peel
Over the Mountains ..... Arr. by Roger Quilter

IV.

Aria: Recondita armonia (La Tosca) ..... Puccini
Aria: Monologue (Otello) ..... Verdi

That Mr. Carron is a vocalist of experience there is no doubt, but his program at Woonsocket definitely demonstrated that he may best be called a delightful singer of ballads, for the charm of lyricism certainly pervades his song.

Not that he is insipid in bravura—far from it, for to heavy demands he responds with plenty of gusto, but in those works which are to and from the heart his voice has a real message; consequently I found "Nell," "Bonjour Suzon," and "In Summertime on Bredon" all too brief.

Evidently aware of his particular sphere of vocal appeal he gained additional applause with the encores "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes" and "I Love Life."

To prosaically state that Ruth Weed provided the piano accompaniments would be manifestly unfair; in fact, it is treating her work too lightly to say that she presided at the piano.

Miss Weed is one of those rare accompanists, who comes as an unprogrammed surprise on infrequent occasions; one whose sense of musical proportion must certainly be intuitive, for every mood of the soloist is reflected in mirro-like perfection.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
MERCURY
JAN 18 1941

Britisher to Conduct at Providence

Boston Symphony in Holst, Elgar, Delius, Bax—with Brahms

Stanley Chapple, the English conductor, will appear as guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra Jan. 21 in Providence, and Jan. 24 and 25 in Boston. In Boston his program will include Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro," Delius's "Paris," Bax's "Overture to a Picaresque Comedy" and the Brahms Fourth symphony. In Providence Holst's "The Planets" will be substituted for the Delius and Bax selections.

Mr. Chapple, who assisted Serge Koussevitzky last Summer at the Tanglewood music school as an authority on conducting, is now established in this country. He has been known here, through several visits, as teacher and lecturer and specializes in child pedagogy.

The number of particular interest in the Providence Concert is the magnificent suite of the late British composer, Gustav Holst, in which he depicts the planets in musical terms. This has been played in Boston, but infrequently. Mr. Chapple's assembly of English composers is both timely and important.

* * *

The Providence concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are given at the Metropolitan Theater.

A.C.R.

New Bedford

Providence Hears Holst And Elgar

Chapple Leads in British Music with Boston Symphony

A distinguished conductor, directing a virtuoso orchestra in presentation of an interestingly chosen program came off this week at the Metropolitan, Providence, with the score balance largely in his favor. This was Stanley Chapple, British conductor, lecturer and writer on music who assisted Serge Koussevitzky last Summer at Tanglewood in the first year of the music school under Boston Symphony auspices.

Mr. Chapple was guest conductor with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third concert of the season in Providence. He will lead the two weekend concerts of the orchestra in Boston Friday afternoon and Saturday evening when Delius "Paris" and Bax's "Overture to a Picaresque Comedy" will take the place of Gustav Holst's suite "The Planets" which was the feature of the Providence concert. For both programs, Mr. Chapple listed Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for Strings" and the fourth symphony of Brahms in E minor.

After watching in Providence this chin-thrusting, rather elegant English man whose podium technique resembles that of Koussevitzky in facial encouragements; accepting the calm, warm, full-volumed, unmistakably national beauties he revealed in the Elgar music; exulting, pondering and questioning, in the order presented, the three members of the Holst set played, "Mars," "Venus" and "Jupiter," this Pilgrim would gladly go to Boston Friday for a "rush line" rehearing of Mr. Chapple's program.

It was the "Mars" of Holst that, heard back in the regime of Pierre Monteux, has remained an exciting memory. It was composed in the days of the earlier World War and speaks out loudly of war's alarms; yet its effect is of the din of classic combat. Opening with rhythmic strokes of bows in unison, with fanfare of brass and pounding percussion, it keeps the same dynamics nearly to the end when the conflict seems to wane in strength. The masterly variation of the drum beats—now ceasing, entering with one stroke, then in different groupings enlists the admiration. Even the combined movement of the instruments has its excitements.

In contrast, the "Venus"—a bringer of peace in astrological parlance—was of extreme beauty of timbre, sweetened by harp tones, choice of instrumentation. The number suggested some old Greek temple ritual. To his "Jupiter," famed as the bringer of jollity, Holst has assigned continuous change of rhythms—as many as the loves of the god. The music is boisterous, suggests the merry-making of Holst's own people; one section chants out, plain and full, a sound old melody that some one suggested might be shouted out over mugs of ale. Mr. Chapple and his English composers are most welcome.

This Brahms Fourth is less frequently heard than preceding symphonies of the same composer. Mr. Chapple gave infinite care to its reading, kept a normal pace and, except for a short time in the first allegro, maintained clarity.

A. C. R.

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
JAN 22 1941

Music

And Musicians

Stanley Chapple will be guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its concerts Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week in Boston.

The noted English musician will include on the program the first performances at these concerts of the Bax "Overture to a Picaresque Comedy." Also to be played are Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, the Delius "Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)" and the Brahms Symphony No. 4 in E minor.

Stanley Chapple

English conductor who leads Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday next week.

Stanley Chapple, the English conductor, will be the guest of the week at the coming pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Chapple had a distinguished career in Europe before he made America his home last season. He was best known as guest conductor of the B B.C. Orchestra in London since its inception in 1923 and as one of the regular conductors of the London Symphony Orchestra.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 19 1941

Boston Orchestra Performs Tuesday

A VISIT from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with a guest conductor, and a number of solo and ensemble programs make up a varied musical calendar for the week.

The concert by the Rhode Island WPA Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for this evening, has been postponed to next Sunday owing to the prevalence of grippe among the musicians, it is announced.

This afternoon the first of two concerts for young people, under the auspices of the Parents' League of Porvidence, will be played by the Beacon Hill Symphonic Ensemble, in Memorial Hall. Russell Ames Cook is the conductor.

Tomorrow Lily Dymont, pianist, will continue the series of afternoon musicales, sponsored by Mrs. Rush Sturges, in the home of Mrs. Wilson G. Wing. In the evening there will be a Brown University department of music audition, in Alumnae Hall, which is free to the public, and a concert by the Catholic Choral Club, in Plantations Auditorium. Fr. Leo Rowlands, O. F. M. C., is the director and Eva Tancrell Meunier, guest artist.

Under its guest conductor, Stanley Chapple, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will make its third visit of the season, Tuesday evening, in the Metropolitan Theatre. The Belgian Piano-String Quartet will be presented by the Chopin Club as its guest night attraction, Wednesday, in Plantations Auditorium.

In Woonsocket Arthur Carron, tenor, will give a Woonsocket Civic Music Association recital, Tuesday night, in Hotel Blackstone. Program and other details follow:

THIS CLIPPING FROM
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
JAN 18 1941

Chapple To Conduct Boston Symphony

Stanley Chapple, well known conductor from London, will conduct as guest the next concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in the Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday evening next. (He will also conduct the concerts in Boston the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening).

Mr. Chapple had a distinguished career in Europe before he made America his home last season. He was best known as guest conductor of the B. B. C. Orchestra in London since its inception in 1923 and as one of the regular conductors of the London Symphony Orchestra. He also made guest appearances with the orchestras in Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw and The Hague. He has given a number of lectures in this country and is to continue as the assistant to Dr. Koussevitzky in his conducting class at the Berkshire Music Center, which was founded last summer.

The first part of the program will be introduction and allegro for strings by Elgar; then Mr. Chapple will present three movements from the suite of Gustav Holst's "The Planets": 1—Mars. The Bringer of War; 2—Venus. The Bringer of Peace; 3—Jupiter. The Bringer of Jollity.

The closing number will be the "Fourth Symphony" of Brahms in E minor.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
JAN 22 1941

Boston Programs.

In Dr. Koussevitzky's absence the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening will be conducted by Stanley Chapple, English musician now in this country and not unknown in Boston. Naturally, for the most part he has chosen a program of the works of English composers. On the list is set Introduction and Allegro, Elgar; Paris, a Night Piece (The Song of a Great City), Delius; Overture to a Picaresque Comedy, Bax. To round out the program he has selected the Symphony No. 4 of Brahms.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
JAN 19 1941

Chapple Will Be Guest Conductor

ANOTHER example of something good blown by the ill wind of war is Stanley Chapple, the 40-year-old Londoner who will conduct the Boston Symphony at its third Providence concert in Metropolitan Theatre on Tuesday night and concerts in Boston on the following Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

War cut short Mr. Chapple's brilliant English and Continental career little more than a year ago. While British statesmen slipped from desperate compromise to worse, the British conductor went to Poland in the summer of 1939 and there, in the last few hours of the doomed country's freedom, conducted the English and Spanish sections of a great Festival held by the International Society of Contemporary Music.

STANLEY CHAPPLE

Not long after, he arrived in America to assist Serge Koussevitzky in the maestro's conducting class at the Berkshire Music Centre, founded last summer. He has stayed on to lecture on symphonic analysis, conduct the Boston Symphony occasionally and will continue at the Centre next season.

London born and bred, he won a scholarship at the London Academy of Music when he was only eight years old and at 16 was conducting light opera. He formed and conducted the Modern Chamber Orchestra in 1922.

By way of radio, phonograph records and continental tours, Europe soon came to know Chapple as a frequent conductor of the B. B. C. Orchestra and a regular conductor of the London Symphony Orchestra.

J. T.

C. S. M. Jan. 23

Stanley Chapple and British Music-

69

Conductor Views Singing As English-Speaking Bond

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Seasons and seasoning are wanted for a public to get the idea of a new type of art, and Stanley Chapple, visiting conductor at the Boston Symphony concerts this week, may be considered as helping the familiarizing process. For he is presenting three items from the British school, comprising a study for strings by Elgar, a rather big and serious work by Delius, and a smallish and lightish piece by Bax. In the way of regular routine, he adds to these the Symphony No. 4, in E minor, of Brahms.

Not that any of the scores he is opening out from his English portfolio here can be described as a novelty, the nearest thing to that being Bax's Overture to a Picaresque Comedy, which appears for the first time on a Boston Symphony program, but which has been performed in New York. And yet, all modern British orchestral effort remains in a state of newness as regards the United States. Like native American symphonic attempts of late years, it goes as nonclassic, experimental, and preparatory. It hardly counts with contemporary German and French music, because lacking a Beethoven, a Berlioz, or other historic master in the national background.

* * *

But perhaps the time has come for us to change all that. Possibly Elgar and Delius deserve rating with Strauss and Debussy as equals. It may be that certain of the British experiments, after all, are a success, even as some American preparations may really have been consummations. Listeners of the 40's had better cultivate their powers of discovery, else those of the 50's may prove them to have been dull of ear.

Now British music has had what we call a fair show in American concert halls. It has been produced dutifully by orchestral organizations—conscientiously played and sympathetically interpreted. It has had the advantage from time to time also of being set forth with especial authenticity by visiting conductors, to mention Sir Thomas Beecham for one. A work like the "London" Symphony of Vaughan Williams has sunk in.

But suppose we take Mr. Chapple's word for values. Talking on the subject one morning in the Conductor's Room at Symphony Hall before rehearsal, he named six British composers as standing at the top: Delius, Elgar, Holst, Vaughan Williams, Bax, and Ireland. A coming name he mentioned is that of Britten. Along with Elgar he mentioned the A flat Symphony, remarking on its appeal to the interest of audiences of today. "Here is the mood of it," he explained, going to the piano, where he showed the characteristic melody to be something altogether different from the square-cut, mechanically designed pattern of notes that it has seemed to be.

* * *

"Elgar was a man of fire," he explained, "though he liked to have people think of him as a typical country gentleman. He was full of temperament, and he had a bombastic side, which you realize when you hear his popular 'Pomp and Circumstance.' A work in which the Elgar of emotion becomes evident is the Violin Concerto, and a soloist who makes you realize that is Menuhin."

Concerning Delius, he noted that his works do not appear on London concert programs with the regularity and persistence of Elgar's; and as for Holst, there remains a rather small amount of composing as his legacy to the century. High praise he gave to Holst's "The Planets," which he presented with the Boston Symphony at Providence early in the week. "Who but Holst," he asked, "would write a part for bass oboe? And where but in Boston could you find a specimen of the instrument and a musician who can perform on it? In few other places, I assure you. But the bass oboe has just the tone color that Holst wanted, and there you are."

Another good English violin concerto which he referred to is Walton's, which Heifetz is bringing along in due time. Then, too, Walton has written a concerto for the next string voice below the violin, the viola; and this is something to hear, supposing you have the right viola player for soloist.

* * *

"What I think we need more of in England," said he, "and what I think should be good for America as well, is choral composing. We need to break away from the orchestra and liberalize music, letting the people into its performance. To express the democratic idea, you want music with the community actually taking part and not merely assuming the listening attitude. To look at Britain and America from the viewpoint of friendship, I think the strongest present bond between them is the literary one. Now you combine the literary with the musical, as you would in an exchange of choral works, and you have one country realizing the worth of the other in a way that figures out just double."

Music Notes

Richard Burgin, assistant conductor, will direct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next week. For the fourth pair in the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series he will offer Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, with Georges Laurent as flutist and Putnam Aldrich at the harpsichord; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

At the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts Ruth Posselt will be soloist in the first Boston performance of Walter Piston's Violin Concerto, and also in a Concert Piece in one movement by Henriette Bosmans. The program will open with the "Fireworks Music" of Handel, which is to be heard for the first time at these concerts. The second portion of the program will consist of Arnold Schönberg's arrangement for full orchestra of the Piano Quartet of Brahms in G minor.

* * *

in a program which will include works by Joh. Rosenmüller, Marin Marais, Henry Purcell, Orlando Gibbons, J. S. Bach, Dietrich Buxtehude, and Estienne du Tertre.

This Clipping From
CHICAGO, ILL.
TRIBUNE
JAN 26 1941

Chapple Guest Conductor.

The Boston Symphony orchestra last week acquired a new guest conductor, Stanley Chapple, an Englishman who has conducted both the B. B. C. and London Symphony orchestras in the last 15 years and who is now making his home in America.

Ernest Nash

Stanley Chapple

Guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the concerts of Jan. 24-25

English Offerings

Stanley Chapple Conducts Boston Symphony In New Overture of Bax; Elgar and Delius

A GOOD dose of English music, including the first Boston performance of Arnold Bax's Overture to a Picaresque Comedy, was administered a Boston Symphony audience yesterday afternoon by the English guest conductor, Stanley Chapple. English music has always been a problem to American audiences—not because it is difficult to understand, but Americans have never been able to quite understand the Englishman's enthusiasm for it. Most of us do not think that England has produced a really first class composer since Purcell, who died in 1695. True, yesterday's program did little to change this impression, but is such a negative attitude an intelligent basis for listening to English music?

After all, there is a great deal of serious American music, which we enjoy today, without having to fool ourselves into thinking that we have among us any modern Handel or Schumann or Debussy. And if we listen to English music from the same point of view, we shall find much to amuse and stir us.

Bax's Overture to a Picaresque comedy can by no stretch of the imagination be called an important piece of music. But it is divertingly unaffected, full of animal high spirits, it has at least one rousing good tune and it is effectively orchestrated. Mr. Chapple led it without much nuance, with broad strokes of color and soft and loud, at times even a little roughly, and we take it, that is what he intended to do. If the Overture does not add much to the musical stature of Arnold Bax, it is still entertaining to hear.

The program opened with Elgar's fresh Introduction and Allegro for Strings, composed soon after 1900. On a much higher plane, this is the same kind of eupeptic music as Bax's Overture. It has a typically Anglo-Saxon vigour, a sweep and spaciousness suggestive of Handel. Its use of eighteenth century concerto grosso contrast between a solo string quartet and the full weight of the orchestra might also bring Handel to mind, though there the resemblance stops. Elgar's invention is fertile, but not very original or distinguished. Again pleasant music, but nothing that makes you hanker to hear it again right away.

"Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)" by Frederick Delius completed Mr. Capple's trio of English composers. Delius is so seldom played in this country, it is a pity he was not represented on this occasion by a stronger work. His "Paris" was doubtless a fascinating and suggestive musical portrait when it was first performed in 1900, but today it sounds discursive and a little platitudinous—not because Delius copied anyone at the time, but because other composers have since said the same things he does here, and said them more effectively.

After the intermission came a thoroughly competent and musicianly performance of the Brahms Fourth Symphony. Mr. Capple seemed to know just what he wanted from the orchestra and to be able to get it. Without the sensitive nuances, the nervous dramatic power or the brilliance of the Brahms we are accustomed to, it had a sober strength of its own.

Mr. Capple shared the cordial applause with the orchestra.

E. D.

This Clipping From
SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF.
CHRONICLE
JAN 19 1941

Attn.: Pierre Monteux

Dear Sir: In your issue of December 22 there appeared a letter from Marion R. Morgan, under the rather cryptic heading, "Onion for the Union." I did not know that your correspondent was privy to our plans and motives, but I should like to correct the impression given in the first paragraph of the letter.

We have engaged the San Francisco Orchestra out of our respect for its years of steadily distinguished achievement and out of our regard for Pierre Monteux, who is unquestionably one of the great conductors in the world today.

We did not engage the orchestra and Mr. Monteux to supplant, replace or substitute for the Boston Symphony Orchestra or any other orchestra. We believe that the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra is worthy of appearing under the Victor Red Seal and that we would be negligent of our duty to the musical public of the Pacific Coast, as well as music lovers throughout the United States and the Americas if we did not present to them, along with other great orchestras, your own very beautiful one.

In engaging Mr. Monteux and the San Francisco Symphony Orchestra we had no other motive than this.

CHARLES O'CONNELL,
Music Director, RCA-Victor, Inc.

In other words, "RCA All the Way"—for Monteux.

Chapple Guest Symphony Conductor

British Conductor Is Symphony Guest

By LEO GAFFNEY

STANLEY CHAPPLE, young and vigorous British musician, conducted the week-end concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, much to the profit of his listeners.

(Mr. Chapple has been assisting Dr. Koussevitzky in the Berkshires and in other matters closely connected with the orchestra.

The program was divided between the works of three of Chapple's countrymen and the massive Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

There was, naturally, a piece by Edward Elgar, Introduction and Allegro for Strings; Frederick Delius' "Paris," and "Overture to a Picaresque Comedy," by Arnold Bax.

Seldom performed here, the Elgar work is derived from Wales. Moved by the sound of a "falling third" in some lusty Welsh chorus, the composer was stimulated to use it to his purpose.

The result is a resounding short work of great liveliness and vigor perfectly suited to the conductor, the orchestra and the occasion.

Delius' "Paris" is not further programmed beyond the title. Free in form, it presents no tonal tour of the great French metropolis; rather, it is a moody dream of days gone by when the composer was able to relish life in the once free atmosphere of the Latin Quarter.

The Bax piece, "Overture to a Picaresque Comedy," was a "first performance" here. To explain, the work is complete in itself; there is no particular "comedy," and it is the prelude to nothing at all.

Because his name is mostly associated with solemn music, Bax wrote this one, probably, to show that he has a sense of lighter, even ridiculous things.

The great rogues, or "picaroons," such as D'artagnan and Cassanova, have an electric appeal in art, it seems, so Mr. Bax was moved to set them down in music. He had no specific swashbuckler in mind; probably a composite character based on all of them.

The music is dashing, lusty and at times there is heard what can only be described as the razzberry.

It was good and exciting—and a lot of fun.

The audience liked Mr. Chapple's humor and his program-making and, doubtless, wished for many happy returns of the day.

MUSIC IN BOSTON

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Stanley Chapple is at the helm of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, the third guest conductor of the season. Although the English musician has been familiar hereabouts as lecturer for several years, the concerts of yesterday afternoon and tonight are his local debut as conductor.

His program is given to spacious and comfortable music, and in that manner it was played for the Friday subscribers. Three English composers, none over-performed here recently, are represented in the first half: Elgar by the Introduction and Allegro for strings; Delius by "Paris: A Night Piece (Song of a Great City)," and Arnold Bax by his Overture to a Picaresque Comedy, new to the Boston Symphony. After intermission comes the Fourth Symphony of Brahms.

Since Mr. Koussevitzky gives us mostly familiar masterpieces or new contemporary works, it was very pleasant—and interesting, also—to hear so many as three secondary pieces whose main object is just beauty of sound. Call the luscious music of Elgar "Edwardian" and that describes it. Delius wrote "Paris" in 1899, and its expression is conditioned by the ideal of a large and colorful orchestra, yet the music itself, vaguely delineative, is easy to absorb and free from tragedy or pseudo-philosophy.

The Bax Overture is light in what it has to say, even if many instruments are required; no doubt Pops audiences would find it to their liking. Breezy and humorous in pages, the Overture is largely what the English with their knack of precise description, would term "jolly." Certainly there is in it nothing of Bax' earlier and emotional "Celtic" manner or the heavy complication of his Second Symphony. Incidentally, Mr. Bax disclaims that he had any one comedy in mind. Stretching the word picaresque a little, the Overture might do for "The Taming of the Shrew."

Mr. Chapple is a sound, reliable conductor, who seemingly asks no more for an orchestra than that they produce a good tone and play according to the markings of a score and the style of the composer. One cannot imagine him wringing the last drop of emotion from any work, nor would he be perfunctory. Outwardly he is energetic upon the stand, his long arms emphasizing the rhythm in unorthodox gestures. He likes a clear texture, to judge by yesterday's performance, and while, as in the Brahms, he may bring out some of the harmonizing strings a little, one has no sense of effect for its own sake.

Actually he discarded the doubling of wind instruments which some conductors have added to Brahms' own orchestration. As a result there was a smaller tone in certain places, but the whole was a good deal more transparent than usual. At the second entrance of the main theme in the finale, where a big climax can be obtained by asking the instruments involved to play as loud as possible, Mr. Chapple followed the score; that is, woodwinds, horns and trombones were forte for the first four measures and then, as Brahms indicated, fortissimo for the rest of the theme. His pace was regular, with little fluctuation for the purpose of momentary expression.

The orchestra played excellently for Mr. Chapple and the audience greeted him most cordially. After the Symphony applause called him back to the stage several times.

Next week Richard Burgin, concert-master of the Boston Symphony, will conduct. His wife, Ruth Posselt, will be soloist in the first local performances of Walter Piston's new Violin Concerto and a one-movement Concert Piece by Henriette Bosmans. Handel's "Fireworks" Music and the orchestral transcription by Arnold Schoenberg of Brahms' G minor Piano Quartet, Op. 25, will also be heard.

C. W. D.

Stanley Chapple, English pianist and conductor, who will be the guest conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday night concerts at Symphony Hall.

Stanley Chapple To Lead Symphony

Stanley Chapple, the English conductor, will be the guest of the week at the coming pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. Mr. Chapple had a distinguished career in Europe before he made America his home last season. He was best known as guest conductor of the B. B. C. Orchestra in London since its inception in 1923 and as one of the regular conductors of the London Symphony Orchestra. He also made guest appearances with the orchestras in Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw and The Hague.

The first part of the program for the next Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will consist of music by three English composers: Introduction and Allegro for Strings by Elgar; the tone poem "Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)" by Frederick Delius, and the Overture to a Picaresque Comedy by Arnold Bax.

CHAPPLE BOWS AS CONDUCTOR

Makes American Debut at Symphony Hall

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

While Dr. Koussevitzky takes his winter vacation, music lovers may get a vacation from great conducting but, for compensation, they are certain to receive a considerable amount of new or unfamiliar music. And these commodities are not exactly drugs on the market nowadays.

Last week it was Igor Stravinsky restoring Tchaikovsky's Second Symphony, and giving a new symphony of his own. This week it was Stanley Chapple with a triad of Englishmen (plus Brahms) and next week Mr. Burgin will offer a whole programme, of hwich not one note has yet been played in Symphony Hall.

Yesterday was the occasion of Mr. Chapple's American debut as conductor. An English and continental reputation preceded him to these shores. As Dr. Koussevitzky's assistant in his conducting classes at "Tanglewood" last summer, Mr. Chapple may be now regarded as a member of the Symphony Hall family. A man of authoritative presence, he is also an authoritative conductor, but one whose readings are soundly eloquent rather than electrifying.

Since Brahms' Fourth Symphony, with which Mr. Chapple's programme concludes, is of almost yearly occurrence hereabouts, some would have welcomed in its stead one of the two Elgar symphonies, which are unknown to the present generation of Boston concert-goers, save for the performance of the Second under Sir Adrian Boult a few years ago. But probably Mr. Chapple thought that three British pieces were enough. Those upon which his choice fell were Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings, Delius' "Paris: A Night Piece (the Song of a Great City)" and Bax's Overture to a Picaresque Comedy. Their relative interest corresponded exactly with their position on the programme. The Bax work was new to Boston, the others had enjoyed one performance apiece at the Symphony Concerts, in 1931 and 1909, respectively.

Those who dislike Elgar call him beefy and bourgeois and accuse him of Edwardian smugness and self-satisfaction. Those who like his music rejoice in its heartiness, its solid facture, its melodic forthrightness. And in his scoring Elgar managed to achieve both richness and clarity.

Delius, who also has had both his proponents and his opponents, is hardly even an issue in America today. In typically Delian fashion "Paris" is largely mood, expressed by means of harmony and orchestration, both of which bridge the gap between Wagnerian opulence and Debussian subtlety. A too protracted conclusion robs the piece of some of its effectiveness, a quality which certain younger members of the audience failed to discover at all. The pleasure that some others had in it may have been partly, or largely, one of reminiscence. Delius' music and what it stood for and strove for, are pretty much things of the past.

According to one informant Bax's Overture was intended as a Strauss parody, but if it is after Strauss it is a long way after. The mystic, introspective Bax tries here to be gay and dashing, but his swashbuckling falls a little flat and his attempts at geniality and sentiment bring him close to the commonplace. At that, the piece was good fun to hear.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

JAN 29 1941

Lenox

Miss Tappan Rites Held

Dr. Koussevitzky Sends Tribute to Tanglewood Donor

LENOX—The funeral of Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan who with her niece, Mrs. Gorham Brooks, gave Tanglewood as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival, was held yesterday afternoon at Story Chapel, Mount Auburn in Boston.

Miss Tappan died Sunday night at her home, 220 Marlboro Street, Boston, after a lingering illness. She would have been 90 next month.

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who is spending a brief vacation at his home here, telephoned the following tribute to Miss Tappan:

It is with deep regret that I learn of the passing of Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan whose memory, so closely associated with Tanglewood, will live in the far reaching vision of the Berkshire Music Center.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE

JAN 28 1941

Miss M. A. Tappan Rites Are at Cambridge Today

Was Co-Donor of Estate to the Boston Symphony

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Jan. 27.—Services will be held tomorrow afternoon in the Story Chapel of Mount Auburn Cemetery, Cambridge, for Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan, who with her niece, Mrs. Gorham Brooks, of Brookline, donated Tanglewood, their family estate in Stockbridge, Mass., to the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a permanent home for the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

Miss Tappan, who died yesterday at her Back Bay home at 220 Marlborough Street, would have been ninety years old on Feb. 14. She was the daughter of William A. and Caroline Sturgis Tappan, and was born on the Bullard estate adjoining Tanglewood, in the same year that the family house was built on that estate.

It was in a cottage on the same estate that Nathaniel Hawthorne first told his "Tanglewood Tales" and framed the plot for his "House of Seven Gables." Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Herman Melville were among other literary greats who gathered there during Miss Tappan's childhood.

Just before the Boston Symphony Orchestra was to present its fourth festival, in 1937, the gift of the 210-acre estate by Miss Tappan and her niece was announced. The Berkshire festivals have continued in growing importance, their enjoyment increased by the construction of a great music shed which, acoustically ideal, gives listeners protection from storms.

Stanley Chapple Conducts Symphony with Brilliant Results

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 13th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Stanley Chapple conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Introduction and Allegro for Strings..Elgar
"Paris, a Night Place, the Song of a Great City".....Delius
Overture to a Picaresque Comedy.....Bax
Symphony No. 4 in E minor, op. 98..Brahms

Very often after the appearance of a guest conductor you will observe in next day's papers such ambiguous phrases as "seemed to get what he wanted by way of interpretation" or "the orchestra responded to his efforts." That usually means that the writer is being polite and noncommital and that he hopes he will not be called upon to be intelligent on the subject of conductors for some time to come. No such beating around the bush is necessary after yesterday's concert.

The orchestra did not have to "respend" to Mr. Chapple; he stimulated them. Yesterday's program was no mean test, and on the basis of it we can say that Mr. Chapple is an excellent conductor. He is a thorough musician, knows exactly the effects and the interpretation that he wants and goes right after them. From the musicians' point of view he must be a remarkably easy leader to follow. From the public's he is obviously sympathetic to the music at hand and gets brilliant results. Mr. Chapple is one of the best ever of the Boston Symphony's visitors.

The first part of the program was devoted to English composers and was well chosen in that field. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro is one of his most satisfying works. It is superbly written for the strings and must be enormously invigorating to play. When a good string band plays this piece properly the sensations of the musicians must be similar to that of an an eight-oared crew that is hitting its stride perfectly.

Elgar's music, for some reason or other, has never been popular outside England, at least not here. It is impossible to put your finger precisely on what it is that eludes or irritates the public in this respect. Perhaps it is that his scores need an English conductor to interpret them. The Introduction and Allegro, as we have said, needs special pleading much less than the rest. Neverthe less, it benefited greatly by being set on its way by Mr. Chapple. Another might not have got that splendid, sinewy strength out of the orchestra that he did.

Delius is another composer who is not really understood over here, even though for a time he lived in the South. We can not believe that "Paris" is his best work. It is too derivative, for one thing. Yet Delius was a most sensitive artist, and consequently there are many fine pages in this score and an imaginative scheme for it as a whole. He does not forget that the French, in the old definition, "love light wines and dancing;" but on the whole this Nocturne or symphoenic poem is nostalgic and contemplative. It follows also that it is a little tedious at times. Still, it has not been heard here for over 30 years and was certainly worth reviving.

Arnold Bax's Overture to a Picaresque Comedy needs no explanation. For the most part it is boisterous, jully music and might serve as musical comment on "Tom Jones" or "Roderick Random," which are, as you remember, picaresque novels. There is a sentimental middle section whicch serves well enough to set off the engaging humor of the rest of the music.

Mr. Chapple finally proved his authority as a conductor by his sound and eloquent reading of Brahm's greatest symphony, the 4th. The whole program was a taxing one for the conductor and it would have been easy to ride home on a merely routine performance of the Brahms, for the musicians of the Boston Symphony know it, of course, inside out. But Mr. Chapple saw to it that the performance had the spark of life and an authentic spirit. He was well received by the audience, as indeed he should have been.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Richard Burgin will conduct. Ruth Posselt, violinist, is the soloist and the program is as follows: Handel's Fireworks Music; Henriette Bosmans's Concert Piece for violin and orchestra; Walter Piston's Violin Concerto; Arnold Schoenberg's transcription for orchestra of Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
JAN 27 1941

MARY A. TAPPAN, 89, TANGLEWOOD DONOR

Bostonian Who, With Niece, Made Koussvitzky Music Festival Possible, Dies

SHE WAS BORN ON ESTATE

Hawthorne Wrote 'Tanglewood Tales' There—Melville and Other Writers Visitors

Special to THE NEW YORK TIMES.

BOSTON, Jan. 26—Miss Mary Aspinwall Tappan of this city, who, with her niece, Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline, gave the Tanglewood estate near Stockbridge in the Berkshire Hills to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, died today at the age of 89 at her home in the Back Bay. Tanglewood has become a Summer colony of music lovers.

The daughter of the late William A. and Caroline Sturgis Tappan, Miss Tappan was born on the Tanglewood estate and had lived there for most of her Summers, spending her Winters here. For many years she was on the Continent of Europe. She had been well known for her social service work in this city and vicinity.

Her niece is her only survivor.

Tanglewood, a 200-acre estate laid out in 1849 by William Aspinwall Tappan, is associated with American literature of the last century and is the site of one of the greatest cultural projects ever conceived in the United States.

Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in a little red cottage on the estate for a year in 1852, and there wrote his "Tanglewood Tales," from which the estate later took its name. Herman Melville, famous as the author of "Moby Dick," and other literary figures visited Hawthorne during his residence on the estate. The little red cottage burned down fifty years ago.

In 1937 Miss Tappan and her niece deeded the property to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for a project in which Dr. Serge Koussevitzky planned the establishment of Summer music, operatic and drama festivals that would compare with the Salzburg festivals in Europe.

The orchestra immediately opened a campaign for contributions with which a Music Shed was built to accommodate an audience of 5,000 at Summer concerts, and it was filled to overflowing last Summer. The main house on the estate was considered ideal for a school for the training of conductors playing before small audiences.

Plans call eventually for the presentation of operas, ballets and classical tragedy and comedy in a re-creation of the antique Greek theatre in a modern form.

In a statement outlining the project Dr. Koussevitzky said the aim was "the establishment of the greatest music and art center in the world."

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
JAN 26 1941

SYMPHONY PROGRAMS THE COMING WEEK

There will be four concerts in the coming week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. These concerts will be conducted by Richard Burgin and will take place on Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon, January 27-28, and on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, January 31-February 1st.

Mr. Burgin presents this programme for the fourth pair of concerts in the Monday-Tuesday series: Bach's Suite in B minor for flute and strings, in which Georges Laurent will play the flute solo, and Putnam Aldrich the harpsichord; Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony; Ravel's Suite "Mother Goose"; and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet."

At the concerts on Friday and Saturday, Miss Ruth Posselt will be the soloist, appearing in the first Boston performance of the new Violin Concerto by Walter Piston. Miss Posselt will also be heard in a Concert Piece in one movement by Henriette Bosmans. The programme will open with an arrangement for wind orchestra which Serge Koussevitzky has made of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in C major (VII). The arrangement will then have its first performance. There will follow the "Fire Music" of Handel, which likewise is to be heard for the first time at these concerts. The second portion of the programme will consist of Arnold Schoenberg's arrangement for full orchestra of the Piano Quartet of Brahms in G Minor.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
JAN 27 1941

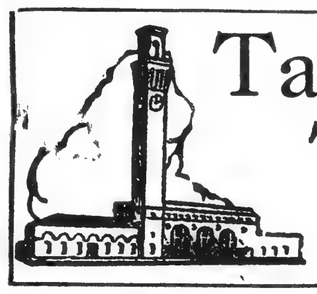
71

Burgin to Conduct Symphony Tuesday

Richard Burgin, concertmeister and associate conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will lead the orchestra in its programs of this week—filling the place of Dr. Koussevitzky who is on vacation. The program for Tuesday afternoon, the "Commuters' Day," will be a duplicate of the preceding evening—Bach's Suite in B minor, for flute and strings, Mendelssohn's "Italian Symphony," the "Mother Goose" Suite of Ravel and Tschaikowsky's Overture-Fantasy: "Romeo and Juliet."

The Tuesday concert is at the convenient hour of 3, concluding about 4:30, in ample time for the 5:49 from the Back Bay.

This Clipping From
WATERBURY, CONN.
DEMOCRAT
JAN 30 1941



Tall Tower Topics

BY THE MAN IN THE TOWER

Good Evening

The name Mary Aspinwall Tappen may not mean much to most people but is a name of significance in the Berkshire Hills country. Miss Tappan died the other day at her Back Bay (Boston) home. It was she who made the now nationally famous Berkshire Music festivals possible, for she donated the Tanglewood estate between Stockbridge and Lenox to the Boston Symphony orchestra. These festivals which started out modestly, presenting each year a series of musical programs have grown proportionately each year, until the enterprise is now carried on in a grand manner and on a much larger scale, a school now being conducted that covers all branches of music, and the establishment, so to speak, of a great music center. Miss Tappen was born on the Tanglewood estate which was laid out in 1849 by William Aspinwall Tappan, and which has had many literary associations. Nathaniel Hawthorne lived in a little red cottage on the estate at one time and here wrote his "Tanglewood Tales", the estate later adopting the name. Miss Tappen and her niece assigned the property to the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the project which has now been definitely established, a summer colony for music. Two music sheds have been built, the last one more adequate. In her childhood Miss Tappan saw at Tanglewood such visitors as Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, Oliver Wendell Holmes and Herman Melville.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

It has fallen to Richard Burgin to present the most adventurous program of the season, thus far, at the Boston Symphony concerts. The phrase "first performance at these concerts" stands beneath the title of all four works which the orchestra's concert-master conducted yesterday afternoon and will repeat tonight. In order they are Handel's "Fireworks Music," a Concert Piece by Henriette Bosmans, the Violin Concerto of Walter Piston, and Arnold Schoenberg's orchestral transcription of the G minor Piano Quartet, Op. 25, of Brahms. Ruth Posselt (Mrs. Richard Burgin) is violin soloist in the Bosmans and Piston.

Handel composed his "Fireworks Music" for the gigantic celebration staged in London April 27, 1749, in honor of the Peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. It was composed for a large number of wind instruments, to which Handel later added strings for performance indoors. Use of so many winds as Handel originally specified would be impracticable for several reasons at modern concerts. These performances follow Max Seiffert's edition, and they omit the two minuets.

In most of this solid, beefy score, with its six horns, three trumpets, three oboes and three bassoons, you would not easily recognize the Handel who wrote "Messiah" and "Solomon," the multitudinous, imposing arias of flowing style, or the concerto grossos. The largo alla Siciliana (titled "The Peace") does, however, remotely suggest a dance.

The other two movements are just what the title indicates, big and jubilant and tuny, composed for a joyous occasion. If only for the reason that we hear very little Handel nowadays, we must be grateful to Mr. Burgin for having introduced it to the Boston Symphony repertory.

The name Henriette Bosmans is unfamiliar. She is a pianist as well as composer, born in Amsterdam in 1895. Miss Posselt gave the first American performances of her Concert Piece last year. That it is in a single movement may have led some to expect a short, light work. Quite the opposite proved to be true. Miss Bosmans composed 15 minutes of dull, heavily orchestrated music that seemed twice as long. Her orchestration made one think a little of the Jewish music of Ernest Bloch, though it has far less intensity and color. The part for solo violin, on the other hand, is virtuoso material. With Miss Posselt's brilliant playing and the devoted conducting of Mr. Burgin, Miss Bosmans' Concert Piece must surely have been done under the best auspices. Yet one kept thinking it might better have been omitted, partly because it made the program too long, but mostly because it demanded too much of the audience's attention before Mr. Piston's Concerto, which is a much finer work.

One has said before that each new score by Walter Piston shows not only a more acute technic but a steady ripening of creative powers. The statement must be repeated, since the Violin Concerto is one of his best achievements. On the basis of first acquaintance it is plain that what he had to say was conditioned by form and instruments. It is not a "big" concerto in the conventional sense, but it is full of beauty and there is not one measure too many.

Both orchestration and solo part "sound" to the utmost. If some of the Piston melodic dryness yet remains, it is less noticeable than heretofore. Far more conspicuous is the development of a vein of lyricism, particularly in the slow movement, a refined and controlled lyricism that in its manner says quite as much as others have conveyed with bigger means. Dissonance, too, seems more ordered, more subordinated. It is to be hoped that this Concerto will not suffer the fate of a few performances and then long silence; repetitions are deserved until the public has become thoroughly familiar with it. Mr. Piston was enthusiastically acclaimed when he appeared on the stage after its performance.

By way of stating a fact, let one add that Miss Posselt has been ill and played after only a few rehearsals. No evidence of that was discernible in the poise or the technical assurance of her work. She performed as she always does, as a first-ranking artist.

To say that Schoenberg's transcription of the Brahms Quartet is neither Brahms nor Schoenberg is not disparaging. Nevertheless, the orchestration is only intermittently like that of Brahms. At other times it sounds like Richard Strauss, and the Gypsy finale might be Carmen dancing in the Vienna woods. At that, the Quartet stands up in its expensive new clothes as music of symphonic proportions. That is because the original work had plenty of good ideas. Mr. Burgin gave it an admirable interpretation, which was also true of the entire program.

C. W. D.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Monday Concert

The fourth concert of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series was given by the Boston Symphony orchestra last night in Symphony Hall. Richard Burgin, concert-master of the orchestra, was the conductor, and the soloists were Georges Laurent, flutist, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichordist. The program was as follows:

Suite in B minor for flute and strings ..... Bach
Symphony No. 4 in A minor ("Italian") ..... Mendelssohn
Ma Mere l'Oye ..... Ravel
Overture—Fantasie "Romeo and Juliet" ..... Tchaikovsky

This was a genteel sort of concert for a Monday night; refined, pleasant, easy-going, taxing neither orchestra nor audience. If you were in a daring mood you might even call it routine, but like as not more maturc cogitation on the matter would reveal the program to be mostly responsible for the impression.

Not exactly uninteresting but certainly over-sweet, the program was not one to leave a symphony audience breathless. It hears both the "Romeo and Juliet" overture and the "Italian" symphony almost constantly on the radio. Not as well done, of course, but done nevertheless. The charming Ravel suite is rather less familiar, but since it too is extremely ingratiating it doesn't appear in its best light sandwiched between the Mendelssohn and the Tchaikovsky—both of which are cloying to a degree.

The main interest, consequently, focusses on the Bach suite. This particular suite bears up less well than the others in a huge auditorium since it is of course impossible to double the solo flute. It was nevertheless remarkably well performed by Mr. Laurent, who achieved an amazing volume in his tuttis with the doubled string band. His solo passages were marked by purity of tone and a splendid virtuosity. Mr. Burgin conducted the orchestra with a sure and compelling beat but never forced it to the climaxes it is capable of. The concert will be repeated this afternoon at 3 o'clock.

R. F. E., JR.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony, led the orchestra in the fourth program of the Monday evening series of concerts at Symphony Hall last night. His program was composed of inviting but relatively familiar pieces, yet his approach gave it a completely fresh appeal.

Georges Laurent, flute, and Putnam Aldrich, harpsichord, were the soloists in the opening Bach Suite in B minor for Flute and Strings, as edited by Robert Franz. There followed Mendelssohn's sportive "Italian" Symphony in A major, No. 4, Op. 90; Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite, and the Overture-Fantasia "Romeo and Juliet" by Tchaikovsky.

Due to one thing and another, principally the slowness of traffic, this reviewer arrived at Symphony Hall too late to hear the graceful and elegant Bach Suite. So it must be reported second-hand that it was admirably performed, with Messrs. Laurent and Aldrich playing with their customary distinction.

Given indifferent readings, the familiar last three items on the program might have been tedious. But Mr. Burgin was obviously in no mood to be such. Instead there was imagination and energy in his conducting that seemed to bring new lights on the works he presented. As a result the "Italian" Symphony was in just the right tempo. It was high, spirited and brightly romantic.

Since much of Ravel's music is inclined to be reserved in nature, conductors sometimes bring it to such a state of rarefaction as to make it seem superficial and merely brilliant. The "Mother Goose" is exquisitely simple and poetical but not over-refined. Mr. Burgin instilled it with a subtle transparency, reminding one of delicately lucent water colors.

After the classic restraint of Ravel, one might expect the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture to be akin to rather hysterical emotionalism. But here again, Mr. Burgin succeeded in making the music before him just right. There was an extraordinary amount of verve in his reading. It was elemental, basic, and set one's blood to racing and heart pounding. But it was not coarse.

Mr. Burgin will conduct again this afternoon at 3, repeating this program.

BURGIN LEADS AT SYMPHONY

Acts as Conductor for Week at Concerts

The conductor for the week at the Symphony Concerts is Richard Burgin, concert master and assistant conductor of the orchestra, who made his first appearance of the season in the latter capacity last evening. The programme, which will be repeated this afternoon, was in the main derived from programmes of preceding concerts of the regular series directed by Dr. Koussevitsky. For opening number there came however, a composition unheard at Symphony Hall for some time, Bach's delightful Suite in B minor for flute and strings. The soloist was Georges Laurent, first flutist of the orchestra, who played with his accustomed finish and virtuosity.

The remainder of the programme, in which Dr. Koussevitsky's interpretations were heard by proxy, consisted of Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Ravel's "Mother Goose" Suite and Tchaikovsky's Overture-Fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet."

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES

JAN 29 1941

Burgin in Brilliant Form

Assistant Conductor Leads Orchestra in 'Italian' Symphony

The impressions here set down concern the Monday evening performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra rather than that of the paired Tuesday "Commuters' Matinee" as customarily attended. As a matter of snowy weather driving, it seemed wiser to join a party of three Monday night subscribers from this locality. We hope yesterday's audiences enjoyed as brilliant conducting as Mr. Burgin gave Monday.

This is Burgin week, for in the vacationing of Dr. Koussevitzky, his assistant and concertmeister not only took charge of the monthly pair of concerts but will conduct the regular Friday afternoon and Saturday evening program upon which his talented wife, Ruth Posselt, will be violin soloist in two numbers—Bosmans and Piston of Harvard.

Coming out of the cold and the snow, one found warmth and good cheer in the discreet mastic and gold of Symphony Hall. Mr. Burgin had arranged a program to delight: one of the charming Bach Suites (that in B minor, No. 2 for flute and strings); the imagination-stirring "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn; Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" suite of fairy-tales in sound and the exciting "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia of Tschaikowsky.

In the Bach, there was the pleasure of hearing Georges Laurent's flute prominently with a "continuo" on the harpsichord by Putnam Aldrich. Of course all and sundry caught up with the swiftly passing members of the suite when Mr. Laurent rose in the Bourree for the enchanting floridities of his part, supported by Mr. Bedetti's cello and one of the two double basses—later elaborated by another cello and violas. At the Badinerie, those lightly tossed flute notes assured us we knew the suite of old.

Mr. Burgin renewed the youthful spirit of the 21-year-old Mendelssohn in the symphony he began during a happy Winter in Rome. It was brilliantly presented—opening with electrical effect and exuberance in the Allegro vivace, played with both precision and enthusiasm by the accustomed band.

A minor cast for the Andante set its chiseled melody against a gentle, but clearly-brought-out pattern of woodwinds. One visioned it as some oldtime tale, related among the flowering ways of the Southland to the visitor from the North. Both the Andante and the flashing Saltarello must have been cherished souvenirs to take home to Germany.

Perhaps a bit lighter hand might have been given to the miniatures of Ravel but, it being a cold night, Mr. Burgin's way with the "Romeo and Juliet" was heartening. He spent small sentiment on the love theme; clashed up the street fighting to gorgeous climaxes. It was all consistent if more symphonic than romantic.

A.C.R.

Symphonic Novelties

The Arts in Boston

Enough for a violin concerto if it enshrines ever so short a strain of memorable melody within the three divisions of which it commonly consists; and Walter Piston's Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, which held chief place on the Boston Symphony program yesterday afternoon, Mme. Ruth Posselt playing the solo part, Richard Burgin conducting, and the composer attending to take applause, possesses at least a saving element of tune in its second movement. A complete air, indeed, would more than suffice to make a work remembered. A single note in the right setting might answer, not only to impress a piece on the memory of listeners, but even to cause them to want a repeat performance.

The special instant in the Piston concerto proves to be more than a lone note and less than a full song; but, no escape, it is there, in the clear voice of the violin, toward the close of the andante. It comes as a sentimental quiver, not sad and gloomy, nor yet gay and laughing, but of a quiet romantic sort such as certain of the best American types of art are calculated to give. Nothing, certainly, to rave about; and still, something to feel and to recognize as native to the United States. To localize it in New England, or in the East, or in the North, would be to narrow down its value and force. It pertains neither to region nor to dialect. It is nothing short of national and expressive of the whole country.

On the external side, the concerto is an admirable example of design, completely respecting the classic form without subservience to conventionality, and disclosing plentiful traits of individual craftsmanship. The composer shows hesitancy and uncertainty only when going more than need to be on his own, as happens here and there in the first movement; for he could at times let old methods have their way with him and help him through scrapes which his inventive knack finds difficulty in coping with.

The music can confidently be described as the correct thing in plan and style, so smoothly it went in performance under Mme. Posselt's skilled hands. A companion novelty that Mme. Posselt interpreted was the Concertstück for Violin and Orchestra by Henriette Bosmans, the Netherlands composer and pianist; an interesting matter to listen to, its especial character taken into account. Solo instrument and orchestra are well set off against each other, everything stands in excellent balance as regards construction and sonority. The work falls out of rule, if at all, in instrumental idea. The Concertstück sounds, that is to say, like something thought of in terms of the piano and violin and transferred to the orchestra and violin somewhat as an arranger does things. Nevertheless, the music plays off agreeably, and excitingly, too, because of its contrasts of serious and sparkling, and of elegiac and satiric.

Arnold Schönberg figured on the program with a vastly loud and busy transcription of the Brahms Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor—a remarkable exhibition of orchestral practice scoring. Handel was there, too, with an edited set of movements bearing the title, "Fireworks Music," lending an old-fashioned clang to the occasion.

W. P. T.

John B. Sanromá

Walter Piston

Whose Violin Concerto will be played by Ruth Posselt at the Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
HAWTHORNE, N. J
NEWS
1/30/41

Boston Symphony Presented Feb. 11

By Griffith Music Foundation in Newark

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, on February 11, Newark, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston.

The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its sixtieth year. In 1881 sixty players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until twenty years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor from England to direct it.

A succession of eminent conductors followed, each building the orchestra in tonal power and achievement. In 1924 Serge Koussevitsky came to the United States and was almost immediately engaged as conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post which he has held ever since.

Koussevitzky came to the United States from Paris where he had been conducting his own orchestra and presenting "Concerts Koussevitzky." Born in Russia he had, as a small boy, run away from home to attend the Philharmonic School in Moscow. On his unexpected arrival he found the school full and the year begun. But authorities sensed his unusual abilities and offered him the only scholarship open — for a student of the double bass. Koussevitzky accepted it, and within a short time astonished teachers by coaxing lovely cello-like tones and delicate melodies from the cumbrous bass.

His first trials as an orchestra conductor were in Berlin. Later he established his own orchestra in Moscow and gave memorable concerts there and in St. Petersburg. A pioneer in his art, he decided to further spread it, and he chartered a steamer to take his players the length of the Volga in order to give musically starved people of provincial towns their first symphony concert. The revolution brought an end to his orchestral performances, and the conductor left for Paris, London, and eventually America.

Tickets for the concert are on sale through members of the Woman's Club of Orange and at the Griffith Music Foundation, 605 Broad Street, Newark.

Piston's Violin Concerto at Symphony Concerts

Program Consists Wholly Of Works New to Boston

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"You may expect me to be silent," said Walter Piston, the composer, "when I have nothing to say."

This was in reply to a query of mine, made in the course of a call at his residence, where he played over on the piano his Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, announced for presentation by the Boston Symphony, Mme Ruth Posselt the soloist, and Richard Burgin the conductor, this week. At a moment of pause, I, not only in curiosity but in fairness, had asked:

"Where is the filling?"

In fairness, I note, since filling, extra decoration, or call it what you like, may be expected, almost as a matter of rule, to mark a work designed for the display of a front-stage performer.

* * *

Does not a show piece, indeed, exist largely for the show's sake? Without dispute it does in plenty of cases, though not here. The solo part of Mr. Piston's composition tests severely enough the powers of an executant on the violin, yet chiefly in a musical way, and scarcely ever in the way of pure technical exhibition. Harmless to divulge, a somewhat elaborate unaccompanied passage stands in the score, which may be thought inserted for that purpose. It is a cadenza; and what concerto has the appropriate festive thrill, if lacking such a momentary diversion? In any view, the brief episode in which the composer lets his fancy go free and gives the soloist scope to parade tricks is based directly on themes heard just before, and accordingly it passes for something that appertains to the main idea.

To speak in behalf of an orchestral offering by an American is to assume, necessarily, the role of apologist. The how and the why have to be explained, and the composer's right to be heard has to be proved. For of all realistic entities in the world, none is more so than a public that subscribes to symphony concerts; and with a public of the sort the notion has become fixed, or next thing to fixed, that American orchestral composing has still to get into production. Tools and shops have yet to be made ready; and one of the last places where the desired article may be expected to issue from is a university.

* * *

The particular stigma that efforts of college professors of music have to carry is that of being "academic"; and yet orchestral compositions by Americans who hold rating as practical musicians rarely find warm favor either, their output being quite regularly dismissed as in some respect imitative. Not to dispute persons who adopt traditional opinions and stick to them against every argument, I must grant that Mr. Piston has the disability not only of being a professor of music but that of being a practical musician as well; inasmuch as he belongs to the faculty of Harvard, and inasmuch as, furthermore, he plays the violin.

But President James Bryant Conant in his Report to the Board of Overseers of Harvard, just sent out for 1939-40, makes a plea for especial cultivation of the arts in the University at this time, and Mr. Piston tells me that enrollment in the Harvard Music Department has in the last few years doubled. He himself has to do with some 80 students in the music courses. So composing looks like a waxing college interest, and we had perhaps better make the most of it. At any rate, here comes along the Violin Concerto by Piston, in three movements, as follows:

1. Allegro Energico, in classic sonata form.
2. Andantino Tranquillo; theme and three variations, with repeat of theme.
3. Allegro con Spirito, in more or less rondo form, with three themes and a variation of the second theme from the first movement.

The Concerto is written in the key of D, though no key signature so indicates. It has already been through performance in public and is not a raw and untried novelty. Mme. Posselt, too, was the soloist. The first presentation took place in New York under the direction of Leon Barzin, conductor of the National Orchestral Association.

On the Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday program is scheduled another work new to the town—a Concertstück for Violin and Orchestra by Henriette Bosmans, Mme. Posselt the soloist. The Bosmans work dates from 1934 and was produced in Amsterdam under Willem Mengelberg, with Louis Zimmerman as soloist, in 1935. Mme Posselt has taken part in performances in New York and Cincinnati.

Still another item new to Boston is an arrangement for orchestra of the Brahms Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor, Op. 25, by Arnold Schoenberg. A hitherto untried work in three movements by Handel, "Fireworks Music," is down on the program as opening number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TEANECK, N.J
POST
1/30/41

Boston Symphony To Perform At Newark On February 11th

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Marian Anderson, Nelson Eddy and two performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo were announced today as additional features of the program of the Griffith Music Foundation by Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, president.

The Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will make its first appearance for the Foundation on February 11 in the Mosque Theater. The concert will be sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

Nelson Eddy, baritone star of concert, screen and radio, will also make his first appearance under the sponsorship of the Griffith Music Foundation when he gives a recital at the Mosque on March 10.

Two performances of the Ballet

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 31 1941

DALE HARRISON'S NEW YORK

NEW YORK—People and Places: The piano player of the intimate Barberry Room was pacing up and down Madison avenue in high dudgeon, muttering under his breath. To a friend who inquired the reason for his rage, he grumbled: "It's Toscanini. I was sitting at the piano, playing my stint. In comes this Toscanini fellow and takes a table. A few minutes later a waiter comes over and tells me to stop playing while the maestro is in the room, on account of the maestro doesn't appear too happy about my piano playing. I've been walking around out here in the cold for an hour, and I'm still indignant."

It's more than likely that Toscanini made no protest whatever about the music. More probably one of the captains of the restaurant did so of his own volition in the belief the master doesn't like such light music as one would expect to find in such circumstances. Actually, Toscanini has often given indication of his enjoyment of New York night clubs and American popular music. In the days of the old Cotton Club he liked to go there and listen to the hot and swingy negro bands.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini never grants interviews, and his thoughts upon matters animal, vegetable and mineral can only be guessed upon the basis of his actions and the occasional comments of musicians associated with him. It is quite generally accepted that he has no particularly high enthusiasm for contemporaneous serious music by Americans, for he rarely performs their works. Most encouraging among front ranking conductors toward American composers is Koussevitsky of the Boston orchestra. The late Henry Hadley, American born, made it a rule to include the work of at least one American on every concert program. This didn't do him any good with certain wealthy patrons of music who would have liked him much better if he had stuck to the established classics.

There is no major symphony orchestra in America today that has an American-born conductor. Boston's Koussevitsky came from Russia; Stokowski too. Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia orchestra was born in Budapest. Eugene Goossens and John Barbirolli are English, Toscanini Italian. None of the principal maestri of the Metropolitan Opera is American born, and the general manager of the opera is from Canada. The only native born conductors of serious music that come to mind are Albert Stoessel (born in St. Louis), Arthur Fiedler—conductor of the Boston "Pops" orchestra—, a native of Massachusetts, and Werner Janssen, son of a New York restaurateur. The greater part of all the classical music sent to America over the radio networks is either from the batons of foreign born conductors or supervised by them.

I have yet to meet a Europe-trained maestro who had any sincere sympathy for the work of American composers or who gave anything more than lip born on early Louisiana plantations; can conductors developed during the past quarter century behave patronizingly toward American com-

MUSIC and RECORDINGS

by Constance Contestabile

AN enthusiastic audience greeted guest conductor Stanley Chapple at last week's Symphony concert. Mr. Chapple, an Englishman, conducted three compositions by modern English composers, so one assumes that we heard an authentic interpretation of them. The Delius was excellently done; but we thought Bax's "Overture to a Picaresque Comedy" a little lacking in humor and sparkle. Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro" was first on the program and we did not hear it, and thereby hangs a grievance! Being late to concerts is bad, and we don't excuse it, but Saturday night we arrived at Symphony Hall just after the doors had closed and the Elgar had begun. We listened with straining ears, and could hear very little but a loud sound of conversation from the other latecomers. We frowned forbiddingly with no results and an usher made a couple of suggestions via a sign which read "Silence is Requested." People smiled gently and went right on talking! (I am in favor of a sign saying "SHUT UP!") Really, dear people, it is not nice to be so thoughtless. It spoils the music for many people inside as well as for those outside.

The last number of this program was Brahms' Symphony No. 4, in E minor, which Mr. Chapple did very well by. We liked it better, in point of interpretation, than the rest of the program. Incidentally, a brand new recording of this symphony, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Koussevitsky, will make its appearance in the music stores this week. It is superbly played—in fact, it is claimed to be one of the greatest recordings ever made by this orchestra. This work has been used as a ballet with much success—you may remember it as a background for some choreography by the Ballet Russe a few years back. This is a Victor Red Seal Album; M/AM/OM-730.

February promises to be a gala month for record-buyers. Some splendid and musicianly new offerings are coming up, in all branches of the art. We have already mentioned Dr. Koussevitsky's recording of Brahms' "Symphony No. 4."

Helen Traubel completely disproves the popular theory that an artist cannot sing both opera and lieder by recording the Schumann song cycles "Woman's Love and Life." (Frauenliebe and Leben.) This eloquent music, sung in German, reveals fully the richness, flexibility and dramatic power of Miss Traubel's voice, making an outstanding collection of lieder. (Victor album M-737.)

Marjorie Lawrence also turns to lieder, presenting two of the loveliest songs in this classification, "Stimme Der Sehnsucht" and "Michaelskirchplatz," both by Pfitzner. With Felix Wolfes at the piano, these are noble and sympathetic performances. (Victor 2142.)

The highly cultivated voices of the Augustana Choir present music from the 16th and 17th centuries, "Ecce Quomodo Moritur" (Behold! The Way of Death) of Palestrina, and "Misericordias Domini" (God Have Mercy On Us) of Francesco Durante. Both are sung in Latin under the direction of Henry Veld. (Victor 17633.)

Piston's Violin Concerto at Symphony Concerts

Program Consists Wholly Of Works New to Boston

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"You may expect me to be silent," said Walter Piston, the composer, "when I have nothing to say."

This was in reply to a query of mine, made in the course of a call at his residence, where he played over on the piano his Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, announced for presentation by the Boston Symphony, Mme Ruth Posselt the soloist, and Richard Burgin the conductor, this week. At a moment of pause, I, not only in curiosity but in fairness, had asked:

"Where is the filling?"

In fairness, I note, since filling, extra decoration, or call it what you like, may be expected, almost as a matter of rule, to mark a work designed for the display of a front-stage performer.

* * *

Does not a show piece, indeed, exist largely for the show's sake? Without dispute it does in plenty of cases, though not here. The solo part of Mr. Piston's composition tests severely enough the powers of an executant on the violin, yet chiefly in a musical way, and scarcely ever in the way of pure technical exhibition. Harmless to divulge, a somewhat elaborate unaccompanied passage stands in the score, which may be thought inserted for that purpose. It is a cadenza; and what concerto has the appropriate festive thrill, if lacking such a momentary diversion? In any view, the brief episode in which the composer lets his fancy go free and gives the soloist scope to parade tricks is based directly on themes heard just before, and accordingly it passes for something that appertains to the main idea.

To speak in behalf of an orchestral offering by an American is to assume, necessarily, the role of apologist. The how and the why have to be explained, and the composer's right to be heard has to be proved. For of all realistic entities in the world, none is more so than a public that subscribes to symphony concerts; and with a public of the sort the notion has become fixed, or next thing to fixed, that American orchestral composing has still to get into production. Tools and shops have yet to be made ready; and one of the last places where the desired article may be expected to issue from is a university.

* * *

The particular stigma that efforts of college professors of music have to carry is that of being "academic"; and yet orchestral compositions by Americans who hold rating as practical musicians rarely find warm favor either, their output being quite regularly dismissed as in some respect imitative. Not to dispute persons who adopt traditional opinions and stick to them against every argument, I must grant that Mr. Piston has the disability not only of being a professor of music but that of being a practical musician as well; inasmuch as he belongs to the faculty of Harvard, and inasmuch as, furthermore, he plays the violin.

But President James Bryant Conant in his Report to the Board of Overseers of Harvard, just sent out for 1939-40, makes a plea for especial cultivation of the arts in the University at this time, and Mr. Piston tells me that enrollment in the Harvard Music Department has in the last few years doubled. He himself has to do with some 80 students in the music courses. So composing looks like a waxing college interest, and we had perhaps better make the most of it. At any rate, here comes along the Violin Concerto by Piston, in three movements, as follows:

1. Allegro Energico, in classic sonata form.
2. Andantino Tranquillo; theme and three variations, with repeat of theme.
3. Allegro con Spirito, in more or less rondo form, with three themes and a variation of the second theme from the first movement.

The Concerto is written in the key of D, though no key signature so indicates. It has already been through performance in public and is not a raw and untried novelty. Mme. Posselt, too, was the soloist. The first presentation took place in New York under the direction of Leon Barzin, conductor of the National Orchestral Association.

On the Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday program is scheduled another work new to the town—a Concertstück for Violin and Orchestra by Henriette Bosmans, Mme. Posselt the soloist. The Bosmans work dates from 1934 and was produced in Amsterdam under Willem Mengelberg, with Louis Zimmerman as soloist, in 1935. Mme Posselt has taken part in performances in New York and Cincinnati.

Still another item new to Boston is an arrangement for orchestra of the Brahms Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor, Op. 25, by Arnold Schoenberg. A hitherto untried work in three movements by Handel, "Fireworks Music," is down on the program as opening number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TEANECK, N.J.
POST
1/30/41

Boston Symphony To Perform At Newark On February 11th

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Marian Anderson, Nelson Eddy and two performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo were announced today as additional features of the program of the Griffith Music Foundation by Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, president.

The Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will make its first appearance for the Foundation on February 11 in the Mosque Theater. The concert will be sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

Nelson Eddy, baritone star of concert, screen and radio, will also make his first appearance under the sponsorship of the Griffith Music Foundation when he gives a recital at the Mosque on March 19.

Two performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will be given on Saturday, March 22. Featuring Massine, Slavenska, Markova, Danilova, Youskevitch, Eglevsky and Franklin, the company will present a special young people's matinee at 2:30, and an evening performance at 8:40. This will be the Ballet's third time in Newark under Foundation auspices. A portion of the proceeds for the Ballet's evening performance will be given to the Jewish Child Guidance Bureau of Newark.

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS
JAN 31 1941

73

DALE HARRISON'S NEW YORK

NEW YORK—People and Places: The piano player of the intimate Barberry Room was pacing up and down Madison avenue in high dudgeon, muttering under his breath. To a friend who inquired the reason for his rage, he grumbled: "It's Toscanini. I was sitting at the piano, playing my stint. In comes this Toscanini fellow and takes a table. A few minutes later a waiter comes over and tells me to stop playing while the maestro is in the room, on account of the maestro doesn't appear too happy about my piano playing. I've been walking around out here in the cold for an hour, and I'm still indignant."

It's more than likely that Toscanini made no protest whatever about the music. More probably one of the captains of the restaurant did so of his own volition in the belief the master doesn't like such light music as one would expect to find in such circumstances. Actually, Toscanini has often given indication of his enjoyment of New York night clubs and American popular music. In the days of the old Cotton Club he liked to go there and listen to the hot and swingy negro bands.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini never grants interviews, and his thoughts upon matters animal, vegetable and mineral can only be guessed upon the basis of his actions and the occasional comments of musicians associated with him. It is quite generally accepted that he has no particularly high enthusiasm for contemporaneous serious music by Americans, for he rarely performs their works. Most encouraging among front ranking conductors toward American composers is Koussevitsky of the Boston orchestra. The late Henry Hadley, American born, made it a rule to include the work of at least one American on every concert program. This didn't do him any good with certain wealthy patrons of music who would have liked him much better if he had stuck to the established classics.

There is no major symphony orchestra in America today that has an American-born conductor. Boston's Koussevitsky came from Russia; Stokowski too. Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia orchestra was born in Budapest. Eugene Goossens and John Barbirolli are English, Toscanini Italian. None of the principal maestri of the Metropolitan Opera is American born, and the general manager of the opera is from Canada. The only native born conductors of serious music that come to mind are Albert Stoessel (born in St. Louis), Arthur Fiedler—conductor of the Boston "Pops" orchestra—, a native of Massachusetts, and Werner Janssen, son of a New York restaurateur. The greater part of all the classical music sent to America over the radio networks is either from the batons of foreign born conductors or supervised by them.

I have yet to meet a Europe-trained maestro who had any sincere sympathy for the work of American composers or who gave anything more than lip born on early Louisiana plantations; can conductors developed during the past quarter century behave patronizingly toward American composition. A notable exception is Dr. Howard Hanson of the School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., whose orchestra is constantly performing American works, often from manuscript. The music is not always good, but its constant encouragement by Dr. Hanson is one of the really important contributions to the development of American music.

What's Doin in Town

AFTER SUNDOWN

TOP attraction of the week goes to the Mayfair, where the inimitable George Jessel is the feature attraction until Wednesday, January 29th . . . At the Latin Quarter a gay Parisian revue is the attraction . . . The starry cast includes, the Clymas, the Four Sydneys, the Kosloff Dancers, and Evelyn Farney.

The Beachcomber is still offering those exotic tropical revues in an atmosphere of the romantic South Sea Islands. It is another gay and smooth revue at the Cocoanut Grove this coming week . . . And of course to further add to the pleasure of your evening the ever popular Mickey Alpert and his band are supplying the dance music . . . The Hotel Essex Grill Room is presenting entertainment with plenty of sparkle . . . Lou Gordon and his orchestra continue to play here for dancing.

At the Versailles this week the feature attraction is Lois Andrew, lovely wife of the ace comedian, George Jessel. So with George at the Mayfair and Lois at the Versailles, the Jessel family do very well in taking over the night life in the hub this week . . . Steuben's Vienna Room is playing host to large crowds these days . . . Lew Conrad and his orchestra play here for your dancing pleasure . . . The Bermuda Terrace still offers the rhythms of Ella Fitzgerald and her orchestra to make a very worth while attraction.—J. H. B.

NOW THRU FEBRUARY 4
GEORGE JESSEL
AMERICA'S GREATEST WIT
Heading a New All-Star
BROADWAY MUSICAL REVUE

Piston's Violin Concerto at Symphony Concerts

Program Consists Wholly Of Works New to Boston

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"You may expect me to be silent," said Walter Piston, the composer, "when I have nothing to say."

This was in reply to a query of mine, made in the course of a call at his residence, where he played over on the piano his Concerto for Violin and Orchestra, announced for presentation by the Boston Symphony, Mme Ruth Posselt the soloist, and Richard Burgin the conductor, this week. At a moment of pause, I, not only in curiosity but in fairness, had asked:

"Where is the filling?"

In fairness, I note, since filling, extra decoration, or call it what you like, may be expected, almost as a matter of rule, to mark a work designed for the display of a front-stage performer.

* * *

Does not a show piece, indeed, exist largely for the show's sake? Without dispute it does in plenty of cases, though not here. The solo part of Mr. Piston's composition tests severely enough the powers of an executant on the violin, yet chiefly in a musical way, and scarcely ever in the way of pure technical exhibition. Harmless to divulge, a somewhat elaborate unaccompanied passage stands in the score, which may be thought inserted for that purpose. It is a cadenza; and what concerto has the appropriate festive thrill, if lacking such a momentary diversion? In any view, the brief episode in which the composer lets his fancy go free and gives the soloist scope to parade tricks is based directly on themes heard just before, and accordingly it passes for something that appertains to the main idea.

To speak in behalf of an orchestral offering by an American is to assume, necessarily, the role of apologist. The how and the why have to be explained, and the composer's right to be heard has to be proved. For of all realistic entities in the world, none is more so than a public that subscribes to symphony concerts; and with a public of the sort the notion has become fixed, or next thing to fixed, that American orchestral composing has still to get into production. Tools and shops have yet to be made ready; and one of the last places where the desired article may be expected to issue from is a university.

* * *

The particular stigma that efforts of college professors of music have to carry is that of being "academic"; and yet orchestral compositions by Americans who hold rating as practical musicians rarely find warm favor either, their output being quite regularly dismissed as in some respect imitative. Not to dispute persons who adopt traditional opinions and stick to them against every argument, I must grant that Mr. Piston has the disability not only of being a professor of music but that of being a practical musician as well; inasmuch as he belongs to the faculty of Harvard, and inasmuch as, furthermore, he plays the violin.

But President James Bryant Conant in his Report to the Board of Overseers of Harvard, just sent out for 1939-40, makes a plea for especial cultivation of the arts in the University at this time, and Mr. Piston tells me that enrollment in the Harvard Music Department has in the last few years doubled. He himself has to do with some 80 students in the music courses. So composing looks like a waxing college interest, and we had perhaps better make the most of it. At any rate, here comes along the Violin Concerto by Piston, in three movements, as follows:

1. Allegro Energico, in classic sonata form.
2. Andantino Tranquillo; theme and three variations, with repeat of theme.
3. Allegro con Spirito, in more or less rondo form, with three themes and a variation of the second theme from the first movement.

The Concerto is written in the key of D, though no key signature so indicates. It has already been through performance in public and is not a raw and untried novelty. Mme. Posselt, too, was the soloist. The first presentation took place in New York under the direction of Leon Barzin, conductor of the National Orchestral Association.

On the Boston Symphony Friday and Saturday program is scheduled another work new to the town—a Concertstück for Violin and Orchestra by Henriette Bosmans, Mme. Posselt the soloist. The Bosmans work dates from 1934 and was produced in Amsterdam under Willem Mengelberg, with Louis Zimmerman as soloist, in 1935. Mme Posselt has taken part in performances in New York and Cincinnati.

Still another item new to Boston is an arrangement for orchestra of the Brahms Quartet for Piano and Strings in G minor, Op. 25, by Arnold Schoenberg. A hitherto untried work in three movements by Handel, "Fireworks Music," is down on the program as opening number.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TEANECK, N.J
POST
1/30/41

Boston Symphony To Perform At Newark On February 11th

Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Marian Anderson, Nelson Eddy and two performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo were announced today as additional features of the program of the Griffith Music Foundation by Mrs. Parker O. Griffith, president.

The Boston Symphony under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky will make its first appearance for the Foundation on February 11 in the Mosque Theater. The concert will be sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

Nelson Eddy, baritone star of concert, screen and radio, will also make his first appearance under the sponsorship of the Griffith Music Foundation when he gives a recital at the Mosque on March 19.

Two performances of the Ballet Russe de Monte Carlo will be given on Saturday, March 22. Featuring Massine, Slavenska, Markova, Danilova, Youskevitch, Eglevsky and Franklin, the company will present a special young people's matinee at 2:30, and an evening performance at 8:40. This will be the Ballet's third time in Newark under Foundation auspices. A portion of the proceeds for the Ballet's evening performance will be given to the Jewish Child Guidance Bureau of Newark.

This Clipping From
PERTH AMBOY, N. J.
NEWS

JAN 31 1941

73

DALE HARRISON'S NEW YORK

NEW YORK—People and Places: The piano player of the intimate Barberry Room was pacing up and down Madison avenue in high dudgeon, muttering under his breath. To a friend who inquired the reason for his rage, he grumbled: "It's Toscanini. I was sitting at the piano, playing my stint. In comes this Toscanini fellow and takes a table. A few minutes later a waiter comes over and tells me to stop playing while the maestro is in the room, on account of the maestro doesn't appear too happy about my piano playing. I've been walking around out here in the cold for an hour, and I'm still indignant."

It's more than likely that Toscanini made no protest whatever about the music. More probably one of the captains of the restaurant did so of his own volition in the belief the master doesn't like such light music as one would expect to find in such circumstances. Actually, Toscanini has often given indication of his enjoyment of New York night clubs and American popular music. In the days of the old Cotton Club he liked to go there and listen to the hot and swingy negro bands.

* * *

Arturo Toscanini never grants interviews, and his thoughts upon matters animal, vegetable and mineral can only be guessed upon the basis of his actions and the occasional comments of musicians associated with him. It is quite generally accepted that he has no particularly high enthusiasm for contemporaneous serious music by Americans, for he rarely performs their works. Most encouraging among front ranking conductors toward American composers is Koussevitsky of the Boston orchestra. The late Henry Hadley, American born, made it a rule to include the work of at least one American on every concert program. This didn't do him any good with certain wealthy patrons of music who would have liked him much better if he had stuck to the established classics.

There is no major symphony orchestra in America today that has an American-born conductor. Boston's Koussevitsky came from Russia; Stokowski too. Eugene Ormandy of the Philadelphia orchestra was born in Budapest, Eugene Gossens and John Barbirolli are English, Toscanini Italian. None of the principal maestri of the Metropolitan Opera is American born, and the general manager of the opera is from Canada. The only native born conductors of serious music that come to mind are Albert Stoessel (born in St. Louis), Arthur Fiedler—conductor of the Boston "Pops" orchestra—, a native of Massachusetts, and Werner Janssen, son of a New York restaurateur. The greater part of all the classical music sent to America over the radio networks is either from the batons of foreign born conductors or supervised by them.

I have yet to meet a Europe-trained maestro who had any sincere sympathy for the work of American composers or who gave anything more than lip born on early Louisiana plantations; can conductors developed during the past quarter century behave patronizingly toward American composition. A notable exception is Dr. Howard Hanson of the School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., whose orchestra is constantly performing American works, often from manuscript. The music is not always good, but its constant encouragement by Dr. Hanson is one of the really important contributions to the development of American music.

What's Doin in Town

AFTER SUNDOWN

TOP attraction of the week goes to the Mayfair, where the inimitable George Jessel is the feature attraction until Wednesday, January 29th . . . At the Latin Quarter a gay Parisian revue is the attraction . . . The starry cast includes, the Clymas, the Four Sydneys, the Kosloff Dancers, and Evelyn Farney.

The Beachcomber is still offering those exotic tropical revues in an atmosphere of the romantic South Sea Islands. It is another gay and smooth revue at the Cocoanut Grove this coming week . . . And of course to further add to the pleasure of your evening the ever popular Mickey Alpert and his band are supplying the dance music . . . The Hotel Essex Grill Room is presenting entertainment with plenty of sparkle . . . Lou Gordon and his orchestra continue to play here for dancing.

At the Versailles this week the feature attraction is Lois Andrew, lovely wife of the ace comedian, George Jessel. So with George at the Mayfair and Lois at the Versailles, the Jessel family do very well in taking over the night life in the hub this week . . . Steuben's Vienna Room is playing host to large crowds these days . . . Lew Conrad and his orchestra play here for your dancing pleasure . . . The Bermuda Terrace still offers the rhythms of Ella Fitzgerald and her orchestra to make a very worth while attraction.—J. H. B.

Room
IR
700
NOW THRU FEBRUARY 4
GEORGE JESSEL
AMERICA'S GREATEST WIT
Heading a New All-Star
BROADWAY MUSICAL REVUE

VICTOR RECORD REVIEW

VOL. 3 FEBRUARY, 1941 NO. 10

Arthur Griffin

Serge Koussevitzky

BY JOHN N. BURK

Author of program notes for Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts reveals the qualities that make a great leader and interpreter

THE name of Serge Koussevitzky is magic—one of those names about which legends cluster. The world must envelop its famous men in an aura of mystery, and if some of the legends are half truths or untruths—there is little use in denying them. They will simply go on being repeated, as is the way with legends.

There has been much speculation about how Koussevitzky goes about preparing the disclosures which he makes from the public platform with an Olympian assurance. as if nothing could ever go wrong. Does he act like an ordinary human being at rehearsal, behaving like the rest of us (or worse)? One writer recently set out to expose the frailties of famous conductors at their work. Coming to Koussevitzky, he found himself reduced to speaking only of "The Kremlinlike secrecy which surrounds the preparation of his programs," adding that "an inquiry about his rehearsals invariably produces the same enigmatic smile, but no information and less satisfaction."

Any conductor of the very first rank is supposed to have an impossible temper. Of course anyone fitting the requirements of that lofty station would have his moments of overtension, impatience at rehearsals—even eruptions. It must be so, in the handling of a hundred temperaments by one. A leader could not remain invariably even and reasonable without coming nearer to complacent routine than is possible in the conceptual and mood-evoking task before him. If there is an "incident"—a spark now and then at the Boston Symphony rehearsals—it is usually taken in the stride. The conductor is popular with most of his musicians, respected and esteemed by all of them.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1941

Musicians' Data Put on Exhibition

Caricatures. autographed pictures, music manuscripts and letters of musicians, composers and instrumental virtuosos of the past century were on exhibition today at Bloomingdale's. Part of the exhibit, collected by Boaz Piller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in the Lexington Ave. windows, while the remainder is in the radio and phonograph departments.

Brahms, Liszt, Grieg, Sibelius, Ravel and Rachmaninoff are among the composers represented. One of the features of the show is a collection of 57 caricatures of musicians by Daumier.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1941

Bostonians to Play Duke's Concerto

Vernon Duke, who wrote the music for "Cabin in the Sky," at the Martin Beck Theatre, has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 4 - 1941

Violin Concerto Accepted

Vernon Duke has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization. Mr. Duke is presently represented on Broadway by "Cabin in the Sky," musical comedy starring Ethel Waters at the Martin Beck Theatre.

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 1 - 1941

Koussevitzky Will Direct The Boston Symphony Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, on Feb. 11, Newark, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston. The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its 60th year. In 1881 60 players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until twenty years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor from England to direct it.

VICTOR RECORD REVIEW

VOL. 3 FEBRUARY, 1941 NO. 10

Arthur Griffin

Serge Koussevitzky

BY JOHN N. BURK

Author of program notes for Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts reveals the qualities that make a great leader and interpreter

THE name of Serge Koussevitzky is magic—one of those names about which legends cluster. The world must envelop its famous men in an aura of mystery, and if some of the legends are half truths or untruths—there is little use in denying them. They will simply go on being repeated, as is the way with legends.

There has been much speculation about how Koussevitzky goes about preparing the disclosures which he makes from the public platform with an Olympian assurance, as if nothing could ever go wrong. Does he act like an ordinary human being at rehearsal, behaving like the rest of us (or worse)? One writer recently set out to expose the frailties of famous conductors at their work. Coming to Koussevitzky, he found himself reduced to speaking only of "The Kremlinlike secrecy which surrounds the preparation of his programs," adding that "an inquiry about his rehearsals invariably produces the same enigmatic smile, but no information and less satisfaction."

Any conductor of the very first rank is supposed to have an impossible temper. Of course anyone fitting the requirements of that lofty station would have his moments of overtension, impatience at rehearsals—even eruptions. It must be so, in the handling of a hundred temperaments by one. A leader could not remain invariably even and reasonable without coming nearer to complacent routine than is possible in the conceptual and mood-evoking task before him. If there is an "incident"—a spark now and then at the Boston Symphony rehearsals—it is usually taken in the stride. The conductor is popular with most of his musicians, respected and esteemed by all of them.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1941

Musicians' Data Put on Exhibition

Caricatures, autographed pictures, music manuscripts and letters of musicians, composers and instrumental virtuosos of the past century were on exhibition today at Bloomingdale's. Part of the exhibit, collected by Boas Piller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in the Lexington Ave. windows, while the remainder is in the radio and phonograph departments.

Brahms, Liszt, Grieg, Sibelius, Ravel and Rachmaninoff are among the composers represented. One of the features of the show is a collection of 57 caricatures of musicians by Daumier.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1941

Bostonians to Play Duke's Concerto

Vernon Duke, who wrote the music for "Cabin in the Sky," at the Martin Beck Theatre, has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 4 - 1941

Violin Concerto Accepted

Vernon Duke has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization. Mr. Duke is presently represented on Broadway by "Cabin in the Sky," musical comedy starring Ethel Waters at the Martin Beck Theatre.

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 1 - 1941

Koussevitzky Will Direct The Boston Symphony Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, on Feb. 11, Newark, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston. The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its 60th year. In 1881 60 players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until twenty years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor from England to direct it.

Does being at the top of fame require that a conductor expend his temper on his public, refuse to bow, lecture them or walk out on them altogether? If this is so, then Koussevitzky is not of the top rank. He can look daggers if, as will happen in a conductor's life, there is an importunate interruption. But he has never addressed an audience discourteously; never excluded late-comers unreasonably. On one occasion, a group of these walked in in the middle of the first movement of a symphony. He laid down his stick and strode from the stage. But he soon remembered the great majority and returned.

Koussevitzky can stand up to his convictions. The incident is famous of the summer when his colleague, Toscanini, was publicly insulted and prevented from conducting by Fascist zealots in his own country, whereupon Koussevitzky cancelled a series of Italian engagements with an open letter of protest which went around the world.

A rather tepid reception of a symphony in Boston this season (the Fifth of Shostakovitch) together with some damning newspaper reviews challenged what he deeply believed to be a music of exceptional beauty and importance. The result: he repeated the symphony within a few weeks before the same audiences in such a way that they shouted their enthusiasm. Koussevitzky's intensity of belief in a piece of music can be so strong, so penetrating, that the music takes on an unexpected new life and glow. His orchestra surpasses itself. And in the audience, the last vestige of half-heartedness is routed.

His Approach to Music — Old and New

And this brings up another side of Koussevitzky. I mean the way he approaches a score on returning to it. It is not enough that in studying a new score he lives with it, makes its language all his own, all but sleeps with it. However discerning the first performance, the return performance (if there is one) is apt to disclose something further in the score. The quality is a vital part of the conductor's fondness for digging out and making known an individual talent that has something of its own to say, whether that something is poetic delicacy or lusty exuberance. The quality could be actually disastrous if it became a preoccupation with new trends to the neglect of the "classics." The all too few symphonies of Beethoven, Brahms, Tschaikowsky, repeated interminably by one conductor leading the same orchestra has been known to become a very routine affair. Koussevitzky, coming back for the dozenth time to—let us say—the Fourth of Brahms, can in some uncanny and unexplained way pick it up as if it were music he were examining for the first time. The difference is not externally notable. It could be analyzed down to numerous minor details—points of stress, of tempo, of phrasing. But the general impression is unmistakable. It is an impression of life breathing and fresh, of emotion newly felt and revealed. Every great interpreter must have some of this quality, for if he should reach a reading exactly right and satisfactory to himself, and thereupon fix and maintain it for the remainder of his public career, then he might as well be preserving it in alcohol. Koussevitzky is probably farther removed from this kind of mummification than any conductor living. The past of his art as well as its present and future is always for him an adventure.

Began Career as Bass Virtuoso

The name of Koussevitzky was already legendary when, in the spring of 1924, he was announced as the next conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was told how he had run away from home, a Russian village, at the age of fourteen, presented himself penniless before the head of the Conservatory at Moscow, coaxed from him a scholarship on the double bass, mastered it so completely that soon he was travelling through Europe as a virtuoso who could make that cumbrous instrument sing like a deeper and richer-voiced 'cello. The self-made virtuoso soon appeared as a self-made conductor. (continued on page 17)

New Koussevitzky recording of Brahms's "Fourth" Symphony reviewed on page 17

Arthur Griffin

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1941

Musicians' Data Put on Exhibition

Caricatures, autographed pictures, music manuscripts and letters of musicians, composers and instrumental virtuosos of the past century were on exhibition today at Bloomingdale's. Part of the exhibit, collected by Boaz Piller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in the Lexington Ave. windows, while the remainder is in the radio and phonograph departments.

Brahms, Liszt, Grieg, Sibelius, Ravel and Rachmaninoff are among the composers represented. One of the features of the show is a collection of 57 caricatures of musicians by Daumier.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1941

Bostonians to Play Duke's Concerto

Vernon Duke, who wrote the music for "Cabin in the Sky," at the Martin Beck Theatre, has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 4 - 1941

Violin Concerto Accepted

Vernon Duke has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization. Mr. Duke is presently represented on Broadway by "Cabin in the Sky," musical comedy starring Ethel Waters at the Martin Beck Theatre.

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 1 - 1941

Koussevitzky Will Direct The Boston Symphony Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, on Feb. 11, Newark, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston. The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its 60th year. In 1881 60 players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until twenty years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, a young opera composer and conductor from London to direct it.

Serge Koussevitsky

(continued from page 6)

He organized his own orchestra, roused Moscow and Petrograd with pioneering programmes, took his orchestra for a thousand miles or so along the Volga to carry the propaganda of his art to the remote provinces where it had never been heard. These deeds could be apocryphal if they were not facts. So also could the publishing firm which he founded for the circulation of such debatable (and then unmarketable) Russian "moderns" as Scriabin, Stravinsky, Prokofieff. When Revolutionary Russia no longer gave his artistic zeal the scope it required he moved westward and organized an orchestra in Paris.

Fame Reaches America

The "Concerts Koussevitzky" became famous—or infamous. The American public read or were told of the sensational Koussevitzky, who espoused the newest and wildest music and threw it at the heads of his audiences. Or who would violate the sanctities and traditions of the old masters by taking outrageous liberties.

There was some apprehension in the public mind, but curiosity outweighed fears. Koussevitzky was a success in America from the very start. His "moderns" were accepted, not without a certain amount of grumbling. His readings of Beethoven or Brahms or Wagner were found not so unorthodox after all, and thoroughly engrossing.

Koussevitzky has controlled the destinies of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for seventeen years and, since 1929, he has made VICTOR RECORDS in Symphony Hall. Seventeen years is a long time. It could spell musical stagnation—musical hardening of the arteries. But these seventeen are a chronicle of steady ascent. The Boston Symphony Orchestra has perhaps never before quite reached its present degree of tonal eloquence. The public has been immensely enlarged, not only through the discs, but through the annual Festival in the Berkshire Hills which has become the prime musical event of the summer season. At Tanglewood, the Orchestra's Lenox home, a school for performance and interpretation by playing and singing was established last summer—the realization of the conductor's life-long dream.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 1 - 1941

Musicians' Data Put on Exhibition

Caricatures, autographed pictures, music manuscripts and letters of musicians, composers and instrumental virtuosos of the past century were on exhibition today at Bloomingdale's. Part of the exhibit, collected by Boaz Piller of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is in the Lexington Ave. windows, while the remainder is in the radio and phonograph departments.

Brahms, Liszt, Grieg, Sibelius, Ravel and Rachmaninoff are among the composers represented. One of the features of the show is a collection of 57 caricatures of musicians by Daumier.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
JOURNAL AMERICAN
FEB 4 - 1941

Bostonians to Play Duke's Concerto

Vernon Duke, who wrote the music for "Cabin in the Sky," at the Martin Beck Theatre, has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 4 - 1941

Violin Concerto Accepted

Vernon Duke has just completed a violin concerto which has been accepted for performance by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be the sixth of his works to be played by that organization. Mr. Duke is presently represented on Broadway by "Cabin in the Sky," musical comedy starring Ethel Waters at the Martin Beck Theatre.

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 1 - 1941

Koussevitzky Will Direct The Boston Symphony Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, on Feb. 11, Newark, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston. The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its 60th year. In 1881 60 players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until twenty years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, young singer, composer and [illegible] to direct [illegible]

Ruth Posselt, Violinist, Soloist with Symphony—Richard Burgin Directs

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 14th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

"Fireworks Music".....Handel
Concertstueck for violin and orchestra
Bosmans
Concerto for violin and orchestra
Piston
Quartet for piano and strings in G minor Op. 25 (transcribed for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg)
Brahms

It is a curious habit of conductors in building a program that they will, time and again, put a fair-to-middling modern work smack up against a really good one. The audience makes the inevitable comparison, and the poorer piece, which may have good points or be commendable in a special field, suffers as a consequence. This often happens to the embarrassment of an American composer, but yesterday the reverse took place. Mr. Piston's Concerto quite snowed under Miss Bosmans by no means bad piece.

The new work is very effective music, and that, after all, is the first quality that this type of concerto must strive for. Mr. Piston has analyzed it tersely in the program, and anyone familiar with the terms will find no difficulty in following the music mentally. It is concise and logical. If it means nothing to you even after only one hearing, it probably never will and is just not your kind of music.

If the Concerto contains no surprises or is not startlingly original, it has a great deal to say, all of which is said in an interesting fashion. The first movement, as is the classical tradition, is the most intellectual, the slow movement the most emotional and the finale brilliant and witty. It is not necessary to say a great deal about Mr. Piston's Concerto. It is just good music and a great pleasure to listen to. The composer was in the audience and was cordially applauded when he came out on the stage.

This is probably as good a place as any to bear witness to Miss Ruth Posselt's extraordinarily fine playing yesterday afternoon. She is a violinist of superb poise. Her phrasing is exquisite, and her tone is singularly pure. Both Mr. Piston and, most emphatically, Miss Bosmans benefited from her handling of the solo parts of their music. You cannot say more of Miss Posselt than to acknowledge that any composer would be flattered to have her undertake to present his work.

We have hinted that the Concertstueck of Henriette Bosmans is hardly of the first rank. Yet it is not at all bad or inconsequential. It holds the interest of the listener and has an attractive rhapsodic quality. It reminded us strongly of Bloch. Unfortunately Bloch is not our favorite modern composer, and Miss Bosmans' piece thus became less and less sympathetic from a personal point of view. And, as we have indicated, Mr. Burgin's notion of following it right up with Mr. Piston's Concerto, was really absurd.

The symphonic repertoire has long been in need of a new symphony by Brahms, for the four authentic ones have been played far too much. While most of us have been sighing and complaining, as we thought, in vain, Arnold Schoenberg, the dreaded gorgon of atonality and the twelve-tone system, has gone to work and produced a perfect beauty out of the master's own G minor Piano Quartet.

This particular work has always seemed to commentators a little too big for its boots and, as with a number of Beethoven's works for small combinations, has cried out for larger scope. Mr. Schoenberg, using a bigger orchestra than Brahms required for his symphonies, has turned the trick brilliantly. You are not conscious of any strain or awkwardness in the transcription. Rather do you wonder that Brahms himself did not see the possibilities for expansion in his own score. And what lovely music it is—fresh, spontaneous, romantic and with that dazzling Hungarian rondo as a finish. In our haste we have said nothing of Mr. Burgin and the orchestra, and we must ask you—no difficult request—to take their admirable work for granted.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns from his mid-season vacation to conduct the first performance of Hindemith's Cello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorski as soloist. The rest of the program lists Rabaud's "La procession nocturne"; Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra"; Ravel's "La valse."

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 3 - 1941

Rutgers Glee Goes to Town

College Chorus, Established 60 Years Ago, to Sing with the Boston Symphony

Special to Newark News.

NEW BRUNSWICK—From tear-jerking and rah-rah-spirited college song renditions to an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generally recognized as close to the top in its field, may seem like a long jump, but it spans the 60-year history of the Rutgers University Glee Club.

The chorus had its beginning in the 1880s when Loren Bragdon, almost legendary figure in Old Greens musical history, organized the musical clubs of the campus into one big organization.

For the last part of the 19th and the early part of the 20th centuries this combination of singing groups, mandolin, banjo and guitar clubs traveled all over the East. The repertoire consisted mainly of typical college songs of the period.

In 1915 another big step forward was taken when the first faculty instructor, Professor Howard D. McKinney, Rutgers graduate and present head of the music department, was appointed. The club prospered and set out in search of new types of music.

Through the '20s it continued to raise its musical standards until in 1932, with the enlarging of the music department, F. Austin Walter, another Rutgers graduate, appeared to relieve McKinney of much of the burden of directing.

Since that time the club has consistently expanded and now is outstanding in the national field. Its chorus of 50 men and its quartet have made numerous appearances at Town Hall; it has appeared throughout the Eastern states on some 20 occasions each year; this Fall it gave a joint concert with Paul Robeson, Rutgers alumnus; it has taken part in many joint programs with other college singing groups, and this year it will appear at both New Brunswick and New York with the Boston orchestra.

It also will present programs at Forts Dix and Hancock.

Quite a jump from the "Solomon Levi," "Seeing Nelly Home," "Spanish Cavalier" days!

RUTH POSSELT WITH SYMPHONY

Wife Soloist as Richard Burgin Conducts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A more auspicious occasion than yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert is not easily imagined. Making their first joint public appearance here since their recent marriage, Richard Burgin conducted and Ruth Posselt was the solo violinist. Both outdid themselves in their respective capacities.

If not uniformly rewarding, the programme was noteworthy for the fact that each of its four items was new to Boston, unless possibly Handel's "Fireworks Music" had been played here by some other orchestra. Not the greatest Handel, this quite celebrated piece made a stately and genial beginning.

Of Henriette Bosmans' concert piece for violin and orchestra, which followed, the worst that can be said is that it lacked personality and physiognomy. It contains agreeable episodes, and also some that are musically insignificant, and it afforded Miss Posselt an opportunity for some superlative fiddling. Had it not been succeeded, as well as completely dwarfed and overshadowed, by Walter Piston's new Violin Concerto (written for Miss Posselt), this "Concertstuk," to give it its Dutch title, would at least have passed muster. We have listened to worse pieces.

As it happened, the American's work reduced the Hollander's to tonal powder. After a sinewy first movement, with arresting themes and just a touch of the aloof intellectuality that has characterized some of Mr. Piston's music, comes a slow movement of restrained, yet unescapable beauty. Mr. Piston's lyric vein, fine and touching at its best, is at its very best in this winning Andantino. Add to all this a brilliant Rondo, as grateful to soloist and orchestra as it is to the listener, and you have a composition that must immediately be proclaimed one of the highest points yet reached in American music. Our fellow citizen is a master who can hold his head up in any contemporary company. Conductor, soloist and composer received the plaudits that were their due.

After all this an anti-climax would have been the easiest thing in the world to achieve but Mr. Burgin contrived to cap the afternoon's enjoyment by exhibiting to us in a performance remarkable in its own right Schoenberg's superb, audacious (and sometimes irreverent) transcription of Brahms' Piano Quartet in G minor.

The Quartet itself, by no means overfamiliar, combines the creative fire of youth with the ripened skill of early maturnity. The music abounds in melody. From start to finish it never falters and it concludes in a hilarious Gypsy Rondo. Though conceived as chamber music it is of true symphony caliber and it has provided the inexhaustibly resourceful Schoenberg with an orchestrator's holiday. Some of the scoring might have been done by Brahms himself, on one of his better days. Much of it belongs to another world altogether. Fancy Brahms using an E-flat clarinet and a xylophone! It is as though Brahms, whose orchestral sense was certainly not overdeveloped, had decided to team up with Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Bizet, Strauss and Mahler, who had proceeded to show him what really could be done with an orchestra. Score a hit for Mr. Burgin, Brahms and Schoenberg.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 2 - 1941

Concerts in Newark

Two Programs on Wednesday at Mosque Theater

Two concerts will be given next Wednesday, Feb. 5, in the Mosque Theater in Newark, N. J., under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. The second youth symphony concert in a series directed by Dr. Frank Black, of the National Broadcasting Company, will be held in the afternoon, with a program illustrating various orchestral instruments by music from Mozart's 'Eine kleine Nachtmusik," Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Franck symphony and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march.

On Wednesday night Simon Barer will give the fourth recital in the foundation's master piano series. On the following Tuesday night, Feb. 11, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at the Mosque Theater, under the auspices of the Women's Club of Orange.

75

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 5 - 1941

Boston Symphony To Play in Newark

Serge Koussevitzky to Direct February 11 Program

Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D minor, a composition said to be accepted by the Finns as an expression of their revolt against oppression, will be included in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Mosque Theatre, Newark, on February 11. This is a Griffith Music Foundation concert sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Sibelius second symphony has the same unusual and effective orchestration as the first symphony. The music is by turns pastoral, introspective and somber in the slow movement; wildly exultant in the finale. The composition was written in 1901, shortly after Sibelius returned from a visit to Italy, Munich and Bayreuth.

The Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 13" composed in 1786, will open the Boston Symphony concert. The program follows in detail:

Symphony in G Major, No. 13, Haydn—I. Adagio. Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale, Allegro con spirito. Overture to "Lenore" No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven.

Intermission

Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43, Sibelius, I. Allegretto; II. Tempo andante, ma rubato; III. Vivacissimo; Lento e suave; IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.

MONTCLAIR, N.J
TIMES
2/4/41

In Newark Feb. 11

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will lead the ensemble at the Mosque Theatre, Newark, on Tuesday night of next week, in a special concert sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange and the Griffith Music Foundation. Both the orchestra and its conductor are outstanding figures in Montclair musical history.

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
CALL
FEB 1 - 1941

Boston Symphony Will Give Newark Concert

Koussevitzky To Direct Orchestra On Tuesday, Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, Newark on Feb. 11, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston. The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its sixtieth year. In 1881, 60 players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until 20 years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor from England to direct it.

A succession of eminent conductors followed, each building the orchestra in tonal power and achievement. In 1924 Serge Koussevitzky came to the United States and was almost immediately engaged as conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post which he has held ever since.

Koussevitzky came to the United States from Paris where he had been conducting his own orchestra and presenting "Concerts Koussevitzky." Born in Russia, he had, as a small boy, run away from home to attend the Philharmonic School in Moscow. On his unexpected arrival he found the school full and the year begun. But authorities sensed his unusual abilities and offered him the only scholarship open — for a student of the double bass. Koussevitzky accepted it, and within a short time astonished teachers by coaxing lovely cello-like tones and delicate melodies from the cumbrous bass.

His first trials as an orchestra conductor were in Berlin. Later he established his own orchestra in Moscow and gave memorable concerts there and in St. Petersburg. A pioneer in his art, he decided to further spread it, and he chartered a steamer to take his players the length of the Volga in order to give musically starved people of provincial towns their first symphony concert. The revolution brought an end to his orchestral performances, and the conductor left for Paris, London, and eventually America.

Tickets for the concert are on sale through members of the Woman's Club of Orange and at the Griffith Music Foundation, 605 Broad street, Newark.

Ruth Posselt, Violinist, Soloist with Symphony—Richard Burgin Directs

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 14th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Richard Burgin conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Ruth Posselt, violinist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

"Fireworks Music".....Handel
Concertstueck for violin and orchestra
Bosmans
Concerto for violin and orchestra
Piston
Quartet for piano and strings in G minor Op. 25 (transcribed for orchestra by Arnold Schoenberg)
Brahms

It is a curious habit of conductors in building a program that they will, time and again, put a fair-to-middling modern work smack up against a really good one. The audience makes the inevitable comparison, and the poorer piece, which may have good points or be commendable in a special field, suffers as a consequence. This often happens to the embarrassment of an American composer, but yesterday the reverse took place. Mr. Piston's Concerto quite snowed under Miss Bosmans by no means bad piece.

The new work is very effective music, and that, after all, is the first quality that this type of concerto must strive for. Mr. Piston has analyzed it tersely in the program, and anyone familiar with the terms will find no difficulty in following the music mentally. It is concise and logical. If it means nothing to you even after only one hearing, it probably never will and is just not your kind of music.

If the Concerto contains no surprises or is not startlingly original, it has a great deal to say, all of which is said in an interesting fashion. The first movement, as is the classical tradition, is the most intellectual, the slow movement the most emotional and the finale brilliant and witty. It is not necessary to say a great deal about Mr. Piston's Concerto. It is just good music and a great pleasure to listen to. The composer was in the audience and was cordially applauded when he came out on the stage.

This is probably as good a place as any to bear witness to Miss Ruth Posselt's extraordinarily fine playing yesterday afternoon. She is a violinist of superb poise. Her phrasing is exquisite, and her tone is singularly pure. Both Mr. Piston and, most emphatically, Miss Bosmans benefited from her handling of the solo parts of their music. You cannot say more of Miss Posselt than to acknowledge that any composer would be flattered to have her undertake to present his work.

We have hinted that the Concertstueck of Henriette Bosmans is hardly of the first rank. Yet it is not at all bad or inconsequential. It holds the interest of the listener and has an attractive rhapsodic quality. It reminded us strongly of Bloch. Unfortunately Bloch is not our favorite modern composer, and Miss Bosmans' piece thus became less and less sympathetic from a personal point of view. And, as we have indicated, Mr. Burgin's notion of following it right up with Mr. Piston's Concerto, was really absurd.

The symphonic repertoire has long been in need of a new symphony by Brahms, for the four authentic ones have been played far too much. While most of us have been sighing and complaining, as we thought, in vain, Arnold Schoenberg, the dreaded gorgon of atonality and the twelve-tone system, has gone to work and produced a perfect beauty out of the master's own G minor Piano Quartet.

This particular work has always seemed to commentators a little too big for its boots and, as with a number of Beethoven's works for small combinations, has cried out for larger scope. Mr. Schoenberg, using a bigger orchestra than Brahms required for his symphonies, has turned the trick brilliantly. You are not conscious of any strain or awkwardness in the transcription. Rather do you wonder that Brahms himself did not see the possibilities for expansion in his own score. And what lovely music it is—fresh, spontaneous, romantic and with that dazzling Hungarian rondo as a finish. In our haste we have said nothing of Mr. Burgin and the orchestra, and we must ask you—no difficult request—to take their admirable work for granted.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky returns from his mid-season vacation to conduct the first performance of Hindemith's Cello Concerto, with Gregor Piatigorski as soloist. The rest of the program lists Rabaud's "La procession nocturne"; Strauss' "Also sprach Zarathustra"; Ravel's "La valse."

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 3 - 1941

Rutgers Glee Goes to Town

College Chorus, Established 60 Years Ago, to Sing with the Boston Symphony

Special to Newark News.

NEW BRUNSWICK—From tear-jerking and rah-rah-spirited college song renditions to an appearance with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, generally recognized as close to the top in its field, may seem like a long jump, but it spans the 60-year history of the Rutgers University Glee Club.

The chorus had its beginning in the 1880s when Loren Bragdon, almost legendary figure in Old Greens musical history, organized the musical clubs of the campus into one big organization.

For the last part of the 19th and the early part of the 20th centuries this combination of singing groups, mandolin, banjo and guitar clubs traveled all over the East. The repertoire consisted mainly of typical college songs of the period.

In 1915 another big step forward was taken when the first faculty instructor, Professor Howard D. McKinney, Rutgers graduate and present head of the music department, was appointed. The club prospered and set out in search of new types of music.

Through the '20s it continued to raise its musical standards until in 1932, with the enlarging of the music department, F. Austin Walter, another Rutgers graduate, appeared to relieve McKinney of much of the burden of directing.

Since that time the club has consistently expanded and now is outstanding in the national field. Its chorus of 50 men and its quartet have made numerous appearances at Town Hall; it has appeared throughout the Eastern states on some 20 occasions each year; this Fall it gave a joint concert with Paul Robeson, Rutgers alumnus; it has taken part in many joint programs with other college singing groups, and this year it will appear at both New Brunswick and New York with the Boston orchestra.

It also will present programs at Forts Dix and Hancock.

Quite a jump from the "Solomon Levi," "Seeing Nelly Home," "Spanish Cavalier" days!

RUTH POSSELT WITH SYMPHONY

Wife Soloist as Richard Burgin Conducts

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A more auspicious occasion than yesterday afternoon's Symphony Concert is not easily imagined. Making their first joint public appearance here since their recent marriage, Richard Burgin conducted and Ruth Posselt was the solo violinist. Both outdid themselves in their respective capacities.

If not uniformly rewarding, the programme was noteworthy for the fact that each of its four items was new to Boston, unless possibly Handel's "Fireworks Music" had been played here by some other orchestra. Not the greatest Handel, this quite celebrated piece made a stately and genial beginning.

Of Henriette Bosmans' concert piece for violin and orchestra, which followed, the worst that can be said is that it lacked personality and physiognomy. It contains agreeable episodes, and also some that are musically insignificant, and it afforded Miss Posselt an opportunity for some superlative fiddling. Had it not been succeeded, as well as completely dwarfed and overshadowed, by Walter Piston's new Violin Concerto (written for Miss Posselt), this "Concertstuk," to give it its Dutch title, would at least have passed muster. We have listened to worse pieces.

As it happened, the American's work reduced the Hollander's to tonal powder. After a sinewy first movement, with arresting themes and just a touch of the aloof intellectuality that has characterized some of Mr. Piston's music, comes a slow movement of restrained, yet unescapable beauty. Mr. Piston's lyric vein, fine and touching at its best, is at its very best in this winning Andantino. Add to all this a brilliant Rondo, as grateful to soloist and orchestra as it is to the listener, and you have a composition that must immediately be proclaimed one of the highest points yet reached in American music. Our fellow citizen is a master who can hold his head up in any contemporary company. Conductor, soloist and composer received the plaudits that were their due.

After all this an anti-climax would have been the easiest thing in the world to achieve but Mr. Burgin contrived to cap the afternoon's enjoyment by exhibiting to us in a performance remarkable in its own right Schoenberg's superb, audacious (and sometimes irreverent) transcription of Brahms' Piano Quartet in G minor.

The Quartet itself, by no means overfamiliar, combines the creative fire of youth with the ripened skill of early maturnity. The music abounds in melody. From start to finish it never falters and it concludes in a hilarious Gypsy Rondo. Though conceived as chamber music it is of true symphony caliber and it has provided the inexhaustibly resourceful Schoenberg with an orchestrator's holiday. Some of the scoring might have been done by Brahms himself, on one of his better days. Much of it belongs to another world altogether. Fancy Brahms using an E-flat clarinet and a xylophone! It is as though Brahms, whose orchestral sense was certainly not overdeveloped, had decided to team up with Wagner, Tchaikovsky, Rimsky-Korsakov, Bizet, Strauss and Mahler, who had proceeded to show him what really could be done with an orchestra. Score a hit for Mr. Burgin, Brahms and Schoenberg.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 2 - 1941

Concerts in Newark

Two Programs on Wednesday at Mosque Theater

Two concerts will be given next Wednesday, Feb. 5, in the Mosque Theater in Newark, N. J., under the auspices of the Griffith Music Foundation. The second youth symphony concert in a series directed by Dr. Frank Black, of the National Broadcasting Company, will be held in the afternoon, with a program illustrating various orchestral instruments by music from Mozart's "Eine kleine Nachtmusik," Wagner's "Lohengrin" and the Franck symphony and Dukas's "Sorcerer's Apprentice" and Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance" march.

On Wednesday night Simon Barer will give the fourth recital in the foundation's master piano series. On the following Tuesday night, Feb. 11, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert under Serge Koussevitzky's direction at the Mosque Theater, under the auspices of the Women's Club of Orange.

75

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 5 - 1941

Boston Symphony To Play in Newark

Serge Koussevitzky to Direct February 11 Program

Sibelius Symphony No. 2 in D minor, a composition said to be accepted by the Finns as an expression of their revolt against oppression, will be included in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Mosque Theatre, Newark, on February 11. This is a Griffith Music Foundation concert sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

The Sibelius second symphony has the same unusual and effective orchestration as the first symphony. The music is by turns pastoral, introspective and somber in the slow movement; wildly exultant in the finale. The composition was written in 1901, shortly after Sibelius returned from a visit to Italy, Munich and Bayreuth.

The Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 13" composed in 1786, will open the Boston Symphony concert. The program follows in detail:

Symphony in G Major, No. 13, Haydn—I. Adagio, Allegro; II. Largo; III. Menuetto, Trio; IV. Finale, Allegro con spirito. Overture to "Lenore" No. 3, Op. 72, Beethoven.

Intermission

Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43, Sibelius, I. Allegretto; II. Tempo andante, ma rubato; III. Vivacissimo; Lento e suave; IV. Finale: Allegro moderato.

MONTCLAIR, N. J
TIMES
2/4/41

In Newark Feb. 11

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will lead the ensemble at the Mosque Theatre, Newark, on Tuesday night of next week, in a special concert sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange and the Griffith Music Foundation. Both the orchestra and its conductor are outstanding figures in Montclair musical history.

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
CALL
FEB 1 - 1941

Boston Symphony Will Give Newark Concert

Koussevitzky To Direct Orchestra On Tuesday, Feb. 11

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concert, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, which is to be presented by the Griffith Music Foundation at the Mosque Theater, Newark on Feb. 11, will be one of a few given this season outside New York and Boston. The concert, which is being sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange, will be the only one presented by the group in the Newark area.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is now in its sixtieth year. In 1881, 60 players were assembled under the same name in Boston by Henry L. Higginson, a student of music who visioned festivals of Beethoven, Schubert or Hayden music. But it was not until 20 years later, when business success brought sufficient means, that he organized and established a symphony orchestra and engaged George Henschel, a young singer, composer and conductor from England to direct it.

A succession of eminent conductors followed, each building the orchestra in tonal power and achievement. In 1924 Serge Koussevitzky came to the United States and was almost immediately engaged as conductor for the Boston Symphony Orchestra, a post which he has held ever since.

Koussevitzky came to the United States from Paris where he had been conducting his own orchestra and presenting "Concerts Koussevitzky." Born in Russia, he had, as a small boy, run away from home to attend the Philharmonic School in Moscow. On his unexpected arrival he found the school full and the year begun. But authorities sensed his unusual abilities and offered him the only scholarship open — for a student of the double bass. Koussevitzky accepted it, and within a short time astonished teachers by coaxing lovely cello-like tones and delicate melodies from the cumbrous bass.

His first trials as an orchestra conductor were in Berlin. Later he established his own orchestra in Moscow and gave memorable concerts there and in St. Petersburg. A pioneer in his art, he decided to further spread it, and he chartered a steamer to take his players the length of the Volga in order to give musically starved people of provincial towns their first symphony concert. The revolution brought an end to his orchestral performances, and the conductor left for Paris, London, and eventually America.

Tickets for the concert are on sale through members of the Woman's Club of Orange and at the Griffith Music Foundation, 683 Broad street, Newark.

PIATIGORSKY SOLOIST IN NEW HINDEMITH 'CELLO CONCERTO

Piatigorsky Discusses Piece He Will Play With Symphony

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"In 10 years from now," said Gregor Piatigorsky, the cellist, "people will look back and wonder why the Violoncello Concerto by Paul Hindemith was not accepted when first brought out; or they will if it is coldly received by the Boston Symphony audiences this week."

Mr. Piatigorsky was talking at an interval in rehearsal, waiting backstage at Symphony Hall to be called when the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was ready for him. Dr. Koussevitzky at the moment was taking the strings and the wind sections of the orchestra through some detail of practice on the new work.

"We have here a contribution to the repertory," Mr. Piatigorsky went on to declare. "The concerto is written on a classic plan right through, opening movement containing a good singing theme; slow movement starting out quietly, breaking off into a tarantella in lively scherzo style, and returning to the quiet measures; then, to conclude, a movement in march rhythm. It is bright, varied, and interesting from beginning to end. It has much to test the quality of the orchestral players; and while it gives the soloist plenty of problems to solve, everything for him is practical and suited to his instrument. For myself, I could go right on and put the work among cello concertos that I travel with over the country.

* * *

"We do not get a new cello concerto too often, though I do not admit that the number of useful compositions is small and that the solo cellist's opportunities are restricted for lack of material. You hear that said often enough, but I do not find it true. Just note, please, what works I took a hand in presenting in a single season."

In haste they were noted down, names of composers only, as Mr. Piatigorsky told them off, as follows:

Hayden in D	Bloch
Boccherini	Castelnuovo-Tedesco
Schumann	Lalo
Dvořák	Stock
Saint-Saëns	Berezowski

"Speaking of the Haydn Concerto in D," Mr. Piatigorsky made diversion, "Haydn, I am sure, did not write it, but a pupil of his, Anton Kraft, did."

Has the new concerto been performed anyhere, either in a public or a private way, before now? Mr. Piatigorsky was asked.

"Nowhere," he replied, "except by myself in rehearsal with the composer at New Haven, Conn., Professor Hindemith playing the orchestral part on a piano; and here in orchestral rehearsal this week in Boston."

* * *

Thereon Mr. Piatigorsky told a story, I know not on what impulse.

"You understand," he began, "that we soloists have to be ready for anything. There was a violinist once who went on the platform to take part in an orchestral performance, supposing the program to call for Beethoven's Violin Concerto. He was all primed up for a big effort, wanting to be equal to the situation. The orchestra started to play—but not Beethoven's concerto; it was Mendelssohn's. Instantly he had to adapt himself to a different sort of call altogether. But he was ready. The moment presently came and he struck into the solo part of Mendelssohn, and went through it without a tremor."

The anecdote was no soone told than a signal came. Mr. Piati gorsky caught his cello from ou the air or somewhere, and in ar other minute he was out frontsta sitting under Dr. Koussevitzky baton and doing his trick at t thirty-fifth bar, or wherever it w of the tarantella of the Hin mith Concerto.

A privileged fleeting glance the photostat score of the new p showed it to have been writte Lenox, Mass., and concluded S 9, 1940. There were indications arrangements for publication h been started. On paper, it see a conservative, workmanlike, well-balanced job. The three mo ments ran, under German de nations, about as Mr. Piatigor described them, though in the s movement I did not see an ac reference to a tarantella. Th was an episode, however, mar "Sehr Lebhaft" that must h meant the same thing.

...n early 19th century print. Above: Bela Bartok, Josef Szigeti and Benny Goodman who play ...n Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Feb. 6. Right: Gregor Piatigorsky studying Hindemith's new cello concerto which he will play next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 2 - 1941

Boston Symphony

Paul Hindemith's new cello concerto will have its first performance anywhere in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with Gregor Piatigorsky as the soloist. Serge Koussevitzky's other numbers are Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra" and Maurice Ravel's "La Valse."

Koussevitzky to Serve as Guest Conductor With Philharmonic

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest leader of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks in January, next season. Mr. Koussevitzy will be one of eight conductors who will appear as part of the 100th anniversary celebration of New York's famous organization. It will be the first time he has conducted any other American orchestra.

John Barbirolli, the Philharmonic's regular director; Leopold Stokowski, Bruno Walter, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Goossens and Fritz Busch are the other seven musicians who will occupy the Philharmonic conductor's stand at Carnegie Hall. Now the oldest symphonic organization in the country, the Philharmonic was founded in 1842.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appearances in New York will occur during the Winter period he customarily takes as vacation. During his absence, the Boston Sypmhony will have Bruno Walter as guest leader.

Symphony

Burgin Conducts Cambridge Concert

Richard Burgin conducted last evening's sound and musicianly, but never very exhilarating, concert by the Boston Symphony in Sanders Theater, the program consisting of the first performance of the Koussevitzky-Bach Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Piston's Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

Koussevitzky's transcription of the Bach prelude and fugue, scored for only woodwinds and brass, is delightful. The grandiosity encountered in so many other modern Bach orchestrations is happily missing. The voices of the five-part fugue are much more readily followed than in many a more pretentious version. Not only that, but, as Mr. Downes pointed out in his preview of the music in yesterday's Transcript, it comes much closer to the spirit of Bach than the frequent swollen versions of the master we hear today.

Apart from the Bach, the most rewarding performance of the evening was that of the Piston Concerto which the brilliant Miss Posselt played with fine bravura and musicianship. Conductor and orchestra provided an always sympathetic accompaniment. Mr. Piston's music, without being profound, is decidedly appealing with its learning and grace and humor and pleasant emotional content.

Thoughtful as it was, Mr. Burgin's reading of the "Italian" Symphony was on the ponderous side. The first and last movements had more nervous energy than natural exuberance, and the slow movement seemed too little varied. Isn't it time, anyway, that we hear the "Scotch" or "Reformation" Symphony of Mendelssohn rather than the familiar "Italian"?

The "Petrouchka" suite made a stunning close to the concert, even though its bright colors were a little subdued last evening.

M. H.

Richard Burgin

The concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will direct three of the organization's concerts next week: Thursday evening in Cambridge, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall

Four Premieres

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony In Enterprising Program With Ruth Posselt

IN spite of an automobile accident and an attack of influenza which would have driven a person of ordinary energies to bed, Ruth Posselt not only persisted in making her scheduled appearance with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon — she played magnificiently and achieved a small triumph with two compositions which were new to her audience. They were a Concertstueck for violin and orchestra by the Dutch composer, Henriette Bosmans, and the Violin Concerto written for Miss Posselt by Walter Piston of this city. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and conductor of yesterday's concert, opened his program with Handel's Fireworks Music which, oddly enough, had never been performed by the Boston Symphony, and Schoenberg's orchestral arrangement of Brahms's G minor Quartet for piano and strings, also new to Friday subscribers.

Dutch Composer

Henriette Bosmans, whose Concertstueck will be repeated by the Boston Symphony this evening.

Four first performances, and all of them interesting music! Mr. Burgin is to be thanked for the boldness of his enterprise and for an excellent piece of program building.

If not a work of epochal significance, the Bosmans Concertstueck turned out to be engrossing music, effectively written for the violin, in a spontaneous melodic vein which is neither pointedly modernistic nor tritely neo-romantic. It speaks the musical language of today with a directness, almost a naivete that is vastly relieving at a time when so much clever artifice passes for inspiration. Miss Posselt played it with fluency and enthusiasm, with clean technique and a sweet tone which, though it was small, carried well throughout the hall.

On first acquaintance, at least, Walter Piston's Violin Concerto seems a strangely uneven score, both as to style and emotional drive behind it. Mr. Piston is, of course, past master of the modern orchestra. His instruments may speak with a slight Gallic accent, but his vocabulary is supple, swift, clear and to the point. There is no question about his being able to say exactly what he has in mind.

When Mr. Piston lets himself go and tells you what seem to be his first instinctive thoughts on the musical matter in hand, his Concerto has a spontaneous grace that is wholly entrancing. The invention appears simple even if it is not, and that simplicity, in the hands of a master, is a pure delight.

But there are many pages, especially in the last movement, when the composer becomes self-conscious about style. Then the thought appears complicated, even when it is simple. It becomes so much crochety, neo-classical verbiage. It strains for effect. It is slick, smart, empty. And Mr. Piston's charm is fled.

Nevertheless, the effect remains. And Miss Posselt made the most both of the effects and the music. She played with verve and authority, as well she might, since the Concerto was written for her. Both she and Mr. Piston were cordially applauded.

Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor is a work of astonishing youthful genius. Yet it has its weak points, and an orchestral version seems rather to emphasize than gloss over the pages of thin inspiration. To compare it to a Brahms symphony is obviously unfair, yet it is hard to avoid doing that very thing.

Handel's Fireworks Music should be played more often. In its way it is quite equal to the more famous Water Music, though it has no picturesque legend to deck it out. Written for open air performance, it is extremely simple. Its pages are studded with eighteen century harmonic and melodic cliches. But what might have been trite in another man's score, is transgured here by Handel's overpowering inspiration. It is ageless music. Mr. Burgin conducted it with a strongly pulsing, true Handelian rhythm and a communicative joy in its broad melodic curves.

E. D.

PIATIGORSKY SOLOIST IN NEW HINDEMITH 'CELLO CONCERTO

Piatigorsky Discusses Piece He Will Play With Symphony

By Winthrop P. Tryon

"In 10 years from now," said Gregor Piatigorsky, the cellist, "people will look back and wonder why the Violoncello Concerto by Paul Hindemith was not accepted when first brought out; or they will if it is coldly received by the Boston Symphony audiences this week."

Mr. Piatigorsky was talking at an interval in rehearsal, waiting backstage at Symphony Hall to be called when the conductor, Serge Koussevitzky, was ready for him. Dr. Koussevitzky at the moment was taking the strings and the wind sections of the orchestra through some detail of practice on the new work.

"We have here a contribution to the repertory," Mr. Piatigorsky went on to declare. "The concerto is written on a classic plan right through, opening movement containing a good singing theme; slow movement starting out quietly, breaking off into a tarantella in lively scherzo style, and returning to the quiet measures; then, to conclude, a movement in march rhythm. It is bright, varied, and interesting from beginning to end. It has much to test the quality of the orchestral players; and while it gives the soloist plenty of problems to solve, everything for him is practical and suited to his instrument. For myself, I could go right on and put the work among cello concertos that I travel with over the country.

* * *

"We do not get a new cello concerto too often, though I do not admit that the number of useful compositions is small and that the solo cellist's opportunities are restricted for lack of material. You hear that said often enough, but I do not find it true. Just note, please, what works I took a hand in presenting in a single season."

In haste they were noted down, names of composers only, as Mr. Piatigorsky told them off, as follows:

Hayden in D	Bloch
Boccherini	Castelnuovo-Tedesco
Schumann	Lalo
Dvořák	Stock
Saint-Saëns	Berezowski

"Speaking of the Haydn Concerto in D," Mr. Piatigorsky made diversion, "Haydn, I am sure, did not write it, but a pupil of his, Anton Kraft, did."

Has the new concerto been performed anyhere, either in a public or a private way, before now? Mr. Piatigorsky was asked.

"Nowhere," he replied, "except by myself in rehearsal with the composer at New Haven, Conn., Professor Hindemith playing the orchestral part on a piano; and here in orchestral rehearsal this week in Boston."

* * *

Thereon Mr. Piatigorsky told a story, I know not on what impulse.

"You understand," he began, "that we soloists have to be ready for anything. There was a violinist once who went on the platform to take part in an orchestral performance, supposing the program to call for Beethoven's Violin Concerto. He was all primed up for a big effort, wanting to be equal to the situation. The orchestra started to play—but not Beethoven's concerto; it was Mendelssohn's. Instantly he had to adapt himself to a different sort of call altogether. But he was ready. The moment presently came and he struck into the solo part of Mendelssohn, and went through it without a tremor."

The anecdote was no soone told than a signal came. Mr. Piati gorsky caught his cello from ou the air or somewhere, and in ar other minute he was out frontsta sitting under Dr. Koussevitzky baton and doing his trick at t thirty-fifth bar, or wherever it w of the tarantella of the Hind mith Concerto.

A privileged fleeting glance the photostat score of the new p showed it to have been writte Lenox, Mass., and concluded S 9, 1940. There were indications arrangements for publication h been started. On paper, it see a conservative, workmanlike, well-balanced job. The three mo ments ran, under German de nations, about as Mr. Piatigor described them, though in the s movement I did not see an ac reference to a tarantella. Th was an episode, however, mar "Sehr Lebhaft" that must h meant the same thing.

an early 19th century print. Above: Bela Bartok, Josef Szigeti and Benny Goodman who play n Jordan Hall Thursday evening, Feb. 6. Right: Gregor Piatigorsky studying Hindemith's new cello concerto which he will play next Friday and Saturday with the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 2 - 1941

Boston Symphony

Paul Hindemith's new cello concerto will have its first performance anywhere in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's home concerts of next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with Gregor Piatigorsky as the soloist. Serge Koussevitzky's other numbers are Henri Rabaud's "La Procession Nocturne," Richard Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra" and Maurice Ravel's "La Valse."

Koussevitzky to Serve as Guest Conductor With Philharmonic

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be guest leader of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra for two weeks in January, next season. Mr. Koussevitzy will be one of eight conductors who will appear as part of the 100th anniversary celebration of New York's famous organization. It will be the first time he has conducted any other American orchestra.

John Barbirolli, the Philharmonic's regular director; Leopold Stokowski, Bruno Walter, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Goossens and Fritz Busch are the other seven musicians who will occupy the Philharmonic conductor's stand at Carnegie Hall. Now the oldest symphonic organization in the country, the Philharmonic was founded in 1842.

Mr. Koussevitzky's appearances in New York will occur during the Winter period he customarily takes as vacation. During his absence, the Boston Sypmhony will have Bruno Walter as guest leader.

Symphony

Burgin Conducts Cambridge Concert

Richard Burgin conducted last evening's sound and musicianly, but never very exhilarating, concert by the Boston Symphony in Sanders Theater, the program consisting of the first performance of the Koussevitzky-Bach Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Piston's Violin Concerto with Ruth Posselt as soloist, and the orchestral suite from Stravinsky's "Petrouchka."

Richard Burgin

The concertmaster and assistant conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who will direct three of the organization's concerts next week: Thursday evening in Cambridge, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening in Symphony Hall

Gano President of Reliance Bank

At a meeting of the directors of the Reliance Co-operative Bank of Cambridge, Seth T. Gano was elected president to fill the vacancy caused by the death of R. Curtis Groveslein.

A new director, Owen D. McClellan, was named to the board and Harry R. Andrews, treasurer, continues as the executive officer of the bank.

Mr. Gano has been a member of the board of directors since 1924 and has served on the finance committee since 1928. He is also vice president and a member of the board of investment of the Belmont Savings Bank and a director of the Webster & Atlas National Bank.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN
FEB 5 - 1941

Boston Programs.

Gregor Piatigorsky, eminent 'cellist, will be assisting artist at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening this week. He will play a new concerto for the instrument by Hindemith. Under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky the orchestra will play La Procession, Nocturne, Rabaud; also Sprach Zarathustra, Strauss and La Valse, Ravel.

Four Premieres

Richard Burgin Conducts Boston Symphony In Enterprising Program With Ruth Posselt

IN spite of an automobile accident and an attack of influenza which would have driven a person of ordinary energies to bed, Ruth Posselt not only persisted in making her scheduled appearance with the Boston Symphony yesterday afternoon — she played magnificiently and achieved a small triumph with two compositions which were new to her audience. They were a Concertstueck for violin and orchestra by the Dutch composer, Henriette Bosmans, and the Violin Concerto written for Miss Posselt by Walter Piston of this city. Richard Burgin, concertmaster of the Boston Symphony and conductor of yesterday's concert, opened his program with Handel's Fireworks Music which, oddly enough, had never been performed by the Boston Symphony, and Schoenberg's orchestral arrangement of Brahms's G minor Quartet for piano and strings, also new to Friday subscribers.

Dutch Composer

Henriette Bosmans, whose Concertstueck will be repeated by the Boston Symphony this evening.

Four first performances, and all of them interesting music! Mr. Burgin is to be thanked for the boldness of his enterprise and for an excellent piece of program building.

If not a work of epochal significance, the Bosmans Concertstueck turned out to be engrossing music, effectively written for the violin, in a spontaneous melodic vein which is neither pointedly modernistic nor tritely neo-romantic. It speaks the musical language of today with a directness, almost a naivete that is vastly relieving at a time when so much clever artifice passes for inspiration. Miss Posselt played it with fluency and enthusiasm, with clean technique and a sweet tone which, though it was small, carried well throughout the hall.

On first acquaintance, at least, Walter Piston's Violin Concerto seems a strangely uneven score, both as to style and emotional drive behind it. Mr. Piston is, of course, past master of the modern orchestra. His instruments may speak with a slight Gallic accent, but his vocabulary is supple, swift, clear and to the point. There is no question about his being able to say exactly what he has in mind.

When Mr. Piston lets himself go and tells you what seem to be his first instinctive thoughts on the musical matter in hand, his Concerto has a spontaneous grace that is wholly entrancing. The invention appears simple even if it is not, and that simplicity, in the hands of a master, is a pure delight.

But there are many pages, especially in the last movement, when the composer becomes self-conscious about style. Then the thought appears complicated, even when it is simple. It becomes so much crochety, neo-classical verbiage. It strains for effect. It is slick, smart, empty. And Mr. Piston's charm is fled.

Nevertheless, the effect remains. And Miss Posselt made the most both of the effects and the music. She played with verve and authority, as well she might, since the Concerto was written for her. Both she and Mr. Piston were cordially applauded.

Brahms's Piano Quartet in G minor is a work of astonishing youthful genius. Yet it has its weak points, and an orchestral version seems rather to emphasize than gloss over the pages of thin inspiration. To compare it to a Brahms symphony is obviously unfair, yet it is hard to avoid doing that very thing.

Handel's Fireworks Music should be played more often. In its way it is quite equal to the more famous Water Music, though it has no picturesque legend to deck it out. Written for open air performance, it is extremely simple. Its pages are studded with eighteen century harmonic and melodic cliches. But what might have been trite in another man's score, is transgured here by Handel's overpowering inspiration. It is ageless music. Mr. Burgin conducted it with a strongly pulsing, true Handelian rhythm and a communicative joy in its broad melodic curves.

E. D.

Debut for New Work at Concert

Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, who will be the soloist in Hindemith's concerto for 'cello and orchestra, which will have its first performances anywhere at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUMMIT, N.J
HERALD
2/7/41

To Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major, a composition said to be accepted by the Finns as an expression of their revolt against oppression, will be included in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Mosque Theater, Newark, on February 11. This is a Griffith Music Foundation concert sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

The Sibelius second symphony has the same unusual and effective orchestration as the first symphony. The music is by turns pastoral, introspective and somber in the slow movement; widly exultant in the finale. The composition was written in 1901, shortly after Sibelius returned from a visit to Italy, Munich and Bayreuth.

The Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 13" composed in 1786, will open the Boston Symphony concert. The program follows in detail:

Symphony in G Major, No. 13 ..... Haydn
Adagio: Allegro
Largo
Menuetto: Trio
Finale: Allegro con spirito
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 ..... Beethoven
Intermission
Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43 ..... Sibelius
Allegretto
Tempo andante, ma rubato
Vivacissimo; Lento e suave
Finale: Allegro moderato

E. ORANGE, N.J
RECORD
2/6/41

LITTLE FALLS, N.J
HERALD
2/6/41

RAHWAY, N.J
RECORD
2/6/41

S. ORANGE, N.J
RECORD
2/7/41

CLIFTON, N.J
TIMES
2/6/41

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
CALL
FEB 6 - 1941

MAPLEWOOD, N.J
NEWS
2/6/41

THIS CLIPPING FROM GLEN RIDGE, N.J
PAPER
2/7/41

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 6 - 1941

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 6 - 1941

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS
FEB 7 - 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL BE HEARD WEDNESDAY

The Philadelphia Forum will present the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who became the orchestra's conductor in 1924, will conduct.

Philharmonic Anniversary Celebration

As was announced in yesterday's Transcript, Serge Koussevitzky will, for the first time in the 17 years he has been in this country, be the guest conductor of another orchestra when he takes over the baton of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony next January for a period of two weeks. This will not interfere with Dr. Koussevitzky's regular appearances at the head of the Boston Symphony, since his guest appearance in New York will come during his regular midwinter vacation.

Koussevitzky's performances will be part of a great parade of prominent conductors with which the Philharmonic-Symphony, the oldest orchestra in this country (and very nearly the oldest in the world) plans to celebrate its hundredth anniversary. The centennial splurge will last during the entire season of 1941-42 and the first part of the season 1942-43, covering the anniversary of the founding of the Philharmonic Society on April 5, 1842, and its first concert on Dec. 7, 1842.

The first fortnight of the season will be conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Bruno Walter will return to the orchestra for four weeks, Dimitri Mitropoulos and Artur Rodzinski will direct for one month each, Eugene Goossens and Fritz Busch for a fortnight apiece and John Barbirolli, the regular conductor of the Philharmonic, will take two weeks in October and six during February and March.

During Dr. Koussevitzky's visit to New York, Bruno Walter will conduct the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 7 - 1941

Hindemith Concerto Makes Debut Today

First Tanglewood-Composed Work Played in Boston

The first public performance of a work composed at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, will be given this afternoon at Symphony Hall, Boston, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, presents Paul Hindemith's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Each of the three movements is inscribed, "Lenox, Mass."

Mr. Hindemith was a member of the faculty of the music center, which opened last year with Dr. Koussevitzky as a director. The school opened in July and continued through the period of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

The first movement is dated June 30, 1940, the second, July 4 and the third, Sept. 9.

Bravura-like Measures

The concerto opens (massig schnell) with bravura-like measures for the tutti, and these are followed by a rounded and graceful melody for the solo 'cello. The melody is taken up by the wood winds, and as the soloist repeats it, the introductory theme is set against this by the orchestra. Now the 'cello takes up this theme for the first time (unaccompanied). The themes undergo transformation in development, the soloist and tutti alternately providing an obbligato in triplets. As this development builds to a climax, the solo player is silent, but then enters with a long unaccompanied cadenza. The 'cellist, lightly accompanied, carries the movement to its conclusion.

The second movement (ruhig bewegt) begins with an extended melody for the violoncello to an accompaniment of pizzicato strings. The wood winds take up the melody. Suddenly the movement triples its pace to "sehr lebhaft." Again the orchestra alone is carried by the swift triplets. A still more exciting point is reached by the orchestra in unison. Then the orchestra returns to the initial slow tempo while the soloist maintains the swift one, playing three measures to one in the orchestral score. Thus the wood winds carry a deliberate and sustained melody while the solo persists in the likely triplet figure. In the last fourteen measures the soloist falls into the slow tempo.

The finale (Marsch: Lebhaft) utilizes the more varied percussion. The orchestra delivers and develops a march theme before the soloist enters with an obbligato figure, eventually, however, taking the melodic lead. The trio is labelled "nach einem alten Marsch." The composer acknowledges a royal source—a march tune by Amalia, sister of Frederick the Great. Hindemith has altered the tune for his present purpose. The present purpose. The trio is delivered pianissimo by the wind groups and subdued percussion; the glockenspiel and celesta here making their only appearance. The soloist takes a subservient and muted part in the proceedings. As the first march is resumed, the orchestra and soloist speak with renewed brilliance.

Debut for New Work at Concert

Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, who will be the soloist in Hindemith's concerto for 'cello and orchestra, which will have its first performances anywhere at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
SUMMIT, N.J
HERALD
2/7/41

To Conduct Boston Symphony Orchestra

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Sibelius' Symphony No. 2 in D major, a composition said to be accepted by the Finns as an expression of their revolt against oppression, will be included in the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky at the Mosque Theater, Newark, on February 11. This is a Griffith Music Foundation concert sponsored by the Woman's Club of Orange.

The Sibelius second symphony has the same unusual and effective orchestration as the first symphony. The music is by turns pastoral, introspective and somber in the slow movement; widly exultant in the finale. The composition was written in 1901, shortly after Sibelius returned from a visit to Italy, Munich and Bayreuth.

The Haydn "Symphony in G Major, No. 13" composed in 1786, will open the Boston Symphony concert. The program follows in detail:

Symphony in G Major, No. 13 ..... Haydn
Adagio: Allegro
Largo
Menuetto: Trio
Finale: Allegro con spirito
Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72 ..... Beethoven
Intermission
Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Op. 43 ..... Sibelius
Allegretto
Tempo andante, ma rubato
Vivacissimo; Lento e suave
Finale: Allegro moderato

E. ORANGE, N.J
RECORD
2/6/41

LITTLE FALLS, N.J
HERALD
2/6/41

RAHWAY, N.J
RECORD
2/6/41

S. ORANGE, N.J
RECORD
2/7/41

CLIFTON, N.J
TIMES
2/6/41

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
FEB 7 - 1941

Hindemith Concerto Makes Debut Today

First Tanglewood-Composed Work Played in Boston

The first public performance of a work composed at the Berkshire Music Center, Tanglewood, will be given this afternoon at Symphony Hall, Boston, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Serge Koussevitzky, presents Paul Hindemith's Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Each of the three movements is inscribed, "Lenox, Mass."

Mr. Hindemith was a member of the faculty of the music center, which opened last year with Dr. Koussevitzky as a director. The school opened in July and continued through the period of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival.

The first movement is dated June 30, 1940, the second, July 4 and the third, Sept. 9.

Bravura-like Measures

The concerto opens (massig schnell) with bravura-like measures for the tutti, and these are followed by a rounded and graceful melody for the solo 'cello. The melody is taken up by the wood winds, and as the soloist repeats it, the introductory theme is set against this by the orchestra. Now the 'cello takes up this theme for the first time (unaccompanied). The themes undergo transformation in development, the soloist and tutti alternately providing an obbligato in triplets. As this development builds to a climax, the solo player is silent, but then enters with a long unaccompanied cadenza. The 'cellist, lightly accompanied, carries the movement to its conclusion.

The second movement (ruhig bewegt) begins with an extended melody for the violoncello to an accompaniment of pizzicato strings. The wood winds take up the melody. Suddenly the movement triples its pace to "sehr lebhaft." Again the orchestra alone is carried by the swift triplets. A still more exciting point is reached by the orchestra in unison. Then the orchestra returns to the initial slow tempo while the soloist maintains the swift one, playing three measures to one in the orchestral score. Thus the wood winds carry a deliberate and sustained melody while the solo persists in the likely triplet figure. In the last fourteen measures the soloist falls into the slow tempo.

The finale (Marsch: Lebhaft) utilizes the more varied percussion. The orchestra delivers and develops a march theme before the soloist enters with an obbligato figure, eventually, however, taking the melodic lead. The trio is labelled "nach einem alten Marsch." The composer acknowledges a royal source—a march tune by Amalia, sister of Frederick the Great. Hindemith has altered the tune for his present purpose. The present purpose. The trio is delivered pianissimo by the wind groups and subdued percussion; the glockenspiel and celesta here making their only appearance. The soloist takes a subservient and muted part in the proceedings. As the first march is resumed, the orchestra and soloist speak with renewed brilliance.

Philharmonic Anniversary Celebration

As was announced in yesterday's Transcript, Serge Koussevitzky will, for the first time in the 17 years he has been in this country, be the guest conductor of another orchestra when he takes over the baton of the New York Philharmonic-Symphony next January for a period of two weeks. This will not interfere with Dr. Koussevitzky's regular appearances at the head of the Boston Symphony, since his guest appearance in New York will come during his regular midwinter vacation.

Koussevitzky's performances will be part of a great parade of prominent conductors with which the Philharmonic-Symphony, the oldest orchestra in this country (and very nearly the oldest in the world) plans to celebrate its hundredth anniversary. The centennial splurge will last during the entire season of 1941-42 and the first part of the season 1942-43, covering the anniversary of the founding of the Philharmonic Society on April 5, 1842, and its first concert on Dec. 7, 1842.

The first fortnight of the season will be conducted by Leopold Stokowski. Bruno Walter will return to the orchestra for four weeks, Dimitri Mitropoulos and Artur Rodzinski will direct for one month each, Eugene Goossens and Fritz Busch for a fortnight apiece and John Barbirolli, the regular conductor of the Philharmonic, will take two weeks in October and six during February and March.

During Dr. Koussevitzky's visit to New York, Bruno Walter will conduct the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
NEWS
FEB 7 - 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY WILL BE HEARD WEDNESDAY

The Philadelphia Forum will present the Boston Symphony orchestra in its annual Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening.

Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, who became the orchestra's conductor in 1924, will conduct.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
GLEN RIDGE, N.J
PAPER
2/7/41

This Clipping From
NEWARK, N. J.
NEWS
FEB 6 - 1941

This Clipping From
LONG BRANCH, N. J.
RECORD
FEB 6 - 1941

This Clipping From
PATERSON, N. J.
CALL
FEB 6 - 1941

MAPLEWOOD, N.J
NEWS
2/6/41

Associated Press Photo.

Serge Koussevitzky is back from his mid-season vacation with a new Cello Concerto by Paul Hindemith. The perform ance will be repeated this eve ning at Symphony Hall.

Hindemith's New Cello Concerto

Koussevitzky Leads Brilliant New Work for His Return Concert; Piatigorsky is Soloist

EVEN while wading through the exasperating slush of a February afternoon, Bostonians have reason to bless the name of Tanglewood. For it was there, during such summer hours as were not taken up with diligent pupils of the Boston Symphony's music center, that Paul Hindemith composed the extraordinary Cello Concerto revealed to us yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Always adaptable, always prolific, Hindemith appears to have to taken to American musical life like a fish to water. His new concerto will probably prove extremely popular.

Serge Koussevitzky's return from his mid-season vacation was cause for rejoicing on more scores than one. The orchestra, always superb, is just a little bit more on its toes for him than anyone we have ever heard. There was a wildly dramatic performance of Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra"; there was Ravel's solid apotheosis of Imperial Paris, "La Valse"—a conductor's tour de force; there was Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and finally there was his vehicle (if such it can be called): the Hindemith Concerto.

We have heard Hindsmith in many guises. Here is a new one. Traditionally, a concerto is a display piece for the excutant, and so far Hindemith is more traditional than he has ever seemed before. But in saying that it is display music and in a popular vein, no aspersion is intended, even by implication, on the high quality of his inspiration. For, reversing the process of so many other composers, Hindemith's development has been from the abstruse (sometimes calculated bedeviment of the musical school-masters) to the simple, from intellectualism to emotion. Today he is almost something of a romantic, and yesterday he was at his most ingratiating.

If his concerto called upon the full spectacular technique of Mr. Piatigorsky, it is none the less a richly symphonic work. There are even climactic moments in the solo part which are fairly overwhelmed by the exuberantly weaving voices of the orchestra—though this can scarcely have been the composer's intention.

The first movement is brisk and dramatic. For all its brevity, could not be called laconic. Indeed it has so much to say and that so swiftly, that chances are you will not catch it all at first. There is a long, rhapsodic cadenza, which, unlike most cadenzas for string instruments, is filled with stress of sharp emotion.

The middle movement begins with a slow song for the 'cello, but this is swept away by a sudden rush of the orchestra to an exhilarating, brilliant climax Neither here nor anywhere else in his concerto does Hindemith allow himself to be overawed by the unspoken law of some of his neo-classical brethren, that strong feelings show bad taste or at least a lack of sophictication. But perhaps that is just because Hindemith has strong emotions.

His last movement utilizes several bubbling march tunes. The enchanting trio, which indulges in the mild frivolity of a tambourine, is adapted from a Rococo march by a sister of Frederick the Great—the gifted but forlorn Amalia of the Ermitage at Bayreuth.

The audience left Mr. Hindemith in no doubt about the success of his new work. Hindemith, Piatigorsky, Koussevitzky and the orchestra all shared in their resounding thanks.

Gaelic Grace

The program opened with a subtly polished performance of a symphonic poem, "La Procession Nocturne" by Henri Rabaud, one-time conductor of the Boston Symphony. Of the tragic, tempestuous emotions which its Faustian program implies, hardly a trace. There is a gentlemanly restraint upon its sorrow; the story is told elegantly, and with a certain melancholy charm.

The irresistible grandeur of the opening to Strauss's "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is even less resistible when Koussevitzky is director of that apocalyptic mis en scene. Koussevitzky is also the ideal man to take the banality (if that annoys you) out of its Viennese Tanzlied. He will sweep you to the skies in certain parts of the score. But his climaxes were noisy. They approached the limit beyond which music becomes a cataclysmic rumpus and majesty overstrains itself. In holding the vast lines of the entire composition together, Koussevitzky was a master architect, but complete clarity, even at climaxes is a subject on which Strauss is adamant, when conducting his own works.

Sensitive to its somber undertones as well as its orgy of color rhythm, conductor and orchestra gave Ravel's "La Valse" a performance of unparalleled virtuosity. It was a memorable concert.

E. D.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I. JOURNAL
FEB 9 - 1941

Koussevitzky Back for Concert Here

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will return to the stand at the Boston Symphony's next concert here, Tuesday evening, Feb. 18, at which he will conduct Haydn's Symphony No. 88, Beethoven's third "Leonore" overture, Tschaikowski's overture to "Romeo and Juliet" and "Contes de ma Mere l'Oye," by Ravel.

Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday and Friday conducted his first pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, since his annual mid-winter vacation which was spent on his new estate at Lenox, Mass.

Gregor Piatigorsky Soloist fo

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 15th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, was the soloist. The program was as follows:

Rabaud
"La Procession Nocturne," Symphonic Poem after Lenau
Strauss
"Also Sprach Zarathustra," Tone Poem Op. 30
Hindemith
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra
Ravel...."La Valse," Choreographic Poem

If you want to stump a composer and put him in an embarrassing position, you have only to commission a cello concerto from him. Composers who have written them have never surpassed themselves. Everyone would agree, for example, that Schumann, Dvorak, Saint-Saens, Elgar and Prokofieff have composed much better music than is to be found in their respective cello concertos. It is the nature of the solo instrument that is the stumbling block, and you just have to face the fact that there is a dearth of effective music for cello and orchestra.

All this is by way of preface to the agreeable fact that Hindemith has turned the trick. Here at last is a first-rate composer who has succeeded in this difficult task; and we predict that Hindemith's Cello Concerto will become more and more well known if only because it fills a long-felt want.

Last season we all of us hoped that Prokofieff's new work in this field would prove thoroughly satisfying. But, though it had many points of interest, it did not quite make the grade. Prokofieff made the mistake of becoming too fascinated with the technical side of the solo instrument, and his explorations as to what it could do with various combinations in the orchestra ended by boring the listener.

Hindemith has first of all concerned himself with writing an interesting symphonic work, and he has contrived in the course of it to get his solo cello nicely in to the picture. Aside from the first movement, whose interest is almost entirely intellectual, the Concerto ought to make its way more easily to the average ear than do others of Hindemith's scores. There was good evidence that this was so yesterday in view of the ovation accorded to Mr. Piatigorsky and the composer and conductor.

As we have said, the first movement is stimulating from the intellectual side. But Hindemith is that kind of composer, and there is no reason why he should not indulge his talent in this direction at the risk of dryness. As it turned out the first movement makes a highly effective contrast with the other two.

The slow movement gives the cello a chance to do its favorite trick, that is to rhapsodize; but this is swept away in a contrasting fast section. The return to the slow tempo is most ingeniously accomplished. The finale is a brilliant march, and tucked away in the middle of it is one of the most enchanting trios imaginable. This admirable new work had its first performances this week. Mr. Piatigorsky, whose great skill is well known here, was a most sympathetic soloist; and Mr. Koussevitzky led the orchestra in a clear and beautifully balanced performance.

All the rest of the music on the program is thoroughly familiar to Boston audiences, and it was especially well presented by the orchestra under Mr. Koussevitzky, who was presumably invigorated after his three weeks' vacation. "Zarathustra" and "La Valse" are his specialties anyway, and nowhere will you hear them so brilliantly played as by the Boston Symphony.

Rabaud's tone poem, "La Procession Nocturne," is a lovely piece of program music, an orchestral painting. Strauss's subject matter in "Zarathustra" is more complicated, but nobody needs to bother with it. It is voluptuous music and should be relished, like most naughty things in this world, unashamedly! Ravel's "La Valse" is an inordinately clever score; and it too has a program of sorts in that it conveys a message of fatalism and sadness for things that are gone forever.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. The program for Feb. 21 and 22 offers two choral works, Roy arris' Folk-Song Symphony and Villa-Lobos' Chorus No. 10, and Brahms' 2nd Piano Concerto, with Leonard Shure as soloist.

KOUSSEVITZKY SHINES AGAIN

Conducts Two Brilliant Programmes

Feb. 8

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After three stimulating Symphony Concerts from as many conductors, which offered a feast of new and unfamiliar music, Dr. Koussevitzky returned to his post yesterday afternoon to prove anew that when he is in his element he is the master of them all. There were two super-performances yesterday, one of Rabaud's deeply affecting, cunningly fabricated tone poem, "La Procession Nocturne," and one of Strauss' super-music of the Superman, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."

For a time the playing of Ravel's "La Valse," the final number of a knockout programme, measured up to these high standards. But at the end, Dr. Koussevitzky's virtuosity got a little the better of him—and of the music—and the conclusion came near to crossing the borderline that separates interpretation from distortion of the composer's intentions.

However, it is very easy to forgive and overlook this particular instance of conductorial high spirits, and that is really all that it amounted to, since Ravel's intoxicating piece followed one of the happiest occasions that the Symphony Concerts have known in some time, namely, the first performance of Paul Hindemith's 'cello concerto, composed at "Tanglewood" last summer, in which Gregor Piatigorsky was the soloist.

Mr. Hindemith's latest score is above all exuberant. The last movement is a brilliant march, the slow division cannot stay slow very long and turns into a heady scherzo that virtually dominates the rest. The first movement gets off to a rousing start and even when things calm down a bit the interest never flags. The orchestral portion is a good deal heftier than one might expect in a 'cello concerto, and the soloist has to work to keep his end up. Of course, Mr. Piatigorsky was ready to meet such a challenge as this, and the premiere turned into a triple triumph for composer, soloist and conductor, as did that of Walter Piston's violin concerto a week ago, when Mr. Burgin and Miss Posselt shared in the honors.

When it came time for the parade of bows yesterday's audience was seized with justifiable mirth, for Mr. Piatigorsky who could tuck his 'cello under his chin and play it like a fiddle, towers high above Mr. Hindemith. And after they had Mutt-and-Jeffed it two or three times, Dr. Koussevitzky was produced to split the difference.

FEBRUARY 8, 1941

oist for Hindemith's Cello Concerto

79

THE BOSTON DAILY GLOBE—SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 8, 1941

Koussevitzky Returns With Brilliant Symphony Concert

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky returned from his midseason vacation to the conductor's stand at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon. The result was an electrifying concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. As it has happened, we have enjoyed three able and interesting guest leaders this Winter. Yet during this period the warming interpretive imagination and the commanding will to which Bostonians are accustomed have been missing. With Mr. Koussevitzky back one can say, quite simply, "There is the magnificent Boston Symphony we know."

Two hours of instrumental virtuosity took a little distinction away from what would be an event anywhere: first performance of a new Cello Concerto by Paul Hindemith, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. But only a little distinction was lost in the blaze of color and intensity, because Mr. Hindemith's music is brilliant. The remainder of the program, bound to raise emotional temperature both on the stage and in the auditorium, assembled Rabaud's symphonic poem, "The Nocturnal Procession" (after the "Faust" of Lenau), the Strauss tone poem, "Thus Spake Zarathustra," and Ravel's choreographic poem, "The Waltz." Yes, most of the afternoon was poetry, and progressively intoxicating poetry, at that.

The gentle and delineative music of "Le pere Rabaud" (as the French composer and one-season conductor of the Boston Symphony once was called) is poetical in a suggestive way. Even when Faust weeps into his horse's mane, after the religious procession has left him in unwelcome solitude, the tears are elegant, Gallic tears.

But the poetry of "Thus Spake Zarathustra" is vast and rhapsodic, in Koussevitzky's performance a mixture of Germanic and Slavic emotion. Some still think of "Zarathustra" as vulgar, referring particularly to the beer-garden music of "The Dance Song" episode. "Vulgarity" in a musical sense is, however, a variable quality, depending upon one's own temperament.

This reviewer, perhaps in blissful innocence, stopped thinking of Strauss as "vulgar" long since. Between "Don Juan," "A Hero's Life" and the other tone poems, the tunes, harmony and colors may be more or less luscious, sensuous and vivid. But Strauss as a whole is Strauss the orchestral wizard and the painter of great musical canvases. Either you are very fond of him or you don't like him at all.

Mr. Hindemith wrote his Cello Concerto out in the Berkshires last Summer, where he taught at the Boston Symphony's Berkshire Music Center. It is an unconventional Concerto, short, compact, heavily scored, with a march tune forming the basis of the finale. The march tune of the trio is derived from a composition of Amalia, sister of Frederick the Great, and it is orchestrated in a way to make you think of the "Youth" section in Mahler's "The Song of the Earth."

Most people instinctively think that music involving a cello ought to be melodically juicy, with a long, soulful slow movement. Hindemith's Concerto does not fit that description at all. There is hardly a trace of emotion, even in the lyrical slow section. But there are bright, cheerful tunes, most of them rhythmic. As a whole, the Concerto is simply very clever, to be enjoyed for brilliant sound it makes and for its bustling rhythms.

Apart from the slow movement, Hinedmith's writing for cello is disappointing in its mechanical dryness. Perhaps the orchestra is too heavy for the solo instrument in many places. It seemed almost as if, with some alteration, the orchestral part could stand on its own as three symphonic movements.

Mr. Piatigorsky gave a lively performance that appeared completely authentic. Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation was in like vein. Composer, soloist and conductor were the objects of unusually warm applause after the performance.

Ravel's fascinating incarnation of waltz rhythm made what was nearly an orgiastic ending for the concert. Here Mr. Koussevitzky was at the top of his form, drawing gorgeous sonorities and blowing up emotional fire that was as much Russian as French.

Next week the orchestra goes to New York. At the concerts of Feb. 21 and 22 the program will consist of two works new to Boston, Roy Harris' "Folk Song" Symphony and the Choros No. 10 by Villa-Lobos, and Brahms' Second Piano Concerto with Leonard Shure as soloist.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
FEB 9 - 1941

Boston Symphony Will Give Concert Thursday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the third concert in its 55th season in Brooklyn at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Thursday evening. Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Woman's Club of Brooklyn of which Mrs. Oscar W. Swift is president, Mrs. Thomas W. Lauderdale, and the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy of which Mrs. Charles Gitlin is chairman, will be the box holders.

Col. Eley P. Denson, commanding officer at Fort Hamilton and Mrs. Denson will occupy the Army-Navy box, and other boxes will be occupied by students of Poly Prep Country Day School, the Brooklyn Friends School, and the Packer Collegiate Institute.

The orchestra, of which Dr. Serge Koussevitsky is the conductor, will present the following program: Overture, "The School for Scandal," Op. 5 by Barber; two nocturnes, Clouds and Festivals, by Debussy; Symphony No. 4 in E minor of Brahms, and Gregor Piatigorsky 'cellist, will appear as soloist in the Hindemith concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is presented in Brooklyn under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president, the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is executive chairman, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
CITIZEN
FEB 10 1941

Piatigorsky Will Be Soloist With Boston Symphony Here

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give its third Brooklyn concert of the current season on Thursday evening, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will be devoted to works by Barber, Debussy, Hindemith and Brahms. Gregor Piatigorsky, celebrated Russian 'cellist, will appear as guest soloist in Hindemith's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra. The program will open with Barber's Overture, "School for Scandal" and will continue with Two Nocturnes by Debussy. The entire second half of the program will be given over to Brahms' Symphony No. 4 in E Minor, Op. 98.

These series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the Academy of Music are held under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, a Brooklyn Committee, and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences. The Institute announces that the house is sold out on subscription, but standing room will be available on the night of the concert.

This Clipping From
CAMDEN, N. J.
COURIER
FEB 7 - 1941

Phila. Has Concert By Boston Symphony

Forum Will Present Koussevitzky Wednesday In Yearly Visit

The Philadelphia Forum will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual Philadelphia concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening, February 12.

To probe backwards 60 years is to encompass almost all that is important in the history of musical performance in this country. As the Boston Symphony Orchestra celebrates its sixtieth birthday under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky it can look back to a leading part in this development.

In 1881, when Henry Lee Higginson assembled 60 musicians and called them the Boston Symphony Orchestra, there were no others to look upon as really serious rivals. The inception of the orchestra is traceable to the realization of a young Bostonian student of music in Vienna that America should have a symphony orchestra of the high standard which one could hear in the old world. Mr. Higginson held tenaciously to his dream for more than 20 years until at last, in 1881, he had acquired sufficient means to make it a fact. His principal thought was to create "an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price."

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts had all the musical excellence which the devotion and care of their founder could bring to them. They remained low in price and accessible to all, while the musicians and conductors were the best to be had. Among the distinguished conductors were Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Arthur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Pierre Monteux, Henri Rabaud, and Serge Koussevitzky, who became the orchestra's conductor in 1924.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 9 - 1941

Novelty by Hindemith

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its third evening concert at Carnegie Hall next Friday night, instead of the usual Thursday. Besides the Mozart symphony, the program includes Strauss's "Also sprach Zarathustra" and two works of Ravel. Paul Hindemith's new cello concerto will have its first performances here Thursday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music and Saturday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The soloist is Gregor Piatigorsky, who took part in the first performances of the work in Boston last Friday and Saturday. The programs, both for Brooklyn and for the Carnegie Hall matinee, open with Samuel Barber's overture to "The School for Scandal" and close with Brahms's fourth symphony.

Back in Boston, Dr. Koussevitzky will introduce Roy Harris's Folk-Song Symphony for orchestra and chorus to Symphony Hall on Friday afternoon and Saturday night, Feb. 21-22. This was first heard in full in Cleveland late in December. The chorus for the symphony and for Villa-Lobos's tenth "Choros," "Rasga o coraçao" is that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
INQUIRER
FEB 9 - 1941

Boston Symphony to Play Wednesday for Phila. Forum

The Philadelphia Forum will present the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its annual concert in the Academy of Music on Wednesday evening. Serge Koussevitzky will conduct.

In 1881 Henry Lee Higginson assembled sixty musicians and called them the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His principal thought was to create "an orchestra which should play the best music in the best way, and give concerts to all who could pay a small price." The Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts had all the musical excellence which the devotion and care of their founder could bring to them.

Among the distinguished conductors were Georg Henschel, Wilhelm Gericke, Artur Nikisch, Emil Paur, Karl Muck, Max Fiedler, Pierre Monteux, Henri Rabaud and Serge Koussevitzky, who became the orchestra's conductor in 1924.

An expatriate who had dwelt in Germany and France, and visited England, Dr. Koussevitzky had closely identified himself with the musical cultures of each country, and others as well. In the years to follow, America's composers and America's musical point of view became equally familiar to him. His sympathies know no border, nor does he neglect contemporary currents in his preoccupation with the great music of the past.

Dr. Koussevitzky has led the orchestra for more than a quarter of its history, far exceeding the tenure of any previous leader, and has brought the orchestra to new heights of eloquence and renown.

The program which he will conduct here includes Mendelssohn's Symphony in A, No. 4 ("Italian"), Debussy's Two Nocturnes ("Clouds" and "Festivals"), and Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 5, Opus 47.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 10 1941

HINDEMITH CONCERTO

Paul Hindemith's concerto for violoncello and orchestra was heard for the first time last Friday afternoon at Symphony Hall when Gregor Piatigorsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, played it in matchless fashion. If ever a work had a perfect medium for its interpretation, this did.

The composer wrote the concerto last summer in Lenox where he was a member of the faculty at the Berkshire Music Centre. It was evident that the magic of Tanglewood has changed Hindemith's style. Here were bits of really beautiful music. Always, Hindemith has written in a way which commands attention and he rates high in the list of contemporary composers. Of the moderns in the German school he has never gone the limit in writing incomprehensible atonal stuff. His music always retains a sense of key, at least for this listener, and it invariably leaves the desire to hear it over.

The first movement of the new concerto is written in a bold style. A crash of cymbals at the start introduces a long phrase for orchestra. The 'cello sings alone and then with the group, as the work progresses. A difficult cadenza comes just before the close of the movement. It is in the middle movement that Hindemith becomes genial and displays emotion. The artists lost no opportunity to make this section beautifully expressive. The last movement is gay and humorous. It has for a theme an old march tune, altered somewhat to make it less like the folk melody that it is. Humor and spirit mark this movement. Piatigorsky played the rapid passages with remarkable brilliancy.

The audience was tremendously excited and soloist, conductor and composer were recalled several times. Underlying it all one had the feeling that Koussevitzky's ideal of having the world's finest music centred at Tanglewood has reached a point past the usual conception of that statement. Not only is the world's finest music going to be heard there but here is proof that some of it is being created there.

K. T.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
FEB 9 - 1941

BROOKLYN TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Dr. Koussevitzky Will Direct Third Concert at Academy Thursday Night

'MARX BROTHERS' SUITE

Local Composer's Work to Be Given by Civic Sinfonietta—More Music at Hofstra

Gregor Piatigorsky, 'cellist, will be guest soloist at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, at the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Thursday night. The program will comprise Barber's overture, "The School for Scandal," Op. 5; Debussy's two nocturnes, Hindemith's Concerto for Violoncello and Orchestra, and Brahms's Symphony No. 4 in E minor, Op. 98. This will be the orchestra's third Brooklyn concert of the current season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, a Brooklyn committee, and the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

The boxholders will be Mrs. Frederic B. Pratt, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Woman's Club of Brooklyn, of which Mrs. Oscar Swift is president; Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale and the Associate Alumnae of Adelphi Academy, of which Mrs. Charles Gitlin is chairman. Colonel Eley P. Denson, commanding officer at Fort Hamilton, and Mrs. Denson will occupy the Army-Navy box, and other boxes will be occupied by students of Poly Prep Country Day School, the Brooklyn Friends School and Packer Collegiate Institute.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

AN INTERNATIONAL DAILY NEWSPAPER

BOSTON, TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 11, 1941—

Koussevitzky Plans Citizenship Program

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, becomes an American citizen next week three days before Washington's Birthday and in recognition of the event has prepared a special program.

The Russian-born conductor has arranged a special performance of American flavor, a revised version of Roy Harris's folk song symphony, a collection of half a dozen cowboy, mountaineer, and Negro songs.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
GAZETTE
FEB 5 - 1941

SEEKS CITIZENSHIP

BOSTON, Feb. 5 (UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, revealed today he will apply for his final citizenship papers Feb. 19. The Russian-born musician said he and his wife Nathalie and his secretary, niece of Mrs. Koussevitzky, took out first papers in 1935 and probably would seek citizenship together.

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, RIGHT
Being Sworn in at the Federal Building Yesterday

Koussevitzky Lost to Reds 'Over Million'

With a dramatic description of what this country and American citizenship means to him, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 66, famed conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 17 years, applied for his second papers seeking naturalization at the Federal building yesterday.

Also seeking U. S. citizenship was his wife, Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky, a native of Russia, as is the distinguished conductor.

"America is the only democratic country in the world; the only country for freedom of expression, freedom of culture, freedom of youth and opportunity," Dr. Koussevitzky said. "I have always felt that it was my country, and here at last is my chance to make it so."

Twice during the regime of totalitarian nations, Dr. Koussevitzky said, he has forfeited huge fortunes in money and possessions totalling many millions of dollars in value.

"First, the Russian Communists seized my home in Russia," he said. "They robbed me of a great deal more than a million; in my Russian home I had 260 paintings which alone were valued at a million. Other art objects and treasures I had collected were worth much more.

"And then my home in France was seized, and is now headquarters for Nazi officers. Under the Nazis, too, I have lost possessions of great value.

"That is my personal experience under the Communists and Nazis. Is it any wonder that I regard this country as the stronghold of freedom? Many of my musician friends, many of them exiles from totalitarian countries, are here now, and they believe with me that the honor of American citizenship is great.

CITIZENSHIP OATH TO BE TAKEN SOON

Dr. Koussevitzky Will Swear Allegiance Next Month

BY WILLIAM A. COBLENZ

If he passes an examination before a clerk in the Boston Federal building's Naturalization Bureau on Feb. 19, proving that he knows what democracy is all about, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, for 17 years conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will, three weeks from that date, stand before a judge of the United States Court and be sworn into the American fellowship of free men as a citizen of this country.

REDS HAVE HIS ESTATE

For a man who has been robbed of his $1,000,000 estate in Russia by its Communist regime, whose Paris home in what was Republican France is now "owned" by Nazi army officers, Dr. Koussevitzky has some first hand information on the broader distinctions between democratic and totalitarian governments.

In fact, he had even snubbed Mussolini once, turning down an engagement at La Scala, because the dictator had made a virtual prisoner for a time of Koussevitzky's friend and fellow-artist, Arturo Toscanini, because the latter refused to play a Fascist march in a programme where that kind of music made no sense.

Very Solemn Moment

"To me," Dr. Koussevitzky said after yesterday's rehearsals at Symphony Hall, "this is a very solemn, a very important moment. I do not wish to say anything about my citizenship, that is banal, that is routine. I have been in the United States 17 years and my work and my interests are centred here. This has become my country. For me this is something I cannot pass off with the usual words. What words can tell so much?"

In his youth, he explained, when he was decorated by the Czar, "I hated that regime." But, he asked, what could he do? In those days the relatively greater liberties he found even in Germany under the Kaiser when he travelled there on tour, made their first impact and to this day he remembers, he said, how differently he felt as he crossed national frontiers. When he was 18, he said, he was in England for the first time, and "it was unbelievable."

As a musician, he was asked, government and politics apart, as a cosmopolite and a citizen of the world, what difference does it make to him, or to his art, whether he is a citizen of a free country or no country. Does it make any difference when, for example, he is conducting a Mozart symphony, whether the government in the country where he is playing, is democratic or totalitarian?

Like Free Country

"Ah," he said, seizing on the question for the chance it gave him to say what was seemingly on his mind, "yes. It is the atmosphere. It is everywhere around you. You feel it. In a free country where people are happy you like it much better. You walk in the street and you see the happiness in people's faces. Ah, yes, I know. Where there is no liberty, where there is fear, where the people, they are all suspicious, the atmosphere is bad.

"Here in the United States I am now a part of your culture. This is my country, this is my orchestra, this is my life. It is part of me and I am

Citizenship New Symphony for Koussevitzky

Herald Feb 20

Soviet Seized Art Valued at Million

It was a great day yesterday for Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. He said so himself, standing not before his Boston Symphony Orchestra, but before the naturalization bureau in the federal building. For he was passing the examination for his final citizenship papers. With him as candidates stood his wife, Nathalie, and his secretary and niece, Miss Olga Naumoff. The trio will take the oath of allegiance within 30 days.

"I am delighted," said the gray-haired genius of Symphony Hall, smiling before an audience which included only a few who had seen him conduct his orchestra. "I always felt that I was a part of this great country, for here I am surrounded by friends. It is the only democratic country.

OLD RUSSIA PAST

"And the old Russia is a thing of the past. Here in America is youth, in which I have faith, and here artistic ability can have expression."

Somebody asked the eager, slightly nervous conductor if he had not lost mony in Soviet Russia, which he left 17 years ago." The Communists seized my home," he replied. "There I had 260 paintings worth $1,000,000. My art objects and treasures were taken. And now, in France, where I had another home, the Germans have entered. I have lost my home there, which has become a headquarters for German officers. Is it strange that I consider this country the stronghold of freedom?"

The three central members of the Koussevitzky menage in Brookline took out their first papers in 1935, and waited the required five years to establish legal residence and carry out the federal routine. That is why they were all so happy and smiling yesterday.

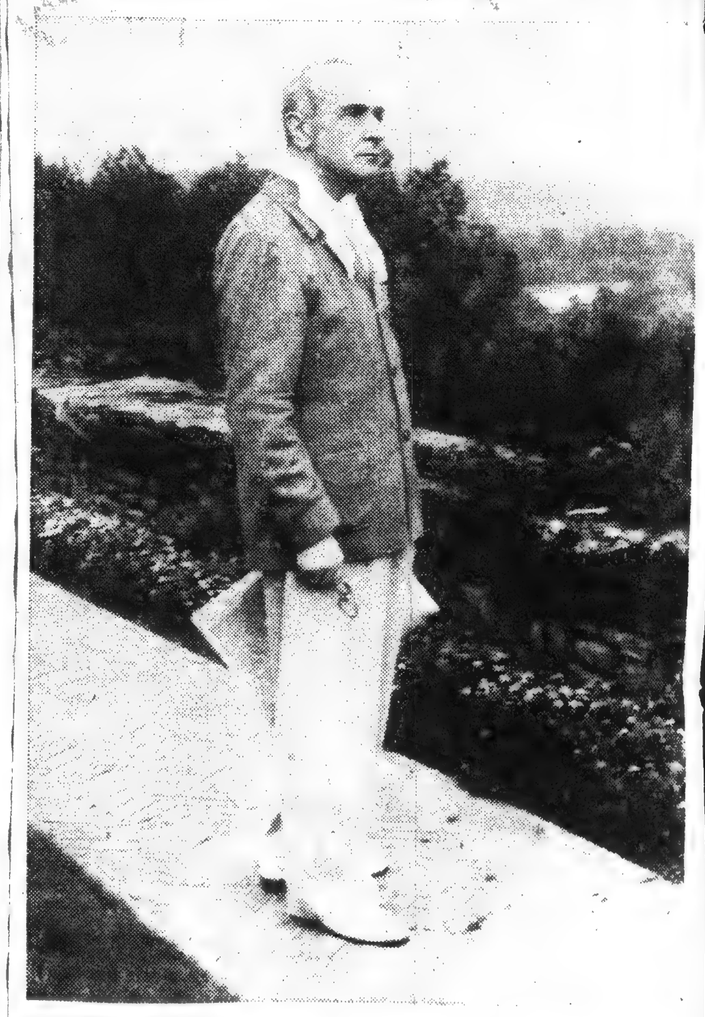
Papers filled out by the maestro said that he was born in Tver, a Russian provincial town, July 13, 1874. His wife, who is a sculptress of unassuming quality, gave her age as 60 and was born in Viatka, Russia. She was wealthy when she married the conductor, then a struggling bull fiddler. Miss Naumoff, a caricaturist not given to exhibiting her art, is 39 and was born in Samara, Russia.

So last night in the Koussevitzky's Druse street home, Victor, the valet, and his jolly wife prepared a gala meal for a sort of Russo-American birthday. There was plenty of borsch, and some of the wine the conductor likes so well, and even a few selections by himself on his old bull fiddle.

NEW WORLD SYMPHONY was in the hearts of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and his wife as they took final naturalization steps yesterday.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
REPUBLICAN
FEB 18 1941

Boston and Berkshire Maestro Becomes U. S. Citizen Tomorrow



(Copyright, 1940, by Gravelle)

Tomorrow Dr Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be sworn in as an American citizen before a federal judge at Boston. Photo shows Dr Koussevitzky at his Lenox estate which overlooks Tanglewood, setting of the summer music school and festival for which he has labored enthusiastically.

The Boston Post

81

2nd Class Matter at Boston P. O.
ight, 1941, by Post Pub. Co.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1941 **

SYMPHONY HEAD PASSES LAST QUIZ

Koussevitzky, Wife and Secretary File Final Citizenship Papers--- Take Oath in About Month

APPLY FOR CITIZENSHIP PAPERS

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mrs. Koussevitzky, left, and Miss Olga Naoumoff, his niece, at the Federal building yesterday.

The United States is the only country in the world today in which artistic and musical ability can find free expression, according to Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, who applied for his final citizenship papers yesterday at the naturalization bureau in the Federal building.

With him at the time were Mme. Koussevitzky and her niece, Mlle. Olga Naoumoff, who acts as secretary to Mr. Koussevitzky. Both of them also applied for their final papers.

The latter expressed great pleasure over his prospective American citizenship. "I have always felt a part of this country," said he, to members of the press who were on hand to greet him after he had passed the quiz on American history and government, given him by Naturalization Examiner Daniel F. Mahoney.

"This is where I have carved out my career in life," he added. "This is where my friends are, and this is where I want to spend the rest of my days, in an atmosphere of freedom and achievement. The old country is a thing of the past. The United States is the only country in the world today in which artistic and musical ability can find free expression. I have great hopes for the future of America and am proud to be adopted and accepted as one of its citizens. This is a great day for me.

"Americans have already made remarkable progress in art and music. There is no reason why the youth of America should not go on to greater accomplishment in the cultural life of this country. They have liberty, freedom, opportunity, everything that a great nation can offer. All that is necessary is the will to excell, the determination to triumph over obstacles. Young America has both."

Lost Over $1,000,000

When asked about the loss of his property in Russia and France, he said he accepted it as part of the vicissitudes of life, although he pointed out that it exceeded $1,000,000 in value. The thing that haunted his memory most, he said, was the loss of 260 masterpieces of painting, which he valued above dollars because of their artistic worth.

Dr. Koussevitzky in applying to Arthur D. Grandison, deputy clerk of the United States District Court, for his final papers, swore that he was born in Tver, Russia, 66 years ago, and that his last place of residence abroad was at Meudon, France, in 1935.

Mme. Natalie Koussevitzky gave her age as 60 and her birthplace as Viatka, Russia. Her niece, who is 39, was born at Samara, Russia.

All passed the quiz in American history and government and will be notified, after 30 days, when they are to take the oath of allegiance.

When word was passed around that the distinguished Symphony Orchestra conductor was at the bureau, clerks and prospective citizens climbed on chairs and settees to get a glimpse of him as he was undergoing the quiz.

George Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and John Burk, editor of the symphony programme, appeared as witnesses for Dr. Koussevitzky.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 5 - 1941

To Become Citizen

Boston, Feb. 5.—(UP)—Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, revealed today he will apply for his final citizenship papers Feb. 19. The Russian-born musician said he and his wife, Nathalie, and his secretary, a niece of Mrs. Koussevitzky, took out first papers in 1935 and probably would seek citizenship together.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 20 1941

Conductor of Boston Orchestra Qualifies for Citizenship

Herald Tribune—Acme (telephoto)

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky (right), conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, receiving certification of approval of his final examination papers in citizenship test in the Federal Building at Boston yesterday. With him are D. F. Mahoney (left), the examiner, and John Burke, a witness

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 6 - 1941

Koussevitsky Expects U. S. Citizenship Soon

Boston—(UP) — Serge Koussevitzky, Boston Symphony Orchestra conductor, revealed he will apply for his final citizenship papers Feb. 19.

The Russian-born musician said he and his wife Nathalie and his secretary, niece of Mrs. Koussevitzky, took out first papers in 1935 and probably would seek citizenship together.

Dr. Koussevitzky Passes Final Test for Citizenship

Boston Conductor to Take Oath of Allegiance Within Month

Special to the Herald Tribune

BOSTON, Feb. 19.—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, passed the examination for his final citizenship papers today. With him as candidates stood his wife, Nathalie, and his secretary and niece, Miss Olga Naumoff. All will take the oath of allegiance within thirty days.

"I am delighted," said the sixty-six-year-old conductor. "I always felt that I was a part of this great country, for here I am surrounded by friends. It is the only democratic country. The old Russia is a thing of the past. Here in America is youth, in which I have faith, and here artistic ability can have expression."

Dr. Koussevitzky was born in Tver, Russia, and came to the United States seventeen years ago.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Wife Apply for Final Citizenship Papers in Boston

Globe Feb 19

"This is a great day for me, I feel proud of the opportunity to become an American citizen," Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, 66-year-old conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, exclaimed as he completed the routine of application for his final citizenship papers at the Naturalization and Immigration office in the Federal building yesterday.

Federal Building yesterday.

"I have great faith in the future of American music," the noted conductor said. "This is now the only country in which artistic and musical ability can find freedom of expression. We have made remarkable progress, the youthful genius of this country promises even greater strides in the realm of music than has come out of the Old World."

Koussevitzky said that for many years he has felt like a citizen of the United States, with all his friends and interests now centered in this country. The old order is a thing of the past, he declared, recalling the loss of his old estate in Russia and the confiscation of priceless art treasures and valuables he owned.

The musician's wife, Natalie, and his secretary, Miss Olga Naumoff, who is Mrs. Koussevitzky's niece, also went through the hour-long formality which goes with the final examination, ending with a searching quiz by United States Naturalization Examiner Daniel F. Mahoney. Accompanying the group as witnesses were George E. Judd, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and John Burk, editor of the Symphony program.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, takes oath before United States Naturalization Examiner Daniel F. Mahoney (at left). John Burke looks on as Mr. Koussevitzky applies for his second papers.

Plays Ancient Instrument

By a Staff Photographer

Lawrence White

Member of the percussion section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who has adapted over 200 pieces of classical music for the marimba. He claims the marimba is not just an instrument for the playing of simple ballads and the rumba, but has a tone quality worthy of the finest serious music. Mr. White has given many recitals on the marimba both here and in Europe.

Marimba Crosses Equator To Stage Comeback in U. S.

The marimba, wallflower of musical instruments, is making a comeback.

It is this new alliance with South America that is responsible for it, according to Lawrence White, member of the percussion section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 13 years.

South American composers are becoming known in the United States, and "a great deal of classical music—serious music—as well as the inevitable rumba, is coming over the border now," said Mr. White. Naturally the marimba, a native instrument of the southern countries, has an important place in this new music.

He rejoices over this returning popularity of the marimba, whose glory faded in this country when the marimba band became a back number in musical favor. But through all the years Mr. White never has lost faith in the musical value of this ancient instrument whose origin goes back to days of early Africa.

Mellow Tone Quality

Most people associate it only with the playing of sentimenal ballads, he pointed out, and even musicians, for the most part, think of it only as a rumba instrument.

"But the marimba, played with soft mallets, has a very rich, mellow tone quality," Mr. White claims, "suggestive of a quartet of reed instruments."

Mr. White, putting his views into practice, has specialized on the marimba, adapting over 200 compositions of the masters for that instrument and through the medium of two hands and eight mallets giving expression to music which ordinarily requires a symphony orchestra of many members. These include the work of Schumann, Brahms, Grieg, Tchaikovsky, and many others, which he not only has given in recitals, but has played for special record transcriptions. Mr. White has given marimba concerts both here and in Europe, where he played on one occasion in the home of Ignace Paderewski in Switzerland, and has been feautred as soloist with the Pops Orchestra many times.

Mr. White played a few bars in popular swing time to illustrate the customary use of the instrument, and then veered off into a classical piece, the very tone itself seeming to change in the transition.

It has a rich quality, he said, that mixes very little with other instruments. "As an acompaniment for voice it is difficult because its richness detracts from the tone quality of of the voice. It blends well with strings, but its use with an orchestra should be worked out judiciously."

Started When a Boy

His first interest in the instrument, Mr. White confided, was aroused some years ago when he was a boy in Idaho. He fell heir to a marimba when a friend who purchased one was unable to play it, and gave it to him. Mr. White said he never had seen one before and had no idea how it was played.

He studied a method, however, and picked it up by himself. When he found a phonograph record with a marimba piece played with four mallets, he played it over and decided that "what that fellow could do, he could do, and proceeded to work it out."

After successive episodes with the piano, marimba, and snare drum, Mr. White decided that his career lay along musical lines and came to the New England Conservatory of Music in 1925, from which he graduated with a Bachelor of Music degree. He became associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1928.

Mr. White, who is also head of the Timpani and Percussion Department at the Conservatory, is married and resides in Boston.

MORRISTOWN, N. J
BANNER
2/14/41

Boton Symphony Acclaimed By Music Lovers

The Griffith Music Foundation in cooperation with the Woman's Club of Orange presented the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Knoussevitsky on Wednesday evening at the Mosque Theatre.

The theatre was filled to capacity with music lovers who enthusiasticly applauded this great organition.

The program opened with the Symphony in G major No. 88 by Haydn. This was followed by the Overture to Leonore No. 3 O P. 72 by Beethaven.

Following intermission a work by Sibelious, Symphony Io. 2 in D major Op. 43 completed the propram. Applause after applause runing through the house at the conclausion. Mr. Koussivitsky was asked to come from the wing many, many times.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays with Usual Precision at the Metropolitan

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Refreshed (as it seemed) by his midwinter vacation, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned to Metropolitan Theatre last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was welcomed back with the accustomed cordiality, and he made answer with a superb display of his powers.

The program itself was nothing to cause trembling expectancy — two items antedating the battle of Waterloo and two others that are not so young themselves. But Dr. Koussevitzky gave them one of the handsomest refurbishings that could be imagined.

Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 88, took the cure first. Possible there was room for learned argument about the tempos, but one could scarcely set himself for any such objection. The music rushed out of the orchestra with such magnificent liveliness of tone, such rhythmic power, such exhilarating grace of motion that one could only rejoice. Here were the precision for which the Boston orchestra is famous and the affection of artists for the work of an artist. It made one think that perhaps a symphony orchestra is the closest man has yet come to contriving a machine with a soul.

The portentous, tender, exciting music of the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, by Beethoven, was heard next. To these pages, Dr. Koussevitzky brought dramatic utterance, exhibiting the moods in luminous contrast and drawing from the orchestra a tone of uncommon eloquence.

In Ravel's "Mother Goose" music there was a further demonstration of the subtlety and exactness of which the orchestra is capable in the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky. Solo voices in this fragile make-believe were remarkably expressive, and the entire telling of the brief stories revealed the master reader.

It appears that anybody can start a program, but only Tchaikovsky can finish one so this time it was the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." The introduction, taken perhaps too slowly, was marked by almost hesitant moments, but once the main portion had been reached, everybody was in stride, and went flying away to a typical, sonorous, gaudy close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LITTLE FALLS, N. J
HERALD
2/13/41

Talking It Over

The recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque in Newark was truly an inspiring occasion not wholly because of the rendition of beautiful music by a symphonic group as near perfect as musical genius, plus ample financing, can make it, but because of the number of people still interested in the spiritual and cultural well being of the community at this time when there is such a need to nuture and strengthen these constructive forces.

The fortunes of the Boston Symphony have always interested the writer because as a member of a great chorus in Springfield, Massachusetts, members of this group assisted annually in the rendition of oratorios and operas. It seems to us that the Boston Symphony is now enjoying a new vigor and promise under Serge Koussevitzky, its noted conductor.

Mrs. Frank Donato of Main street underwent an operation at the Paterson General Hospital Tuesday. Her condition is very satisfactory.

The Home Hygiene Class will meet only one day a week beginning Tuesday the 11th and every Tuesday thereafter. The hours will remain the same.

Despite Inclement Weather

Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, Mrs. John M. Abbot, Mrs. George Saltonstall West in Audience

By ALISON ARNOLD

Every Friday afternoon during the winter season, rain or shine, cold or snow, Boston society throngs to Symphony Hall. No hostess would ever think of planning anything that would interfere with the weekly symphony concerts. Luncheons on Fridays are always over early and tea is not served until late. Stately, white-haired dowagers, busy young matrons, debutantes, and even youngsters of nine or ten, all look forward eagerly to Friday afternoons.

Yesterday's concert was important for several reasons. In the first place, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor, returned from his winter vacation of three weeks. And Gregor Piatigorsky was the guest artist. The program opened with "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19, and the concerto for violoncello was written by Paul Hindemith, a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, which held its first session at Tanglewood in Lenox last summer.

On account of the subway construction, the traffic situation at the busy corner near Symphony Hall is usually in a snarl, but yesterday afternoon in the drizzle, it was even more tangled than ever. Policemen's whistles blew shrilly as limousines and taxis fought for space at the entrance. And lovely ladies in festive attire were obliged to leap huge puddles and wallow in the mire.

Among the early arrivals was Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, wearing sables and a hat of beige felt with her black coat. Mrs. George Saltonstall West was charming in a beige ensemble, with which she wore a toque of matching ostrich feathers. Mrs. J. Harleston Parker's black coat was trimmed with silver fox, and Mrs. John Moseley Abbot wore an orchid corsage with her mink-trimmed black.

Wearing a black coat with a panel of Persian lamb, and a smart little black hat brightened with pale blue wings was Mrs. Russell Burrage, whose daughter, Mrs. George D. Aldrich, in a chic gray tailleur, also attended the concert. With her black frock Mrs. Francis P. Sears wore a mink jacket, and Mrs. Otis Russell's olive green coat was collared with mink.

Chatting together during the intermission was an attractive group of debutantes, among them Miss Ruth Robb, who was chosen as a lady-in-waiting to the Queen at the Cotillion Monday evening. Her simple black frock had a shell pink collar and she carried a muff of silver fox. Also in the group was Miss Constance Bradlee, whose beige frock had wide bands of two shades of brown on the full skirt. On her hair she wore a snood of coarse black net. Others were Miss Nancy Denny and Miss Polly Faulkner.

With Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller was her daughter, Mrs. Robert L. Henderson, who wore a beaver coat and tiny matching hat. Mrs. Fuller Halsey, who wore with her Persian lamb coat a hat of dusty pink trimmed with coq feathers, was accompanied by her pretty daughter, Miss Hope Halsey, in a plaid wool frock combining shades of gray and green, her sleek blonde hair arranged most becomingly in a pompadour.

Mrs. Robert Stevenson wore olive green and Mrs. James J. Minot contrasted her black frock with an emerald green turban. Mrs. William B. Long, who always wears distinctive hats, chose for yesterday's concert a fetching black affair with perky wings and a sort of mantilla of black lace. Miss Joan Lawson, sub-debutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lawson of Salem, wore bright red beads to match the embroidered flowers on her frock.

Miss Lucy Cochrane's black coat had a collar and cuffs of coachman's red, and Miss Faith Kidder topped her black skirt with a red jacket. With Mrs. William Ellery was her sister, Miss Grace Collier. Still others we noted were Miss Cynthia Forbes, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike and her daughter, Miss Priscilla Thorndike, Miss Louise Sargent, Miss Leslie Lindsey, Miss Anne Phillips, Miss Katharine Lane and Mrs. Phister Cowin.

And others were Mrs. Roland Baker, Miss Louise Coburn, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. E. Fred Cullen, Mrs. Arthur Beal, Mr. James Beaumont Noyes, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Robert F. Estabrook, Mrs. Frederick Estes, Mrs. Albert Kales, Mrs. Roswell Parish, Mrs. Harold Walker, Mr. Elliot Emerson, Mrs. George Megrew, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt and Mrs. Frank Jenkins.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 13 1941

Boston Symphony in Concert for the Forum

NOT the least of the many public services performed by the Philadelphia Forum is its annual presentation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That the value of the Bostonians' visit is not lost upon Philadelphia musical public is reflected in the large and discriminating audiences which regularly attend the concerts.

Such an audience was at the Academy of Music, last night, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his magnificent ensemble offered Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "Nuages and Fetes" and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5.

The major works were, of course, the two symphonies and they were wonderfully well played, the Mendelssohn with amazing brilliance, vitality and precision, the Shostakovich with imposing breadth and penetration. But the most provocative items of the program were the Debussy nocturnes which comprise a kind of special showpiece in the repertoire of both the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras.

It's surprising how different Mr. Koussevitzky's and Mr. Stokowski's conceptions of this music are, one from another. And how superlative is each in its own way! Mr. Stokowski goes after supernatural effects. He tries to transcend the traditionally accepted limitations of instruments, and he often succeeds. Mr. Koussevitzky seems to rejoice in the instruments and their natural characteristics.

The dynamic range is smaller, and the color scheme less minutely refined. But the beauty of the normal color of the instruments is restored and the artistry of Debussy's own blend of timbres speaks for itself. With the combination of Debussy, Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra a listener finds himself reflecting on the miracle that is a symphony orchestra when it is playing the music of a man who knew and loved instruments under the direction of another man fully appreciative of the genius of the composer.—H. P.

Plays Ancient Instrument

By a Staff Photographer

Lawrence White

Member of the percussion section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra who has adapted over 200 pieces of classical music for the marimba. He claims the marimba is not just an instrument for the playing of simple ballads and the rumba, but has a tone quality worthy of the finest serious music. Mr. White has given many recitals on the marimba both here and in Europe.

Marimba Crosses Equator To Stage Comeback in U. S.

The marimba, wallflower of musical instruments, is making a comeback.

It is this new alliance with South America that is responsible for it, according to Lawrence White, member of the percussion section of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the past 13 years.

South American composers are becoming known in the United States, and "a great deal of classical music—serious music—as well as the inevitable rumba, is coming over the border now," said Mr. White. Naturally the marimba, a native instrument of the southern countries, has an important place in this new music.

He rejoices over this returning popularity of the marimba, whose glory faded in this country when the marimba band became a back number in musical favor. But through all the years Mr. White never has lost faith in the musical value of this ancient instrument whose origin goes back to days of early Africa.

Mellow Tone Quality

Most people associate it only with the playing of sentimenal ballads, he pointed out, and even musicians, for the most part, think of it only as a rumba instrument.

"But the marimba, played with soft mallets, has a very rich, mellow tone quality," Mr. White claims, "suggestive of a quartet of reed instruments."

Mr. White, putting his views into practice, has specialized on the marimba, adapting over 200 compositions of the masters for that instrument and through the medium of two hands and eight mallets giving expression to music which ordinarily requires a symphony orchestra of many members. These include the work of Schumann, Brahms, Grieg, Tchaikovsky, and many others, which he not only has given in recitals, but has played for special record transcriptions. Mr. White has given marimba concerts both here and in Europe, where he played on one occasion in the home of Ignace Paderewski in Switzerland, and has been feautred as soloist with the Pops Orchestra many times.

Mr. White played a few bars in popular swing time to illustrate the customary use of the instrument, and then veered off into a classical piece, the very tone itself seeming to change in the transition.

It has a rich quality, he said, that mixes very little with other instruments. "As an acompaniment for voice it is difficult because its richness detracts from the tone quality of of the voice. It blends well with strings, but its use with an orchestra should be worked out judiciously."

Started When a Boy

His first interest in the instrument, Mr. White confided, was aroused some years ago when he was a boy in Idaho. He fell heir to a marimba when a friend who purchased one was unable to play it, and gave it to him. Mr. White said he never had seen one before and had no idea how it was played.

He studied a method, however, and picked it up by himself. When he found a phonograph record with a marimba piece played with four mallets, he played it over and decided that "what that fellow could do, he could do, and proceeded to work it out."

After successive episodes with the piano, marimba, and snare drum, Mr. White decided that his career lay along musical lines and came to the New England Conservatory of Music in 1925, from which he graduated with a Bachelor of Music degree. He became associated with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1928.

Mr. White, who is also head of the Timpani and Percussion Department at the Conservatory, is married and resides in Boston.

MORRISTOWN, N. J
BANNER
2/14/41

Boton Symphony Acclaimed By Music Lovers

The Griffith Music Foundation in cooperation with the Woman's Club of Orange presented the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Serge Knoussevitsky on Wednesday evening at the Mosque Theatre.

The theatre was filled to capacity with music lovers who enthusiasticly applauded this great organition.

The program opened with the Symphony in G major No. 88 by Haydn. This was followed by the Overture to Leonore No. 3 O P. 72 by Beethaven.

Following intermission a work by Sibelious, Symphony Io. 2 in D major Op. 43 completed the propram. Applause after applause runing through the house at the conclausion. Mr. Koussivitsky was asked to come from the wing many, many times.

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Plays with Usual Precision at the Metropolitan

Prov. Journal Feb 14

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Refreshed (as it seemed) by his midwinter vacation, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned to Metropolitan Theatre last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was welcomed back with the accustomed cordiality, and he made answer with a superb display of his powers.

The program itself was nothing to cause trembling expectancy — two items antedating the battle of Waterloo and two others that are not so young themselves. But Dr. Koussevitzky gave them one of the handsomest refurbishings that could be imagined.

Haydn's symphony in G major, No. 88, took the cure first. Possible there was room for learned argument about the tempos, but one could scarcely set himself for any such objection. The music rushed out of the orchestra with such magnificent liveliness of tone, such rhythmic power, such exhilarating grace of motion that one could only rejoice. Here were the precision for which the Boston orchestra is famous and the affection of artists for the work of an artist. It made one think that perhaps a symphony orchestra is the closest man has yet come to contriving a machine with a soul.

The portentous, tender, exciting music of the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, by Beethoven, was heard next. To these pages, Dr. Koussevitzky brought dramatic utterance, exhibiting the moods in luminous contrast and drawing from the orchestra a tone of uncommon eloquence.

In Ravel's "Mother Goose" music there was a further demonstration of the subtlety and exactness of which the orchestra is capable in the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky. Solo voices in this fragile make-believe were remarkably expressive, and the entire telling of the brief stories revealed the master reader.

It appears that anybody can start a program, but only Tchaikovsky can finish one so this time it was the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." The introduction, taken perhaps too slowly, was marked by almost hesitant moments, but once the main portion had been reached, everybody was in stride, and went flying away to a typical, sonorous, gaudy close.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LITTLE FALLS, N. J
HERALD
2/13/41

Talking It Over

The recent concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Mosque in Newark was truly an inspiring occasion not wholly because of the rendition of beautiful music by a symphonic group as near perfect as musical genius, plus ample financing, can make it, but because of the number of people still interested in the spiritual and cultural well being of the community at this time when there is such a need to nuture and strengthen these constructive forces.

The fortunes of the Boston Symphony have always interested the writer because as a member of a great chorus in Springfield, Massachusetts, members of this group assisted annually in the rendition of oratorios and operas. It seems to us that the Boston Symphony is now enjoying a new vigor and promise under Serge Koussevitzky, its noted conductor.

Mrs. Frank Donato of Main street underwent an operation at the Paterson General Hospital Tuesday. Her condition is very satisfactory.

The Home Hygiene Class will meet only one day a week beginning Tuesday the 11th and every Tuesday thereafter. The hours will remain the same.

Despite Inclement Weather

Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, Mrs. John M. Abbot, Mrs. George Saltonstall West in Audience

By ALISON ARNOLD

Every Friday afternoon during the winter season, rain or shine, cold or snow, Boston society throngs to Symphony Hall. No hostess would ever think of planning anything that would interfere with the weekly symphony concerts. Luncheons on Fridays are always over early and tea is not served until late. Stately, white-haired dowagers, busy young matrons, debutantes, and even youngsters of nine or ten, all look forward eagerly to Friday afternoons.

Yesterday's concert was important for several reasons. In the first place, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, the beloved conductor, returned from his winter vacation of three weeks. And Gregor Piatigorsky was the guest artist. The program opened with "La Procession Nocturne," a symphonic poem by Henri Rabaud, who conducted the Boston Symphony Orchestra for the season of 1918-19, and the concerto for violoncello was written by Paul Hindemith, a member of the faculty of the Berkshire Music Center, which held its first session at Tanglewood in Lenox last summer.

On account of the subway construction, the traffic situation at the busy corner near Symphony Hall is usually in a snarl, but yesterday afternoon in the drizzle, it was even more tangled than ever. Policemen's whistles blew shrilly as limousines and taxis fought for space at the entrance. And lovely ladies in festive attire were obliged to leap huge puddles and wallow in the mire.

Among the early arrivals was Mrs. Ralph Hornblower, wearing sables and a hat of beige felt with her black coat. Mrs. George Saltonstall West was charming in a beige ensemble, with which she wore a toque of matching ostrich feathers. Mrs. J. Harleston Parker's black coat was trimmed with silver fox, and Mrs. John Moseley Abbot wore an orchid corsage with her mink-trimmed black.

Wearing a black coat with a panel of Persian lamb, and a smart little black hat brightened with pale blue wings was Mrs. Russell Burrage, whose daughter, Mrs. George D. Aldrich, in a chic gray tailleur, also attended the concert. With her black frock Mrs. Francis P. Sears wore a mink jacket, and Mrs. Otis Russell's olive green coat was collared with mink.

Chatting together during the intermission was an attractive group of debutantes, among them Miss Ruth Robb, who was chosen as a lady-in-waiting to the Queen at the Cotillion Monday evening. Her simple black frock had a shell pink collar and she carried a muff of silver fox. Also in the group was Miss Constance Bradlee, whose beige frock had wide bands of two shades of brown on the full skirt. On her hair she wore a snood of coarse black net. Others were Miss Nancy Denny and Miss Polly Faulkner.

With Mrs. Alvan T. Fuller was her daughter, Mrs. Robert L. Henderson, who wore a beaver coat and tiny matching hat. Mrs. Fuller Halsey, who wore with her Persian lamb coat a hat of dusty pink trimmed with coq feathers, was accompanied by her pretty daughter, Miss Hope Halsey, in a plaid wool frock combining shades of gray and green, her sleek blonde hair arranged most becomingly in a pompadour.

Mrs. Robert Stevenson wore olive green and Mrs. James J. Minot contrasted her black frock with an emerald green turban. Mrs. William B. Long, who always wears distinctive hats, chose for yesterday's concert a fetching black affair with perky wings and a sort of mantilla of black lace. Miss Joan Lawson, sub-debutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Lawson of Salem, wore bright red beads to match the embroidered flowers on her frock.

Miss Lucy Cochrane's black coat had a collar and cuffs of coachman's red, and Miss Faith Kidder topped her black skirt with a red jacket. With Mrs. William Ellery was her sister, Miss Grace Collier. Still others we noted were Miss Cynthia Forbes, Mrs. Richard K. Thorndike and her daughter, Miss Priscilla Thorndike, Miss Louise Sargent, Miss Leslie Lindsey, Miss Anne Phillips, Miss Katharine Lane and Mrs. Phister Cowin.

And others were Mrs. Roland Baker, Miss Louise Coburn, Mrs. Charles P. Howard, Mrs. E. Fred Cullen, Mrs. Arthur Beal, Mr. James Beaumont Noyes, Miss Amy Sacker, Mrs. Robert F. Estabrook, Mrs. Frederick Estes, Mrs. Albert Kales, Mrs. Roswell Parish, Mrs. Harold Walker, Mr. Elliot Emerson, Mrs. George Megrew, Mrs. William Dana Orcutt and Mrs. Frank Jenkins.

This Clipping From
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
BULLETIN
FEB 13 1941

Boston Symphony in Concert for the Forum

NOT the least of the many public services performed by the Philadelphia Forum is its annual presentation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That the value of the Bostonians' visit is not lost upon Philadelphia musical public is reflected in the large and discriminating audiences which regularly attend the concerts.

Such an audience was at the Academy of Music, last night, when Mr. Koussevitzky and his magnificent ensemble offered Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Debussy's "Nuages and Fetes" and Shostakovich's Symphony No. 5.

The major works were, of course, the two symphonies and they were wonderfully well played, the Mendelssohn with amazing brilliance, vitality and precision, the Shostakovich with imposing breadth and penetration. But the most provocative items of the program were the Debussy nocturnes which comprise a kind of special showpiece in the repertoire of both the Philadelphia and the Boston orchestras.

It's surprising how different Mr. Koussevitzky's and Mr. Stokowski's conceptions of this music are, one from another. And how superlative is each in its own way! Mr. Stokowski goes after supernatural effects. He tries to transcend the traditionally accepted limitations of instruments, and he often succeeds. Mr. Koussevitzky seems to rejoice in the instruments and their natural characteristics.

The dynamic range is smaller, and the color scheme less minutely refined. But the beauty of the normal color of the instruments is restored and the artistry of Debussy's own blend of timbres speaks for itself. With the combination of Debussy, Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra a listener finds himself reflecting on the miracle that is a symphony orchestra when it is playing the music of a man who knew and loved instruments under the direction of another man fully appreciative of the genius of the composer.—H. P.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
FEB 17 1941

Symphonic Programs Heard Over Week End

Two Met Operas Presented; Recitals Given at Town Hall

By PITTS SANBORN.

The symphonic week end opened in Carnegie Hall on Saturday morning with the fourth Young People's concert by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society. In the afternoon the Boston Symphony Orchestra completed its New York visit. Yesterday the Philharmonic-Symphony Society gave its regular Sunday matinee and in the evening the New York City Symphony Orchestra appeared in its regular weekly concert. Arturo Toscanini continued the N. B. C. Symphony Orchestra's series of Saturday night broadcasts.

L'Amore Dei Tre Re and Madama Butterfly were the afternoon and evening operas at the Metropolitan on Saturday. The Town Hall events included a piano recital by 12-year-old Gary Graffmann on Saturday afternoon, the late afternoon session of New Friends of Music yesterday and a piano recital by Roger Aubert last night.

The Ballet Theater continued its run at the Majestic with three week-end programs, two Saturday and one last night.

* * *

Two Composers.

Two composers in person gave the fillip of bowed acknowledgments to the Boston Symphony event. Samuel Barber made his obeisance after the first number, his own "School for Scandal" overture; Paul Hindemith saluted the throng when it had listened to his new 'cello concerto, introduced to New York on this occasion.

Mr. Barber is by this time old enough to find the overture classed among his earlier works. It is not on that account a bit less lively in its chatter, now trenchantly exhilirating, now lyrically insinuating, but it does seem a trifle overlong.

Mr. Hindemith's concerto will probably not take rank among his more important achievements, but its slow movement is certainly among his more ingratiating. Here the man of mighty erudition, the thrice doughty contrapuntist, the scorner of mere tonal pleasing writes flowing cantilena for the solo instrument, against a background of plucked strings; then turns polyphonist for the nonce, though not too much so, and finally ends this pleasant interlude serenely and harmoniously. The last of the three movements is a lively, if obviously learned, march.

Lucky indeed was the composer to have for this work no less impressive a 'cellist than Gregor Piatigorsky.

The program's other numbers were Debussy's Clouds and Festivals and the Fourth Symphony of Brahms. Whether or not you always liked the interpretation, the wonderful orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky, gave constan delight.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
FEB 16 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY AT CARNEGIE HALL

Dr. Koussevitzky Conducts the Overture to 'A School for Scandal' by Barber

HINDEMITH WORK PLAYED

Piatigorsky Soloist in 'Cello Concerto—Brahms 4th and Debussy Nocturnes Heard

By OLIN DOWNES

The uncommon brilliancy and interest of the concert given by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall was due, of course, to the conductor and orchestra and also in considerable part to the choice of new as well as old music to be performed. And here was a sovereign example of the importance of interpretation to a composer, for the opening performance of Samuel Barber's overture to "A School for Scandal," which was not the first hearing of the work in this city, nevertheless constituted a revelation of what that score by a gifted young American was really made. The overture as a consequence had an immense success.

It is very gay, lyrical and riant. It is Italianate somewhat in its approach to the comedy mood, and this is probably due to certain musical influences which Mr. Barber experienced in his student period. His model is close to the "Falstaff" of Verdi and the scores of Italian opera buffa composers of the later period. This influence lends a passing flavor to the motives themselves and to the method of attack.

Lyricism and Wit Shown

We do not mean that Mr. Barber is imitative or directly influenced by other men. He has his own things to say. He says them here with contagious spirit. It is not bad for a young American to aspire to lyricism, clarity and wit without heaviness, in creating music. This overture, in the writer's opinion, is better, if not so ambitious, than Mr. Barber's recently played violin concerto.

This overture attempts nothing which is not in the composer's power. The themes, the development, the amusing and ingenious coda are admirably contrived, and this without pose or megalomania. Mr. Barber is just doing what he can to write a piece of good music.

One cannot forget the performance. At its end Dr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Barber to the stage, as he brought another composer, Paul Hindemith, before the audience later in the concert. Both composers owed much to the skill and the intuition of their extraordinary interpreter and the superlative orchestra, never more alive, more glowing in its every tonal particle, and, for Mr. Barber, shimmering and jesting and gossiping like a magpie!

Mr. Hindemith's new 'cello concerto, played by Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, is a fairly short work in the lighter vein. It is ingeniously wrought, in a vein of fancy and humor. In texture it is indicative of a general direction toward tonal- and away from the atonal ideas -int—if indeed Mr. H-

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 15 1941

Koussevitzky Leads Concert In Carnegie Hall

Boston Orchestra Heard in Mozart Symphony, Ravel and Strauss Program

By Jerome D. Bohm

Ordinarily one may depend upon Serge Koussevitzky to provide a program of absorbing interest when he brings the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Carnegie Hall. But last night's concert was disappointing; not because this superb aggregation of musicians played less compellingly than usual, but because the music played, with the exception of the opening Mozart symphony in A major (K. 201), was second rate, or less than second rate in quality. And the greater part of the evening brought with it ravishing sounds, but little in the way of substantial pabulum. For Richard Strauss's "Also Sprach Zarathustra," which followed the Mozart symphony, is not one of the German composer's more enduring tone poem's nor are Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" and "La Valse" among the products of his workshop which bear seeds of immortality within them.

The opening page of "Also Sprach Zarathustra" remains its most imposing one, but this flamboyant greeting to the sun over with, Strauss's inspiration falters and the ensuing episodes, excepting possibly for the impassioned "Vor der grossen Sehnsucht," are either merely dull or tawdry, reaching the depths of banality in the "Tanzlied," which smacks more of a Münchener Bierstube than of Nietzsche's rhapsodic philosophical poem.

Ravel's "Ma Mere l'Oye" has appeared so frequently on Mr. Koussevitzky's lists that one has grown tired of its carefully calculated naïvetes, and "La Valse" is not one whit better than one of those outmoded piano transcriptions by a Tausig, Schulz-Evler or Godowsky, of a Strauss waltz. Tricky, lush orchestration does not suffice to replace ideational poverty. The ear grows satiated with gorgeous tonal effects and longs for music to satisfy the inner man. A dinner consisting of a morsel of meat and a hogshead of sauce piquante is not a well balanced or a nourishing one.

The virtuosity of the orchestra has never been more in evidence and Mr. Koussevitzky conducted with unflagging zeal, but I fear his chief objective on this occasion was to show how wonderfully his musicians can perform and not to interpret great music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
FEB 17 1941

Hindemith Concerto Given By the Boston Symphony

A new concerto for cello and orchestra by Hindemith, bearing the date-line, "Lenox, Mass., 1940," had an out-of-town opening with Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, and Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony at the Brooklyn Academy of Music last Thursday evening, and was repeated—together with the balance of the program—for a large and equally enthusiastic audience at Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon. The other numbers heard were Samuel Barber's Overture to "The School for Scandal," Debussy's "Nuages" and "Fetes" and the Symphony No. 4 of Brahms.

The new concerto makes a better first impression than much that has been written by that prolific and provocative composer, having a melodic brightness and an almost Mozartean sense of inspired invention about it that give it an unusually spontaneous ring.

Mr. Piatigorsky is an outstanding virtuoso, and he played the concerto in a highly personal, super-expressive manner, which was often more than the work asked. The case was one of slight artistic incompatibility, with two indomitable personalities—Hindemith's and Piatigorsky's—retaining their identities throughout the engagement. The composer was present at the Carnegie Hall performance, joining Koussevitzky and Piatigorsky in sharing the applause.

—O'G.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
FEB 16 1941

83

MUSIC

By VIRGIL THOMSON

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Serge [illegible]y, conductor, third afternoon concert of its series at Carnegie Hall yesterday, with Gregor Piatigorsky, cellist, as soloist in the following program:

Overture to "The School for Scandal," Op. 5 ..... Samuel Barber
Two nocturnes: Nuages, Fetes..... Debussy
Concerto for violoncello and orchestra. Paul Hindemith
First performance in Manhattan
Symphony No. 4, in E minor, Op. 98, Brahms

Without Benefit of Inspiration

ORCHESTRAS constantly guest-conducted get hypersensitive, and their performances vary in technical quality. They are overdependent on conducting. Orchestras that play most of the time under a single conductor have a musical discipline that survives the conductor's off-days. His tempi may be all wrong and he may beat 4-4 time when the piece is in 3-4; but the orchestra, remembering him at his best, goes right ahead and gives a good performance. The string players don't get angry at him and scratch; the brasses don't get careless and burp.

* * *

Yesterday would seem to have been not one of Dr. Koussevitzky's better days. But the Boston Symphony Orchestra sounded, nevertheless, as lovely as always in tone and texture. Take it all in all, there is nothing like it in the United States. The string choir in particular plays with a silken transparency and a delicacy that is unequaled. The woodwinds, too, are thin and pure. Nowhere else does an oboe sound so completely like an oboe, a flute like a flute, a clarinet, a bassoon so right and so characteristic in sonority. The trumpets and trombones are majestic, the horns richly mysterious, the ensemble harmonious without any instrument's individual character being absorbed or obscured by that of another.

* * *

Nevertheless, the concert was a little unsatisfactory. Mr. Barber's "School for Scandal" overture, an early work far more ample and incisive than his recent Violin Concerto, was executed with clarity, if not with brilliance. Hindemith's new Cello Concerto was played with all the brilliance possible (it is not a brilliant work) by Mr. Piatigorsky. I could not tell whether the heaviness of the brass entries, which were certainly a shade on the blitzkrieg side, was due to the composer's scoring or to Mr. Koussevitzky's overenthusiastic hand. That hand has ere now been known to overinsist brassward. But so has Mr. Hindemith's. The piece itself is more varied and more imaginative than this composer's recently heard Violin Concerto, but it is a pretty ponderous chunk of music all the same.

* * *

The Debussy Nocturnes and the Brahms Fourth Symphony, being familiar, made it clear that neither Mr. Barber nor Mr. Hindemith could be held wholly responsible for the impression their pieces had given of being earnest but pointless. Because those pieces, which one knows to be anything but pointless, came to earth even more wide of any imaginable mark or aim than the new works did.

The tempi were fast everywhere. Debussy's "Clouds" was taken half again as fast as is considered normal in France. "Fêtes," though nearer to the conventional speed, was a shade fast too. The Brahms slow movement was taken as an andantino, hardly distinguishable from the allegretto which followed. The Brahms was full of careless accents as well. In no music, save perhaps that of Debussy, is it so necessary to lean on the short notes. If one does that, the long notes take care of themselves; if one doesn't, the short ones get lost and the music loses that smooth flow without which most of the meaning gets lost too.

* * *

There is a great deal of similarity between Brahms and Debussy. Their pieces don't sound alike, but the technique of their rendering is identical. Their rhythms must not be tampered with too much, and their melodies must be voiced subjectively. Any emphatic extroversion of them takes away their poignancy and their poetry. They must be floated ever so gently (with care for the short notes) on a steadily flowing rhythmic stream, articulated tenderly, allowed to breathe in their own way. No music responds so fully to kind and gentle treatment or flowers with such a penetrating fragrance when given half a chance. But it withers and dies in one's hands under any kind of objective or rhetorical pressure whatsoever.

The good doctor at his best is a bit theatrical and Slavic when dealing with that sort of music. Yesterday he added a sort of unreflected and meaningless oratory to it that deprived it of all its sweetness, all its inwardness, all its power to take flight. He did his best to whip it up, but it would not be bullied. Politely and quietly both Brahms and Debussy retired behind their beards and left him alone with the beautiful sounds that were all his musicians could give him.

Gregor Piatigorsky

'Cello soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday in Carnegie Hall

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
FEB 17 1941

HINDEMITH WORK HAS INTRODUCTION

Piatigorsky Is Soloist With Boston Symphony.

To the season's mounting array of new concertos was added on Saturday afternoon a first New York performance of the opus for cello and orchestra which Paul Hindemith composed last summer in the Berkshires. Mr. Hindemith was present in Carnegie Hall to hear it performed by Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist. The applause was hearty and the composer took the platform to join the conductor and the soloist in its acknowledgment.

Another composer also had his bows to make and for the second time in the week. Samuel Barber, whose new violin concerto was introduced on Tuesday evening by Albert Spalding and the Philadelphians, was represented on Mr. Koussevitzky's program by his early "School for Scandal" Overture. Brilliantly played, the familiar piece took on a new measure of wit and animation and the Boston subscribers seemed much pleased when the young American who penned it came before them.

The Hindemith work was ardently served by Mr. Piatigorsky and the ensemble. It is ingenious and aims to be both melodious and friendly. There is simple tune as well as a deal of contrapuntal jugglery. But it is not essentially grateful for the solo instrument and the whole effect is cerebral. The composer's melodies fail of human contact, in a now only too familiar way.

The Debussy nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes," which Mr. Koussevitzky invariably plays supremely well, and the Brahms Fourth Symphony, which runs a little to surface brightness at his hands, were the standard literature of the program. The prevailing splendor of the orchestral playing was not lost on a closely attentive audience.

O. T.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES

FEB 15 1941

MOZART WORK LED BY KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts Boston Orchestra in the Symphony in A Major at Carnegie Hall Concert

TONE POEM IS ON PROGRAM

'Also Sprach Zarathustra,' by Richard Strauss, and Ravel Compositions Are Played

A heap of brilliant playing was lavished on a program of less than earth-shaking import last night at Carnegie Hall when the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Serge Koussevitzky, its conductor, paid their third evening visit of the season. Of the four works on the program, three were of fairly recent vintage by Richard Strauss and Maurice Ravel. The fourth, by a curious coincidence, was the very work that had stood out on the program of the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra under John Barbirolli at the same hall the previous evening—Mozart's Symphony in A major (K. 201).

It was the Mozart symphony, perfect in its balance and proportions, that lingered longest in the memory, though it led off. This product of the 18-year-old genius was played with radiant simplicity, on a scale of values commensurate with the modest frame of the music. The tone was light and transparent, and the conception had the grace and style of the period. The traversal of the delicate slow movement was a model of Mozart playing in its purity of style and patrician phrasing.

After Mozart came Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Also sprach Zarathustra," which is based, with some freedom, on Nietzche. It is Strauss in his most philosophic vein, and as music it is less shoddy than some of his other works. The conception and the instrumentation have an assurance and a sweep that are fascinating. Mr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra took advantage of the virtuoso scoring. The performance was grandiose in design. If it did not catch fire, it was not the fault of conductor or players.

The second half was devoted to Ravel—"Ma Mere l'Oye" and "La Valse." The five children's pieces that make up the "Mother Goose" suite are rather thin for the strong appetites of modern symphonic audiences. But if one was intent on following and reveling in the felicities of performance, there was pleasure to be had from the clarity, crispness and refinement of Mr. Koussevitzky's interpretation. Similarly, there was a dazzling performance of "La Valse," which is more appropriate these days, for Ravel's wry and bitter treatment of the traditional waltz seems to be as meaningful for our day as for his.

H. T.

THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,
FEBRUARY 15, 1941

New Tube Boon To Late Folk To 'Symphony'

By eliminating countless traffic jams the new subway is expected to reduce the number of late comers to symphony concerts and other functions in the Huntington Avenue district and make such events smoother for everybody concerned, officials of the Boston Symphony Orchestra said today.

Greater ease in reaching the district undoubtedly will encourage more persons to attend its cultural activities and thus heighten its importance as a civic center, it was said. Improved accessibility to the Symphony Hall district will result not only from greatly improved traffic conditions, but also from the proximity of the new Symphony subway station, conveniently located at Massachusetts Avenue.

"Often symphony patrons have planned their evening to perfection and left home in plenty of time, only to be caught unexpectedly in a traffic jam and delayed until after the concert has started," a spokesman for the organization stated.

"By removing surface cars from Huntington Avenue many of these unexpected jams will be eliminated and much of the uncertainty will be taken out of a trip to the symphony."

Such delays have been particularly unfortunate in the case of persons who were especially desirous of hearing the first selection in the concert, it was pointed out. No one is seated while the orchestra is playing.

Similar savings in time and inconvenience will apply to functions at Mechanics Hall, the Arena, Jordan Hall, Horticultural Hall, centers in the district.

"During the evening rush period, a single surface car can stall taxicabs and private automobiles, and effectively delay arrival at these buildings. Such incidents will be ended when the cars are put underground," the symphony spokesman continued.

Congestion in the vicinity of Symphony Hall, at the intersection of Massachusetts Avenue and Huntington Avenue, frequently halts traffic on both streets and backs it up as far away as Westland Avenue, it was pointed out.

Hundreds of thousands of persons are affected by these conditions each year. During the "Pops" concert season each summer, 100,000 persons pass the box office. About 150,000 attend the symphony concerts each winter season. There are also many other functions held in the Hall. Added to these are patrons of all the other centers mentioned.

Thus valuable time will be saved to countless numbers of people.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1941

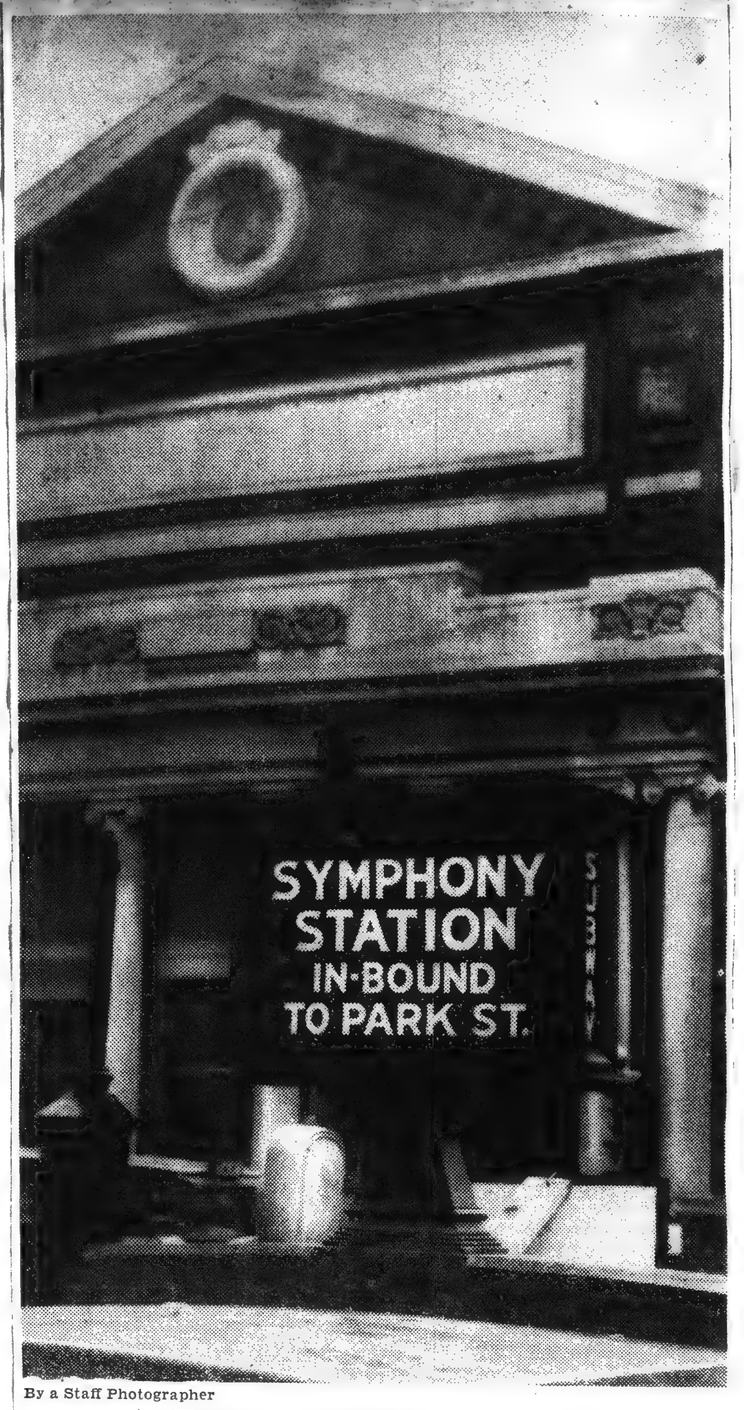
Boston Plugs Hole in Street

By a Staff Photographer

Boylston Street Will Never Look the Same

The last chapter in the story of the surface trolley line on Boylston Street in Boston. Workmen in the picture are busy tearing up the tracks at the ramp between Charles and Arlington Street, where cars bound for Huntington Avenue used to emerge from the Boylston Street subway before completion of the Huntington Avenue subway extension.

The incline is to be filled in and waterproofed and the area paved as part of the street with a central reservation along the middle. With Boylston Street thus widened, automobile traffic is expected to flow more freely.



By a Staff Photographer

An Entrance to New Huntington Tube

One of the eight entrances to Symphony Station on the new Huntington Avenue Subway line, with Symphony Hall in the background. This particular inbound entrance is across the street from Symphony Hall, but on a rainy night a Symphony patron could hurry into one of the entrances only a few feet from the steps of Symphony Hall and cross the street through an underground hallway.

Adjacent to The Christian Science Mother Church

Shawmut Realty Apartments Now Served by the New Subway

If you are desirous of living where there is the utmost consideration given for your comfort—convenient to the Public Library, Symphony Hall, theaters, colleges, lectures, etc.—where you will have Edison steam heat, continuous hot water, watchman and resident janitor service, we invite you to inspect these suites.

2 to 7 Rooms $42.50 a month and up

Completely Furnished Suites Also Available

Shawmut Realty Trust
15 Norway Street, Boston Kenmore 0482

SYMPHONY HALL

For the past 40 years Home of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Boston's Finest Auditorium—Acoustically Unexcelled

For tickets and for rental information call Commonwealth 1492

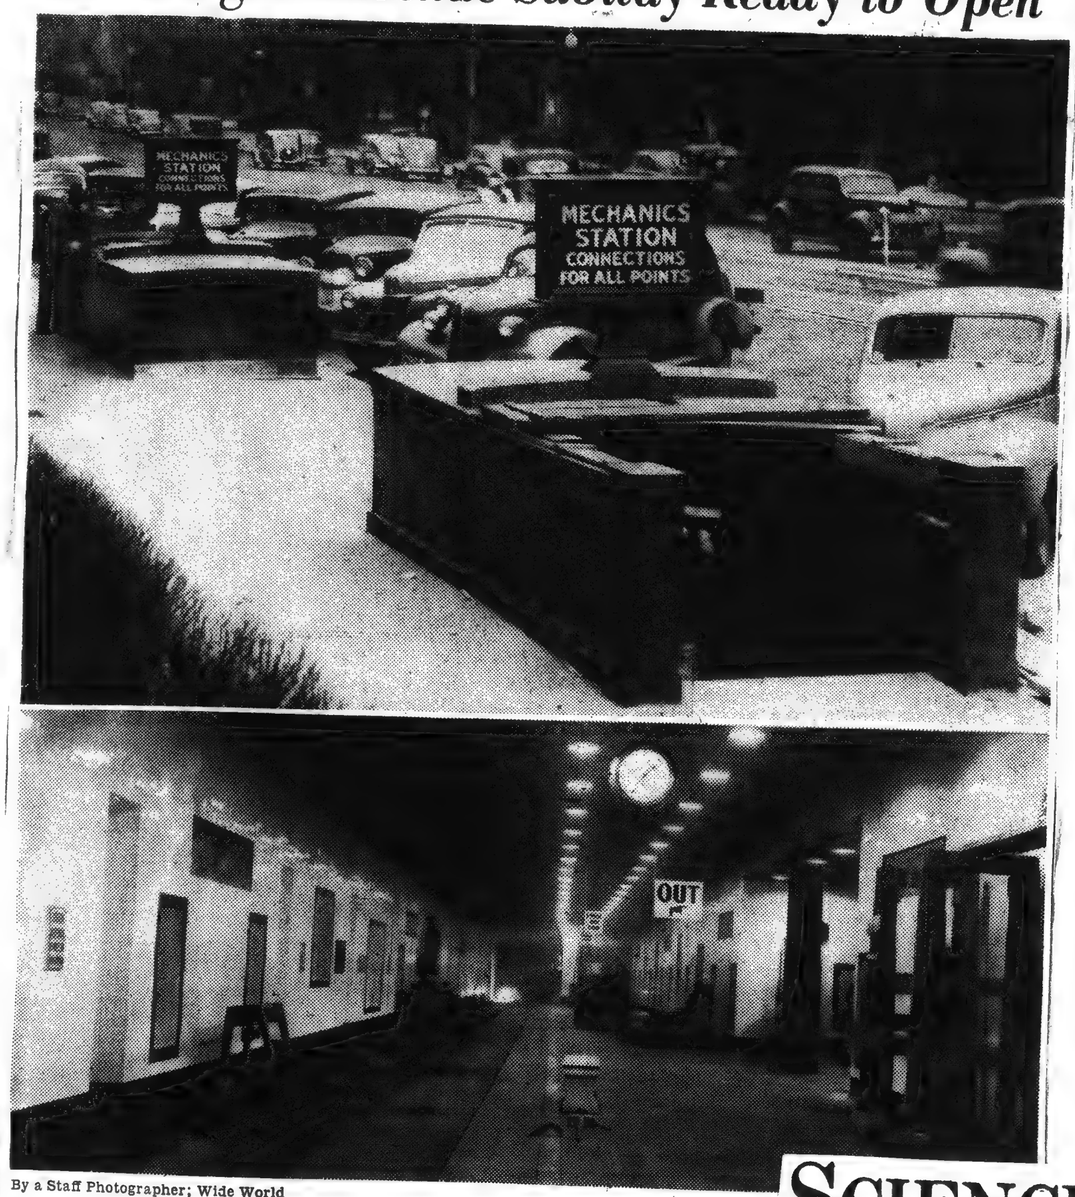
TIAN SCIENCE MO

AN INTERNATIONAL DAILY NEWSPAPER

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1941—VOL. XXXIII, NO. 68 R

85

Huntington Avenue Subway Ready to Open



By a Staff Photographer; Wide World

Two Views of the New Huntington Avenue Sul

Top: One of the four entrances to the new Mechanics subway station in front of Mechanics Building on Huntington Avenue.

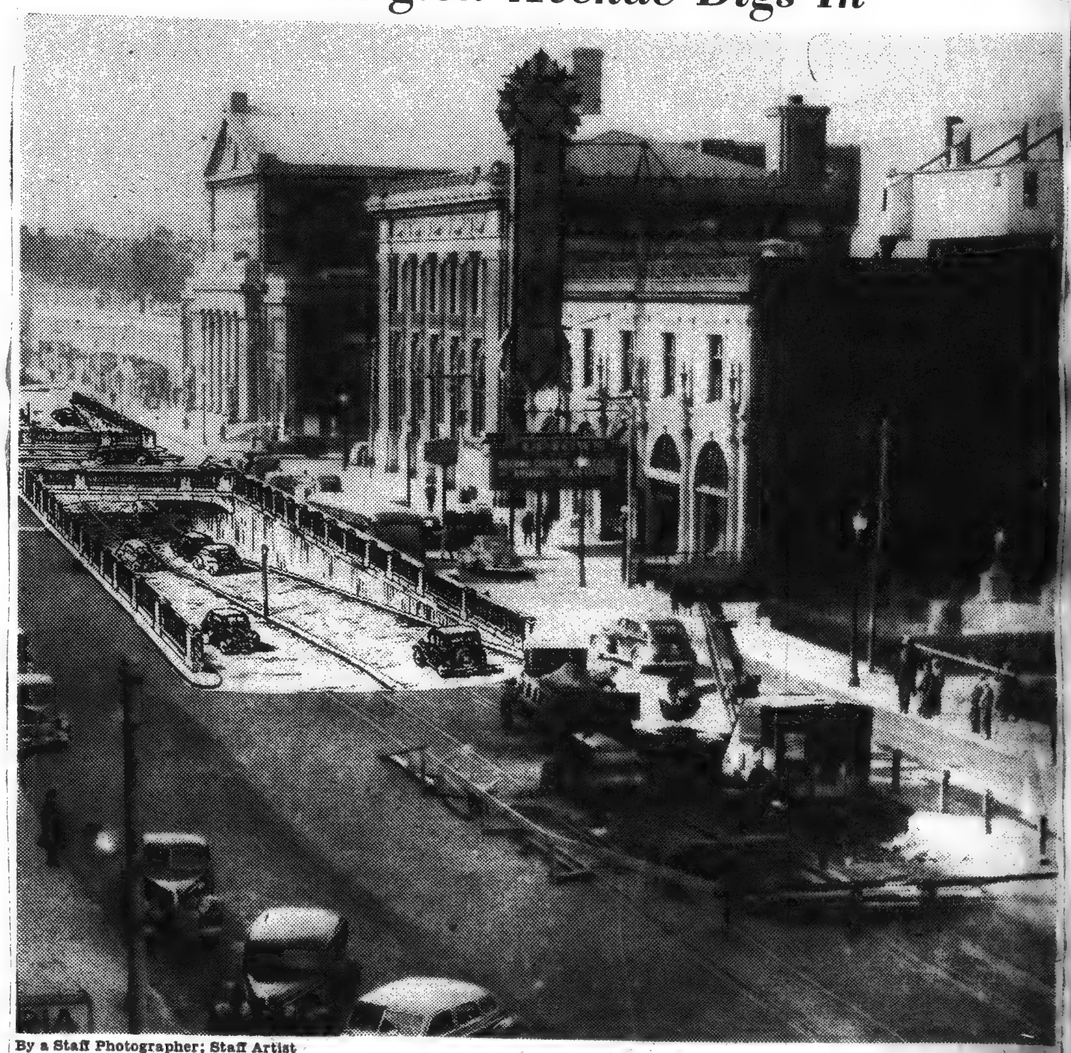
Lower: A view of the spacious new Symphony station on the new Hur Symphony station is at th ton Avenue and Massa ceremonies will be broadcas

Plans complete for opening new Huntington Avenue tube: Page

SCIENCE MONITOR

FEBRUARY 18, 1941 ☆☆

Huntington Avenue Digs In



By a Staff Photographer; Staff Artist

Underpass Construction Begins at Mass Avenue

Snorting steam shovels today began digging the $800,000 underpass which by early summer is expected to carry through traffic on the busy artery under heavily-traveled Massachusetts Avenue. The underpass will be about 1,000 feet long, will have two 20-foot roadways, and will be financed by the City of Boston and the WPA. Boston's share of the expense will be $300,000. Inset shows artist's conception of how the finished job will look.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, O.
BLADE
FEB 24 1941

* * *

TO MOST persons the name of Serge Koussevitzky calls to mind the gray-haired, austere and awe-inspiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But to Marion Dana, who had won recognition as a concert pianist before taking up residence in Toledo a few years ago, mention of the world-famous conductor recalls her student days in Berlin. Mr. Koussevitzky, a native of Russia, was known then throughout Europe, not as an orchestra leader but as a soloist on—of all things—the bass viol. He was in Berlin frequently for concerts and word of his coming thrilled the feminine heart—for the tall handsome man was a matinee idol. Miss Dana tells me that the students would deny themselves lunch, sweets or attendance at their own required piano recitals to they might have money for tickets for a Koussevitzy concert—and it wasn't the bass viol which attracted them.

Within a month Dr. Koussevitsky, for 17 years a resident of this country, will be a citizen as well. Three days before the birthday of the father of his adopted land, the 66-year-old famed musical director passed the examination for his final papers. He is quoted as having said on that occasion, "I always felt that I was a part of this great country, for here I am surrounded by friends. It is the only democratic country. The old Russia is a thing of the past. Here in America is youth, in which I have faith, and here artistic ability can have expression."

INFORMATION OBSCURED

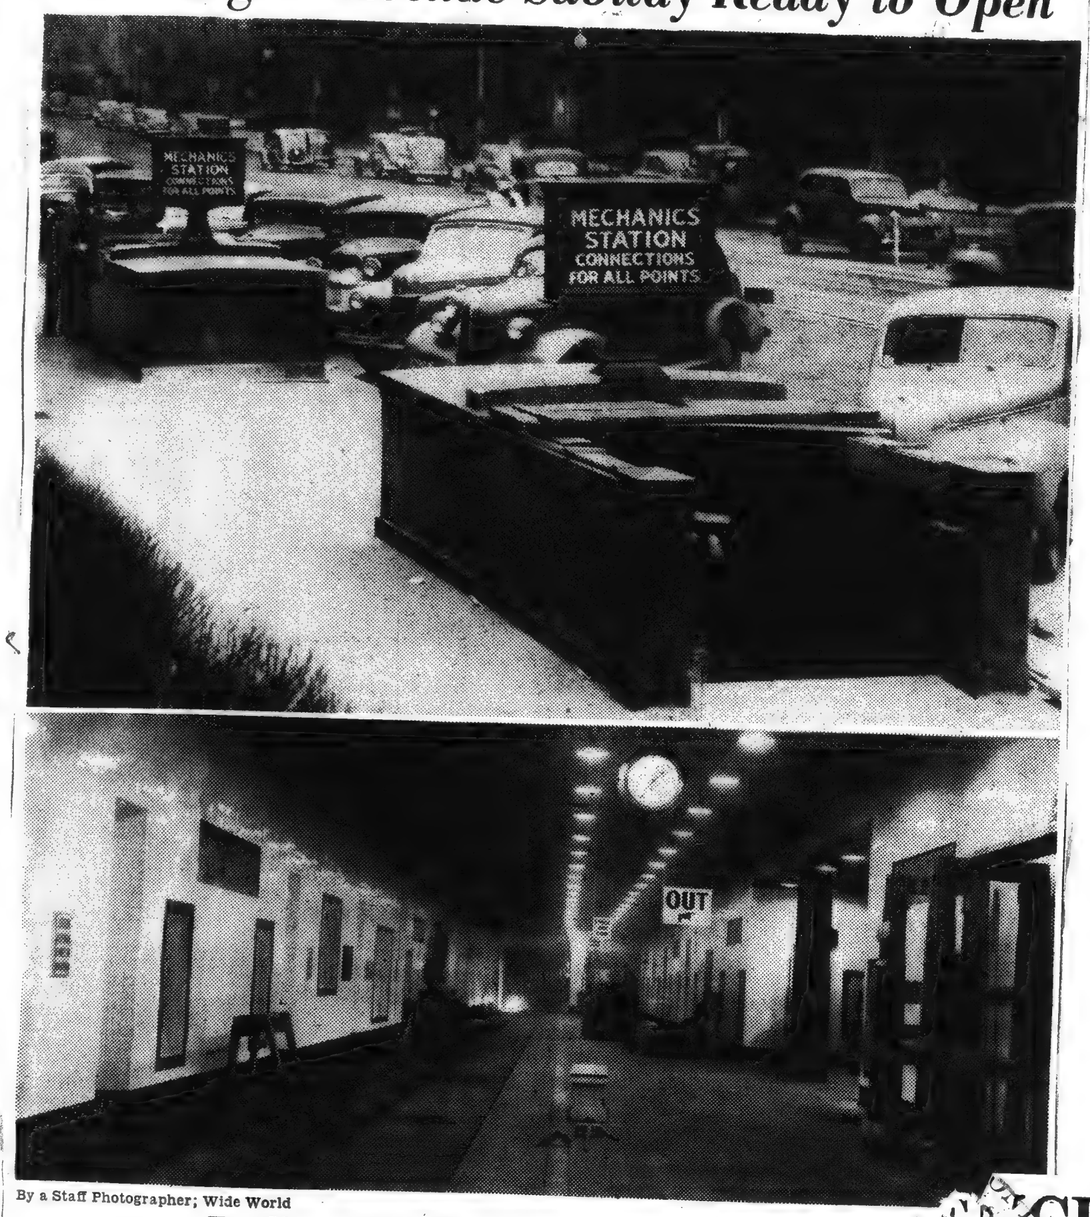
TIAN SCIENCE MO

AN INTERNATIONAL DAILY NEWSPAPER

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1941—VOL. XXXIII, NO. 68 R

85

Huntington Avenue Subway Ready to Open



By a Staff Photographer; Wide World

Two Views of the New Huntington Avenue Subway

Top: One of the four entrances to the new Mechanics subway station in front of Mechanics Building on Huntington Avenue.

Lower: A view of the spacious new Symphony station on the new Huntington Avenue ... Symphony station is at the intersection o... ton Avenue and Massachusetts Aven... ceremonies will be broadcast over W...

Plans complete for opening new Huntington Avenue tube: Page 10.

This Clipping From TOLEDO, O.
BLADE
FEB 24 1941

* * *

TO MOST persons the name of Serge Koussevitzky calls to mind the gray-haired, austere and awe-inspiring conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. But to Marion Dana, who had won recognition as a concert pianist before taking up residence in Toledo a few years ago, mention of the world-famous conductor recalls her student days in Berlin. Mr. Koussevitzky, a native of Russia, was known then throughout Europe, not as an orchestra leader but as a soloist on—of all things—the bass viol. He was in Berlin frequently for concerts and word of his coming thrilled the feminine heart—for the tall handsome man was a matinee idol. Miss Dana tells me that the students would deny themselves lunch, sweets or attendance at their own required piano recitals to they might have money for tickets for a Koussevitzy concert—and it wasn't the bass viol which attracted them.

Within a month Dr. Koussevitsky, for 17 years a resident of this country, will be a citizen as well. Three days before the birthday of the father of his adopted land, the 66-year-old famed musical director passed the examination for his final papers. He is quoted as having said on that occasion, "I always felt that I was a part of this great country, for here I am surrounded by friends. It is the only democratic country. The old Russia is a thing of the past. Here in America is youth, in which I have faith, and here artistic ability can have expression."

CE MONITOR

* *

...untington Avenue Digs In

By a Staff Photographer; Staff Artist

Underpass Construction Begins at Mass Avenue

Snorting steam shovels today began digging the $800,000 underpass which by early summer is expected to carry through traffic on the busy artery under heavily-traveled Massachusetts Avenue. The underpass will be about 1,000 feet long, will have two 20-foot roadways, and will be financed by the City of Boston and the WPA. Boston's share of the expense will be $300,000. Inset shows artist's conception of how the finished job will look.

86

Trombonist Learns to Hit the High Seas

By a Staff Photographer

Mr. and Mrs. Valdemar Lilleback Sail the Ocean Blue

". . . Schooner Rigged and Rakish," as John Masefield would say, is this model four-master which rouses the admiration of two sea-going enthusiasts. Mr. Lilleback is a trombone player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Inset—The Blue Heron, the Friendship sloop of Mr. and Mrs. Lilleback, whose hobby is sailing.

Mast of Boat Beats Time to Seas' Symphony

By Josephine Ripley

Staff Writer of The Christian Science Monitor

For Valdemar D. Lilleback, trombone player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky wields the greatest baton in the world—except one.

That's the tall "baton" that masts his 32-foot sloop, the "Blue Heron," and conducts symphonies of its own that have to do with wind and sail and sea.

It's a thrilling experience, playing under Koussevitzky. Mr. Lilleback's eyes glow as he speaks of it. He's a great conductor." His voice drops in reverence. "And he makes wonderful music."

But there's melody, too, in the crash of the surf, in the rhythmic dip of the prow, the crescendo of wind in the sails, and the high, lonely wail of the gull. And towering above, that giant "baton," the mast, swings a measured arc in the sky, and an unscored, unrehearsed symphony of the sea rises, clear and sweet, for those who have ears to hear.

Mariner Lilleback hears. He has always recognized the effortless notes of this grand composition. So perhaps it is not strange at all that the hobby of a "Symphony" man should be sailing. As far back as he can remember, says Mr. Lilleback, the sea has called him with its music.

In Denmark, when a boy, he was always prowling around boat yards, he confided, inspecting the different kind of craft with dreamy eyes and visions in his head of that day when he would have his own boat. And that day finally came. He and two other members of an orchestra in which he was playing chipped together and bought one.

Mr. Lilleback learned to sail, he said, "from fisher folk," and from then on, the world was his—all of it that he wanted. In 1904, after traveling with a musical organization that played in Sweden and Germany, he came to the United States. Then, because there were no musical jobs to be had, he shipped as member of the crew on a boat plying between New York and Brazil.

"So I've sailed the South Atlantic," he related with a smile of reminiscence, "and I know blue water."

Such far oceans are foreign, however, to the dancing keel of the "Blue Heron," whose home waters are Casco Bay and Boston Harbor, with its only extended voyage the honeymoon trip of Mr. and Mrs. Lilleback to Albany, N. Y.—the nearest mooring to Stockbridge where Mr. Lilleback played in the Berkshire Festival.

Mrs. Lilleback, the former Ann Gibson of Boston, is as intensely interested in boating as her husband, and as familiar with the handling of a sail, having learned to jibe and tack in her own boat when she was 12.

Audition Given for Concert Tour With Stokowski

Preliminary Hearings at Shell on Esplanade Being Held by Fiedler

Down in his quarters at the Hatch Memorial Shell on the Charles River Esplanade, Arthur Fiedler is winding up preliminary auditions for the Stokowski All-American Youth Orchestra.

The ensemble finally chosen by Leopold Stokowski himself, will be the second All-American Youth Orchestra. Last Summer Mr. Stokowski took the first one on a tour of South America. The orchestra selected this year will start out with Mr. Stokowski in May for a tour of cities in Canada, Mexico and the United States.

These preliminary auditions are under auspices of the National Youth Administration, and are designed to choose ultimately the five best applicants from Massachusetts. In additon to those heard in Boston by Mr. Fiedler, auditions are going on in the western part of the state. These will be over by the end of the week, it is said. Then Mr. Stokowski starts upon his own tour of final selection.

Five aspirants, instruments and music cases under arms, arrived at the Hatch Memorial yesterday morning. Three were violinists—Maurice Wolfson of Dorchester, Evelyn Castricone of Lawrence, and Bernard Chebot, from Fall River. The other two were brass players, Miriam Polak of Belmont, trumpet, and Michael Denesuk, who plays the tuba, of Somerville.

One by one they were ushered into Mr. Fiedler's room—which is his office as conductor of the Massachusetts National Youth Administration Symphony Orchestra as well as of the Esplanade Concerts in the Summer. First each applicant was asked routine information about age, study, and so on. Next came performance of a piece chosen by the player, the accompaniment for which was furnished by Mr. Fiedler at the piano. Two violinists brought concertos, the trumpeter a shorter work.

A bit of sight reading—parts from a Mozart, a Tchaikovsky and a Brahms Symphony—was last in order, Mr. Fiedler sitting alongside to beat time and observe proficiency. Some of the young musicians were understandably nervous, but those whom one heard carried through bravely.

Mr. Fiedler spoke highly of the general degree of talent shown this year. He added that the total number of applicants was below that last year, because the high requirements of the All-American Youth Orchestra have tended to encourage the finest material, and to eliminate students not sufficiently developed technically to meet these standards.

C. W. D.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
FEB 19 1941

MUSIC

Boston Symphony Orchestra Brings Koussevitsky Back to Metropolitan.

By G. Y. LOVERIDGE

Refreshed (as it seemed) by his midwinter vacation, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returned to Metropolitan Theatre last night to lead the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He was welcomed back with the accustomed cordiality, and he made answer with a superb display of his powers.

The program itself was nothing to cause trembling expectancy — two items antedating the battle of Waterloo and two others that are not so young themselves. But Dr. Koussevitzky gave them one of the handsomest refurbishings that could be imagined.

Haydn's symphony In G major, No. 88, took the cure first. Possible there was room for learned argument about the tempos, but one could scarcely set himself for any such objection. The music rushed out of the orchestra with such magnificent liveliness of tone, such rhythmic power, such exhilarating grace of motion that one could only rejoice. Here were the precision for which the Boston orchestra is famous and the affection of artists for the work of an artist. It made one think that perhaps a symphony orchestra is the closest man has yet come to contriving a machine with a soul.

The portentous, tender, exciting music of the overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72, by Beethoven, was heard next. To these pages, Dr. Koussevitzky brought dramatic utterance, exhibiting the moods in luminous contrast and drawing from the orchestra a tone of uncommon eloquence.

In Ravel's "Mother Goose" music there was a further demonstration of the subtlety and exactness of which the orchestra is capable in the hands of Dr. Koussevitzky. Solo voices in this fragile make-believe were remarkably expressive, and the entire telling of the brief stories revealed the master reader.

It appears that anybody can start a program, but only Tchaikovsky can finish one so this time it was the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet." The introduction, taken perhaps too slowly, was marked by almost hesitant moments, but once the main portion had been reached, everybody was in stride, and went flying away to a typical, sonorous, gaudy close.

PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 19 1941

NEWS OF THE WORLD OF MUSIC

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

BOSTON has now its own Youth Symphony Orchestra, sponsored by the NYA, which is to say, the National Youth Administration for Massachusetts. Arthur Fiedler is the conductor and Alexander Thiede and George Hoyen have assisted him in training the group of 60 young people which will make its bow to the public at Jordan Hall next Sunday evening. There will be no admission charge.

According to present standards, an orchestra of 60, even a youth orchestra, is not quite a symphony orchestra and it is planned to increase the new organization to at least 70 players. There are still a few openings in the strings and woodwinds, and since the roster which has come to hand lists but three French horns and two trombones, it would seem that one more of each of these instruments would not be amiss. However, they will not be needed for the programme of next Sunday's concert, which includes Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro," Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and the G minor Violin Concerto of Bruch, in which Sheldon Rotenberg will be the soloist. John L. Donovan, Jr., State youth administrator, will make an address.

A nucleus for the new orchestra was formed last year during auditions for the American Youth Orchestra which toured South America last summer under the direction of Leopold Stokowski. There were two Massachusetts players in that body, which astonished the critics of both Americas by the brilliance of its performances. Whatever one may think of Mr. Stokowski's highly colored interpretations, he impressively demonstrated his sovereign command of an orchestra, when in the course of a couple of weeks' rehearsals he welded his youth musicians into a cohesive body that played with genuine virtuosity. The results of Messrs. Fiedler, Thiede and Hoyen will be awaited with interest.

Speaking of matters orchestral, the Berkshire Music Centre at Tanglewood, which was established last summer with Dr. Koussevitzky as its director, is to be enlarged. As many as 350 will be accepted for next summer's term and to accommodate them new buildings are planned and there will be extended facilities for group performance. As before, the Centre will have classes in conducting, composition, operatic interpretation and symphonic performance.

The principal change will be in the largest department of the school, described in the new catalogue as the department of music and culture and which includes the festival chorus. In his preliminary statement Dr. Koussevitzky refers to this department as designed for "students with less specific qualifications" and for "amateurs who wish to increase their acquaintance with music and its interpretation." A survey of choral and instrumental music in study and performance, will be conducted by Paul Hindemith. The most important work to be prepared by the chorus will be Beethoven's "Missa Solemnis" and it will come to performance at one of the concerts of the Berkshire Festival. A notable addition to the faculty, which already bristles with important names, will be Gregor Piatigorsky, the eminent Russian cellist, who will have charge of a department of chamber music. Other new members are Hugh Ross, New York's able choral conductor and Leo Schrade, the musicologist now connected with the department of music at Yale. The school term will be from July 7 through Aug. 17. Additional information may easily be obtained from Symphony Hall.

So much for the Symphony Orchestra's summer plans. Its winter doings more immediately concern us. This week Dr. Koussevitzky will go Pan-American, introducing to Boston the new "Folk-Song" Symphony of Roy Harris and the "Choros" No. 10, by Hector Villa-Lobos, the best known of living Brazilian composers, whose name will be new to the Symphony programmes. This "Choros, No. 10," is one of 14 works bearing the title and one of the few which actually requires a chorus. The music we will hear is essentially Brazilian and makes use of native percussion instruments. The text is both Indian and Portuguese. In both this and the Harris work the chorus will be that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

Since the word symphony has been loosely applied by Mahler and Stravinsky, Roy Harris is probably entitled to call his five American folk-song settings, plus two instrumental-interludes, that or anything he chooses. What is more important is that one distinguished American critic, Herbert Elwell of Cleveland, has found the music to be "totally and overpoweringly magnificent in its rich outpouring of lyricism." Since his return from his winter vacation, Dr. Koussevitzky's programmes have been spectacularly rich in interest. Besides the above numbers, we are to hear this week the most formidable of piano concertos, the Second of Brahms, with Leonard Shure as the soloist. Last fall the New York Philharmonic Symphony offered the same piece, with Mr. Serkin as the pianist. Mr. Serkin, by the way, will play

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 17 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY

One of Haydn's numerous symphonies—No. 88, in G major—is at the top of the list for the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Metropolitan Theatre tomorrow night. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky returns to conduct, after a two-concert interval.

No. 88, one of the Paris symphonies, was written in 1787. It begins with an adagio introduction, which gives way to an allegro. The three other movements are marked largo, menuetto, and allegro con spirito.

The celebrated "Leonore No. 3" will follow, the best-known of the four overtures Beethoven wrote, or rewrote, for his opera, "Fidelio." It appears the Leonore No. 3" is a revision of "Leonore No. 2" and was used when the opera, which had been withdrawn, was produced again in 1806. The overture is a favorite with concert audiences.

Ravel's "Mother Goose Suite," first written as piano pieces for children, and later orchestrated for ballet and then revised for concert, will be played, and the Tchaikovsky overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet," will end the program.

G. Y. L.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1941

87

Musicians' View of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky

Famed Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the first time in his 17 years as conductor of renowned orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky permitted himself to be photographed in action, not as the audience sees him but as he appears to the musicians themselves. The rare pictures were taken during special hour-long concert arranged for The Associated Press following regular program at Symphony Hall in Boston. —AP photos

Upper left . . . "SOSTENUTO": looking over heads of first violins, he signifies to double basses to sustain and give full body to a phrase.

Upper right: "EXPRESSIVO": expressively, as if the music had carried him from the earth, he brings one of the movements to a close.

Above . . . AFTER TAKING HIS PLACE ON THE PODIUM, Dr. Koussevitsky stands motionless facing the orchestra until every member is ready. Then quickly taking the baton, he raises both hands, pauses an instant, and brings both of them down for the start.

Above . . . "ATTAQUE": wheeling, Dr. Koussevitsky gives "attack forte" to trombones and kettle drums with baton, and with his left hand indicates volume of tone for rest of orchestra.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 23 1941

Music and Musicians

By JOHN TEBBEL

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony performed a program of what might be termed "popular works" here last week. They were performed well and it was a privilege, as it always is, to hear so distinguished a combination of talents.

I don't mean to appear ungrateful and am only reporting the reactions of other people as well as my own—but why do the Providence programs almost invariably consist of more or less standard music?

At the concerts in Boston last week Dr. Koussevitzky offered new works by Roy Harris and Villa-Lobos, and the second piano concerto of Brahms. Brahms may be standard but at least that particular concerto is not played to death as the Beethoven symphonies are every season. I don't mean to say that we should be denied Koussevitzky interpretations of the great masterworks, but at the same time it is certainly wearing to hear one every program with nothing to balance except music almost equally familiar to regular concert-goers.

Assuming that the Providence audience feels the same way—and perhaps it doesn't at all—I think a sufficient show of hands might persuade Dr. Koussevitzky to alter his Providence program-making next season. After all, he wants to play what people want to hear.

◈ ◈ ◈

And "what people want to hear" is a debatable question. Possibly last week's audience was satisfied with the pleasantries of Haydn, the dramatic gesturings of a Beethoven overture and second-rate samples of Ravel and Tschaikowsky. Possibly the orchestra's expert performance of these items, with the exception of Ravel, compensated for all things else. I don't know. I do know that this has been a season thus far without any new music, without a single soloist, with programs generally on a music appreciation hour level, and with one guest conductor whose work is most charitably remembered for its earnestness.

◈ ◈ ◈

That man Shostakovich moves faster than the human eye can follow. Even while Koussevitzky tries to make the Boston critics believe the Russian's fifth symphony is great music, his sixth symphony has been introduced in Philadelphia and now, from Moscow, comes word from the composer himself that the seventh symphony is nearly completed. Hopes to have it finished by next spring. Meanwhile, he has finished a quintet yet to be heard in America.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 16 1941

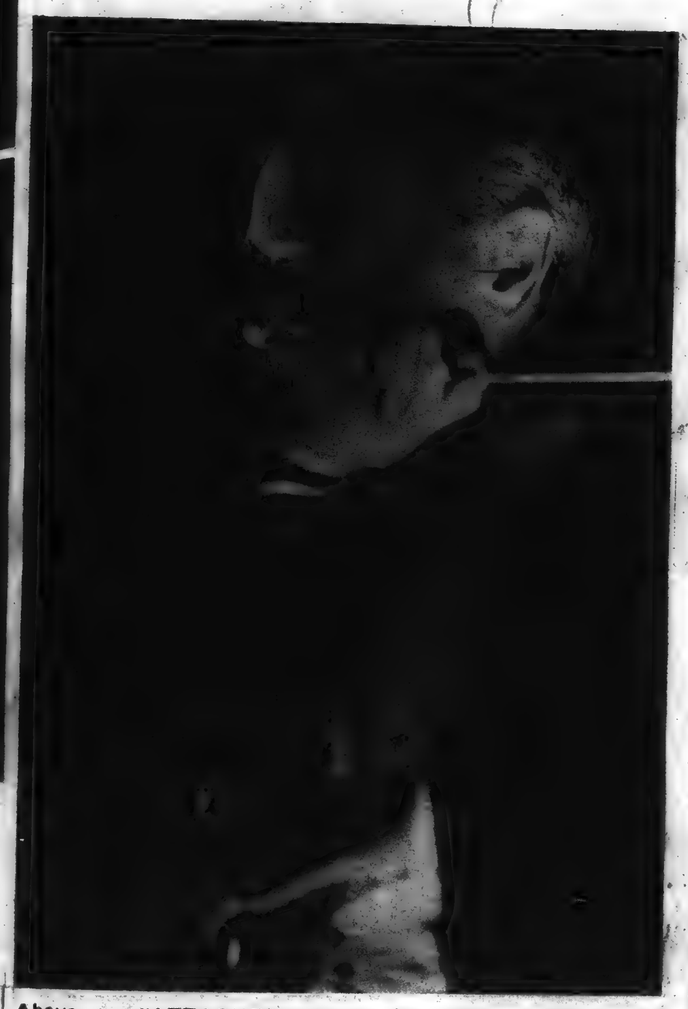
Musicians' View of Dr. Serge Koussevitsky

Famed Conductor of Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the first time in his 17 years as conductor of renowned orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky permitted himself to be photographed in action, not as the audience sees him but as he appears to the musicians themselves. The rare pictures were taken during special hour-long concert arranged for The Associated Press following regular program at Symphony Hall in Boston. —AP photos

Upper left . . . "SOSTENUTO": looking over heads of first violins, he signifies to double basses to sustain and give full body to a phrase.

Upper right: "EXPRESSIVO": expressively, as if the music had carried him from the earth, he brings one of the movements to a close.



Above . . . AFTER TAKING HIS PLACE ON THE PODIUM, Dr. Koussevitsky stands motionless facing the orchestra until every member is ready. Then quickly taking the baton, he raises both hands, pauses an instant, and brings both of them down for the start.

Above . . . "ATTAQUE": wheeling, Dr. Koussevitsky gives "attack forte" to trombones and kettle drums with baton, and with his left hand indicates volume of tone for rest of orchestra.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
FEB 23 1941

Music and Musicians

By JOHN TERBEL

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY and the Boston Symphony performed a program of what might be termed "popular works" here last week. They were performed well and it was a privilege, as it always is, to hear so distinguished a combination of talents.

I don't mean to appear ungrateful and am only reporting the reactions of other people as well as my own—but why do the Providence programs almost invariably consist of more or less standard music?

At the concerts in Boston last week Dr. Koussevitzky offered new works by Roy Harris and Villa-Lobos, and the second piano concerto of Brahms. Brahms may be standard but at least that particular concerto is not played to death as the Beethoven symphonies are every season. I don't mean to say that we should be denied Koussevitzky interpretations of the great masterworks, but at the same time it is certainly wearing to hear one every program with nothing to balance except music almost equally familiar to regular concert-goers.

Assuming that the Providence audience feels the same way—and perhaps it doesn't at all—I think a sufficient show of hands might persuade Dr. Koussevitzky to alter his Providence program-making next season. After all, he wants to play what people want to hear.

◆ ◆ ◆

And "what people want to hear" is a debatable question. Possibly last week's audience was satisfied with the pleasantries of Haydn, the dramatic gesturings of a Beethoven overture and second-rate samples of Ravel and Tschaikowsky. Possibly the orchestra's expert performance of these items, with the exception of Ravel, compensated for all things else. I don't know. I do know that this has been a season thus far without any new music, without a single soloist, with programs generally on a music appreciation hour level, and with one guest conductor whose work is most charitably remembered for its earnestness.

◆ ◆ ◆

That man Shostakovich moves faster than the human eye can follow. Even while Koussevitsky tries to make the Boston critics believe the Russian's fifth symphony is great music, his sixth symphony has been introduced in Philadelphia and now, from Moscow, comes word from the composer himself that the seventh symphony is nearly completed. Hopes to have it finished by next spring. Meanwhile, he has finished a quintet yet to be heard in America.

Two Novelties for Symphony Concerts

Dr. Koussevitzky to Conduct Harris and Villa-Lobos Works

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Out of the kindness of his heart, and from his interest in New World musical effort, Serge Koussevitzky brings out a rather large work for voices and orchestra by Roy Harris, to represent North America, and a smallish one of the same description by H. Villa-Lobos, to represent South America, at the Boston Symphony Concerts this week. Dr. Koussevitzky's zeal for the modern cause remains as lively as when he first took interest in the strivings of his former fellow-countryman, Igor Stravinsky. He has always accepted the idea that art, like any other activity, goes ahead; and he has shown the same respect for composers of the United States, since taking up residence and citizenship and pursuing his career of conducting here, that he showed for those of Russia at the time of his starting out.

He has gone so far as to recommend that orchestral audiences, eastern and western, take more notice of music being written right in their midst, and he has backed up his recommendation by regularly producing examples of output which he thought bore marks of craftsmanship and expressed native feeling and aspiration. Quite in line, then, comes preparation of Harris' "Folk Song" Symphony by his instrumentalists and a group of singers.

* * *

There you have an American scene right off—something like an oratorio society's festival; and still, that is only outward appearance. More fancifully speaking, what you have is the band in the park or on the village green, and the people gathered about the stand to hear. But since this is art and therefore an idealization of the matter, the town band assumes the shape and dignity of an orchestra, while the village, instead of passively meditating, thinks out loud and itself makes the music.

Now as audience out in the chairs of floor and balconies, we must take the thing home to our imaginations and avoid a too realistic attitude. That which the men and women on the platform sing might be called old brass-band medley, if we wanted to believe so—from "When Johnny Comes Marching Home" to "The Girl I Left Behind Me,"—five tunes, all told. The tunes are treated, however, in the symphony writer's way, which happens to be business about which the bandmasters and the arrangers of days gone knew nothing.

* * *

Indeed, in almost astounding fashion, American composers have appropriated and applied the symphonic methods of European masters. Nor should their product be regarded as merely college-educated jazz. Their skill is different altogether from that of dance-hall orchestrators, different from the syncopated sleight of hand that has amused us. It stands for art, let us not forget, though about its final value and its power of survival, nobody can yet say.

Fair chance, meantime, in Boston for the "Folk Song" Symphony, which Dr. Koussevitzky champions; and fair chance, also, for a work that dates some 10 years back of this one, the "Choros" No. 10 of the Brazilian composer, Mr. Villa-Lobos. Here, again, we have singers and instrumentalists in ensemble, and we have a composer, furthermore, who was early at tackling the song-symphony form in a modern way. His singers at once furnish melody and accompaniment, and the orchestra adds comment of its own—the whole going to a very complicated scheme of rhythm. The principal air, which is portioned off to the various groups of voices, the sopranos now carrying a strain, now the basses and baritones picking up one, and now the contraltos taking their turn, is written to words of Catullo Cearence. These shape up into an amatory complaint in the Portuguese literary tradition, a heartbreak lyric that carries echoes from away back to the beginnings of poetry.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LOWELL, MASS.
SUNDAY TELEGRAM
FEB 16 1941

SYMPHONY PROGRAM FOR THIS WEEK

The Second Piano Concerto in B flat major by Brahms with Leonard Shure as the soloist. Roy Harris' new "Folk-Song Symphony," and the "Chords No. 10" by Hector Villa-Lebos, the prominent Brazilian composer, (the last two pieces to have their first hearing in Boston), will constitute the interesting program which Serge Koussevitzky has announced for the next pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra to be given in Symphony hall next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening.

Leonard Shure is to make his second appearance as soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at his Friday and Saturday concerts.

The numbers by Harris and Villa-Lobos each call for mixed chorus. The Cecelia Society, prepared by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler, will join the Orchestra for these numbers.

The Symphony of Roy Harris is in seven movements, two of them instrumental with themes in the style of American fiddle tunes, while the remaining five are derived from popular songs of our American mountains, prairies or cotton fields. They are: "When Johnny Comes Marching Home": "Oh Bury me not on the Lone Prairie"; "I am Goin' away for to Stay a Little While"; "De Trumpet Sounds it in my Soul"; and "The Gal I left Behind Me."

The "Choros No. 10" is one of fourteen works by Villa-Lobos which bear this generic title and is one of the few which actually uses a chorus. It is based, as is most of the music of Villa-Lobos, on characteristic resilient rhythms and melodies, with a text using both the native Indian and Portuguese words. Characteristic Brazilian percussive instruments are called for in the score.

Feb 24
THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR,

Novelties at the Symphony Concerts

Harris Folk-Song Symphony, Villa-Lobos Work Are Heard

By L. A. Sloper

Dr. Koussevitzky received an especially warm welcome when he appeared Friday afternoon on the platform of Symphony Hall; evidently an expression of the audience's pleasure in having him now for a fellow citizen as well as a musical preceptor—a fellow citizen who has already proved his exceptional usefulness by establishing in his adoptive city and country a first line of defense for artistic values in a shaken world.

For the sixteenth program of the season he had chosen an American Folk-Song Symphony for Orchestra and Chorus by Roy Harris; a South American work, Chôros No. 10, "Rasga o coraçäo," by Heitor Villa-Lobos, and the Second Piano Concerto of Brahms, in B flat. The first two of these compositions were new to these concerts, and Villa-Lobos was represented for the first time on these programs. The piano soloist was Leonard Shure, and the orchestra was assisted also by the Cecilia Society Chorus, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor.

The first half of this program had the effect of reviving some of the excitements of the musical 'twenties, when almost every concert of the Boston Orchestra provided a new work in the modern idiom, and when operas of similiar novelty were being produced in Philadelphia, Cleveland, and New York. Not all those experimental works were destined for survival; nor does their musical language easily shock the listener of today. The utmost seems to have been done in harmonic extravagance and rhythmic violence, and we look through these outer semblances into the composer's musical thought and structural foundations.

* * *

The Chôros No. 10 of Villa-Lobos was actually written in the middle 'twenties. If we had heard it then, it would doubtless have had on us much the same effect as the "Sept, Ils Sont Sept" of Prokofieff, which burst upon our ears at that time. Probably we should have been swept off our musical feet. Now, however, we can endure such bombardments with relative calm.

Nevertheless, the Chôros No. 10 is an assault upon the senses even today. It conveys, by means of dissonance, persistently monotonous rhythms, and exotic sounds produced by instruments peculiar to Brazil a sense of primitive violence, just as the composer must have intended it to do. He himself explains in the score that this is "a new form of musical composition in which are synthesized the different modalities of Brazilian, Indian, and popular music." Not so much a new form, I should say, as an employment of materials unfamiliar to northern ears. By the same token, the total result of this employment would doubtless be more acceptable, as a "Serenade," to natives of Brazil than to residents of North America. For that very reason, it is well that we should hear Chôros No. 10. Dr. Koussevitzky has done us a service by introducing it.

Mr. Harris' Folk-Song Symphony is designed to further his campaign for a broadening of the base of audience receptivity in America. He wants more people to listen to music as something that belongs to them. In his own words, he intends this work "to bring about a cultural co-operation and understanding between the high school, college, and community choruses of our cities with their symphony orchestras."

* * *

Consequently the work should be judged not as a symphony, but as musical propaganda. For naturally it is difficult to compose a choral piece for such a purpose and at the same time place artistic considerations first. Beethoven tried something of the sort in the Ninth Symphony, and for many of us the choral movement does not come up to the other three. Ernest Bloch made another attempt in his Epic Rhapsody, "America," but without complete success.

Mr. Harris' work is in seven movements, of which two are orchestral interludes and the other five call on chorus and orchestra. The opening "Welcome Party" uses "When Johnny Comes Marching Home." Other choral movements employ cowboy songs, a mountaineer's love song, a negro religious song, and a soldier's song. The instrumental interludes are based on dance tunes.

Mr. Harris has not entirely succeeded in reconciling the elements of popular song and symphonic composition. The first movement is lively, but has little musical interest. The sections employing the cowboy and the mountain songs are excessively sentimental, suggesting irresistibly a musical comedy background. The Negro Fantasy and the Finale have a greater musical interest, but, I should think, less popular appeal. In fact, the choruses here are sufficiently intricate to tax the capacities of the average choir. The Cecilia Society covered itself with glory in these and in the even more difficult Villa-Lobos choruses. It is not easy to believe that their success could be readily duplicated by school or community choruses which have no Fiedler to train nor Koussevitzky to conduct them. The audience Friday, however, was generous in its applause for the Folk-Song Symphony (Mr. Harris was present to make his bow) and for the Chôros No. 10, too.

The audience also applauded warmly the performance of the Concerto. Mr. Shure, who had previously played the Brahms First Concerto and the Beethoven Fifth with this orchestra, brought to the Brahms Second the same solid technique and the same Schnabelian style.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 16th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The soloist was Leonard Shure, pianist; and the Cecilia Society Chorus, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, assisted. The program was as follows:

Roy Harris
Folk-Song Symphony for orchestra and chorus
Villa-Lobos
Choros No. 10, "Rasga o coracao," for chorus and orchestra
Brahms
Piano Concerto No. 2 in B flat major Op. 83

We fear that the cash customers, who are rather leery of choruses at symphony concerts anyway, will not be particularly disposed in their favor after listening to yesterday's new works for this combination. It is not that the scores themselves lacked interest or merit, but that they were not too easy for the public to absorb all at once.

Mr. Harris' Folk-Song Symphony is a disappointment for those of us who looked for more in the manner of his Third Symphony. The best parts of it are the two dance interludes, the first especially, and occasional ideas in the choral movements. For us the trouble lay in the fact that the treatment of these familiar tunes was either too common-place or too strained.

For example, there is much to interest the listener in the Negro Fantasy movement. Bearing the program in mind we can see what Mr. Harris is aiming at, but the result gives the impression of forcing the issue. For all Mr. Harris' prolificity he seldom lets us feel that he is writing naturally. Furthermore, to our taste the Western Cowboy and Mountaineer Love Songs sections were too sentimental and too prolonged.

Yet there were many happy touches in the orchestra, and the dance movements were certainly some compensation. The work seemed ably projected under Mr. Koussevitzky's direction. The composer was on hand to acknowledge the applause.

The Villa-Lobos No. 10 is a much more original work than the Harris Symphony. (Comparisons are, we fear, under the circumstances inevitable.) It is, on the other hand, not so pleasant to listen to and it rather aggressively eschews charm. But you feel that the composer has got something that he urgently wants to say and at the end you gather that he has successfully said it.

We doubt if Choros No. 10 would bear much repetition. The orchestration is extremely bizarre. Not only are a lot of exotic instruments imported for the performance, but the regular instruments are used in a startling fashion. The rhythmic reiteration would probably get on the nerves if the work were played too much; but there is probably little danger of that. As a novelty yesterday afternoon we found it quite fascinating. Mr. Koussevitzky brought Mr. Fiedler out for applause for his work in training the Cecilia Society Chorus.

The best part of the concert, though, when all is said, was Mr. Shure's performance of the Brahms 2nd Piano Concerto. We have not been too fortunate in recent performances of this splendid work. Neither the interpretation by Mr. Serkin and the Philharmonic this season nor that by Mr. Rubinstein and our own orchestra two years ago was wholly satisfactory.

Mr. Shure yesterday brilliantly redressed the balance. As a pianist he is, of course, well known in Boston and he has always been an interesting musician. His playing yesterday was perhaps the highest achievement of his career so far. It was an interpretation with a great sense for the outlines of the music. The solo part had exceptional virility, and the orchestral part under Mr. Koussevitzky fitted it beautifully. Mr. Koussevitzky likes to take the slow movement as though it were meant to be heard in church, but that is our only reservation in a very fine piece of work from all hands.

Shure Symphony Soloist

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES

FEB 24 1941

Leonard Shure Soloist with Symphony

Leonard Shure, pianist, who will appear in the Beethoven festival to be given starting next month by the Hartford Symphony Society, was soloist with the Boston Symphony in the Massachusetts capital over the weekend.

The program, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, presented two first performances at the orchestra's concerts. First was the Roy Harris Folk-Song Symphony for Orchestra and Chorus with the Cecilia Society Chorus, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, assisting. The second was the Villa-Lobos Choros, No. 10, "Rasga o coração," in which the Cecilia chorus also took part.

Mr. Shure was heard in the concluding number, the Brahms Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 83.

The program for this Friday evening and Saturday afternoon by the orchestra will consist of the Mahler Symphony No. 9, the Liadov "Enchanted Lake," Op. 62, and "Baba-Yaga," Op. 56, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34.

Leonard Shure, pianist, who will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky conducted at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, the first Boston performance of two orchestral-choral scores: Folk-Song Symphony by Roy Harris, and the Choros No. 10, "Rasga-Coracab" by the Brazilian Hector Villa Lobos. The remaining number of the program was Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, in which Leonard Shure was the soloist. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the Harris and Villa-Lobs.

The academic purists are probably going to argue about Mr. Harris' Folk-Song Symphony: whether it is really a symphony, whether the tunes—"When Johnny Cames Marching Home," "O Bury Me Not On the Lone Prairie," "The Dying Cowboy," "I'm Goin' Away For to Stay a Little While," "De Trumpet Sounds It In My Soul" and "The Gal I Left Behind Me"—which are the choral basis of the work, are really folk-song. Let them argue! It makes little difference either way. I take the view that, formally, the work is not a symphony in the organic sense; the tunes are not used thematically with relation between the seven movements. In fact, each movement could be played by itself as a concert piece without violating the whole. As to the folk-song question, Americans have no great literature of familiar home music handed down generation after another, as the Europeans do, except for certain sections of the country. Such tunes as these come as reasonably near to being folk-song as anything, so why not call them that?

The Folk-Song Symphony is laid out symmetrically, with two orchestral interludes of dance tunes as contrast for the choral sections. In a general way, it may be claimed that Mr. Harris has the chorus sing each song, and then the tune is worked into a sort of free fantasy. The style ranges from the hurly-burly of the opening, the Negro Fantasy and the Finale, to the sweet banality of the Western Cowboy episode, where the high strings play juicy chords above the voices, a conventional way of making you think of vast space like the prairies. The Mountaineer Love Song movement is also sweet and banal.

Welcome Party, Negro Fantasy and Finale are by far the best parts because they are vulgar in the sense that they are earthy and uninhibited, because the harmony has a spicy dissonance about it, and the orchestra cuts loose in a species of symphonic jam session. The other movements are an over-decorated treatment of simple music, and as a result they are merely commonplace.

Mr. Harris was present and bowed from the stage.

A choros, broadly speaking, is a serenade. Villa-Lobos wrote this one for chorus and immense orchestra containing two pianos and three Brazilian percussion instruments. The text is a mixture of Portuguese and Brazilian-Indian.

Music like this needs more space and time for careful consideration than are possible in a newspaper review, if it is to be adequately described. All the European standards of comparison are useless, for here you have a completely exotic sort of expression. Certainly it is folkish, also primitive and tribal, at the same time devilishly ingenious in the technic of writing. The choral portion sounds relatively simple, with a strong rhythmic "oom-pah" underlying practically all of it. More than likely there are subtle effects in the orchestra swallowed up in the powerful surge of tone and rhythm.

One hopes Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Choros later in the season. Another hearing is deserved. For the present, Villa-Lobos must be credited with creation of an astonishingly vital and exciting score.

Little space is left for Mr. Shure's performance of Brahms' great masterpiece. He made the score vivid, tautly emotional, yet without distortion. This was the performance of a talented young artist, innocent of the Olympian breadth or the color range of a Schnabel or Gabrilovitch at middle age, but in a youthful way valid and moving. Mr. Shure—together with Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra—merited the ovation that followed. Mr. Fiedler, too, was warmly applauded when he appeared on the stage after Villa-Lobos' work.

C. W. D.

KOUSSEVITZKY PAYS TRIBUTE

North, South America Noted in Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At this week's Symphony Concerts Dr. Koussevitzky is celebrating his newly-acquired citizenship with the first Boston performances of a very American piece, Roy Harris' Folk-Song Symphony for orchestra and chorus.

After this homage to North America the programme makes a bow in the direction of South America with Villa-Lobos' Choros No. 10, "Rasga o coracao," also for chorus and orchestra and also new to Boston. The remainder of a long programme falls to Brahms' Second Pianoforte Concerto, with Leonard Shure as the soloist. The chorus is that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

When it comes to folksongs and folk-music there is an undeniable appeal in the exotic. The American listener yesterday might well have been more intrigued with the Brazilian primitiveness (it amounts almost to savagery) of Villa-Lobos' Choros; and, conversely, if the two pieces were presented in Rio the Brazilian listener might find in our folk tunes a fascination which some of us here do not feel, by reason of their very familiarity.

According to the programme notes, Mr. Harris' purpose in writing this so-called symphony was "to bring about a cultural co-operation and understanding between the high school, college, and community choruses of our cities with their symphony orchestras." The work, therefore, is not one of great pretentions and the results achieved, while sometimes entertaining and diverting, are modest. Of the five folk-song settings, "When Johnny Comes Marching Home"; "Western Cowboy," (two songs joined); the "Mountaineer Love Song"; the "Negro Fantasy," "De Trumpet Sounds It in My Soul"; and another cowboy song, "If Even I Travel This Road Again," the last two are by far the most successful from an artistic point of view. Here with only a few lines of text Mr. Harris is more or less forced to some musical development that lifts his work into the sphere of composition. The other settings are that, and no more; merely a job of re-harmonization, choral arrangement and orchestration. There are two dance interludes, one for strings and percussion, one for full orchestra, which are mildly amusing. The chorus acquitted itself well in a not too difficult task and there was much applause for Mr. Harris who was present.

The choral parts in Villa-Lobos', to us, singular piece, are of themselves not too complicated, but the singers have no small task keeping their heads in the midst of the orchestral melee which surrounds them. There is much use of syncopation, there are many strident sonorotiès and there is a formidable array of percussion intruments, both cosmopolitan and indigenously Brazilian. The effect of the whole, despite a certain calculated monotony, is quite exciting. Mr. Fiedler received his well-deserved share of the applause.

For this unregenerate reviewer the hearing of Brahms' Piano Concerto is a bit of an ordeal and he did not find yesterday's performance one to relieve, to any great degree, the tedium that the piece inspires. There was some appropriate lightness in the Finale, the most engaging movement, and some poetry in the Andante. Mr. Shure, who at least has a formidable technique, was enthusiastically applauded.

MUSIC

Symphonic Novelties

Roy Harris Folk-Song Symphony, Villa-Lobos Tenth Choros Performed by Boston Symphony

By EDWARD DOWNES

Whether you like or dislike the Folk-Song Symphony of Roy Harris which was given its first local performances by the Boston Symphony last Friday and Saturday, there is no gainsaying its extraordinary vitality or the strongly individual style of the composer. It is a large and sprawling work in seven movements, five of them with chorus. Much of it is imaginative and forceful; much of it is trite or banal. For a special reason, Mr. Harris has given his chorus length versions to sing of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," "O Bury Me Not on the Lone Prairie," "The Dying Cowboy," "I'm Goin' Away for to Stay a Little While," "De Trumpet Sounds It in My Soul," and "The Gal I Left Behind Me," The reason is that the work is intended as an artistic meeting ground for high-school or college choruses and the symphony orchestras of our great cities.

This, of course, is a laudable intention, but one which may conceivably be ham-strung by the amount of preparation which must go into a composition of such size and complexity. And from the symphonic or from the purely artistic point of view the results are problematic. There is little, indeed, in this Folk-Song Symphony to remind you of a symphony outside of the title.

Without being able to explain why, I find Roy Harris's harmonic speech extremely attractive. It is raw, intentionally so, and it has not all the variety it may one day acquire, but it has a native American pungency and a style of its own.

Among the most successful sections of the Folk-Song Symphony seemed, after a second hearing, the lively and imaginative interlude for strings and percussion on dance tunes and the Negro fantasy on "De Trumpet Sounds It in My Soul." Mr. Harris was present to acknowledge applause.

Villa-Lobos Premiere

There was another provocative first performance on Dr. Koussevitzky's program the Choros No. 10 "Rasga o coracao" of Villa-Lobos. It too has tremendous vitality, and a specifically South American exoticism. Shorter, more effective, and more immediately ingratiating than the Harris, it has irresistible rythmic drive and is highly spiced with standard symphonic and native South-American percussion instruments. At second hearing it is difficult to say whether the strong flavor of this musical dish is due to its Brazilian, Indian and Portuguese ingredients, or to Villa-Lobos' personal touch. Perhaps to both. At any rate it is a piece worth hearing again, and it was warmly applauded.

The Cecilia Society Chorus had been prepared for both the Harris and the Villa-Lobos by Arthur Fiedler, who shared with Dr. Koussevitzky in the audience's acclaim.

After the intermission came a magnificent performance of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto in B flat major with Leonard Shure as soloist. The splendor of the interpretation came chiefly from Koussevitzky and his men. Mr. Shure has a formidable technique and no little verve, but his tone was hard in the big passages. Neither in depth of feeling nor subtlety of expression did he equal the performance of the orchestra. He was at his best in bravoura passages and in the final Allegretto grazioso.

E. D.

Youth Orchestra In Brilliant Debut

One of the most promising signs of the musical times anywhere this season was the debut of the Massachusetts National Youth Administration Orchestra last night in Jordan Hall under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. This group of boys and girls of 17 to 24 years have been working as a unit for only three months, yet they performed difficult works of Mozart, Beethoven, Bruch and Ravel with a temperament, a golden sonority and a technical aplomb that would put to shame many an established professional orchestra.

The chief works of the evening were Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" as a curtain raiser and Ravel's Bolero as a climax of orchestral virtuosity.

The group of strings has not only body and warmth, but delicacy and accuracy as well. Mr. Fiedler, his colleague, Alexander Thiede, and assistant, George Hoyen, have been first rate drill-masters, for the orchestra is beautifully integrated — far beyond what one has a right to expect after three months' practice, and the ensemble as a whole has extraordinary transparency and glow.

The soloist in the Bruch Concerto was Sheldon Rotenburg, the concertmaster, who did an excellent piece of work, well schooled, with fine emotional control and a firm tone.

The solo instruments had their innings in the "Bolero" and removed any lingering doubts that here is another symphony orchestra which must be reckoned with in Boston. Or rather, it should be reckoned with throughout the State, for if it is possible to take these young people afield, there should be a welcoming public for them in other Massachusetts cities.

Before the second half of the concert, State Youth Administrator John L. Donovan, Jr., welcomed the audience briefly, recalling that abroad, youth had been in the forefront of Nazi and Fascist developments, while here the National Youth Administration presents "youth on the march, in what we are proud to call 'the American way.'"

E. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM

TUFTS WEEKLY
TUFTS COLLEGE, MASS
2/20/41

Among the concerts for the week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, presents its sixteenth program with two new scores. "The Folk Songs", based on various American popular songs more or less folkish in character, such as "Bury Me Not on The Lone Prairie", and "The Gal I Left Behind", is by the American composer Roy Harris. This concert is on Friday afternoon at 2:30 and on Saturday night at 8:15 at Symphony Hall.

Shure Symphony Soloist

This Clipping From
HARTFORD, CONN.
TIMES
FEB 24 1941

Leonard Shure Soloist with Symphony

Leonard Shure, pianist, who will appear in the Beethoven festival to be given starting next month by the Hartford Symphony Society, was soloist with the Boston Symphony in the Massachusetts capital over the weekend.

The program, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, presented two first performances at the orchestra's concerts. First was the Roy Harris Folk-Song Symphony for Orchestra and Chorus with the Cecilia Society Chorus, of which Arthur Fiedler is conductor, assisting. The second was the Villa-Lobos Choros, No. 10, "Rasga o coraçäo," in which the Cecilia chorus also took part.

Mr. Shure was heard in the concluding number, the Brahms Concerto for Pianoforte No. 2 in B flat major, Op. 83.

The program for this Friday evening and Saturday afternoon by the orchestra will consist of the Mahler Symphony No. 9, the Liadov "Enchanted Lake," Op. 62, and "Baba-Yaga," Op. 56, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Op. 34.

Leonard Shure, pianist, who will be the soloist in Brahms' Second Concerto with the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Friday afternoon and Saturday evening concerts this week.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL
Boston Symphony Orchestra

Serge Koussevitzky conducted at the Boston Symphony concert yesterday afternoon, the first Boston performance of two orchestral-choral scores: Folk-Song Symphony by Roy Harris, and the Choros No. 10, "Rasga-Coracab" by the Brazilian Hector Villa Lobos. The remaining number of the program was Brahms' Second Piano Concerto, in which Leonard Shure was the soloist. The Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the Harris and Villa-Lobs.

The academic purists are probably going to argue about Mr. Harris' Folk-Song Symphony: whether it is really a symphony, whether the tunes—"When Johnny Comes Marching Home," "O Bury Me Not On the Lone Prairie," "The Dying Cowboy," "I'm Goin' Away For to Stay a Little While," "De Trumpet Sounds It In My Soul" and "The Gal I Left Behind Me"—which are the choral basis of the work, are really folk-song. Let them argue! It makes little difference either way. I take the view that, formally, the work is not a symphony in the organic sense; the tunes are not used thematically with relation between the seven movements. In fact, each movement could be played by itself as a concert piece without violating the whole. As to the folk-song question, Americans have no great literature of familiar home music handed down generation after another, as the Europeans do, except for certain sections of the country. Such tunes as these come as reasonably near to being folk-song as anything, so why not call them that?

The Folk-Song Symphony is laid out symmetrically, with two orchestral interludes of dance tunes as contrast for the choral sections. In a general way, it may be claimed that Mr. Harris has the chorus sing each song, and then the tune is worked into a sort of free fantasy. The style ranges from the hurly-burly of the opening, the Negro Fantasy and the Finale, to the sweet banality of the Western Cowboy episode, where the high strings play juicy chords above the voices, a conventional way of making you think of vast space like the prairies. The Mountaineer Love Song movement is also sweet and banal.

Welcome Party, Negro Fantasy and Finale are by far the best parts because they are vulgar in the sense that they are earthy and uninhibited, because the harmony has a spicy dissonance about it, and the orchestra cuts loose in a species of symphonic jam session. The other movements are an over-decorated treatment of simple music, and as a result they are merely commonplace.

Mr. Harris was present and bowed from the stage.

A choros, broadly speaking, is a serenade. Villa-Lobos wrote this one for chorus and immense orchestra containing two pianos and three Brazilian percussion instruments. The text is a mixture of Portuguese and Brazilian-Indian.

Music like this needs more space and time for careful consideration than are possible in a newspaper review, if it is to be adequately described. All the European standards of comparison are useless, for here you have a completely exotic sort of expression. Certainly it is folkish, also primitive and tribal, at the same time devilishly ingenious in the technic of writing. The choral portion sounds relatively simple, with a strong rhythmic "oom-pah" underlying practically all of it. More than likely there are subtle effects in the orchestra swallowed up in the powerful surge of tone and rhythm.

One hopes Mr. Koussevitzky will repeat the Choros later in the season. Another hearing is deserved. For the present, Villa-Lobos must be credited with creation of an astonishingly vital and exciting score.

Little space is left for Mr. Shure's performance of Brahms' great masterpiece. He made the score vivid, tautly emotional, yet without distortion. This was the performance of a talented young artist, innocent of the Olympian breadth or the color range of a Schnabel or Gabrilovitch at middle age, but in a youthful way valid and moving. Mr. Shure—together with Mr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra—merited the ovation that followed. Mr. Fiedler, too, was warmly applauded when he appeared on the stage after Villa-Lobos' work.

C. W. D.

KOUSSEVITZKY PAYS TRIBUTE

North, South America Noted in Programme

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

At this week's Symphony Concerts Dr. Koussevitzky is celebrating his newly-acquired citizenship with the first Boston performances of a very American piece, Roy Harris' Folk-Song Symphony for orchestra and chorus.

After this homage to North America the programme makes a bow in the direction of South America with Villa-Lobos' Choros No. 10, "Rasga o coracao," also for chorus and orchestra and also new to Boston. The remainder of a long programme falls to Brahms' Second Pianoforte Concerto, with Leonard Shure as the soloist. The chorus is that of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

When it comes to folksongs and folk-music there is an undeniable appeal in the exotic. The American listener yesterday might well have been more intrigued with the Brazilian primitiveness (it amounts almost to savagery) of Villa-Lobos' Choros; and, conversely, if the two pieces were presented in Rio the Brazilian listener might find in our folk tunes a fascination which some of us here do not feel, by reason of their very familiarity.

According to the programme notes, Mr. Harris' purpose in writing this so-called symphony was "to bring about a cultural co-operation and understanding between the high school, college, and community choruses of our cities with their symphony orchestras." The work, therefore, is not one of great pretentions and the results achieved, while sometimes entertaining and diverting, are modest. Of the five folk-song settings, "When Johnny Comes Marching Home"; "Western Cowboy," (two songs joined); the "Mountaineer Love Song"; the "Negro Fantasy," "De Trumpet Sounds It in My Soul"; and another cowboy song, "If Even I Travel This Road Again," the last two are by far the most successful from an artistic point of view. Here with only a few lines of text Mr. Harris is more or less forced to some musical development that lifts his work into the sphere of composition. The other settings are that, and no more; merely a job of re-harmonization, choral arrangement and orchestration. There are two dance interludes, one for strings and percussion, one for full orchestra, which are mildly amusing. The chorus acquitted itself well in a not too difficult task and there was much applause for Mr. Harris who was present.

The choral parts in Villa-Lobos', to us, singular piece, are of themselves not too complicated, but the singers have no small task keeping their heads in the midst of the orchestral melee which surrounds them. There is much use of syncopation, there are many strident sonorities and there is a formidable array of percussion intruments, both cosmopolitan and indigenously Brazilian. The effect of the whole, despite a certain calculated monotony, is quite exciting. Mr. Fiedler received his well-deserved share of the applause.

For this unregenerate reviewer the hearing of Brahms' Piano Concerto is a bit of an ordeal and he did not find yesterday's performance one to relieve, to any great degree, the tedium that the piece inspires. There was some appropriate lightness in the Finale, the most engaging movement, and some poetry in the Andante. Mr. Shure, who at least has a formidable technique, was enthusiastically applauded.

MUSIC

Symphonic Novelties

Roy Harris Folk-Song Symphony, Villa-Lobos Tenth Choros Performed by Boston Symphony

By EDWARD DOWNES

Whether you like or dislike the Folk-Song Symphony of Roy Harris which was given its first local performances by the Boston Symphony last Friday and Saturday, there is no gainsaying its extraordinary vitality or the strongly individual style of the composer. It is a large and sprawling work in seven movements, five of them with chorus. Much of it is imaginative and forceful; much of it is trite or banal. For a special reason, Mr. Harris has given his chorus length versions to sing of "When Johnny Comes Marching Home," "O Bury Me Not on the Lone Prairie," "The Dying Cowboy," "I'm Goin' Away for to Stay a Little While," "De Trumpet Sounds It in My Soul," and "The Gal I Left Behind Me." The reason is that the work is intended as an artistic meeting ground for high-school or college choruses and the symphony orchestras of our great cities.

This, of course, is a laudable intention, but one which may conceivably be ham-strung by the amount of preparation which must go into a composition of such size and complexity. And from the symphonic or from the purely artistic point of view the results are problematic. There is little, indeed, in this Folk-Song Symphony to remind you of a symphony outside of the title.

Without being able to explain why, I find Roy Harris's harmonic speech extremely attractive. It is raw, intentionally so, and it has not all the variety it may one day acquire, but it has a native American pungency and a style of its own.

Among the most successful sections of the Folk-Song Symphony seemed, after a second hearing, the lively and imaginative interlude for strings and percussion on dance tunes and the Negro fantasy on "De Trumpet Sounds It in My Soul." Mr. Harris was present to acknowledge applause.

Villa-Lobos Premiere

There was another provocative first performance on Dr. Koussevitzky's program the Choros No. 10 "Rasga o coracao" of Villa-Lobos. It too has tremendous vitality, and a specifically South American exoticism. Shorter, more effective, and more immediately ingratiating than the Harris, it has irresistible rythmic drive and is highly spiced with standard symphonic and native South-American percussion instruments. At second hearing it is difficult to say whether the strong flavor of this musical dish is due to its Brazilian, Indian and Portuguese ingredients, or to Villa-Lobos' personal touch. Perhaps to both. At any rate it is a piece worth hearing again, and it was warmly applauded.

The Cecilia Society Chorus had been prepared for both the Harris and the Villa-Lobos by Arthur Fiedler, who shared with Dr. Koussevitzky in the audience's acclaim.

After the intermission came a magnificent performance of Brahms' Second Piano Concerto in B flat major with Leonard Shure as soloist. The splendor of the interpretation came chiefly from Koussevitzky and his men. Mr. Shure has a formidable technique and no little verve, but his tone was hard in the big passages. Neither in depth of feeling nor subtlety of expression did he equal the performance of the orchestra. He was at his best in bravoura passages and in the final Allegretto grazioso.

Youth Orchestra In Brilliant Debut

One of the most promising signs of the musical times anywhere this season was the debut of the Massachusetts National Youth Administration Orchestra last night in Jordan Hall under the direction of Arthur Fiedler. This group of boys and girls of 17 to 24 years have been working as a unit for only three months, yet they performed difficult works of Mozart, Beethoven, Bruch and Ravel with a temperament, a golden sonority and a technical aplomb that would put to shame many an established professional orchestra.

The chief works of the evening were Beethoven's Eighth Symphony and Bruch's G minor Violin Concerto with Mozart's Overture to "The Marriage of Figaro" as a curtain raiser and Ravel's Bolero as a climax of orchestral virtuosity.

The group of strings has not only body and warmth, but delicacy and accuracy as well. Mr. Fiedler, his colleague, Alexander Thiede, and assistant, George Hoyen, have been first rate drillmasters, for the orchestra is beautifully integrated — far beyond what one has a right to expect after three months' practice, and the ensemble as a whole has extraordinary transparency and glow.

The soloist in the Bruch Concerto was Sheldon Rotenburg, the concertmaster, who did an excellent piece of work, well schooled, with fine emotional control and a firm tone.

The solo instruments had their innings in the "Bolero" and removed any lingering doubts that here is another symphony orchestra which must be reckoned with in Boston. Or rather, it should be reckoned with throughout the State, for if it is possible to take these young people afield, there should be a welcoming public for them in other Massachusetts cities.

Before the second half of the concert, State Youth Administrator John L. Donovan, Jr., welcomed the audience briefly, recalling that abroad, youth had been in the forefront of Nazi and Fascist developments, while here the National Youth Administration presents "youth' on the march, in what we are proud to call 'the American way.'"

E. D.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
TUFTS WEEKLY
TUFTS COLLEGE, MASS
2/20/41

Among the concerts for the week, the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Serge Koussevitsky, conductor, presents its sixteenth program with two new scores. "The Folk Songs", based on various American popular songs more or less folkish in character, such as "Bury Me Not on The Lone Prairie", and "The Gal I Left Behind", is by the American composer Roy Harris. This concert is on Friday afternoon at 2:30 and on Saturday night at 8:15 at Symphony Hall.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
CITIZEN

FEB 26 1941

90

Koussevitzky to Conduct Here After Several Years' Absence

Third Orchestra's Contract Not Yet Signed—Program for Rochester's Concert Announced

TWO OF THE GREAT orchestras of the world and two first-rank conductors are assured for the next season of the Symphony Club of Central Ohio, according to announcement made today by Helen Pugh Alcorn, club manager. The orchestras are the Boston and the Philadelphia.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Serge Koussevitzky conducting, is announced for Friday evening, Dec. 12, 1941, at Memorial Hall. This will be the first time the Boston has played in Columbus in several seasons.

The Philadelphia Orchestra, which was on the current season's course, will open next season, playing on the night of Monday, Oct. 27, 1941. The conductor, who is also the musical director of this brilliant organization, will be Eugene Ormandy.

There will be a third orchestra on the course, but it cannot be announced at this time as the contract negotiations have not yet been completed.

* * *

Sixty Seasons

This year marks the completion of 60 continuous seasons for the Boston orchestra. It was founded in 1881 by Henry L. Higginson and he continued general direction of its destinies for nearly four decades. Its conductors in the latter part of its period have included such men as Nikisch, Muck, Rabaud, Monteux, and since 1924, the renowned and highly esteemed Koussevitzky, who had previously registered triumphs in Russia and in Paris. In the years that he has been with the orchestra he has brought to it "a tonal richness, a brilliance of virtuosity and a warmth of response quite beyond compare."

* * *

Demand Philadelphia

The Philadelphia Orchestra came into its own some years when Leopold Stokowski, who had often been heard in Columbus with the Cincinnati Orchestra, went on to Philadelphia to build it up to a supreme position in the orchestral world. Several seasons ago, Ormandy, who had done wonders with the Minneapolis group, was called to the podium of the Philadelphia and he is now its principal conductor, as well as the man who is generally responsible for personnel, artistic development and selection of repertoire.

It went without saying that the Philadelphia, if available, would be re-demanded for the Columbus season. There had been many calls from patrons for the Boston and its place on the course became absolutely certain, especially when it became known that the New York Philharmonic would take a less extensive tour next year than it did this season. It seems likely that the inclusion of the Boston will add much prestige to the coming season of the Symphony Club in Columbus.

* * *

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
POST

FEB 25 1941

Listening Post

By ROCKY CLARK

Boston Symphony 'Blitz' by Petrillo Parallels Radio's ASCAP Ban.

Comparable to the broadcasters' crime in ruling beloved American music off the air because it bears ASCAP copyrights is the ruling of dictator James Petrillo's musicians' union that the Boston Symphony orchestra can no longer make records produced by Victor or any other "union shop" all because the Bay State musicians, under Dr. Serge Koussevitzky's baton, have not seen fit to devote a percentage of their earnings to union fees so that Mr. Petrillo can enjoy his combined salaries of $46,000 a year.

In the Boston Symphony's favor, no stronger argument could be presented than the performance of Brahms' Fourth Symphony in E Minor as contained in a newly-released Victor album, recorded before the union ruling forced Victor to drop Koussevitzky's fine aggregation from its roster. Victor's excellent recording work on this particular piece will make the album a fitting memorial to the gorgeous work of this orchestra for posterity.

That this particular work, the final Passacaglia of which is generally regarded as Brahms' greatest single movement, was chosen for Koussevitzky's last great recording before his Victor retirement is most significant. Music lovers who hear it will regard the union's action with bitter regret that they will be unable to obtain further works by this great orchestra—unless somebody starts a non-union recording company that need not listen to the decrees of Mr. Petrillo whose love for money outweighs his niggardly regard for art.

Another recent Victor release, a [illegible] of Wagner's "Meistersinger" Prelude by Leopold Stokowski and the Philadelphia Or-

This Clipping From
FORT WAYNE, IND.
NEWS-SENTINEL

FEB 27 1941

Conducting Of Koussevitzky Given Praise

Critic Commends Reading Of Johannes Brahms' Fourth Symphony.

BY WALTER A. HANSEN,
News-Sentinel Music Critic.

The concert given by the famous Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra on March 9, 1897, was a memorable event; for on that occasion Johannes Brahms, who attended in spite of the fact that he was sick unto death of an incurable disease, received a touching tribute of esteem and devotion from his fellow-citizens. His fourth and last symphony, which had been performed for the first time in 1885, was included in the program; and the audience seemed to sense that the master would not live much longer. "A storm of applause broke out at the end of the first movement," writes his biographer, Florence May, "not to be quieted until the composer . . . showed himself to the audience. The demonstration was renewed after the second and third movements, and an extraordinary scene followed the conclusion of the work. The applauding, shouting house, its gaze riveted upon the figure standing in the balcony, so familiar and yet, in its present aspect, so strange, seemed unable to let him go. Tears ran down his cheeks as he stood there, shrunken in form, with lined countenance, strained expression, white hair hanging lank. And through the audience there was a stifled sob, for each knew that they were saying farewell." Twenty-five days later Brahms was dead.

A Priceless Treasure.

How has the Fourth Symphony fared since the death of its creator? Has it lost its savor? By no means. It remains a priceless treasure. The ballad-like first movement, the dark-hued Andante, the sportive Scherzo and the wonderfully wrought Finale continue to stir sensitive listeners to the very marrow. Conductors worth their salt know that they must approach this great masterpiece with fear and trembling. Some of them do full justice to the work; others can neither feel nor reveal its piercing eloquence. Serge Koussevitzky is an example to all those who undertake to expound the monumental symphony. Under his leadership the Boston Symphony Orchestra gives a performance far superior to any previously recorded reading (Victor Album 730).

The Finale of Brahms' Fourth abounds in fascinating examples of dumbfounding contrapuntal skill; but the entire movement speaks to us with such melodious clarity that the uncanny mystery with which it is constructed never obtrudes itself upon our notice. Are there any other great compositions in which consummate cunning and cleverness are well-nigh concealed by the beauty and the lucidity of the subject-matter? One of the most remarkable of them is the overture which Richard Wagner wrote for his comic opera, "Die Meistersinger." Here, too, there is wizardry in the use of counterpoint; but listeners become so deeply immersed in the striking tunefulness of the work that they do not, as a rule, focus their attention on Wagner's miraculous craftsmanship. Of course, it is entirely unnecessary for them to do so. One can enjoy great art without a knowledge of how it is brought into being.

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
COURIER-CITIZEN

FEB 26 1941

Boston Programs.

At the regular concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week Friday afternoon and Saturday evening Dr. Koussevitzky will feature Mahler's Ninth Symphony, one of the outstanding works by that composer. For orchestral color and variety the program will be rounded out with The Enchanted Lake, BabaYaga, Liadov and the Capriccio Espagnol, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

In Jordan hall tomorrow evening Rudolf Serkin, pianist, will play compositions by Beethoven Brahms, Schubert, Smetana and Chopin.

PIANIST HAS ODD STYLE IDEAS

Post Feb 23

Grainger Wears His White Ducks in Winter

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

HUNTINGTON AVENUE is a very musical thoroughfare. Two of the new subway stops are named after the leading musical forms, and if there had been one between them it would have been called Conservatory (or possibly Jordan, after Jordan Hall). And although we primarily associate Mechanics Building, the first stop, with other and quite different activities, it was once the home of grand opera in this city and on many subsequent occasions has housed musical events.

Of the thousands who, going to or coming from their daily toil, glide by the stops respectively designated as Opera and Symphony, few will give heed even to the applied meaning of those terms, let alone their original ones. To go way back, "Symphony" comes from the Greek and means sounding together, and "opera" is the Latin plural of opus, which meant work. Opera is sometimes work, at that, even for the listener.

At first applied to music, a symphony was any instrumental portion, no matter where located, of a work predominantly vocal. A familiar example is the so-called Pastoral Symphony in Handel's "Messiah"—something quite different from the Pastoral Symphony of Beethoven, with which Mr. Disney goes to town in "Fantasia." What we now call overtures, the instrumental prefaces to operas, were once called symphonies, and the former term was applied, not only to what we now term suites, but even to those compositions which are known to us as symphonies. Even into the 19th century overtures were sometimes programmed as symphonies and vice-versa.

The first opera in our sense of the word came into being around 1600 and was described as "drama per la musica," a term which soon disappeared but was revived by Wagner as "music drama,' in the 1850's. It is difficult to put one's finger upon the exact moment when the word "opera," as we now understand it, first made its appearance. Etymologically, in contradistinction to "symphony," it makes very little sense.

But what's in a name? If the term "symphony" originally meant, "here is where there are no voices," we have since accepted symphonies, with one or more choral or vocal movements, from Beethoven, Spohr, Mahler and Vaughan-Williams. We have had symphonies in which the voices stole the show by Mahler, Stravinsky and Roy Harris. And the crowning inconsistency has been reached in the two symphonies of the Englishman Bantock for voices alone.

Again the form of the symphony was one about as rigid and inflexible as masculine attire. Today any orchestral work, whether in one movement or several, if it sounds sufficiently important, can be called a symphony. So in this respect we have got back about to where we started.

A symphony which Mozart and Beethoven would hardly have recognized as such, aside from the fact that it has four movements, is the Ninth of Mahler. This remarkable and still much-debated work, which Dr. Koussevitzky had the honor of introducing to the United States, will be played for the third time in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of this week. The final Adagio was heard alone last season. While we cannot hear this Symphony too often, at least until we know it much better than we do, it is to be hoped that this performance will not interfere with Mr. Burgin's promise to make known the Mahler Fouth to us next month, with Cleora Wood as the soprano soloist required by the last movement. In most cities this Fourth has proved the most popular of Mahler nine symphonies, only two of which, if we except "The Song of the Earth," have been conducted here by Dr. Koussevitzky. Two short pieces by Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" complete this week's programme.

The recitalist of the week is Rudolph Serkin, pianist, who plays at Jordan Hall on Thursday evening.

Transcript 3/1

FM's Revolution

The Boston Symphony Demonstrates a Coming Change in the Art of Radio Broadcasting Here

By EDWARD DOWNES

BREATHES there the man with soul so dead that he has never wanted to smash his radio for the rasping crackle of static it brought him along with the subtle harmonies of a Bach, or the "endless melody" of a Richard Wagner? If for no other reason than that it is supposed to eliminate static, frequency modulation has been one of the most eagerly discussed, most breathlessly awaited developments in radio, since its coming began to be bruited about, not so very many months ago. Frequency modulation (familiarly, "FM") is not just a gadget you put on your radio set, it is an entirely new method of broadcasting—a method already in operation, in an experimental way, with a fairly regular schedule of programs being sent, and a limited number of enthusiastic amateurs listening in.

Unfortunately you have to have a special kind of set, or at least you must have your own set readjusted, to be able to pick up FM broadcasts. So having had no earlier opportunity to hear it, I accepted the kind invitation this week of Station WBZ to go over to the Hotel Bradford and hear, along with Serge Koussevitzky, Arthur Fiedler, and several colleagues of the press, a broadcast of the Boston Symphony rehearsing in Symphony Hall.

What we heard there was the beginning of a revolution not only in radio industry but, much more important, in the art of radio broadcasting.

Ensconced with us in the studio were Koussevitzky and Fiedler, before them a score, at their side a telephone, with which they could talk directly to Richard Burgin, who was conducting the rehearsal in Symphony Hall. Three microphones in the hall picked up the sound of the orchestra which was piped to the FM broadcasting station, sent out over the air waves, picked up again by a large aerial on the roof of the Hotel Bradford, and finally fed to a loudspeaker in the large studio where we listened.

B. S. O. As the Guinea Pig

Thus, under regular FM broadcasting conditions, we heard the Boston Symphony begin, stop, repeat, and finally complete Rimsky-Korsakoff's Capriccio Espagnol, Liadov's "Baba Yaga" and fragments of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony. From beginning to end of the broadcast there was not a hint of static interference! But what was more remarkable still, and of more importance to musicians: the orchestra itself and its solo instruments sounded incomparably more life-like, each individual hue and timbre was fresher, brighter and truer than ever before over the air.

At the beginning, to be sure, there were difficulties. The violins sounded too dry and hard and there were matters of emphasis on lower or higher frequencies to be adjusted. From time to time, Koussevitzky by telephone would have Mr. Burgin stop the orchestra, to enquire whether a detail of intonation or clarity had been slurred in the rehearsal or by the mechanical apparatus. Sometimes it was one, sometimes the other. But as the rehearsal progressed and minor flaws ironed out, the Boston Symphony emerged from the loud speaker intact, as the wonderfully glowing and vibrant organism that it is.

The faintest shimmer of a planissimo at the end of "Baba Yaga" came over with incredible delicacy and clarity—not as an only partially audible sound. When the brasses gave out a forte, the instruments themselves might have been in the room. A clarinet at last had the peculiar color and flavor of a real clarinet, where before, as Dr. Koussevitzky sadly observed, a clarinet over the air had been something terrible to hear.

The Technical Side

This enormous stride in faithful reproduction is due chiefly to the fact that FM brings to the listener a greatly increased range of tonal pitch: from 30 to 15,000 cycles, whereas the system still in general use transmits only from 50 to 7000 or 8000. It is the lack of the lowest or highest frequencies which tends to reduce orchestral instruments to a common denominator and make them all sound alike. And conversely, the inclusion of these frequencies is what gives back each instrument its individual character. The increase in range will also make it unnecessary for the controlling engineer to dampen a brilliant orchestral tone.

In the past it has been imperative for engineers in the control booth to doctor the sound that comes to us more than most people realize. Both a too brilliant tone and a loud fortissimo had to be reduced, or they would strain the apparatus and reach the listener in distorted form. A whispering planissimo, on the other hand, had to be stepped up to avoid the danger of complete silence on a poor or mediocre receiving set.

With FM a certain amount of regulation will still be necessary but infinitely less than with the system now prevalent. Thus the careful calculations of the conductor in building the dynamic architecture of a given symphonic piece will be only faintly affected by mechanical limitations.

When the rehearsal was over, Koussevitzky thanked his players back in Symphony Hall for their beautiful performances. For the inmates of the studio, the engineers and officials of WBZ he had only congratulations, congratulations to his musicians that their work could be so faithfully reproduced, congratulations, in fact, to the whole world, for an invention, which, he said, brought over the air an orchestra as it had never sounded before.

Broadcasters Note!

Asked for further comment, Dr. Koussevitzky made one of the most important suggestions I have heard for the broadcasting of serious music, and one which all radio stations would do well to take to heart. It should be possible, he said, to have in charge of the control rooms not engineers, but the most gifted young conductors who can be found. For even with FM a certain amount of monitoring of the quality and volume of sound will be necessary. With the present system an enormous amount has to be done.

The monitoring engineers are usually musical fellows who sit with a score before them, watching to adjust their apparatus before a sudden clap of the kettledrums or to counteract as much as may be necessary a loud orchestral outburst, or a pianissimo that gets near the vanishing point. They do their best to make the orchestra sound the way they think it ought to sound.

But the difference between the conception of a musical engineer and that of a gifted conductor, who has spent years, perhaps decades training his ear, is obvious. The latter can give an infinitely more sensitive and faithful reproduction of the performance than would be possible for anyone less highly prepared.

Further, observed Dr. Koussevitzky, it would be extremely difficult to give a professional engineer the amount of musical experience which his job demands. The trained conductor, however, should have little difficulty in mastering the mechanical apparatus sufficiently to turn the proper knobs and obtain exactly the right relation of the high frequencies to the low, the requisite scale of dynamics. In other words, the job is ideally for the musician, not for the engineer.

The broadcasters are frank to say that they still have much to learn about FM. The most serious of its limitations is that it can broadcast only as far as the horizon, while the old type broadcasting can theoretically encircle the globe. Power and height of the antennae make a certain difference. But generally speaking a 600-foot FM antenna can cover a distance of only about 60 miles. This will mean that at least for the near future FM will be confined to centers of population.

That it will revolutionize radio, there cannot be the slightest doubt. And the thanks of music-lovers everywhere belong to those men whose patience and genius make FM a living possibility today.

Post 2/27

SYMPHONY HAS ODD REHEARSAL

"Remote Control," Frequency Modulation

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Will the conductor of the future be able to direct orchestral rehearsals by telephone, perhaps propped up in bed or otherwise at ease, instead of energetically superintending things on the spot? Of course, there would have to be a deputy conductor doing the actual time beating, looking after false entrances or missed entrances and what not.

These things came to mind yesterday morning during the little party at the studios of WBZ in the Hotel Bradford when Dr. Kousevitzky listened to a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin in charge, and gave instructions via the telephone to the assistant conductor. Actually, Arthur Fiedler did the telephoning and, prompted by Dr. Koussevitzky, would say "Richard, have the double basses play a little softer," or "let us have more transparency here," or "the clarinet and oboe are not quite in tune with each other." When the relayed command was carried out, Dr. Koussevitzky would smile his satisfaction or audibly express his pleasure at the result.

Of course, the real purpose of the meeting was not to demonstrate "remote control" possibilities but rather to display the potentialities of high frequency modulation. Aside from the fact that at one time a solo violin sounded almost as loud as all the violins together, because of the way a microphone was placed, and making the necessary allowances for the discrepancies in dynamic strength between an orchestra heard in the flesh and an orchestra heard through the radio, frequency modulation yesterday proved itself remarkably faithful in the transmission of tone colors.

Dr. Koussevitzky vowed that never before had he been able to distinguish so well between the instrumental timbres in an orchestral broadcast. The realistic quality of a harp passage in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," and of a piccolo squeak in Liadov's "Baba Yaga," to mention two details out of many, was indeed extraordinary. Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm was understandable.

BRUARY 27, 1941

Symphony Heard on Air for First Time by F. M.

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday morning a rehearsal was broadcast by the new frequency modulation method. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra; Arthur Fiedler; a group of Boston Symphony trustees and invited guests listened to the demonstration in a studio at Station WBZ. At Symphony Hall Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, directed the rehearsal.

This audience listened to portions of the "Spanish Caprice" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the "Baba Yaga" of Liadov. From time to time Mr. Koussevitzky gave directions concerning the playing to Mr. Fiedler, who communicated them to Mr. Burgin over a direct wire to the stage of Symphony Hall.

At the conclusion of the broadcast, Mr. Koussevitzky expressed delight at the tonal quality obtainable through frequency modulation.

"The colors of the instruments, such as the clarinet, for example, are so natural," he said, as he congratulated W. C. Swartley, general manager of the stations, upon the success of the broadcast.

"Now young conductors should be trained in the engineering technic of manipulating the broadcasting controls. That will insure a perfect communication of the sound of the orchestra and of the conductor's interpretation," continued Mr. Koussevitzky.

Following the broadcast, luncheon was served in a studio at WBZ.

Herald 3/9

FM and the BSO

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, sitting in a room in the Hotel Bradford recently, heard and occasionally directed by telephone, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was playing in Symphony Hall. There was nothing strikingly new or remarkable about that. Indeed, Boston has been pioneering in the communication of sound ever since Alexander Graham Bell made his momentous telephonic remark, "Come here, Watson, I want you," in 1876. The important feature of the experiment was that it was the first time the music of a full symphony orchestra had been carried through the air by frequency modulation, the newest method of radio broadcasting. The music was taken by telephone wires from Symphony Hall to Hull, the site of Westinghouse's experimental FM transmitter, W1XK, and from there returned by air to Boston.

The demonstration convinced Dr. Koussevitzky and the other listeners in the WBZ studio that FM constitutes a major development in radio broadcasting. The many tonal colors and the wide variety of dynamics of the orchestra were reproduced with great clarity and individuality. Dr. Koussevitzky himself spoke of the beauty of the clarinet, which, he said, he had never heard so faithfully reproduced before. Others commented on the realistic shimmering of the harp in a passage of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

To be sure, in one place a solo violin sounded as loud as the whole string choir, but that was the fault of microphone placement, not of FM. Altogether, the performance was an impressive testimony to the superiority of FM over the standard method of broadcasting. It was also another indication of the Boston Symphony's readiness to cooperate with any agency which will help to bring fine music to more people.

Last May the Federal Communications Commission cleared a section of the air channels for FM and authorized the granting of regular or commercial licenses for its use. Its development is expected to benefit New England particularly, because this area, for some reason, is not as receptive to standard broadcasting as are other parts of the country. FM, however, is impervious to static and local interference.

Its only drawback is that its range is limited to the circle of the horizon, or about fifty miles from the average transmitter tower. Its advocates boast that its tone is so clear that it can even broadcast absolute silence. For the time being at least, its adoption by the radio industry and its popular acceptance by the listening public seem much more probable than the use of

SCIENCE MONITOR

FEBRUARY 27, 1941

9/

Hear Special Radiocast

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Mrs. Richard Burgin

The Conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the wife of the Concert Master of the Boston orchestra shown as they listened to a special Symphony broadcast over WBZ's FM transmitter at the Hotel Bradford Studios.

Koussevitzky Praises Music Heard in FM Demonstration

"Marvelous, marvelous!" whispered Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he listened to the first experimental demonstration of symphony music over the FM (frequency modulation) transmitter of Station WBZ yesterday at the Hotel Bradford studios.

Seated in a studio with the score of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol" on a music rack before him, Dr. Koussevitzky whispered delighted appreciation of the quality of the music to Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops Concerts, and Mrs. Richard Burgin, wife of the concertmaster of the Boston orchestra, as the orchestra swung into the famous "Fandango of the Asturias" from the "Capriccio" with its brilliant cadenzas for solo instruments.

Congratulates All

When the demonstration was over, Dr Koussevitzky stood before the gathering which included newspaper men, critics, and engineers and said: "I can only congratulate everybody who was associated with this. Never before have I heard instruments sound so clear, so beautiful, and so natural."

Elaborating upon the new opportunities for symphonic music through FM transmission, Dr. Koussevitzky asked for a new type of operator in the radiocasting industry—a "conductor-engineer" who not only would be familiar with music but also with the technical side.

"Sometimes," he said, "radio engineers like to manipulate during a performance, and the results are not too happy. The man at the controls should be the one who knows when the music is to be played 'pianissimo' and when it is to be 'forte.'"

In order to bring the program to the Symphony conductor in the WBZ studios, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony Hall was "piped" by a special wire line with a range of 30-15,000 cycles to the studio of the station and then transferred by another wide frequency wire to the FM transmitter at Hull, where it was radiocast.

Signals Picked Up

The FM signals were picked up on the roof of the Hotel Bradford by a standard FM receiver and piped downstairs to the studio on the fifth floor.

Present FM equipment of WBZ is experimental and is heard intermittently generally between the hours of 9 a. m., and 3 p. m. on 42.6 mc. WBZ is proceeding with the building of a standard FM transmitter which is expected to go on the air shortly. Its FM antenna is located at the top of its present mast which is approximately 600 feet high, giving the station range of about 60 miles, according to Westinghouse engineers.

This Clipping From
PASADENA, CALIF.
POST

FEB 26

HAILS CITIZENSHIP

BOSTON. (U.P.) — Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, celebrated his becoming a United States citizen by presenting a special program of American music.

This Clipping From
FRESNO, CALIF.
BEE

FEB 28 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM HOBART, OKLA.
DEMOCRAT - CHIEF

FEB 24

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ALAMEDA, CALIF.
TIMES - STAR

FEB 24

This Clipping From
DUBUQUE, IA.
TELEGRAPH HERALD

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BRAWLEY, CAL.
NEWS

FEB 27

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN

MAR 4 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERLOO, IA.
COURIER

Nearby Films

Jamaica Plain — JAMAICA — Santa Fe Trail and A Night at Earl Carroll's. 1.45. 7.45.

Lexington—LEXINGTON—Santa Fe Trail. 2.30. 8.15. Always a Bride. 4.15. 10.00.

Malden — GRANADA — Saint in Palm Springs. 1.45. 4.58. 8.11. Kitty Foyle. 2.55. 6.08. 9.21.
MYSTIC—Life With Henry. 2.05. 8.30. Victory. 3.30. 7.00. 9.55.

MAPLEWOOD — Bowery Ben. Across the Sierras. Continuous 1.45-11.00.
ORPHEUM — Mark of Zorro. Wagon Train. 1.45. 7.00.
STRAND—Angels Over Broadway. 3.25. 8.30. Girl in the News. 2.05. 7.00. 9.45.

Mattapan — ORIENTAL—High Sierra. 12.15. 4.13. 7.54. Kitty Foyle. 2.05. 6.03. 9.44.

Medford—FELLSWAY — Tin Pan Alley and South of Suez. 1.30. 7.30.

Melrose—MELROSE—Love Thy Neighbor. Murder Over New York. 1.30. 7.30.

Natick—COLONIAL—Chad Hanna. 3.15. 9.00. Go West. 2.00. 7.45.

Needham—PARAMOUNT—Thief of Bagdad. No, No, Nanette. 6.30-11.00.

Newton—PARAMOUNT — Four Motners. Gallant Sons. 2.00. 8.00.

Quincy—QUINCY—East Side Kids. Barnyard Follies.
STRAND—Go West and Haunted Honeymoon.

Somerville—CENTRAL—Here Comes the Navy. Cherokee Strip. 2.00. 8.00.
CAPITOL and BALL SQUARE—Dr. Kildare's Crisis. A Night at Earl Carroll's. 2.00. 6.30. 8.00.
DAVIS SQUARE—Snow White. Heroes in Blue. 2.00. 8.00.
STRAND—Mark of Zorro. Little Bit of Heaven. 2.00. 8.00.

Watertown — COOLIDGE — Love Thy Neighbor and Charter Pilot. 1.45. 7.45.
WATERTOWN SQUARE — Seven Sinners. Out West With the Peppers. 1.45. 7.45.

Waverley — STRAND — Arizona. Blondie Plays Cupid. 2.00. 7.45.

Wellesley—COMMUNITY PLAYHOUSE — Thief of Bagdad. No, No, Nanette. 2.30. 7.45.

West Newton—Comrade X. Night at Earl Carroll's. 1.30. 7.45.

Winchester — WINCHESTER — Mark of Zorro. 3.37. 8.07. Christmas in July. 2.15. 6.40. 9.50.

Wollaston—WOLLASTON—Trail of Vigilantes. A Night at Earl Carroll's. 1.45. 7.45.

'Strawberry Blonde'

"Strawberry blonde," or redhead, is what Rita Hayworth is in, surprisingly, "Strawberry Blonde," now at the Metropolitan. And yet, when Miss Hayworth went to Hollywood a few years ago she was raven-haired.

Not only that. The actress was, on arrival, a dancer, and she reported a heavy Spanish accent.

The accent, to be sure, was a fake, even though her real name is Margarita Carmen Cansino, the daughter of Eduarde Cansino, member of a well-known Spanish dancing family.

Miss Hayworth was born in New York, but the family moved to Baltimore when she was very young. She began dancing in public when she was about six years old. She did not, however, stop the show. She didn't do that until she was 14 and joined the Cansino dancing act and toured Europe with it.

She arrived in Hollywood, heralded as a dancer. She decided to try her hand at acting, though. And in three years she has acted in 29 pictures.

Movies—In Town

THE SON OF MONTE CRISTO
LOUIS HAYWARD - JOAN BENNETT
CO-HIT KAY FRANCIS in 'PLAY GIRL'
New MARCH OF TIME
KEITH MEMORIAL

RKO BOSTON
BIG STAGE SHOW
SCREEN--2-FIRST RUN FEATURES-2
SECRET EVIDENCE (CHARLES QUIGLEY) | PETTICOAT POLITICS (THE HIGGINS FAMILY)

FANTASIA
Daily 2:30-8:30
All Seats Reserved
MAJESTIC 219 Tremont Liberty 7725
Mail orders filled promptly.
Reservations at Filene's & Jordan's.

EXETER
NEWBURY and EXETER STS. • KEN. 7067
Eve.-Sat.-Sun., 44c, 35c, 25c. Aft. 30c. Tax Inc.
Margaret Lockwood
'THE GIRL IN THE NEWS'
R. Montgomery C. Cummings 'HAUNTED HONEYMOON'
Sunday "FOUR MOTHERS"

HERE IS 8th WEEK
IRELAND
RARE IRISH FILM IN GORGEOUS COLOR
FINE ARTS • 35c TILL 1 P.M.
MASS. AVE.-NORWAY ST. • DOORS OPEN 12:30

SOUTH STATION LIB. 5560
PETE SMITH QUIZ • DETECTIVE STORY • Leon ERROL • NEW ORLEANS
2½ HOURS SHORT SUBJECTS • 3 NEWSREELS

HOOD Daily Movie Directory

MALDEN
GRANADA
GINGER ROGERS & DENNIS MORGAN
in "KITTY FOYLE"
—Geo. Sanders, "Saint At Palm Springs"

Community THEATRES

BRIGHTON
CIRCLE Cont. Perf. Today 1.45-11 P.M.
Ginger Rogers "KITTY FOYLE" Dennis Morgan
Hum. Bogart "High Sierra" Ida Lupino

DORCHESTER
Free Parking CODMAN SQ. TAL. 4040
HENRY FONDA "CHAD HANNA" DOROTHY LAMOUR
Marx Bros. "GO WEST"

FOR GOOD RECREATION
SEE THE TRANSCRIPT'S
"WHERE TO DINE" COLUMN

Post Feb 27

SYMPHONY HAS ODD REHEARSAL

"Remote Control," Frequency Modulation

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Will the conductor of the future be able to direct orchestral rehearsals by telephone, perhaps propped up in bed or otherwise at ease, instead of energetically superintending things on the spot? Of course, there would have to be a deputy conductor doing the actual baton beating, looking after false entrances or missed entrances and what not.

These things came to mind yesterday morning during the little party at the studios of WBZ in the Hotel Bradford when Dr. Kousevitzky listened to a rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Richard Burgin in charge, and gave instructions via the telephone to the assistant conductor. Actually, Arthur Fiedler did the telephoning and, prompted by Dr. Koussevitzky, would say "Richard, have the double basses play a little softer," or "let us have more transparency here," or "the clarinet and oboe are not quite in tune with each other." When the relayed command was carried out, Dr. Koussevitzky would smile his satisfaction or audibly express his pleasure at the result.

Of course, the real purpose of the meeting was not to demonstrate "remote control" possibilities but rather to display the potentialities of high frequency modulation. Aside from the fact that at one time a solo violin sounded almost as loud as all the violins together, because of the way a microphone was placed, and making the necessary allowances for the discrepancies in dynamic strength between an orchestra heard in the flesh and an orchestra heard through the radio, frequency modulation yesterday proved itself remarkably faithful in the transmission of tone colors.

Dr. Koussevitzky vowed that never before had he been able to distinguish so well between the instrumental timbres in an orchestral broadcast. The realistic quality of a harp passage in Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," and of a piccolo squeak in Liadov's "Baba Yaga," to mention two details out of many, was indeed extraordinary. Dr. Koussevitzky's enthusiasm was understandable.

BRUARY 27, 1941

Symphony Heard on Air for First Time by F. M.

For the first time in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, yesterday morning a rehearsal was broadcast by the new frequency modulation method. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the orchestra; Arthur Fiedler; a group of Boston Symphony trustees and invited guests listened to the demonstration in a studio at Station WBZ. At Symphony Hall Richard Burgin, the Boston Symphony's assistant conductor, directed the rehearsal.

This audience listened to portions of the "Spanish Caprice" by Rimsky-Korsakoff, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and the "Baba Yaga" of Liadov. From time to time Mr. Koussevitzky gave directions concerning the playing to Mr. Fiedler, who communicated them to Mr. Burgin over a direct wire to the stage of Symphony Hall.

At the conclusion of the broadcast, Mr. Koussevitzky expressed delight at the tonal quality obtainable through frequency modulation.

"The colors of the instruments, such as the clarinet, for example, are so natural," he said, as he congratulated W. C. Swartley, general manager of the stations, upon the success of the broadcast.

"Now young conductors should be trained in the engineering technic of manipulating the broadcasting controls. That will insure a perfect communication of the sound of the orchestra and of the conductor's interpretation," continued Mr. Koussevitzky.

Following the broadcast, luncheon was served in a studio at WBZ.

Herald 3/9

FM and the BSO

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, sitting in a room in the Hotel Bradford recently, heard and occasionally directed by telephone, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was playing in Symphony Hall. There was nothing strikingly new or remarkable about that. Indeed, Boston has been pioneering in the communication of sound ever since Alexander Graham Bell made his momentous telephonic remark, "Come here, Watson, I want you," in 1876. The important feature of the experiment was that it was the first time the music of a full symphony orchestra had been carried through the air by frequency modulation, the newest method of radio broadcasting. The music was taken by telephone wires from Symphony Hall to Hull, the site of Westinghouse's experimental FM transmitter, W1XK, and from there returned by air to Boston.

The demonstration convinced Dr. Koussevitzky and the other listeners in the WBZ studio that FM constitutes a major development in radio broadcasting. The many tonal colors and the wide variety of dynamics of the orchestra were reproduced with great clarity and individuality. Dr. Koussevitzky himself spoke of the beauty of the clarinet, which, he said, he had never heard so faithfully reproduced before. Others commented on the realistic shimmering of the harp in a passage of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

To be sure, in one place a solo violin sounded as loud as the whole string choir, but that was the fault of microphone placement, not of FM. Altogether, the performance was an impressive testimony to the superiority of FM over the standard method of broadcasting. It was also another indication of the Boston Symphony's readi[illegible] with any agency which will help to bring fine music to more people.

Last April the Federal Communications Commission cleared a section of the air channels for FM and authorized the granting of regular or commercial licenses for its use. Its development is expected to benefit New England particularly, because this area, for some reason, is not as receptive to standard broadcasting as are other parts of the country. FM, however, is impervious to static and local interference.

Its only drawback is that its range is limited to the circle of the horizon, or about fifty miles from the average transmitter tower. Its advocates boast that its tone is so clear that it can even broadcast absolute silence! For the time being at least, its adoption by the radio industry and its popular acceptance by the listening public seem much more probable than the use of television.

SCIENCE MONITOR

FEBRUARY 27, 1941

Hear Special Radiocast

By a Staff Photographer

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky Mrs. Richard Burgin

The Conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the wife of the Concert Master of the Boston orchestra shown as they listened to a special Symphony broadcast over WBZ's FM transmitter at the Hotel Bradford Studios.

Koussevitzky Praises Music Heard in FM Demonstration

"Marvelous, marvelous!" whispered Dr. Serge Koussevitzky as he listened to the first experimental demonstration of symphony music over the FM (frequency modulation) transmitter of Station WBZ yesterday at the Hotel Bradford studios.

Seated in a studio with the score of Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnol" on a music rack before him, Dr. Koussevitzky whispered delighted appreciation of the quality of the music to Arthur Fiedler, Conductor of the Boston Symphony Pops Concerts, and Mrs. Richard Burgin, wife of the concertmaster of the Boston orchestra, as the orchestra swung into the famous "Fandango of the Asturias" from the "Capriccio" with its brilliant cadenzas for solo instruments.

Congratulates All

When the demonstration was over, Dr. Koussevitzky stood before the gathering which included newspaper men, critics, and engineers and said: "I can only congratulate everybody who was associated with this. Never before have I heard instruments sound so clear, so beautiful, and so natural."

Elaborating upon the new opportunities for symphonic music through FM transmission, Dr. Koussevitzky asked for a new type of operator in the radiocasting industry—a "conductor-engineer" who not only would be familiar with music but also with the technical side.

"Sometimes," he said, "radio engineers like to manipulate during a performance, and the results are not too happy. The man at the controls should be the one who knows when the music is to be played 'pianissimo' and when it is to be 'forte.'"

In order to bring the program to the Symphony conductor in the WBZ studios, the Boston Symphony orchestra playing in Symphony Hall was "piped" by a special wire line with a range of 30-15,000 cycles to the studio of the station and then transferred by another wide frequency wire to the FM transmitter at Hull, where it was radiocast.

Signals Picked Up

The FM signals were picked up on the roof of the Hotel Bradford by a standard FM receiver and piped downstairs to the studio on the fifth floor.

Present FM equipment of WBZ is experimental and is heard intermittently generally between the hours of 9 a. m., and 3 p. m. on 42.6 mc. WBZ is proceeding with the building of a standard FM transmitter which is expected to go on the air shortly. Its FM antenna is located at the top of its present mast which is approximately 600 feet high, giving the station range of about 60 miles, according to Westinghouse engineers.

Mahler's Ninth

Transcript 3/1

Koussevitzky Conducts Gigantic Farewell Symphony of Pessimistic Austrian Master

IF there were more performances of Mahler's Symphonies like the one given yesterday afternoon of his Ninth by Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony, the opposition to that unfortunate composer would melt with amazing speed. For Mahler is not a composer who stands easily on his own feet. He is not for every orchestra. And much less is he for every conductor. The leader who would essay his works must have some grasp of the vastly complicated mentality of Mahler the artist, and an intuitive sympathy for the violent fluctuations between the extremes of exaltation and gloom of Mahler, the man.

An orchestra, to do justice to his scores, must be either a rare group of virtuosi, or must have the familiarity with and love of his idiom, which may be presupposed in the case of the former Vienna Philharmonic. Fortunately in Boston we have a conductor and an orchestra bountifully equal to these demands.

According to many Mahler authorities, his Ninth Symphony is his greatest. It is his last, and it reflects the pessimism of a morbidly sensitive artist who knew bitterly that he had but little time to live. Though he had looked upon life as a cruel and even torturing enigma, he was more deeply attached to it than he realized until the end was upon him. Then like so many before and after, he was torn at the thought of leaving behind him little things: a patch of blue sky with clouds in it, a tree, a brook, the smells of the countryside.

His Ninth Symphony is a lengthy farewell to the gifts he so suddenly found he loved, as well as the things that had martyred him in his ceaselessly agitated life. As a leave-taking, it is anything but stoical or laconic. That would have been foreign to Mahler's nature. Death in a hundred guises haunts its sometimes redundant pages. So much so that the four movements could easily be likened to the gruesome Totentaenze of early German woodcuts. Clearly, the full-throated song of the final Adagio is Death as Friend and Succor.

In its original form the symphony lasts nearly an hour and twenty minutes. With Dr. Koussevitsky's well-considered cuts, only a few minutes over the hour. And still it is long. It is long for reasons inseparable from Mahler's style. Like those interminable sentences, which can come from the finest German prose writers, there are so many qualifying subordinate clauses, and such insistence on detail that by the time reader or listener finishes, he has lost track of the beginning.

One is reminded of Nietzsche's malicious comment on Wagner, whom he called the most impolite of geniuses, because he insists on his point—he insists until one despairs, he insists until one ends by believing him! Yet in spite of its obvious faults, the Ninth Symphony remains a deeply moving and illuminating work.

Of the sprawling first Andante, the second half is by far the more eloquent. The muted trumpet fanfares and the long elegaic dimenuendo which brings it to a close were spun out with a subtle gradation of sonority of which only Dr. Koussevitzky and his men are capable.

In spite of its bitter, macabre undertone the Laendler movement is probably the least affecting of the four movements. It was a virtuoso performance of rather ungrateful music.

The passionately agitated Rondo Burleske, which in a conventional symphony might have been the finale, was astonishingly dramatic in spite of its great length. But it was the closing Adagio that was the glory of the performance as it is the crown of the work.

The light Russian works which made up the second half of the program: Liadoff's "Enchanted Lake," "Baba Yaga" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Capriccio Espagnole" were a decided relief after the sustained ecstacies of Mahler. "Baba Yaga" is an amusing, but only mildly terrifying portrait of the fearsome witch of Russian fairy-tales. "The Enchanted Lake" is pleasant and innocuous. The fading charms of the "Capriccio Espagnole" are still effective enough to make a display piece for any orchestra. The music sparked, crackled with unwonted vigor, and it has at least one good tune you could hum on the way home. Both Koussevitzky and the orchestra were enthusiastically acclaimed at the close of a remarkable concert.

E. D.

MUSIC

Symphony Concert

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

The 17th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mahler.....Symphony No. 9
Liadov....."The Enchanted Lake," Op. 62;
"Baba Yaga," Op. 56
Rimsky-Korsakov..Spanish Caprice, Op. 34

It seems somehow churlish to persist in disliking Mahler's music. No composer ever tried harder than he to write great music, and you are conscious of this heaving and groaning effort in almost every page of his gigantic scores. Occasionally, of course, he strikes sparks, though none brighter than in his own early and quite felicitous songs.

Thus, in the course of seeking bigness and profundity Mahler threw a very valuable musical quality to the winds. He is almost never effective. This is not the greatest ingredient in creative art, but without it most art is boring. It may have intellectual interest, it may show flashes of imaginative power; but as a whole it is tedious.

Mahler's admirers have written much about the originality of his orchestration. That is making a virtue out of an idiosyncrasy. It is like defending Carlyle's prose. The tortured sentences which that cross-grained Scotsman evolved may have been very typical of him, and his books would not be the same without them. But that does not mean that his style is admirable; and the analogy can serve for Mahler.

When all is said and done the finale remains the real excuse for performing this Symphony. We do not happen to care for the long drawn-out conclusion, with the theme extended by augmentation to the point that you think it is never going to stop. But the movement is a noble one in the main. It is also a curious one in the fluctuation between excessive, romantic lushness and barren austerity. Mr. Koussevitzky conducted it with the most affectionate care, as he always does in these cases where the public is obviously divided beforehand.

Some enchanting Russian music after the intermission redressed the balance of the concert for those of us who had had their fill of Mahler. Liadov's "The Enchanted Lake" is a lovely and poetic piece of music. It is, in fact, one of the most successful of all tone pictures. His "Baba Yaga" makes a witty and effective foil for it.

Rimsky-Korsakov's own comments on his Spanish Caprice are exactly right. It is a "brilliant composition for the orchestra," and, as in "Scheherazade," the virtuosity of the players is all-important. The Boston Symphony is, then, just the ensemble from which to hear Rimsky-Korsakov's scores. The performance yesterday, to which Mr. Koussevitzky had given painstaking preparation, was surpassingly good, even for this orchestra. If it served no other purpose, such playing as this shows us how supremely fortunate we are here in Boston to hear such an orchestra week in, week out.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Mr. Koussevitzky will conduct the following program: Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral"; Sibelius's Symphony No. 5.

REVIEWS OF CONCERTS IN BOSTON

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A great and somewhat misunderstood work, the Ninth Symphony of Gustav Mahler, comes first on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week. Serge Koussevitzky follows the Symphony—after a discreet space of intermission—with three brightly colored Russian scores: "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga," by Liadoff, and the "Spanish Caprice" of Rimsky-Korsakoff.

Every performance of a Mahler symphony is fresh occasion for argument. Such music by this composer as we are offered here from time to time seems to increase in public favor. But progress is slow and Mahler performances are still comparatively rare. So there are Mahlerians and anti-Mahlerians, most of them strongly articulate.

One reason why the Ninth Symphony is misunderstood is because the Ninth Symphony is not the sort of music to be taken casually, in your stride. Mahler was one of the most intense individualities in all music. His "Song of the Earth" and Ninth Symphony reflect the highest peak of that intensity and they are further complicated by the preoccupation with death which possessed Mahler during the years of their creation, which were the last of his life.

The Ninth Symphony, then, is music of most intimate spirtual and emotional revelation. The first movement is stormy and conflicting, a certain jangling irony leers from the second and third. In the fourth Mahler seems to welcome, as did Beethoven in not dissimilar slow movements of his last two string quartets, Death as the bringer of peace.

Now the spectacle of a sensitive man thus unburdening himself cannot leave other sensitive people unmoved. Hence the Ninth Symphony is music of a particular and heartrending beauty, directly connected with life, and not art for the sake of art. It ought to be heard with that always in mind, and it ought preferably not to be followed by any other music.

Yet Mahler of the last works is not understood as much as he may be, and some musicians as well as listeners do not perceive his value. Such people find in his grandiose orchestration that occasionally makes you think of other composers, in the vast scope he allowed himself for musical forms, in the volcanic counterpoint or the ripe sentiment of melody and harmony, banality, lack of discipline, or both.

Those who see Mahler as a great talent are almost certain to be found harboring affection and probably respect for the best things that came out of the maligned 19th Century. The spirit of that century is long vanished, together with its beliefs, works and everyday life. But Mahler was of the 19th Century, and his music is a reflection of its humanity, its leisure and warmth, even its faults of longwindedness and pompous rhetoric. Yesterday was yesterday and today is a nightmare. Mahler is dead and so is his way of writing music. But one ventures to salute the Ninth Symphony as extraordinary art, which has a way of outliving its own time.

How much easier it would be to describe the magnificence of yesterday's performance if one had not, many times before, piled up superlatives in speaking of the Boston Symphony. Again the tone was gorgeous, the technical details almost incredibly perfect, the interpretation of Mr. Koussevitzky of astonishing eloquence. With one exception. Why does he make the last pages of the adagio so very, very slow, until the bubble of sustained rapture comes near being punctured?

If the charming tone pictures of Liadoff and Rimsky-Korsakoff seemed trivial after the Symphony, that was not their fault. They are actually very good music, but misplaced on this program.—C. W. D.

This Clipping From
COLUMBUS, OHIO
STATE JOURNAL
MAR 1 - 1941

Rochester Philharmonic's Program Veers Sharply to Pianistic Side

Definitely on the pianistic side is the program of the Rochester Philharmonic Orchestra which will be given next Thursday night at Memorial Hall, presented by the Symphony Club of Central Ohio.

After the Glinka overture and the Strauss tone poem, "Don Juan," will come the first wheeling out of the pianoforte, in fact two of them for the number will be Mozart's Concerto in E Flat for two pianos. Jose Iturbi, the famed pianist, is the conductor of the orchestra so he will play one and his charming and clever sister, Amparo Iturbi, will play the other. It is believed that Mozart wrote the work with the idea of having himself and his sister play it. There is record only of his having played it with another lady in Vienna in 1781, a year after he composed it. It is in three movements.

After the intermission the orchestra will play the Cesar Franck tone poem, "Le Chasseur Maudit" (The Hunter Accursed), which bases its program on a ballad by Gottfried Buerger, derived from an old legend of a wild count of the Rhineland. Then will come the second pianistic treat. Jose Iturbi will be heard as soloist in the Liszt E flat concerto for solo piano and orchestra, which was first played by Liszt with Berlioz conducting. It is in four brilliant movements—allegro maestoso, quasi adagio, allegretto vivace and allegro marziale.

With this concert the Symphony Club brings its season to a close.

For next season it has announced already two out of three projected concerts. One, on Oct. 27, 1941, by the Philadelphia under Ormandy, and the other on Dec. 12 by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Serge Koussevitzky.

This will be the first time in several years that the Boston has been heard in Columbus. This orchestra does not tour widely and it is considered quite a feat for the Symphony Club and its manager, Helen Pugh Alcorn, to obtain the contract.

Tickets for the Thursday evening concert may be had now at Heaton's, 78 N. High St., or may be ordered by mail from that address.

* * *

This Clipping From
LOWELL, MASS.
LEADER

MAR 1 - 1941

Boston Symphony to Play Programs

Three young men wrote the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's extra monthly program of music Monday evening and Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock, and they wrote the music in three different centuries.

That is the ingenious plot devised by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who is famous for programs with ideas.

First will come "A Little Night Music," written by Mozart at the age of 23, in the year 1788. The "Fantastic Symphony," written by Berlioz at the age of 28, will show the radical orchestral changes this youth effected in the following century, in 1831.

From that time, Berlioz developed the orchestral effect so fully that little if anything has been added since to what he worked out or hinted at.

The present generation will be represented by the "Third Symphony" of Nikolai Berezowski, which he composed in 1936 at the age of 36.

Berezowski, as a composer, is a product of America. Born in Russia in 1900, he began his musical career as a violinist, arriving in this country at the age of 22, he joined the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and became leader of the second violins.

Berezowski first made a serious study of composition under New York teachers, including Rubin Coldmark. In 1925 he wrote his first symphony. With his second, four years later, he resigned from the orchestra for the career of composer.

In typical American spirit, he knows what he has to say and says it in energetic and concise music.

This Clipping From
NEW BRUNSWICK, N. J.
HOME NEWS

MAR 1 - 1941

GLEE CLUB TO SING WITH KOUSSEVITZKY

The Rutgers Glee Club will join with the Princeton choir April 2 in singing the ad libitum choral ending of Franz Liszt's "Faust" symphony, accompanying the Boston Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Sergei Koussevitzky, as it gives its annual concert at the Rutgers gymnasium. This is the fifth and last of the 1940-1941 Rutgers concert series.

"Faust," based on Goethe's play, is considered by many to be Liszt's finest orchestral works and one of the greatest masterpieces of the whole romantic age. All three movements of the composition will be played. The concert will be repeated at Carnegie Hall on April 5.

MARCH 1,

PLAY MAHLER AT SYMPHONY

Music Exalts Delighted Audience

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the early days of Symphony Concerts in America it was the custom to provide vocal selections from Donizetti or Rossini between the movements of a Beethoven Symphony. Something of the sort happens at the Symphony Concerts of this week when Dr. Koussevitzky follows Mahler's Ninth Symphony (of the sublime final Adagio) with Liadov's "The Enchanted Lake" and "Baba-Yaga" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice."

From an ideal standpoint it would be far better to play the Mahler Symphony alone. Without cuts it would make quite enough music for an afternoon or an evening. There might also be an intermission between the second and third movements, a procedure suggested by the composer in the case of his First Symphony and carried out the other evening in New York by Mr. Mitopoulos and the Philharmonic-Symphony.

But conductors are practical men. They have to suit the tastes of thousands of subscribers. Some people still do not greatly care for Mahler. Or if they do, they do not like him well enough to want to hear him by himself. And some who might relish the more obvious Mahler of the earlier symphonies might well be ill at ease in the rarified atmosphere of the Ninth—speaking particularly of the initial Andante and of the aforesaid Adagio. Anyway, the Liadov and Rimsky-Korsakov numbers were beautifully or brilliantly played, as the case might be, and the audience went for the "Spanish Caprice" in a big way.

Such feats of orchestral virtuosity, however, were on a very different plane from those accomplished by conductor and orchestra in this most profound of symphonies (the superlative is used here advisedly). But after all this searching beauty and heart-shaking eloquence, after all this plumbing of depths and rising to the heights, why should Dr. Koussevitzky come so near to defeating his own and the composer's purpose by attenuating the final measures until the music almost falls apart? We know from Bruno Walter's performance, now recorded, that his exaggerated rallentando is not necessary.

Until this coda, so strongly reminiscent of the end of Mahler's "Song of the Earth," was reached, the performance of the Symphony yesterday went beyond anything that Dr. Koussevitzky has yet achieved with it, and it made more convincing than ever before the towering greatness, the exalted beauty, not to mention the almost unbearable sorrowfulness, of the work itself. In this Symphony and in this Symphony alone, one encounters a piece of instrumental music that actually goes on from where the later Beethoven left off. It is no more everybody's music than are Beethoven's last quartets. None the less, there was no small enthusiasm for it yesterday. There was even applause between the movements and two recalls for the conductor at the end.

The question now is, when do we hear some more Mahler Symphonies? Dr. Koussevitzky would have us believe that he wrote but two—this Ninth and the so-very-different Fifth.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 1 - 1941

The Boston Symphony In 'FM' Demonstration

Transcd. 3/1/41

By JANE AYRES

Frequency modulation broadcasting (commonly known as FM) is still not much more than a name to those of us who are familiar only with the ordinary, or amplitude modulation (AM) broadcasting by which we hear our favorite programs.

So it was with considerable interest that a group of musicians, professors and newspapermen gathered at the WBZ studios in the Hotel Bradford this week to hear an experimental demonstration of Westinghouse FM station W1XK with the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasting from Symphony Hall.

Obvious center of attention was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, seated by Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Richard Burgin, wife of the assistant conductor who was directing at Symphony Hall. So clear and free from static was the music, that the orchestra seemed to be in the room.

Koussevitzky and Fiedler put their heads together, discussing the quality of the music. Then Fiedler reached for the phone, interrupting the music to say to Burgin that it was not quite clear, and "the oboes aren't in tune." It came somewhat as a surprise to hear Burgin respond via the radio, "All right, we'll try again." More phone calls followed, requesting more emphasis on the strings, and "the brasses a little warmer."

After several attempts to gain perfection in the details of the production of music, Koussevitsky seemed satisfied with its performance. Smiling delightedly, he whispered to Fiedler, who again lifted the phone, repeating Koussevitsky's words (you'll have to imagine the intriguing accent). As Fiedler telephoned: "Dr. Koussevitzky says it is astonishingly beautiful, and the oboes and clarinets are wonderful," we could hear the laughter of the orchestra members coming back over the loudspeaker.

. . . And the Whole World

After three-quarters of an hour of this most interesting performance, the demonstration came to an end. Dr. Koussevitsky seemed genuinely thrilled with the quality of FM reproduction of his music. Never before, he said, had he been able to pick out each instrument individually. Now, even the clarinets —which to him were the poorest over the air—came in perfectly. "The timbre of the instruments is so natural," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "I want first to congratulate my musicians and the broadcasting company" —then with a sweeping motion of his arms he added, "and the whole wide world!"

Dr. Koussevitsky suggested that there was a definite need for "young engineer-conductors" — musicians who would, with the necessary engineering training and their own musical background, know what to expect of musical reproduction, and give it the right treatment in the control rooms of the broadcasting studios.

F. M. Sloan, chief engineer of WBZ, explained that less dynamic control was necessary in FM broadcasting. There is less interference from other stations, and the absence of noise and static permits reproduction of overtones that cannot be heard on the AM method.

The microphone technique for this newer type of broadcasting will be greatly different, and it is now in the process of being studied and properly developed.

For the LOVE of MiKE

By BEN KAPLAN

(TITLE REG. U.S. PATENT OFFICE)

From Koussevitzky, double-bass
Emeritus, who now must face
The flutes, the brass, the strings and harps
To well produce his flats and sharps.
We do obtain a word that's cheering
On radio and engineering.
"Unite," says he, "the wave constructor—
For best effect—with the conductor!"

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, listened to a demonstration of Frequency Modulation given by his Boston Symphony Orchestra at the WBZ studios in Boston the other day and was visibly astonished. So were an audience of musicians, professors and newspapermen, the latter category including your reporter, who has heard FM demonstrations before, but not under such grand conditions and with such fine results.

That Koussevitzky was delighted we haven't any doubt. He didn't hesitate to express his pleasure as he directed Arthur Fielder's telephone conversations with Assistant Conductor Richard Burgin at Symphony Hall. "My congratulations," Dr. Koussevitzky declared after the demonstration, "first to the engineers who made the broadcast possible, and secondly to my musicians. Through FM they will now be sure that the public hears what they give them by their instruments." He pointed out that FM opens up a new field for engineers, a field in which they should become specialists—"engineer conductors" who themselves understand music.

* * *

The demonstration was broadcast from the famous Boston Symphony Hall, with Koussevitzky's aide directing. It was fed from Symphony Hall direct to WBZ's master control board, then to the transmitter, and then picked up from the antenna by the studio. The musical portion of the broadcast included three selections—"Capriccio Espagnol" by Rimsky Korsakov, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and an excerpt from "The Enchanted Lake" by Liadov.

The remarkable part about the broadcast was the ability to pick out each instrument individually. Dr. Koussevitzky remarked about this. "Every instrument sounds so clear, so beautiful, so natural," he said. "Each instrument keeps just the right color and timbre, particularly the clarinet." In orthodox broadcasting, he said, the sound of the clarinet is bad. So impressed was the conductor that at one point he had Fiedler interrupt the orchestra to tell the men how astonishingly beautiful the clarinet and oboe sounded.

* * *

Your reporter, we repeat, was duly impressed too, by the entire demonstration. But we were struck by a bit of artful dodging on a question we asked and which, apparently, interested some of the other newsmen attending. F. M. Sloan, chief engineer of WBZ, was asked how much actual monitoring was required in connection with the demonstration. That is one of the strong talking points of FM people—they claim that very little, if any, engineer control is needed.

But our question failed to produce a forthright answer. Mr. Sloan seemed to be hedging. He would not say there had been little control—as we had expected he might. He repeatedly declared—in answer to insistent reporters—that not as much monitoring as usual was required.

* * *

And while on the topic of monitoring, it would be rather interesting to know whether Petrillo, chief of the musicians' union, or any of his assistants found it necessary to do a bit of monitoring during the FM demonstration. If we're not mistaken, it was just last summer when the music union's leader announced that the Boston Symphony had been removed from the air and would not broadcast again.

The union's ban had to do, specifically, with the Pop Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler. However, the Pops Orchestra is merely the Symphony orchestra without the first desks. So it looks as though the Boston Symphony not only was heard via FM broadcasting for the first time in its history, but also was heard on the air for the first time since its banishment. The demonstration, you see, was picked up by FM set owners throughout Metropolitan Boston as well as by studio WBZ.

* * *

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 - 1941

Paul Hindemith Gets Award From Yale

One of Yale university's highest honors was bestowed on the composer Paul Hindemith recently at a gala evening. It was the opening of the Woolsey series of concerts in the university's magnificent hall; the Boston symphony played with a brilliance which is not uncommon, but which remains exciting nevertheless, and the program included Hindemith's violin sonata. Ruth Posselt was the interpreter.

The Howland Prize, established in 1915 in memory of Henry Elias Howland, may be given to a citizen of any country in recognition of distinguished achievement in the field of literature, the arts, and the science of government. Among the nine recipients thus far are Rupert Brooke, Gustav Holst, Robert Edmond Jones, and Salvador de Madariaga; Paul Hindemith is visiting professor of theory of music at Yale for the current year, and Dr. Koussevitzky revived the sonata as a gracious gesture to the composer and the universty on this occasion. President Seymour made the presentation as the capacity audience rose in honor to Mr. Hindemith.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 2 - 1941

93

THE ORCHESTRAS

* * *

FOUR works will be introduced to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's repertoire in this week's concerts at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night and Friday evening, Italo Montemezzi will conduct the first American performances of his lyric poem, "Paul and Virginia," based upon Bernardin de St. Pierre's late eighteenth century story. This was first performed at the Augusteo in Rome in 1929, and has since been performed in the other principal Italian cities. John Barbirolli will conduct the other two numbers: Vaughan Williams's Tallis Fantasia and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Three American works will have their first public performances here in Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Morton Gould, who was born in Richmond Hill, Queens, twenty-seven years ago, will be represented by his "Foster Gallery," in thirteen sections, based upon Stephen C. Foster's songs and dances. The other novelties are Roy Harris's Three Pieces for Orchestra and Bernard Wagenaar's third symphony.

Mr. Gould writes that much of his material was gathered from the Lilly collection of Fosteriana titled "Foster Hall." There are thirteen short movements "which might be classified as 'variations' in the very general sense of the term." The suite opens with the "Camptown Races," and this tune recurs throughout the composition, linking it together in the manner of the "Promenade" in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." It was first played by the Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner on Jan. 12, 1940.

Two of Mr. Harris's three pieces are interludes from his Folk Song Symphony for chorus and orchestra; the third is a new middle movement written "to complement the other two movements and make a balanced suite." Most of the Folk Song symphony was first heard in Rochester last April in the Eastman School's American Music Festival. It was first performed in full by the Cleveland Orchestra and Cleveland Philharmonic Chorus Dec. 26.

Mr. Wagenaar's third symphony was first played in 1937 in a concert at the Juilliard School of Music under the composer's direction. It has also been played by the Chicago Civic Orchestra under Hans Lange and at Chautauqua in a broadcast concert under Albert Stoessel. Beveridge Webster, American pianist, will be the soloist in the Schumann concerto.

Two works which had their first hearings here last night, Van Vactor's "Overture to a Comedy" and Miaskovsky's violin concerto, with Mishel Piastro as soloist, will be repeated in Mr. Barbirolli's program for this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

Arturo Toscanini will conduct the National Broadcasting Company Symphony Orchestra in the fourth and last of its benefit concerts at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night, April 19, when the conductor's son-in-law, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, will be the soloist in a Tchaikovsky program. The proceeds will go to the Welfare Fund of the New York Junior League.

Philadelphia Orchestra

Eugene Ormandy will make his last New York appearance of the season with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the ninth concert of its Carnegie Hall series on Tuesday night, March 11. Helen Traubel, Metropolitan Opera soprano, will sing "Divinités du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste"; songs by Bach and Beethoven, and the Immolation Scene from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." Edna Phillips, first harpist of the orchestra, will be heard in the first New York performance of Harl McDonald's suite, "From Childhood," which was composed for her. Mr. McDonald planned the suite, which is based on several traditional nursery tunes, last summer and finished it last November. It was first played in Philadelphia Jan. 17 and has been played by this orchestra in Washington, Baltimore and other cities. Mr. Ormandy also will conduct Brahms's first symphony.

In the final concert of this series on Tuesday night, April 1, Leopold Stokowski will conduct Bach's St. Matthew Passion, with the Westminster Choir as the assisting chorus.

Out of Town

Leo Sowerby's symphony in F sharp minor, written for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in connection with its fiftieth season, will have its first performances under Frederick Stock's direction next Thursday and Friday in Chicago's Orchestra Hall. The composer, who is now organist and choirmaster of St. James's Church in Chicago, says that he is weary of reading the long dissertations and explanations provided by some composers, "which often turn out to be mere apologies," and thus has supplied no explanation of the music. It was sketched out in 1939 and completed last July. Vladimir Horowitz will be the soloist in this program in Brahms's second piano concerto.

The New York City W. P. A. Music Project's New York City Symphony Orchestra is continuing its popular-priced Sunday night series at Carnegie Hall under Frieder Weissmann's direction. Richard Bonelli, Metropolitan Opera barytone, will be tonight's soloist, and Joseph Schuster, first cellist of the Philharmonic-Symphony, will be heard next Sunday.

Two symphonies, Beethoven's Pastoral and Sibelius's fifth, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in its home concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The orchestra will play its fourth New York visit of the season in the following week, appearing, as usual, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon (March 13 and 15) and in Brooklyn on Friday evening, March 14.

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be this afternoon's soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra in its second popular Sunday concert of the season in the large Public Auditorium. In the next pair of regular concerts in Severance Hall, Artur Rodzinski will conduct Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. William Horne, tenor, and the Cleveland Orpheus Male Chorus, trained by Charles Dawe, will sing in the finale. Egon Petri will be the soloist in Liszt's piano concerto in E flat.

Two American works will be played by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under Fritz Reiner's direction next Friday evening and Sunday afternoon, March 7 and 9. Alvin Etler's Symphonietta will be played for the first time, and the Bach Choir, of Pittsburgh, will take part in the performances of Randall Thompson's "Americana." The other numbers are Hermann Hans Wetzler's overture "As You Like It" and the Mendelssohn violin concerto with Hugo Kolberg, concert master of the orchestra, as the soloist.

The National Symphony Orchestra, of Washington, D. C., will give an unusual program for the members of the orchestra association Wednesday night in the capital's Woodrow Wilson High School. Hans Kindler will conduct seven hitherto unperformed American works chosen from those submitted in a competition last fall. These will be identified only by a number. At the close the audience will express its preference by ballot, and the works receiving the most votes will have a public performance next season and be added to the orchestra's regular repertoire. The first half of Dr. Kindler's program for this afternoon in Constitution Hall will be devoted to Bach, with Hendrik Willem Van Loon as commentator and Grace Castagnetta as soloist in the D-minor concerto.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
BULLETIN
MAR 1 - 1941

For the LOVE of MIKE

By BEN KAPLAN

(TITLE REG. U.S. PATENT OFFICE)

From Koussevitzky, double-bass
Emeritus, who now must face
The flutes, the brass, the strings and harps
To well produce his flats and sharps,
We do obtain a word that's cheering
On radio and engineering.
"Unite," says he, "the wave constructor—
For best effect—with the conductor!"

* * *

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, listened to a demonstration of Frequency Modulation given by his Boston Symphony Orchestra at the WBZ studios in Boston the other day and was visibly astonished. So were an audience of musicians, professors and newspapermen, the latter category including your reporter, who has heard FM demonstrations before, but not under such grand conditions and with such fine results.

That Koussevitzky was delighted we haven't any doubt. He didn't hesitate to express his pleasure as he directed Arthur Fielder's telephone conversations with Assistant Conductor Richard Burgin at Symphony Hall. "My congratulations," Dr. Koussevitzky declared after the demonstration, "first to the engineers who made the broadcast possible, and secondly to my musicians. Through FM they will now be sure that the public hears what they give them by their instruments." He pointed out that FM opens up a new field for engineers, a field in which they should become specialists—"engineer conductors" who themselves understand music.

* * *

The demonstration was broadcast from the famous Boston Symphony Hall, with Koussevitzky's aide directing. It was fed from Symphony Hall direct to WBZ's master control board, then to the transmitter, and then picked up from the antenna by the studio. The musical portion of the broadcast included three selections—"Capriccio Espagnol" by Rimsky Korsakov, Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony" and an excerpt from "The Enchanted Lake" by Liadov.

The remarkable part about the broadcast was the ability to pick out each instrument individually. Dr. Koussevitzky remarked about this. "Every instrument sounds so clear, so beautiful, so natural," he said. "Each instrument keeps just the right color and timbre, particularly the clarinet." In orthodox broadcasting, he said, the sound of the clarinet is bad. So impressed was the conductor that at one point he had Fiedler interrupt the orchestra to tell the men how astonishingly beautiful the clarinet and oboe sounded.

* * *

Your reporter, we repeat, was duly impressed too, by the entire demonstration. But we were struck by a bit of artful dodging on a question we asked and which, apparently, interested some of the other newsmen attending. F. M. Sloan, chief engineer of WBZ, was asked how much actual monitoring was required in connection with the demonstration. That is one of the strong talking points of FM people—they claim that very little, if any, engineer control is needed.

But our question failed to produce a forthright answer. Mr. Sloan seemed to be hedging. He would not say there had been little control—as we had expected he might. He repeatedly declared—in answer to insistent reporters—that not as much monitoring as usual was required.

* * *

And while on the topic of monitoring, it would be rather interesting to know whether Petrillo, chief of the musicians' union, or any of his assistants found it necessary to do a bit of monitoring during the FM demonstration. If we're not mistaken, it was just last summer when the music union's leader announced that the Boston Symphony had been removed from the air and would not broadcast again.

The union's ban had to do, specifically, with the Pop Orchestra, conducted by Arthur Fiedler. However, the Pops Orchestra is merely the Symphony orchestra without the first desks. So it looks as though the Boston Symphony not only was heard via FM broadcasting for the first time in its history, but also was heard on the air for the first time since its banishment. The demonstration, you see, was picked up by FM set owners throughout Metropolitan Boston as well as by studio WBZ.

* * *

The Boston Symphony In 'FM' Demonstration

Transcd. 3/1/41

By JANE AYRES

Frequency modulation broadcasting (commonly known as FM) is still not much more than a name to those of us who are familiar only with the ordinary, or amplitude modulation (AM) broadcasting by which we hear our favorite programs.

So it was with considerable interest that a group of musicians, professors and newspapermen gathered at the WBZ studios in the Hotel Bradford this week to hear an experimental demonstration of Westinghouse FM station W1XK with the Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcasting from Symphony Hall.

Obvious center of attention was Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, seated by Arthur Fiedler and Mrs. Richard Burgin, wife of the assistant conductor who was directing at Symphony Hall. So clear and free from static was the music, that the orchestra seemed to be in the room.

Koussevitzky and Fiedler put their heads together, discussing the quality of the music. Then Fiedler reached for the phone, interrupting the music to say to Burgin that it was not quite clear, and "the oboes aren't in tune." It came somewhat as a surprise to hear Burgin respond via the radio, "All right, we'll try again." More phone calls followed, requesting more emphasis on the strings, and "the brasses a little warmer."

After several attempts to gain perfection in the details of the production of music, Koussevitsky seemed satisfied with its performance. Smiling delightedly, he whispered to Fiedler, who again lifted the phone, repeating Koussevitsky's words (you'll have to imagine the intriguing accent). As Fiedler telephoned: "Dr. Koussevitzky says it is astonishingly beautiful, and the oboes and clarinets are wonderful," we could hear the laughter of the orchestra members coming back over the loudspeaker.

. . . And the Whole World

After three-quarters of an hour of this most interesting performance, the demonstration came to an end. Dr. Koussevitsky seemed genuinely thrilled with the quality of FM reproduction of his music. Never before, he said, had he been able to pick out each instrument individually. Now, even the clarinets—which to him were the poorest over the air—came in perfectly. "The timbre of the instruments is so natural," said Dr. Koussevitzky. "I want first to congratulate my musicians and the broadcasting company"—then with a sweeping motion of his arms he added, "and the whole wide world!"

Dr. Koussevitsky suggested that there was a definite need for "young engineer-conductors"—musicians who would, with the necessary engineering training and their own musical background, know what to expect of musical reproduction, and give it the right treatment in the control rooms of the broadcasting studios.

F. M. Sloan, chief engineer of WBZ, explained that less dynamic control was necessary in FM broadcasting. There is less interference from other stations, and the absence of noise and static permits reproduction of overtones that cannot be heard on the AM method.

The microphone technique for this newer type of broadcasting will be greatly different, and it is now in the process of being studied and properly developed.

This Clipping From
MILWAUKEE, WIS.
JOURNAL
MAR 2 - 1941

Paul Hindemith Gets Award From Yale

One of Yale university's highest honors was bestowed on the composer Paul Hindemith recently at a gala evening. It was the opening of the Woolsey series of concerts in the university's magnificent hall; the Boston symphony played with a brilliance which is not uncommon, but which remains exciting nevertheless, and the program included Hindemith's violin sonata. Ruth Posselt was the interpreter.

The Howland Prize, established in 1915 in memory of Henry Elias Howland, may be given to a citizen of any country in recognition of distinguished achievement in the field of literature, the arts, and the science of government. Among the nine recipients thus far are Rupert Brooke, Gustav Holst, Robert Edmond Jones, and Salvador de Madariaga; Paul Hindemith is visiting professor of theory of music at Yale for the current year, and Dr. Koussevitzky revived the sonata as a gracious gesture to the composer and the university on this occasion. President Seymour made the presentation as the capacity audience rose in honor to Mr. Hindemith.

NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 2 - 1941

93

THE ORCHESTRAS

* * *

FOUR works will be introduced to the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's repertoire in this week's concerts at Carnegie Hall. On Thursday night and Friday evening, Italo Montemezzi will conduct the first American performances of his lyric poem, "Paul and Virginia," based upon Bernardin de St. Pierre's late eighteenth century story. This was first performed at the Augusteo in Rome in 1929, and has since been performed in the other principal Italian cities. John Barbirolli will conduct the other two numbers: Vaughan Williams's Tallis Fantasia and Beethoven's seventh symphony.

Three American works will have their first public performances here in Mr. Barbirolli's program for next Saturday night and Sunday afternoon. Morton Gould, who was born in Richmond Hill, Queens, twenty-seven years ago, will be represented by his "Foster Gallery," in thirteen sections, based upon Stephen C. Foster's songs and dances. The other novelties are Roy Harris's Three Pieces for Orchestra and Bernard Wagenaar's third symphony.

Mr. Gould writes that much of his material was gathered from the Lilly collection of Fosteriana titled "Foster Hall." There are thirteen short movements "which might be classified as 'variations' in the very general sense of the term." The suite opens with the "Camptown Races," and this tune recurs throughout the composition, linking it together in the manner of the "Promenade" in Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition." It was first played by the Pittsburgh Symphony under Fritz Reiner on Jan. 12, 1940.

Two of Mr. Harris's three pieces are interludes from his Folk Song Symphony for chorus and orchestra; the third is a new middle movement written "to complement the other two movements and make a balanced suite." Most of the Folk Song symphony was first heard in Rochester last April in the Eastman School's American Music Festival. It was first performed in full by the Cleveland Orchestra and Cleveland Philharmonic Chorus Dec. 26.

Mr. Wagenaar's third symphony was first played in 1937 in a concert at the Juilliard School of Music under the composer's direction. It has also been played by the Chicago Civic Orchestra under Hans Lange and at Chautauqua in a broadcast concert under Albert Stoessel. Beveridge Webster, American pianist, will be the soloist in the Schumann concerto.

Two works which had their first hearings here last night, Van Vactor's "Overture to a Comedy" and Miaskovsky's violin concerto, with Mishel Piastro as soloist, will be repeated in Mr. Barbirolli's program for this afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

Arturo Toscanini will conduct the National Broadcasting Company Symphony Orchestra in the fourth and last of its benefit concerts at Carnegie Hall on Saturday night, April 19, when the conductor's son-in-law, Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, will be the soloist in a Tchaikovsky program. The proceeds will go to the Welfare Fund of the New York Junior League.

Philadelphia Orchestra

Eugene Ormandy will make his last New York appearance of the season with the Philadelphia Orchestra in the ninth concert of its Carnegie Hall series on Tuesday night, March 11. Helen Traubel, Metropolitan Opera soprano, will sing "Divinités du Styx," from Gluck's "Alceste"; songs by Bach and Beethoven, and the Immolation Scene from Wagner's "Götterdämmerung." Edna Phillips, first harpist of the orchestra, will be heard in the first New York performance of Harl McDonald's suite, "From Childhood," which was composed for her. Mr. McDonald planned the suite, which is based on several traditional nursery tunes, last summer and finished it last November. It was first played in Philadelphia Jan. 17 and has been played by this orchestra in Washington, Baltimore and other cities. Mr. Ormandy also will conduct Brahms's first symphony.

In the final concert of this series on Tuesday night, April 1, Leopold Stokowski will conduct Bach's St. Matthew Passion, with the Westminster Choir as the assisting chorus.

Out of Town

Leo Sowerby's symphony in F sharp minor, written for the Chicago Symphony Orchestra in connection with its fiftieth season, will have its first performances under Frederick Stock's direction next Thursday and Friday in Chicago's Orchestra Hall. The composer, who is now organist and choirmaster of St. James's Church in Chicago, says that he is weary of reading the long dissertations and explanations provided by some composers, "which often turn out to be mere apologies," and thus has supplied no explanation of the music. It was sketched out in 1939 and completed last July. Vladimir Horowitz will be the soloist in this program in Brahms's second piano concerto.

The New York City W. P. A. Music Project's New York City Symphony Orchestra is continuing its popular-priced Sunday night series at Carnegie Hall under Frieder Weissmann's direction. Richard Bonelli, Metropolitan Opera baritone, will be tonight's soloist, and Joseph Schuster, first cello of the Philharmonic-Symphony, will be heard next Sunday.

Two symphonies, Beethoven's Pastoral and Sibelius's fifth, will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitzky's direction in its home concerts next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. The orchestra will play its fourth New York visit of the season in the following week, appearing, as usual, in Carnegie Hall on Thursday night and Saturday afternoon (March 13 and 15) and in Brooklyn on Friday evening, March 14.

Sergei Rachmaninoff will be this afternoon's soloist with the Cleveland Orchestra in its second popular Sunday concert of the season in the large Public Auditorium. In the next pair of regular concerts in Severance Hall, Artur Rodzinski will conduct Liszt's "Faust" Symphony. William Horne, tenor, and the Cleveland Orpheus Male Chorus, trained by Charles Dawe, will sing in the finale. Egon Petri will be the soloist in Liszt's piano concerto in E flat.

Two American works will be played by the Pittsburgh Symphony Orchestra under Fritz Reiner's direction next Friday evening and Sunday afternoon, March 7 and 9. Alvin Etler's Symphonietta will be played for the first time, and the Bach Choir, of Pittsburgh, will take part in the performances of Randall Thompson's "Americana." The other numbers are Hermann Hans Wetzler's overture "As You Like It" and the Mendelssohn violin concerto with Hugo Kolberg, concert master of the orchestra, as the soloist.

The National Symphony Orchestra, of Washington, D. C., will give an unusual program for the members of the orchestra association Wednesday night in the capital's Woodrow Wilson High School. Hans Kindler will conduct seven hitherto unperformed American works chosen from those submitted in a competition last fall. These will be identified only by a number. At the close the audience will express its preference by ballot, and the works receiving the most votes will have a public performance next season and be added to the orchestra's regular repertoire. The first half of Dr. Kindler's program for this afternoon in Constitution Hall will be devoted to Bach, with Hendrik Willem Van Loon as commentator and Grace Castagnetta as soloist in the D-minor concerto.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
SUN
MAR 1 - 1941

94

Music and Musicians

About 3 American Composers—Bernard Wagenaar, Roy Harris and Morton Gould.

By WILLIAM G. KING.

Next week-end's Philharmonic-Symphony concerts in Carnegie Hall will introduce three major compositions of as many outstanding American composers to New York audiences. The gentlemen involved, all residents of New York city, and one of them a native son, are Roy Harris, Morton Gould and Bernard Wagenaar.

I've talked with all of them this week, and, while each is so interesting a personality that a full column might easily be devoted to him, the factors of space and timeliness make it necessary for them to share a story as they're sharing a concert program.

Let's take them alphabetically—which also happens to be in reverse order of seniority. Young Morton Gould—he was 28 years old last December—was born out in Richmond Hill and went to grammar and high school there. Before he had finished the latter he was already making a living through his music. He had begun the study of piano when he was four years old, had had a year at the Institute of Musical Art at the age of eight, and by the time he was seventeen had embarked on a vaudeville career as half of the two-piano team of Gould and Shafter. The act played all over the country, and later toured as accompanists to the dancing DeMarcos. Gould, who has been improvising and arranging and composing for almost as long as he can remember, got a job on the Radio City Music Hall staff when that theater opened. Some time later—he'd acquired the technic of conducting in the meanwhile—the Mutual Broadcasting Company engaged him to direct the weekly half-hour concert which is still, after five years, one of the better sustaining programs. Gould writes or arranges most of the music for it.

He was only twenty-one when Leopold Stokowski introduced his Choral and Fugue in Jazz with the Philadelphia Orchestra. Since then many other first-rank orchestras have played his works, among them the Philharmonic-Symphony, the Cleveland, the Boston and the Pittsburgh.

"I seem to be something of a problem to a lot of people," he said, "because I've been tagged as a radio musician. I believe there's a tendency to overemphasize the commercial aspects of composing for radio. Radio and all it implies psychologically and financially, gives one a very practical working tool not only for dealing with the mechanics of living, but for functioning as an artist. It's helped to make me aware of the value of the popular material around us. To me, jazz and swing and jive, combined with our marvelous folksongs, are vitally important for our musical development. Some of our 'serious' composers seem to be holding themselves apart from this. But what's the use of trying to function as an isolated water-lily, writing stuff that only you and your mother like, and she only because she's prejudiced in your favor?"

Many of his works are inspired by American folk-music, but he insists that they aren't "derivative." About his "Foster Gallery," which the Philharmonic will play, he says that he has "attempted to retain and intensify the sincerity and simplicity of Stephen Foster and his time and to mold this into an art form." Just now he's working on a "Cowboy Rhapsody" for orchestra, based on Western tunes.

Mr. Harris.

How Roy Harris escaped a political career, in view of his background, is something of a mystery. He was born in a log-cabin in Lincoln county, Okla., on Lincoln's Birthday, 1898. His father was a farmer, and Roy once earned his living driving a truck. But the political potentials were not as strong as the musical urges which he'd felt since his mother gave him his first piano lessons when he was six or seven.

While he was attending the University of California he composed what he calls "a tremendous work, for orchestra, double chorus, and so on," and orchestrated it out of a book, since he'd had no training in that craft. A friend of his showed it to Alfred Hertz, then conductor of the San Francisco Symphony. Hertz sent for him, and although in Harris's words, he "roared with laughter at some of my mistakes," he told him he had a gift and should devote himself to composition. Harris did. That was when he earned his living by driving a truck in the day time in order to study music with Modest Altschuler and Arthur Farwell at night.

In 1926 Willem Van Hoogstraten saw a work called simply "Andante," and listed it for performance by the Philharmonic-Symphony at a Lewisohn Stadium concert. Harris came East to the MacDowell Colony that summer, and of course was present when his piece was played.

"After that it was like a fairy-story," he said. A patron arranged for him to go to Paris to continue his studies with Nadia Boulanger, and then he won a Guggenheim fellowship. Today he is among the best known and most widely performed of American composers. The Philharmonic-Symphony will play his "Three Pieces for Orchestra" next week end. This consists of two interludes from his "Folksong" Symphony (No. 4), with a new movement composed to "complement the other movements and make it a balanced suite." The "Folksong" Symphony was played here by the Boston Symphony on its last visit. He has just finished a work called "Ode to Truth" commissioned for the fiftieth anniversary celebration of Stanford University, and he's working on a 'cello concerto for Gregor Piatigorsky. He thinks that some of his earlier works missed understanding because "I packed my stuff so tightly, used such fast tempi, that listeners weren't able to assimiliate them." The newer things have achieved greater popularity, he believes, because he has developed the ability to express his ideas in less concentrated form.

"I've been trying to develop a new kind of consonance by balancing chords so that the overtone series of the lower ones support the upper harmonics in such a way that they are more brilliant," he said. "And one other thing—lately I've been much more concerned with what I call preserving tonality in a polytonal way. The early things contained quite a bit of atonality. Also I think my works are better understood now because the aural capacity of those who listen to music in this country has quickened so greatly in the last few years, thanks chiefly to the radio." Mr. Harris, as you probably know, is married to Johana Harris, the pianist.

And Mr. Wagenaar.

For a considerable time Bernard Wagenaar has harbored the conviction that contemporary music was following a wrong emotional track in its pursuit of "modernism." And this, he believes, led to the creation and performance of many works which were merely "laboratory experiments."

"Concert goers were paying their money to hear composers practice in public," he said. His Symphony No. 3, which the Philharmonic-Symphony will play, is one of his four latest major works, all of which, in his opinion, have greater simplicity and repose than his earlier efforts. The others of the four are the String Quartet No. 3, the Triple Concerto (performed by the Philharmonic under Toscanini a few years ago), and the Violin Concerto.

"In my Symphony No. 2," he said, "I was interested in exploiting the possibilities of a huge modern orchestra. (This work also was performed by the Philharmonic under Toscanini.) I was trying for a large scale tonal pattern, and although I didn't deliberately try for it, its dissonance was noted. I think, almost in spite of myself, I was influenced by the musical conceptions current at that time.

"Since then I've come to realize that the largest resources of the orchestra are not necessary to realize desired climaxes. The Third Symphony is compact, simple and lyrical, and follows the time-honored traditions of the symphonic form. It represents a reaction from what I attempted in the Second Symphony."

Wagenaar, although he was born in Arnhem, Holland (the date was July 18, 1894), has often been told that there is something "unquestionably American" about his work, and this pleases him greatly. He feels that powerful influences of environment make themselves felt in a composer and that it is therefore pointless to make any deliberate effort to be an American composer. He says he knew that "America was what I was after" as soon as he got here in 1920, and he became a citizen as soon as possible.

He comes of a family that for generations has had at least one member who was a professional musician. He is a nephew and pupil of Dr. Johan Wagenaar, dean of Dutch composers, and director of the Royal Conservatory of Music at The Hague.

Bernard Wagenaar was a member of the violin section of the New York Philharmonic from 1921 through 1925. Since 1927 he has been on the faculty of the Juilliard School of Music, teaching fugue, orchestration and composition. Most of his own composing is done during the four months' vacation period.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM
MAR 2 - 1941

Boston String Quartet To Play Here Today

The Boston String Quartet, to present a concert in the Worcester Art Museum this afternoon, consists of Harrison Keller, first violin; Alfred Krips, second violin; Georges Fourel, viola; and Alfred Zighera, cello.

Mr. Keller, who is director, won a chamber music prize in the Stern Conservatory, Berlin. He was a pupil of Leopold Auer in Leningrad. He has been a member of the Boston Conservatory faculty since 1921.

Mr. Krips, a newcomer to the museum concerts and a former member of the Berlin State Opera Orchestra, is a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the conservatory faculty.

Mr. Fourel was a first prize student in the Paris Conservatory. He has been a member of the Paris Conservatory and of the Boston Symphony Orchestra since 1921.

Mr. Zighera won a first prize in the Paris Conservatory. He was solo cellist of the Paris Conservatory and of Dr. Koussevitsky's orchestra in Paris. He is a master of the viola da gamba. He has been a member of the Boston Symphony since 1925.

This Clipping From
NEW BEDFORD, MASS.
STANDARD TIMES
MAR 3 - 1941

Boston Symphony Has Novel Program

Three young men wrote the program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra's extra monthly program of tonight and Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock, but they wrote the music in three different centuries. That is the ingenious plot devised by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who is famous for programs with ideas.

First will come "A Little Night Music," written by Mozart at the age of 23, in the year 1788. The "Fantastic Symphony," written by Berlioz at the age of 28, will show the radical orchestral changes this youth effected in the following century, in 1831. From that time, Berlioz developed the orchestral effect so fully, that little if anything has been added since to what he worked out or hinted at.

The present generation will be represented by the third symphony of Nikolai Berezowski, which he composed in 1936 at the age of 36. Berezowski, as a composer, is a product of America. Born in Russia in 1900, he began his musical career as a violinist. Arriving in this country at the age of 22, he joined the New York Philharmonic Orchestra and became leader of the second violins.

Berezowski first made a serious study of composition under New York teachers, including Rubin Goldmark. In 1925 he wrote his first symphony. With his second, four years later, he resigned from the orchestra, for the career of composer.

In typical American spirit, he knows what he has to say and says it in energetic and concise music.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Three items out of this season's regular repertory are offered by Mr. Koussevitzky conducting the Boston Symphony in the fifth program of the Monday evening-Tuesday afternoon series of concerts. They are Mozart's deft, appealing little string serenade "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik"; Nicolai Berezowsky's rugged Third Symphony and Hector Berlioz' set of variations on his love for an Irish actress whom he eventually married—the "Fantastic" Symphony.

Mr. Koussevitzky and a small orchestra played the Mozart serenade with charming neatness and that certain fondness which one has for an old friend.

The high strung, hotly romantic "Fantastic" Symphony was put right in the vein. It is extravagant in gesture, inflection and meaning. The composer indulged himself in his own emotions, but they were elemental; hence universal and close to all humans. There are bare, even cheap pages; but above all there is the poetic imagination.

The dream love story of the first movement is really beautiful. And the second movement is brilliant without being hard. But the demons in the third are enough to scare one, while the last two movements are as lurid as anything musical. It seemed last night, that Mr. Koussevitzky realized all the depths of the "Fantastic."

Having heard his version, one is inclined to feel that there can be little more inherent in the work, than has been shown.

The magic of the Boston Symphony and Mr. Koussevitzky was worked again for the Berezowsky Symphony. It is facile and formally designed with considerable breadth. The harmonies are virile, though not at all unpleasant. But, and despite Mr. Koussevitsky's warming interpretation, it has a cold intellectual quality that is clever without being substantial. Its rhythms are quite outstanding. In the second of the three movements, especially, where fragmentary themes are literally thrown from choir to choir, the cross rhythms are highly complex. Balky and syncopated, they require Mr. Koussevitzky's impelling force to keep them from getting out of hand. They must be fiendishly difficult to play accurately. The orchestra behaved magnificently.

The program will be repeated this afternoon at 3.

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Monday Symphony

The fifth concert in the subsidiary series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given last night in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart..."Eine kleine Nachtmusic" K. 525
Berezowsky.....Symphony No. 3 Op. 21
Berlioz.....Fantastic Symphony Op. 14A

Very often these concerts of the shorter series take the habitual listener by surprise. Accustomed as he is to assume, with a touch of intellectual snobbism, that the supreme efforts of men and conductor are reserved for the regular series, he is unprepared for the brilliance with which the orchestra does in fact sound regardless of the day. It is easy, for instance, for those of us who think our palates are a little jaded with draughts of music to feel a slight sinking of the spirit face to face with yet another performance of Berlioz's Fantastic Symphony.

Such was the miracle of playing wrought last night, however, that this historic score sounded with renewed vitality. It is largely a matter of getting into the right frame of mind, the proper romantic mood, to enjoy the Fantastic Symphony to the hilt. Frequently this is impossible of achievement. But last night, thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation and the orchestra's response to his demands, it must have been a dull listener who was not moved.

Previously we heard a fine performance of Mr. Nicolai Berezowsky's invigorating and interesting 3rd Symphony. We have now listened to this work a sufficient number of times to feel perfectly at home with it. The freakishness of the scherzo, for instance, no longer makes us wonder how it would bear up under repetition. We know that it wears well.

At its first performance four years ago we recorded some doubts about the effectiveness of the finale, while admiring the first movement and the scherzo. It now emerges that the finale is, if anything, the strongest movement of the three. It is certainly the most powerful emotionally, the most subjective, if you like. In the course of the variations you feel the impact of an urgent and rather morbid imagination. The other movements though well made and interesting music, have less of this compelling force. The symphony as a whole has proved to be well worth reviving.

A most delicate and gracious performance of Mozart's captivating Serenade by the string band opened this skillfully chosen program. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
LAWRENCE, MASS.
TRIBUNE
MAR 3 - 1941

YOUNG MUSICIANS' MUSIC ON SYMPHONY PROGRAM

BOSTON, March 3—Three young men wrote the program for the Boston Symphony orchestra's extra monthly program of tonight and tomorrow afternoon at 3 o'clock, and they wrote the music in three different centuries. That is the ingenious plot devised by Conductor Serge Koussevitzky, who is famous for programs with ideas. First will come "A Little Night Music," written by Mozart at the age of 23, in the year 1788. The "Fantastic Symphony," written by Berlioz at the age of 28, will show the radical orchestral changes this youth effected in the following century, in 1831. The present generation will be represented by the Third Symphony of Nikolai Berezowski, which he composed in 1936 at the age of 36.

Berezowski, as a composer, is a product of America. Born in Russia in 1900. In typical American spirit, he knows what he has to say and says it in energetic and concise music.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
NEWS
MAR 3 - 1941

Broadway

By DANTON WALKER.

Gotham Gazette

Wendell Willkie has been proffered the job of heading the New York Stock Exchange when President William McChesney Martin is drafted in June . . . Lieut.-Col. Darryl Zanuck has been ordered to Washington to discuss production of Government training films and outline a plan for that industry . . . Jimmy Cromwell would like to do one of those sightseeing-for-publicity tours of Britain, too, but the Democrat bigwigs are agin it . . . General Maximo Camacho, brother to Mexico's new President, is coming to New York for an eye operation, stopping off in the Bahamas en route to visit the Duke of Windsor . . . Col. Pat Hurley, former U. S. Secretary of War, is now in Venezuela representing the Sinclair oil interests . . . Hal Roach, Dave Selznick, Frank Capra and Mary Pickford will head a new movie company . . . Jan Valtin, author of the much discussed "Out of the Night," did a stretch in San Quentin back in 1929 under his real name, Richard Julius Herman Krebs . . . and a French refugee informs me that all that to-do over transferring the Duke of Reichstadt's ashes to Napoleon's Tomb in Paris was a Nazi gesture to woo General Weygand, who is a grandson of the Duke and therefore a great-grandson of Napoleon Bonaparte. He is also a close blood relation to the ill-fated Emperor Maximilian of Mexico.

* * *

The Theatre Guild's reluctance to produce Eugene O'Neill's latest play, "The Ice Man Cometh," is not for the reasons advanced but for fear of the censors. The script makes "Tobacco Road" read like a Sunday School tract . . . The proud Boston Symphony will bow to the American Federation of Musicians within the month, over the protests of its wealthy Boston backer . . . Loyalist Spain's former Minister to Mexico is reported in New York trying to hock $135,000,000 worth of gold and treasure salvaged before the Loyalist collapse, for the purpose of financing a Monarchist-Catholic-Liberal-Socialist revolution against Franco . . . The American Red Cross is soliciting blood donations for the United States Army and Navy "to supply the demands of our National Defense or for other emergencies at home or abroad" . . . RCA may wind up

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony season is beginning to end. Last evening brought the last concert but one of the Monday series. The programme, which will be repeated this afternoon, had at its extremes Mozart's Serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony. Between them came the Second Symphony of the Russian-American Nicolai Berezowsky.

Mozart's perennially fresh and charming composition had not been heard at Symphony Hall this season. The two other numbers had been performed at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and with the "Fantastic" Dr. Koussevitzky had scored one of his most notable triumphs of recent years. The conductor's devotion to Mr. Berezowsky's music is a little hard to understand, for, on the whole, it is quite undistinguished though it displays a certain craftsmanship. The most successful piece thus far has been the Toccata, Variations and Finale for string quartet and orchestra, played here in 1938. Here Mr. Berezowsky seemed to have found something to say that was individual and arresting. The Symphony of last evening has pleasant and effective moments but the musical ideas are so devoid of salience that the piece goes in one ear and comes out the other. There is nothing about it that sticks. Certainly the performance did everything for it that might be done. The Mozart was beautifully played.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1941

Pianist Will Play At WPA Concert

PROVIDENCE — The Rhode Island WPA Symphony orchestra will present Alexandre Peloquin, pianist, as soloist at Gilbert Stuart junior high school Sunday night. He will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 23.

An old composition from the collection of rare music in the New York Public Library, a concerto by the German composer, Peter von Winter, for oboe and small orchestra, will be played, with Riccardo di Benedetto as soloist.

Samuel J. Liebovici, violinist, a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be soloist on the final program of the series March 16, and will play the Saint-Saens Concerto No. 3.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

Symphony

Monday's Concert At Symphony Hall

Although there was a contemporary work on last evening's Boston Symphony program, it was a 110-year-old symphony, Berlioz' "Fantastic" which brought the concert to a close, that seemed the more vital and absorbing of the two.

Once again, in other words, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra made the neurotic Frenchman's masterpiece of wild poetic fancy a vast and exciting experience. One has heard brilliant performances of the symphony before, particularly of the last two movements whose effectiveness is almost impossible to dull, but none which has so tremendous a sense of forboding and of mystic evil as that with which Dr. Koussevitzky imbues them. Not only that, but in this reading the customarily long-winded adagio movement, the "Scene in the Meadows," becomes a sensitive and affecting tone-poem that holds the attention from beginning to end. And when was there ever a more silken and romantic interpretation of the second movement, the scene at the ball?

The modern work on the program was Nicolai Berezowski's Third Symphony, completed only five years ago and several times performed at Boston Symphony concerts. The conscientious and rhythmically intricate music was played with intense conviction and force. But for all that, and in spite of many beautiful passages (the solemn introduction to the first movement, the waltz theme of the second movement, to mention a few), Mr. Berezewski's symphony too frequently impresses one as being confused and lacking in a definite individuality.

The concert opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which Dr. Koussevitzky took at an unusually fast tempo that made the wonderfully felicitous music sound urbane and brilliant. But something of the mannered elegance it should have was missing. There was more of the witty Paris salon in the performance than of the Austrian court.

The program is repeated this afternoon at Symphony Hall.

M. H.

Monday Symphony

Berlioz's 'Fantastique' Revived by Koussevitzky

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Of all examples of nineteenth-century music that have improved in presentation under modern style, taste, and method, the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, which stood on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, is perhaps the most notable. Indeed, this could fairly be called the only big piece of scoring in the repertory that has needed a period of 100 years practice to make perfect. If another were to be mentioned in like case, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt might be it. No doubt the works of Beethoven were about as well performed in the early seasons of the Boston Symphony as they are today, save perhaps the Symphony No. 9. But certainly Berlioz fares better than formerly, and better even at Dr. Koussevitzky's hand than not so long ago.

For it has always been acknowledged that Berlioz, simple and transparent though he is from the standpoints of melody, harmony, and structure, wrote ahead of his period. There existed great orchestras then, but they scarcely presumed to solve the problems that he offers to be solved. Composers for orchestra since his time have all been his pupils, and only through their study of his ways and their completion of his aims, have instrumentalists been put in a position to master him. By rather general admission, tone poems, whether realistic or impressionistic, written at the end of the last century, and orchestral efforts made so far in the present one under the name of symphony or whatever else, have been explorations in paths pioneered by Berlioz. Everything has been an exercise whereby players have fitted themselves to do justice by the "Fantastic" Symphony.

Today, accordingly, an orchestra can take up the set of five pieces, or movements, that comprise this strange, yet straightforward, study and not only "read," but also interpret them. Artists from piccolo to doublebass have the job in control, and there is no nuance of tone nor impulse of rhythm but the conductor commands it. Take the episode entitled "Scene in the Meadows"; what piping we hear of a shepherd near at hand, and what friendly reply of another in the distance! Then, too, the drums. It wants three good men to handle all the mallets needed for the desired effect; or is the number four? In any case, the song is one that only the tympani can sing. A violin can hardly attain so light a vibration, the next thing to inaudibility; and the loudest brass strives vainly against them when they let go in full voice. Neither finicky tapping, however, at the one extreme nor blatant pounding at the other is in evidence.

Again, listen to the cymbals in the fourth episode, "March to the Scaffold." How does Berlioz modify their clash and blend it in, so that it comes through as tone instead of racket? Skillful striking together of the plates must probably be regarded as the chief matter; and further, it may make some difference about the sleeve in which the trembling of the metal is quenched, whether the cloth of the player's coat is woven of wool from Australia or from Montana.

With the "Fantastic" Symphony on the fifth of the Monday programs were the "Nachtmusik" Serenade for string Orchestra, (K.525) of Mozart, and the Symphony No. 3, Opus 21, of Berezowsky.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
MAR 6 - 1941

Our Own Way
New York Times

Serge Koussevitzky will become an American citizen in a few weeks. He told the naturalization officers in Boston that seventeen years ago the Bolsheviks took away his home and property in Russia and recently the Germans seized a new home he had acquired in France. The eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony expressed his confident belief that no such thing will happen to him in a free country.

Obviously Dr. Koussevitzky is in no danger of expropriation over here, but by March 15 at the latest he is sure to be reminded that in the free countries they have such things as income taxes, real estate taxes, corporation taxes, occupation taxes, sales taxes, Federal taxes, State taxes, permanent taxes and non-submersible emergency taxes. And it looks now that the freer these countries want to remain the more taxes they will have to think up.

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
MAR 4 - 1941

Our "Musical Calendar" will be climaxed by an unusually full repertoire to be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky in his 18th pair of concerts for the season. Time: Friday afternoon, 2.30, and Saturday evening, 8.15 o'clock. The program is exrellent, featuring Mozart's superb overture to "The Magic Flute;" Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral;" climaxed by Sibelius' much loved 5th Symphony in E flat major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM ARDMORE, PA
MAIN LINE TIMES
3/6/41

The MusicLover's Corner

By JOSEPH E. BARONE

Why do they do it? Why do artists of first rank insist on "breaking into the news" at the slightest provocation, particularly when they no longer need cheap publicity of this sort? One can possibly understand why a rising youngster must avail himself of every avenue which might lead him to a wider recognition. But in the case of the established musician, it only tends to lower him from the high pedestal on which public favor has placed him. And too often he only betrays those who think of him as something of a musical God.

Take Stokowski, for example. No matter what has transpired during the past quarter of a century, most of us still look up to him as a sort of ideal. Even stories of Greta Garbo escapades, Mickey Mouse movies, and radical orchestral seating plans leave us unshaken in our implicit faith.

But now comes a new batch of stories concerning Army Bands, and really, it's enough to cause the most faithful to entertain some doubt. It seems that the bands of the future should be made up chiefly of saxophones (heaven forbid!), and that they should play in armored tanks. Also that the music should be pitched very high in order to rise above the din of the shooting. Frankly, I choose to believe that Dr. Stokowski was in one of his facetious moods when he made this announcement. I just can't believe that he would let us down so competely.

Then there is Koussevitzky. Most of us agree that he is without equal when he conducts works of the Russian School. And while I, personally, cannot drive myself to the point of rating him with Stokowski and Toscanini, I do feel that he is a great conductor.

But when he conducted the Boston Symphony here a few weeks ago his obvious choreography of baton technique was so theatrical that the complete performance of this superb orchestra was spoiled for me. The suave Dr. Koussevitzky was so polished in his motions, that his arms seemed to go through a well-rehearsed routine. And his trick of holding a six-inch baton as if it were a cigarette-holder was simply the last straw. To be sure, he directed with apparent enthusiasm—appearing to be on a verge of attack of apoplexy all evening — but never once did he seem to penetrate the superficial values of the music at hand. It all seemed like a trained-seal act — which is not good theatre, even at its best.

However, the new low was reached when Jose Iturbi guest-conductor, conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra here last week. As a pianist, he is something more than commendable; and as a conductor, he is well above average. But when he combines the two, he is no longer a musician but an arcrobat. When he first started this trick, a few years ago, in Concerti by Mozart, it was something of a novelty, and one overlooked the orchestral accompaniment since it was virtually chamber music. But in a large work by Liszt, it simply can't be done,—a fact which Mr. Iturbi unwittingly proved.

A novelty these days would be a conductor who simply conducted, without resorting to exotic arm contortions, hysterical displays of emotional temperament, and other arty tricks of Barnum variety.

But until one comes along, I suppose we can expect the worst. And I won't be too startled if, next time Iturbi comes to town, he not only conducts and plays the piano at the same time, but does a tango for good measure. Carrying a red rose in his teeth. . . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
MAR 4 - 1941

Distinguished Addition
(Boston Transcript)

According to "Washington Review," the official publication of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, 1940 naturalizations so far exceeded those of the preceding year that they topped all fees "received by the clerks of Federal Courts from all other sources." According to the clerk of the Federal Court of Boston, however, this present month of February, 1941, has given more to America than many months of 1940. The clerk did not put it in quite those words; but the fact became self-evident when he announced that yesterday afternoon Serge Koussevitsky received his "final papers" and became a full-fledged American citizen.

In one respect, the issuing of those papers is a work of supererogation, for, in that respect, which is to say in political and social spirit, Dr. Koussevitsky became an American at the moment he first set foot on American soil—indeed, in his political and social outlook, he was an American long before coming to this country. Nevertheless, in another respect, the great conductor is a citizen of all the world—because music is international, and Dr. Koussevitsky is a magnificent musician.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
NEWS
MAR 3 - 1941

Broadway

By DANTON WALKER.

Gotham Gazette

Wendell Willkie has been proffered the job of heading the New York Stock Exchange when President William McChesney Martin is drafted in June . . . Lieut.-Col. Darryl Zanuck has been ordered to Washington to discuss production of Government training films and outline a plan for that industry . . . Jimmy Cromwell would like to do one of those sightseeing-for-publicity tours of Britain, too, but the Democrat bigwigs are agin it . . . General Maximo Camacho, brother to Mexico's new President, is coming to New York for an eye operation, stopping off in the Bahamas en route to visit the Duke of Windsor . . . Col. Pat Hurley, former U. S. Secretary of War, is now in Venezuela representing the Sinclair oil interests . . . Hal Roach, Dave Selznick, Frank Capra and Mary Pickford will head a new movie company . . . Jan Valtin, author of the much discussed "Out of the Night," did a stretch in San Quentin back in 1929 under his real name, Richard Julius Herman Krebs . . . and a French refugee informs me that all that to-do over transferring the Duke of Reichstadt's ashes to Napoleon's Tomb in Paris was a Nazi gesture to woo General Weygand, who is a grandson of the Duke and therefore a great-grandson of Napoleon Bonaparte. He is also a close blood relation to the ill-fated Emperor Maximilian of Mexico.

* * *

The Theatre Guild's reluctance to produce Eugene O'Neill's latest play, "The Ice Man Cometh," is not for the reasons advanced but for fear of the censors. The script makes "Tobacco Road" read like a Sunday School tract . . . The proud Boston Symphony will bow to the American Federation of Musicians within the month, over the protests of its wealthy Boston backer . . . Loyalist Spain's former Minister to Mexico is reported in New York trying to hock $135,000,000 worth of gold and treasure salvaged before the Loyalist collapse, for the purpose of financing a Monarchist-Catholic-Liberal-Socialist revolution against Franco . . . The American Red Cross is soliciting blood donations for the United States Army and Navy "to supply the demands of our National Defense or for other emergencies at home or abroad" . . . RCA may wind up

SYMPHONY CONCERT
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony season is beginning to end. Last evening brought the last concert but one of the Monday series. The programme, which will be repeated this afternoon, had at its extremes Mozart's Serenade for strings, "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," and Berlioz' "Fantastic" Symphony. Between them came the Second Symphony of the Russian-American Nicolai Berezowsky.

Mozart's perennially fresh and charming composition had not been heard at Symphony Hall this season. The two other numbers had been performed at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and with the "Fantastic" Dr. Koussevitzky had scored one of his most notable triumphs of recent years. The conductor's devotion to Mr. Berezowsky's music is a little hard to understand, for, on the whole, it is quite undistinguished though it displays a certain craftsmanship. The most successful piece thus far has been the Toccata, Variations and Finale for string quartet and orchestra, played here in 1938. Here Mr. Berezowsky seemed to have found something to say that was individual and arresting. The Symphony of last evening has pleasant and effective moments but the musical ideas are so devoid of salience that the piece goes in one ear and comes out the other. There is nothing about it that sticks. Certainly the performance did everything for it that might be done. The Mozart was beautifully played.

This Clipping From
PAWTUCKET, R. I.
TIMES
MAR 5 - 1941

Pianist Will Play At WPA Concert

PROVIDENCE — The Rhode Island WPA Symphony orchestra will present Alexandre Peloquin, pianist, as soloist at Gilbert Stuart junior high school Sunday night. He will play the Tschaikowsky Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1 in B flat minor, Op. 23.

An old composition from the collection of rare music in the New York Public Library, a concerto by the German composer, Peter von Winter, for oboe and small orchestra, will be played, with Riccardo di Benedetto as soloist.

Samuel J. Liebovici, violinist, a member of the Boston Symphony orchestra, will be soloist on the final program of the series March 16, and will play the Saint-Saens Concerto No. 3.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

Symphony

Monday's Concert At Symphony Hall

Although there was a contemporary work on last evening's Boston Symphony program, it was a 110-year-old symphony, Berlioz' "Fantastic" which brought the concert to a close, that seemed the more vital and absorbing of the two.

Once again, in other words, Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra made the neurotic Frenchman's masterpiece of wild poetic fancy a vast and exciting experience. One has heard brilliant performances of the symphony before, particularly of the last two movements whose effectiveness is almost impossible to dull, but none which has so tremendous a sense of forboding and of mystic evil as that with which Dr. Koussevitzky imbues them. Not only that, but in this reading the customarily long-winded adagio movement, the "Scene in the Meadows," becomes a sensitive and affecting tone-poem that holds the attention from beginning to end. And when was there ever a more silken and romantic interpretation of the second movement, the scene at the ball?

The modern work on the program was Nicolai Berezowski's Third Symphony, completed only five years ago and several times performed at Boston Symphony concerts. The conscientious and rhythmically intricate music was played with intense conviction and force. But for all that, and in spite of many beautiful passages (the solemn introduction to the first movement, the waltz theme of the second movement, to mention a few), Mr. Berezewski's symphony too frequently impresses one as being confused and lacking in a definite individuality.

The concert opened with Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik," which Dr. Koussevitzky took at an unusually fast tempo that made the wonderfully felicitous music sound urbane and brilliant. But something of the mannered elegance it should have was missing. There was more of the witty Paris salon in the performance than of the Austrian court.

The program is repeated this afternoon at Symphony Hall.

M. H.

Monday Symphony

Berlioz's 'Fantastique' Revived by Koussevitzky

By Winthrop P. Tryon

Of all examples of nineteenth-century music that have improved in presentation under modern style, taste, and method, the "Fantastic" symphony of Berlioz, which stood on the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening, is perhaps the most notable. Indeed, this could fairly be called the only big piece of scoring in the repertory that has needed a period of 100 years practice to make perfect. If another were to be mentioned in like case, the "Faust" Symphony of Liszt might be it. No doubt the works of Beethoven were about as well performed in the early seasons of the Boston Symphony as they are today, save perhaps the Symphony No. 9. But certainly Berlioz fares better than formerly, and better even at Dr. Koussevitzky's hand than not so long ago.

For it has always been acknowledged that Berlioz, simple and transparent though he is from the standpoints of melody, harmony, and structure, wrote ahead of his period. There existed great orchestras then, but they scarcely presumed to solve the problems that he offers to be solved. Composers for orchestra since his time have all been his pupils, and only through their study of his ways and their completion of his aims, have instrumentalists been put in a position to master him. By rather general admission, tone poems, whether realistic or impressionistic, written at the end of the last century, and orchestral efforts made so far in the present one under the name of symphony or whatever else, have been explorations in paths pioneered by Berlioz. Everything has been an exercise whereby players have fitted themselves to do justice by the "Fantastic" Symphony.

Today, accordingly, an orchestra can take up the set of five pieces, or movements, that comprise this strange, yet straightforward, study and not only "read," but also interpret them. Artists from piccolo to doublebass have the job in control, and there is no nuance of tone nor impulse of rhythm but the conductor commands it. Take the episode entitled "Scene in the Meadows"; what piping we hear of a shepherd near at hand, and what friendly reply of another in the distance! Then, too, the drums. It wants three good men to handle all the mallets needed for the desired effect; or is the number four? In any case, the song is one that only the tympani can sing. A violin can hardly attain so light a vibration, the next thing to inaudibility; and the loudest brass strives vainly against them when they let go in full voice. Neither finicky tapping, however, at the one extreme nor blatant pounding at the other is in evidence.

Again, listen to the cymbals in the fourth episode, "March to the Scaffold." How does Berlioz modify their clash and blend it in, so that it comes through as tone instead of racket? Skillful striking together of the plates must probably be regarded as the chief matter; and further, it may make some difference about the sleeve in which the trembling of the metal is quenched, whether the cloth of the player's coat is woven of wool from Australia or from Montana.

With the "Fantastic" Symphony on the fifth of the Monday programs were the "Nachtmusik" Serenade for string Orchestra, (K.525) of Mozart, and the Symphony No. 3, Opus 21, of Berezowsky.

This Clipping From
PORTLAND, ME.
PRESS HERALD
MAR 6 - 1941

Our Own Way
New York Times

Serge Koussevitzky will become an American citizen in a few weeks. He told the naturalization officers in Boston that seventeen years ago the Bolsheviks took away his home and property in Russia and recently the Germans seized a new home he had acquired in France. The eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony expressed his confident belief that no such thing will happen to him in a free country.

Obviously Dr. Koussevitzky is in no danger of expropriation over here, but by March 15 at the latest he is sure to be reminded that in the free countries they have such things as income taxes, real estate taxes, corporation taxes, occupation taxes, sales taxes, Federal taxes, State taxes, permanent taxes and non-submersible emergency taxes. And it looks now that the freer these countries want to remain the more taxes they will have to think up.

This Clipping From
LYNN, MASS.
ITEM
MAR 4 - 1941

Our "Musical Calendar" will be climaxed by an unusually full repertoire to be presented by the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Serge Koussevitsky in his 18th pair of concerts for the season. Time: Friday afternoon, 2.30, and Saturday evening, 8.15 o'clock. The program is exrellent, featuring Mozart's superb overture to "The Magic Flute;" Beethoven's Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral;" climaxed by Sibelius' much loved 5th Symphony in E flat major.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
ARDMORE, PA
MAIN LINE TIMES
3/6/41

The MusicLover's Corner

By JOSEPH E. BARONE

Why do they do it? Why do artists of first rank insist on "breaking into the news" at the slightest provocation, particularly when they no longer need cheap publicity of this sort? One can possibly understand why a rising youngster must avail himself of every avenue which might lead him to a wider recognition. But in the case of the established musician, it only tends to lower him from the high pedestal on which public favor has placed him. And too often he only betrays those who think of him as something of a musical God.

Take Stokowski, for example. No matter what has transpired during the past quarter of a century, most of us still look up to him as a sort of ideal. Even stories of Greta Garbo escapades, Mickey Mouse movies, and radical orchestral seating plans leave us unshaken in our implicit faith.

But now comes a new batch of stories concerning Army Bands, and really, it's enough to cause the most faithful to entertain some doubt. It seems that the bands of the future should be made up chiefly of saxophones (heaven forbid!), and that they should play in armored tanks. Also that the music should be pitched very high in order to rise above the din of the shooting. Frankly I choose to believe that Dr. Stokowski was in one of his facetious moods when he made this announcement. I just can't believe that he would let us down so competely.

Then there is Koussevitzky. Most of us agree that he is without equal when he conducts works of the Russian School. And while I, personally, cannot drive myself to the point of rating him with Stokowski and Toscanini, I do feel that he is a great conductor.

But when he conducted the Boston Symphony here a few weeks ago his obvious choreography of baton technique was so theatrical that the complete performance of this superb orchestra was spoiled for me. The suave Dr. Koussevitzky was so polished in his motions, that his arms seemed to go through a well-rehearsed routine. And his trick of holding a six-inch baton as if it were a cigarette-holder was simply the last straw. To be sure, he directed with apparent enthusiasm—appearing to be on a verge of attack of apoplexy all evening — but never once did he seem to penetrate the superficial values of the music at hand. It all seemed like a trained-seal act — which is not good theatre, even at its best.

However, the new low was reached when Jose Iturbi guest-conductor, conducted the Philadelphia Orchestra here last week. As a pianist, he is something more than commendable; and as a conductor, he is well above average. But when he combines the two, he is no longer a musician but an arcrobat. When he first started this trick, a few years ago, in Concerti by Mozart, it was something of a novelty, and one overlooked the orchestral accompaniment since it was virtually chamber music. But in a large work by Liszt, it simply can't be done,—a fact which Mr. Iturbi unwittingly proved.

A novelty these days would be a conductor who simply conducted, without resorting to exotic arm contortions, hysterical displays of emotional temperament, and other arty tricks of Barnum variety.

But until one comes along, I suppose we can expect the worst. And I won't be too startled if, next time Iturbi comes to town, he not only conducts and plays the piano at the same time, but does a tango for good measure. Carrying a red rose in his teeth. . . .

THIS CLIPPING FROM WATERVILLE, ME.
SENTINEL
MAR 4 - 1941

Distinguished Addition
(Boston Transcript)

According to "Washington Review," the official publication of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, 1940 naturalizations so far exceeded those of the preceding year that they topped all fees "received by the clerks of Federal Courts from all other sources." According to the clerk of the Federal Court of Boston, however, this present month of February, 1941, has given more to America than many months of 1940. The clerk did not put it in quite those words; but the fact became self-evident when he announced that yesterday afternoon Serge Koussevitsky received his "final papers" and became a full-fledged American citizen.

In one respect, the issuing of those papers is a work of supererogation, for, in that respect, which is to say in political and social spirit, Dr. Koussevitsky became an American at the moment he first set foot on American soil—indeed, in his political and social outlook, he was an American long before coming to this country. Nevertheless, in another respect, the great conductor is a citizen of all the world—because music is international, and Dr. Koussevitsky is a magnificent musician.

Mozart, Beethoven, Sibelius on Symphony Concert Program

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 18th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart.....Overture to "The Magic Flute"
Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 in F major Op. 68, "Pastoral"
Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in E flat major Op. 82

This was a program which might be considered in the light of a sop to conservative tastes. Sibelius, of course, is still alive and hence a "modern" composer. But here in Boston we have been thoroughly drilled in Sibelius, and his 5th Symphony in particular cannot possibly hold any doubts or terrors for anyone. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky designed this program expressly to please that section of the audience which is often articulate on the subject of modernism or whether he just felt like playing these works does not matter. The point is that he at no time relaxed the standards of orchestral performance. He let us hear superb interpretations of all three.

Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" is not only remarkable for having been written in so short a time but also for the form that it adopts. Writing against time in more senses than one he instinctively achieved exactly the kind of overture that he wanted, a perfect thing in itself and yet unlike previous overtures.

We imagine that many in yesterday's audience listened to the Pastoral Symphony with Mr. Disney's Pegasus, Bacchus, cupids, centaurs and the like floating distractingly through their minds. Such, at any rate, was our condition, and yet the Symphony was not spoiled thereby. So much finer was the interpretation yesterday that the bad taste of some of Mr. Disney's more whimsical notions and Stokowski's obstreperous sound effects was washed away.

One thing we did note, and that was that the film used a great deal more of the score than we had supposed. The distortion occurred in the blowing up of the sound mechanically, so that the third movement, especially, became a gross caricature. The actual cuts were infinitely less annoying.

As for the pictures, it does not seem to us that they matter much in the long run. Max Beerbohm wrote fiercely about men who illustrate books; he felt that they clipped the wings of illusion. Even when he considered that their illustrations were better than his own might have been he felt cheated. But this delightful writer has always been an artist in his own right, and his argument on this head may be allowed to be ingenious sophistry.

It has been proved by symphonic ballets and by programs in general that they do not ruin good music. It was proved yesterday by the orchestra's infinitely gracious reading of the Pastoral that the films are also powerless to change our musical feelings. Very likely we have heard equally good performances of this music in the past, but just now that appears doubtful. Memory in this connection is not to be relied on, though no one would go far wrong in averring that this was the best performance he had ever heard.

We have left little space for discussing Sibelius's 5th Symphony with a deliberate reason, and that is because it did not seem to us to wear well. There is no doubt that the interpretation was a fine one. But there is a certain rhythmic and thematic monotony about this work that now and again takes away from its undeniably good and effective moments. Perhaps it is that we have heard too much Sibelius and that consequently for the time being his stylistic tricks leave us cold. There was good evidence that others were not thus dismally affected.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. The 19th concerts will be conducted by Richard Burgin. Nathan Milstein will be the soloist in Stravinsky's Violin Concerto. The rest of the program offers Mr. Koussevitzky's arrangement for wind orchestra of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C major; Chausson's Symphony in B flat major; Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite.

MARCH

SYMPHONY L IS FAMIL

Sibelius' Fifth, Beetl Mozart Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After three more or less adventurous programmes, Dr. Koussevitzky is offering at this week's Symphony concerts a list of familiar pieces, and a comparatively short one, in the bargain. Even Sibelius' Fifth Symphony may be accounted familiar since it has now been performed at nine pairs of concerts in the space of 20 seasons. And the other numbers are Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony.

Yesterday afternoon was probably the first time in Boston's history that the "Pastoral" could be heard in two different auditoria, namely, Symphony Hall and the Majestic Theatre. After hearing the symphony, or at least the greater part of it, as an accompaniment to Mr. Disney's Olympian fantasies, it was a bit of a relief to hear the music of, for and by itself.

For some of us the work is not over rich in pictorial suggestion. One starts off with a pleasant mental picture of Beethoven's rural haunts on the outskirts of Vienna, as chaming a countryside as could be imagined, and ends by hearing the music merely as music, save when its undeniable monotony, its too frequent and too literal repititions permit the mind to wander from it entirely. Except for the music of the peasant's dance and the interrupting storm (for its day an orchestral tour de force) the "Pastoral" is chiefly music of mood. And musical moods cannot afford to be too long sustained. Still it was a beautiful performance, and as on other occasions, Dr. Koussevitzky had the tact to let the second movement, the scene by the brook which threatens like that of Tennyson to go on forever, move with as much rapidity as circumstances will allow.

At one time this writer was prepared to defend Sibelius' fifth against all comers. He vividly recalls its first performance in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who was actuated more by a sense of duty than by any great affection for the piece itself. In his office at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux pointed to the score, saying, "Do you like this? Do you like that?" and in each instance this deponent replied with a vigorous affirmative.

Twenty years ago the simplicities of the later Sibelius fascinated because they were simplicities in a day when everything had lately been, and to a certain extent still was, as complex as possible. Now it seems as though these simplicities were mere barrenness. There is still a certain excitement in the final climax, partly stifled though it is. But here the theme on which it is based bears an unfortunate and unforgettable resemblance to that bathetic ballad, "O! Dry Those Tears." Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with the enthusiasm he always displays in the presence of Sibelius' music. In these parts he is indeed the Finnish composer's prophet.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
MAR 8- 1941

Boston Symphony to Play Fourth Brooklyn Concert

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play the fourth concert of its current series in the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening. The concert, sponsored jointly by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn Committee, will include the "Magic Flute" Overture, the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony, and Sibelius' Fifth Symphony.

Tomorrow afternoon the Brooklyn Institute will present the final recital of its Young Artists Series. Frances Shapiro, violinist, will be the soloist, playing Brahms' D minor sonata, the Tschaikowsky D major concerto, and works of Bach, Bartok, Debussy, Scriabin, and Stravinsky.

Next Tuesday evening a program of Renaissance music will be given at the Academy of Music by Suzanne Bloch, lutenist, Edith Weiss-Mann, harpsichordist, Alfred Mann, recorder and Viola d'amore soloist, and the recorder quartet of the Curtis Institute.

Sketches and Concert Offer Double Treat

By NATALIE GORDON

THERE IS A TWOFOLD DELIGHT in store for music lovers attetnding the concert this afternoon and tomorrow evening at Symphony Hall, and for those who thrilled to the magic of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at "Tanglewood" in Lenox last summer. The program for today and tomorrow includes Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major.

Treat number two is upstairs in the First Balcony Gallery of Symphony Hall and can be enjoyed both before and after the concert, or during the intermission. It consists of a group of exquisite and delightful sketches lent by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline and drawn between 1866 and 1870 by her mother, Mrs. Richard C. Dixey (Ellen Sturgis Tappan), and her grandmother, Mrs. William Aspinwall Tappan. Naive, charming and lovely in color, they depict scenes of their family life at "Tanglewood", once occupied by Nathaniel Hawthorne and presented by Mrs. Brooks in 1937 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On the walls of the exhibition gallery are recent photographs of Tanglewood today. In glass cases, are the sketches lent by Mrs. Brooks. Exquisite in color, fascinating in detail of costumes of the period, they depict exteriors and interiors of "Tanglewood": scenes of the family and children playing croquet, skating, chasing butterflies and horseback riding. Seen through the soft mist of a winter snow is the "little Red House" at Tanglewood, where Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables". "Wonder Book" and "Blithedale Romance"; and a lovely corner of Tanglewood's parlor.

Also included in the exhibition are letters written to Mrs. Brooks' mother and grandmother by Lili Lehman, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry James, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Charlotte Cushman, Fanny Kemble, Margaret Fuller and Hawthorne, himself, all of whom were guests at Tanglewood of the Tappan family, when the Berkshires were the autumn meeting place of eminent American writers.

MARCH 8, 1941

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, which constitute the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week, are agreeably conservative. In advance, one had also thought of the final number, the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, as conservative. Evidently that was taking too much for granted, where some of the audience were concerned. Lobby conversation after the performance of Sibelius revealed, among a given number of departing listeners, a lively and compact opposition to the work.

These opinions, subjected to a hasty condensation, were that "I can't see anything in that Symphony. It means nothing to me. I can't get into it." Which is another way of saying that they were not stirred emotionally. And by the Fifth, of all Sibelius symphonies! A work of somber coloring and a good deal of incidental, but not unpleasant, dissonance of themes that are fragmentary, in the proverbial Sibelian manner, and a work which reaches at the end a triumphal magnificance of sound.

Performance and interpretation certainly could not have been responsible for these views, because the Boston Symphony had given of its best. And Mr. Koussevitzky conducts this composition with a fervor and a perception of what is in the music that must surely put the Symphony in the best possible light. But, as George S. Kaufman once remarked, "one man's Mede may be another man's Persian," and if Sibelius happens to be your musical Persian, that is that.

The appeal of music is a very personal matter. Some people are unwilling to hear a score a second time, if it has not made favorable impression at first. Others, more open to change in their points of view, are not averse—perhaps they are even eager—to have another try at something they believe they may like upon further acquaintance. But if repeated hearings result in coolness it is plain that one just doesn't like that particular music. From this decision there can be no appeal; all the symphonic logic, all the color effects of orchestration, all the beauties of melody, harmony that others see, do not exist for you if you simply do not care for that music.

There is nothing to be troubled about, either, in this attitude, at least after you have tried to find beauty. This reviewer happens to think of Sibelius' Fifth as a masterpiece of symphonic structure expressed in an emotional and original idiom. But, try as he will, he has never been able to get on speaking terms with the Shostakovitch Fifth or Puccini's "Madame Butterfly."

It is hardly conceivable (to make a quick about-face from the logic of this argument) that any were not moved by Beethoven's "Pastoral." In these four lovable movements are concentrated the enjoyment any one would have after a lovely Summer day in the country, a day whose drowsy repose had been punctuated with a sudden, brief thunder storm.

With Beethoven as with Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzky works marvels of musical re-creation. Both symphonies are great music inherently. Their special qualities are not obscured by perfunctory treatment. But the essential nobility of the one and the sheer loveliness of the other can be realized only in such performances as Mr. Koussevitzky brought about. Without distorting the main line of thought, he dwells lovingly upon minute details of accent, tempo, color and phrase in a way to intensify all the beauty in each. That is great conducting.

Mozart's Overture, missing from these concerts for several seasons, was played in the same refined, precise manner, making a notable beginning for a notably delightful afternoon.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. At the concerts of March 21 and 22, Richard Burgin will conduct the following: Bach: Prelude and Fugue in C major, transcribed for wind orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky (first performances); Chausson: Symphony in B-flat; Stravinsky: Violin Concerto (Nathan Milstein, soloist). "petrouchka" Suite.

C. W. D.

Symphony Concert

The Arts in Boston

For the eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony season (March 7-8) Dr. Koussevitzky chose Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, and the Fifth of Sibelius.

The Overture was delectably played. The "Pastoral" was welcome, if only as a corrective to the recent desecration of the score by a distinguished colleague of Dr. Koussevitzky. Yesterday we heard the symphony as it was intended to be heard, in its simple directness, its unabashed lyricism, its frank recording of simple human emotions. No loud-speakers to distort the tone, no pictures to help us understand what somebody supposes the composer meant; just the voice of the composer, who knew quite well what he wanted to say, and who was able to say it in a way that can be understood by anybody who listens.

Only in the slow movement did the reading fall short of possible beauties. There the pace was a little too slow; so slow that the rhythmic foundation lost its firmness and therefore the line its purity and continuity. Elsewhere the performance was so just and so charming that it won a tribute of prolonged applause from the audience.

Sibelius' Fifth is not the most appealing nor the most satisfying of his symphonies. Original in thought, masterly in workmanship, it does not quite come off in the concert hall as an integrated work of art. Of course, its Finale has the compelling emotional power characteristic of the composer, and by virtue of this the symphony no doubt will long be received with the warmth that greeted its conclusion yesterday. Yet no small part of this applause probably should be regarded as directed toward the conductor and the orchestra, who had given us a magnificent performance.

L. A. S.

Pitts Sanborn

NEW YORK, March 8 (AP)—Pitts Sanborn, who passed on here yesterday, was dean of New York musical journalists. He was music critic of the World-Telegram, New York musical correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor, and program annotator of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Society.

A native of Port Huron, Mich., Mr. Sanborn was graduated from Harvard University and served as music editor of the old New York Globe and as both music editor and foreign correspondent for the old New York Evening Mail before going to the World-Telegram.

He was the author of two novels and a book of poems.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM FOR THIS WEEK 3/9

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit New York in the coming week and present its nineteenth pair of concerts in Boston, Friday and Saturday, March 21-22; likewise the seventh concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, March 20.

Nathan Milstein, the distinguished violinist will be the soloist at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and Richard Burgin will be the conductor.

The program will begin with an organ Prelude and Fugue in C major by Bach, which has been transcribed for wind orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the first performance of the new transcription.

The Symphony of Ernest Chausson in B-flat major will be played in the first portion of the program, which will end with two works of Stravinsky: his violin concerto in D flat and the Suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka."

Mozart, Beethoven, Sibelius on Symphony Concert Program

MUSIC

By ALEXANDER WILLIAMS

Symphony Concert

The 18th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky conducting, was given yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program was as follows:

Mozart....Overture to "The Magic Flute"
Beethoven
Symphony No. 6 in F major Op. 68, "Pastoral"
Sibelius
Symphony No. 5 in E flat major Op. 82

This was a program which might be considered in the light of a sop to conservative tastes. Sibelius, of course, is still alive and hence a "modern" composer. But here in Boston we have been thoroughly drilled in Sibelius, and his 5th Symphony in particular cannot possibly hold any doubts or terrors for anyone. Whether Mr. Koussevitzky designed this program expressly to please that section of the audience which is often articulate on the subject of modernism or whether he just felt like playing these works does not matter. The point is that he at no time relaxed the standards of orchestral performance. He let us hear superb interpretations of all three.

Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute" is not only remarkable for having been written in so short a time but also for the form that it adopts. Writing against time in more senses than one he instinctively achieved exactly the kind of overture that he wanted, a perfect thing in itself and yet unlike previous overtures.

We imagine that many in yesterday's audience listened to the Pastoral Symphony with Mr. Disney's Pegasus, Bacchus, cupids, centaurs and the like floating distractingly through their minds. Such, at any rate, was our condition, and yet the Symphony was not spoiled thereby. So much finer was the interpretation yesterday that the bad taste of some of Mr. Disney's more whimsical notions and Stokowski's obstreperous sound effects was washed away.

One thing we did note, and that was that the film used a great deal more of the score than we had supposed. The distortion occurred in the blowing up of the sound mechanically, so that the third movement, especially, became a gross caricature. The actual cuts were infinitely less annoying.

As for the pictures, it does not seem to us that they matter much in the long run. Max Beerbohm wrote fiercely about men who illustrate books; he felt that they clipped the wings of illusion. Even when he considered that their illustrations were better than his own might have been he felt cheated. But this delightful writer has always been an artist in his own right, and his argument on this head may be allowed to be ingenious sophistry.

It has been proved by symphonic ballets and by programs in general that they do not ruin good music. It was proved yesterday by the orchestra's infinitely gracious reading of the Pastoral that the films are also powerless to change our musical feelings. Very likely we have heard equally good performances of this music in the past, but just now that appears doubtful. Memory in this connection is not to be relied on, though no one would go far wrong in averring that this was the best performance he had ever heard.

We have left little space for discussing Sibelius's 5th Symphony with a deliberate reason, and that is because it did not seem to us to wear well. There is no doubt that the interpretation was a fine one. But there is a certain rhythmic and thematic monotony about this work that now and again takes away from its undeniably good and effective moments. Perhaps it is that we have heard too much Sibelius and that consequently for the time being his stylistic tricks leave us cold. There was good evidence that others were not thus dismally affected.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be away. The 19th concerts will be conducted by Richard Burgin. Nathan Milstein will be the soloist in Stravinsky's Violin Concerto. The rest of the program offers Mr. Koussevitzky's arrangement for wind orchestra of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C major; Chausson's Symphony in B flat major; Stravinsky's "Petrouchka" Suite.

MARCH 8,

SYMPHONY LIST IS FAMILIAR

Sibelius' Fifth, Beethoven, Mozart Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

After three more or less adventurous programmes, Dr. Koussevitzky is offering at this week's Symphony concerts a list of familiar pieces, and a comparatively short one, in the bargain. Even Sibelius' Fifth Symphony may be accounted familiar since it has now been performed at nine pairs of concerts in the space of 20 seasons. And the other numbers are Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute" and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony.

Yesterday afternoon was probably the first time in Boston's history that the "Pastoral" could be heard in two different auditoria, namely, Symphony Hall and the Majestic Theatre. After hearing the symphony, or at least the greater part of it, as an accompaniment to Mr. Disney's Olympian fantasies, it was a bit of a relief to hear the music of, for and by itself.

For some of us the work is not over rich in pictorial suggestion. One starts off with a pleasant mental picture of Beethoven's rural haunts on the outskirts of Vienna, as charming a countryside as could be imagined, and ends by hearing the music merely as music, save when its undeniable monotony, its too frequent and too literal repititions permit the mind to wander from it entirely. Except for the music of the peasant's dance and the interrupting storm (for its day an orchestral tour de force) the "Pastoral" is chiefly music of mood. And musical moods cannot afford to be too long sustained. Still it was a beautiful performance, and as on other occasions, Dr. Koussevitzky had the tact to let the second movement, the scene by the brook which threatens like that of Tennyson to go on forever, move with as much rapidity as circumstances will allow.

At one time this writer was prepared to defend Sibelius' fifth against all comers. He vividly recalls its first performance in Boston under the direction of Pierre Monteux, who was actuated more by a sense of duty than by any great affection for the piece itself. In his office at Symphony Hall, Mr. Monteux pointed to the score, saying, "Do you like this? Do you like that?" and in each instance this deponent replied with a vigorous affirmative.

Twenty years ago the simplicities of the later Sibelius fascinated because they were simplicities in a day when everything had lately been, and to a certain extent still was, as complex as possible. Now it seems as though these simplicities were mere barrenness. There is still a certain excitement in the final climax, partly stifled though it is. But here the theme on which it is based bears an unfortunate and unforgettable resemblance to that bathetic ballad, "O! Dry Those Tears." Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with the enthusiasm he always displays in the presence of Sibelius' music. In these parts he is indeed the Finnish composer's prophet.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
MAR 8- 1941

Boston Symphony to Play Fourth Brooklyn Concert

The Boston Symphony, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky, will play the fourth concert of its current series in the Brooklyn Academy of Music next Friday evening. The concert, sponsored jointly by the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn Committee, will include the "Magic Flute" Overture, the Beethoven "Pastoral" Symphony, and Sibelius' Fifth Symphony.

Tomorrow afternoon the Brooklyn Institute will present the final recital of its Young Artists Series. Frances Shapiro, violinist, will be the soloist, playing Brahms' D minor sonata, the Tschaikowsky D major concerto, and works of Bach, Bartok, Debussy, Scriabin, and Stravinsky.

Next Tuesday evening a program of Renaissance music will be given at the Academy of Music by Suzanne Bloch, lutenist, Edith Weiss-Mann, harpsichordist, Alfred Mann, recorder and Viola d'amore soloist, and the recorder quartet of the Curtis Institute.

band and Concert Offer Double Treat back the boy.

r thing you can give a home to y so doing you husband's love
indness to the

who thrilled to the magic of the Berkshire Symphonic Festival at "Tanglewood" in Lenox last summer. The program for today and tomorrow includes Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute"; Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony; and Sibelius' Symphony No. 5 in E-flat major.

Treat number two is upstairs in the First Balcony Gallery of Symphony Hall and can be enjoyed both before and after the concert, or during the intermission. It consists of a group of exquisite and delightful sketches lent by Mrs. Gorham Brooks of Brookline and drawn between 1866 and 1870 by her mother, Mrs. Richard C. Dixey (Ellen Sturgis Tappan), and her grandmother, Mrs. William Aspinwall Tappan. Naive, charming and lovely in color, they depict scenes of their family life at "Tanglewood", once occupied by Nathaniel Hawthorne and presented by Mrs. Brooks in 1937 to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On the walls of the exhibition gallery are recent photographs of Tanglewood today. In glass cases, are the sketches lent by Mrs. Brooks. Exquisite in color, fascinating in detail of costumes of the period, they depict exteriors and interiors of "Tanglewood": scenes of the family and children playing croquet, skating, chasing butterflies and horseback riding. Seen through the soft mist of a winter snow is the "little Red House" at Tanglewood, where Hawthorne wrote "The House of Seven Gables", "Wonder Book" and "Blithedale Romance"; and a lovely corner of Tanglewood's parlor.

Also included in the exhibition are letters written to Mrs. Brooks' mother and grandmother by Lili Lehman, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Henry James, Elizabeth Barrett Browning, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Charlotte Cushman, Fanny Kemble, Margaret Fuller and Hawthorne, himself, all of whom were guests at Tanglewood of the Tappan family, when the Berkshires were the autumn meeting place of eminent American writers.

MARCH 8, 1941

MUSIC

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic Flute," and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, which constitute the first half of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts this week, are agreeably conservative. In advance, one had also thought of the final number, the Fifth Symphony of Sibelius, as conservative. Evidently that was taking too much for granted, where some of the audience were concerned. Lobby conversation after the performance of Sibelius revealed, among a given number of departing listeners, a lively and compact opposition to the work.

These opinions, subjected to a hasty condensation, were that "I can't see anything in that Symphony. It means nothing to me. I can't get into it." Which is another way of saying that they were not stirred emotionally. And by the Fifth, of all Sibelius symphonies! A work of somber coloring and a good deal of incidental, but not unpleasant, dissonance of themes that are fragmentary, in the proverbial Sibelian manner, and a work which reaches at the end a triumphal magnificance of sound.

Performance and interpretation certainly could not have been responsible for these views, because the Boston Symphony had given of its best. And Mr. Koussevitzky conducts this composition with a fervor and a perception of what is in the music that must surely put the Symphony in the best possible light. But, as George S. Kaufman once remarked, "one man's Mede may be another man's Persian," and if Sibelius happens to be your musical Persian, that is that.

The appeal of music is a very personal matter. Some people are unwilling to hear a score a second time, if it has not made favorable impression at first. Others, more open to change in their points of view, are not averse—perhaps they are even eager—to have another try at something they believe they may like upon further acquaintance. But if repeated hearings result in coolness it is plain that one just doesn't like that particular music. From this decision there can be no appeal; all the symphonic logic, all the color effects of orchestration, all the beauties of melody, harmony that others see, do not exist for you if you simply do not care for that music.

There is nothing to be troubled about, either, in this attitude, at least after you have tried to find beauty. This reviewer happens to think of Sibelius' Fifth as a masterpiece of symphonic structure expressed in an emotional and original idiom. But, try as he will, he has never been able to get on speaking terms with the Shostakovitch Fifth or Puccini's "Madame Butterfly."

It is hardly conceivable (to make a quick about-face from the logic of this argument) that any were not moved by Beethoven's "Pastoral." In these four lovable movements are concentrated the enjoyment any one would have after a lovely Summer day in the country, a day whose drowsy repose had been punctuated with a sudden, brief thunder storm.

With Beethoven as with Sibelius, Mr. Koussevitzky works marvels of musical re-creation. Both symphonies are great music inherently. Their special qualities are not obscured by perfunctory treatment. But the essential nobility of the one and the sheer loveliness of the other can be realized only in such performances as Mr. Koussevitzky brought about. Without distorting the main line of thought, he dwells lovingly upon minute details of accent, tempo, color and phrase in a way to intensify all the beauty in each. That is great conducting.

Mozart's Overture, missing from these concerts for several seasons, was played in the same refined, precise manner, making a notable beginning for a notably delightful afternoon.

The orchestra goes to New York next week. At the concerts of March 21 and 22, Richard Burgin will conduct the following: Bach: Prelude and Fugue in C major, transcribed for wind orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky (first performances); Chausson: Symphony in B-flat; Stravinsky: Violin Concerto (Nathan Milstein, soloist), "petrouchka" Suite. C. W. D.

Symphony Concert

The Arts in Boston

For the eighteenth program of the Boston Symphony season (March 7-8) Dr. Koussevitzky chose Mozart's "Magic Flute" Overture, the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven, and the Fifth of Sibelius.

The Overture was delectably played. The "Pastoral" was welcome, if only as a corrective to the recent desecration of the score by a distinguished colleague of Dr. Koussevitzky. Yesterday we heard the symphony as it was intended to be heard, in its simple directness, its unabashed lyricism, its frank recording of simple human emotions. No loud-speakers to distort the tone, no pictures to help us understand what somebody supposes the composer meant; just the voice of the composer, who knew quite well what he wanted to say, and who was able to say it in a way that can be understood by anybody who listens.

Only in the slow movement did the reading fall short of possible beauties. There the pace was a little too slow; so slow that the rhythmic foundation lost its firmness and therefore the line its purity and continuity. Elsewhere the performance was so just and so charming that it won a tribute of prolonged applause from the audience.

Sibelius' Fifth is not the most appealing nor the most satisfying of his symphonies. Original in thought, masterly in workmanship, it does not quite come off in the concert hall as an integrated work of art. Of course, its Finale has the compelling emotional power characteristic of the composer, and by virtue of this the symphony no doubt will long be received with the warmth that greeted its conclusion yesterday. Yet no small part of this applause probably should be regarded as directed toward the conductor and the orchestra, who had given us a magnificent performance.

L. A. S.

Pitts Sanborn

NEW YORK, March 8 (AP)—Pitts Sanborn, who passed on here yesterday, was dean of New York musical journalists. He was music critic of the World-Telegram, New York musical correspondent of The Christian Science Monitor, and program annotator of the New York Philharmonic - Symphony Society.

A native of Port Huron, Mich., Mr. Sanborn was graduated from Harvard University and served as music editor of the old New York Globe and as both music editor and foreign correspondent for the old New York Evening Mail before going to the World-Telegram.

He was the author of two novels and a book of poems.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM FOR THIS WEEK 3/9 Howell Tel.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will visit New York in the coming week and present its nineteenth pair of concerts in Boston, Friday and Saturday, March 21-22; likewise the seventh concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evening, March 20.

Nathan Milstein, the distinguished violinist will be the soloist at the Friday and Saturday concerts, and Richard Burgin will be the conductor.

The program will begin with an organ Prelude and Fugue in C major by Bach, which has been transcribed for wind orchestra by Serge Koussevitzky. This will be the first performance of the new transcription.

The Symphony of Ernest Chausson in B-flat major will be played in the first portion of the program, which will end with two works of Stravinsky: his violin concerto in D flat and the Suite from the Ballet, "Petrouchka."

Straight Pastoral

Koussevitzky and Boston Symphony Present Beethoven Without Benefit of Centaurettes

THOUGH a visually and acoustically pepped-up "Pastoral" Symphony is playing nightly at a theater further down town, Serge Koussevitzky had the temerity to give a completely unadorned performance of the same work yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. Sans centaurettes, sans cupid's posterior, sans flying horses, sans everything, in fact, except the music. This may sound rather drab to devotees of "Fantasia." Actually there was a thousand times more drama, color and excitement in the luminous performance of the Boston Symphony than could possibly be extracted from Disney's flickering Olympian menagerie, even when they are seconded by the roaring amplifiers of Mr. Stokowski.

To the surprise of nobody at all, it turned out that Beethoven stands excellently well on his own feet. If you had the misfortune, as I did, to see and hear "Fantasia" twice, you may have had to chase a few intruding unicorns or drunken donkeys out of your mind before you could really enjoy the music. But generally speaking, the strength and simplicity of Koussevitzky's interpretation were compelling enough in themselves to ward off such unhappy memories.

Yesterday's performance had that priceless quality of naivete which seems so hard for modern performers to achieve, and without which the "Pastoral" Symphony can be quite a bore. The orchestra distinguished itself throughout almost the entire score with the purity of its tone and its fine shading of dynamics.

Comfortable Program

The program as a whole must have delighted even the most conservative of Old Subscribers. It began with the Overture to Mozart's opera, "The Magic lute," and ended with the now so popular ifth Symphony of Sibelius. But it is well to remember that if Serge Koussevitzky were not such a dauntless champion of new music, Sibelius' Fifth Symphony would not seem so comfortably familiar as it does today.

Paradoxically, the Mozart overture was to most of the audience the least familiar work on the program. It was almost the last work Mozart composed, since it was written after the completion of the opera, and with the exception of the "The Marriage of Figaro," it is probably his finest overture. As in many of his latest works, Mozart writes here in a contrapuntal vein. But like Beethoven after him he casts his polyphony in the sonata form and in the essentially homophonic style of the sonata.

Another link to Beethoven is the invocation of ethical forces in music — an idea which was rare with the earlier Mozart, but which took increasing hold of his imagination in the last months of his life. And it was typical of the day that Mozart should have chosen not a churchly text for the expression of these forces, but an unmistakable reference to Free Masonry, which in Mozart's time was very different from what it is today. The three solemn chords which open the overture and punctuate its middle section are a clear allusion to Free Mason ceremonial.

In spite of its buffoonery, the whole "Magic Flute" is a glorification of the enlightened humanity and the surprisingly democratic ideals of the late eighteenth century. The fugato sections of the overture, though the theme itself does not occur in the opera, are an obvious reminiscence of the scene in which Tamino and Pamina approach the trial of their faith and courage by fire and water.

The performance was a triumph of delicacy and precision.

A Modern Classicist

Sibelius alone among living composers gives us the feeling that he has produced an art which is destined to be classic, and nowhere does he do this more than in his Fifth Symphony. This impression is not due to his conservatism or his affinity with traditional symphonic form. We have had a neoclassical school of composition which, for all its conscious and nearly literal its observance of classical procedure, has proved pretty ephemeral.

The classicism of Sibelius is more subjective. It resides in deeply organic development of his themes, the feeling of an inevitable form, which his greatest symphonic movements produce upon us, the unforced, boldly logical development of his musical thought.

Yesterday's performance was not only magnificent architecture, it had tremendous sweep and emotional drive. The elemental ostinato chant of the Finale can seldom have had such power, such dark rhapsodic eloquence. The orchestra was at its unsurpassable best and Koussevitzky fired the imaginations of players and audience alike.

The afternoon was a series of ovations for conductor and musicians.

E. D.

This Clipping From
PROVIDENCE, R. I.
JOURNAL
MAR 8- 1941

BOSTON SYMPHONY PROGRAMS

Editor:

Please allow me to disagree violently with John Tebbel about Dr. Koussevitzky's Providence concert programs. He asserts that we should get more of the music that "people want to hear." Perhaps a little clarification as to who these "people" are, and what they really do want, might be desirable.

I should divide them into two classes: a small "elite" of regular concert-goers, who also hear a great deal of music outside the Metropolitan Theatre, either in the course of their business as critics and musicians, or as a hobby. My sympathies are with this group, who naturally want to hear something new and different after a continuous overdosage of old standbys. But why should this craving be satisfied at the Boston Symphony concerts at the expense of everyone else? If they want to hear modernistic attempts, let them go to the Boston concerts or, lacking the means for this, to those of a first rate orchestra right here in our midst, the Providence WPA Symphony, under Edward Caffier. Its audiences are all too small and it plays new works regularly, with soloists aplenty. I fail to see why the supreme artistry and virtuosity of the Boston orchestra should be squandered consistently on new and untried compositions, which have not yet proved their worth; indeed, whose worth in many cases is more imaginary than real. Its efforts should rather be spent on recreating the masterworks, which have lost much of their meaning at the hands of some modern "interpreters."

The majority at the Metropolitan two weeks ago, especially the ones in the balcony, belong in the other class, those who for various reasons get little chance to hear really first-class music, but who try, nevertheless, to widen their acquaintance and understand better at every opportunity. Because good concerts hereabouts are relatively uncommon, it would be unfair to ask, or rather to force these people to listen to works which in all probability they would never hear again, sacrificing the best compositions which are so much more worth their attention on an all-too-short symphony program.

For these reasons, I am against the diluting of Dr. Koussevitzky's Providence programs with mediocre works.

J. D. BACON.

Providence.

Pitts Sanborn, 61, Music Critic, Dies

Novelist, Poet, Essayist Found Dead by Friend

Pitts Sanborn, 61, music critic of the World-Telegram and recognized as one of the greatest contemporary authorities on the opera, was found dead last night in his apartment at 10 Sheridan Sq., apparently of a heart attack.

At the time of his death Mr. Sanborn was serving as program annotator for the Philharmonic-Symphony Society for the first season and was completing a biography of Kirsten Flagstad, Metropolitan soprano. He also was noted as a novelist, poet and essayist.

Mr. Sanborn, who was not married, was found on the floor of the bathroom in his apartment at 11 p. m. by a friend, Angelo Rodo of 258 Stagg St., Brooklyn, who had called.

Mr. Sanborn, who was at work in his office at the World-Telegram yesterday, was last seen alive about 8:30 p. m., when he arrived at his apartment. An autopsy will be performed today.

Mr. Sanborn went to the Metropolitan to see the season's first production of Mozart's Don Giovanni. After the performance he attended a reception to Bruno Walter, the conductor, then went home to write his review. Friends found only the first paragraph. He had rewritten it twice.

Born in Michigan.

John Pitts Sanborn was born in Port Huron, Mich., the son of John Pitts Sanborn and Mary Ann Wastell Sanborn. He studied at Harvard, receiving a B. A. degree in 1900 and an M. A. in 1902.

He became the music editor of the New York Globe in 1905 and continued in that position until 1923, serving as foreign correspondent for the New York Evening Mail, then became music editor of that paper.

Mr. Sanborn took the position of music critic and editor of the New York Telegram when the Evening Mail was merged with it and continued his work in the World-Telegram.

Won Two Decorations.

He was made a Chevaliar of the French Legion of Honor for his championing of French musical art and was decorated by the Italian government for his aid to Italian music.

Mr. Sanborn wrote two novels, Prima Donna, a two-volume work, and Greek Night; Vie de Bordeaux, a Book of poems; the Metropolitan Book of the Opera, containing plots of the best known operas, and numerous articles in music periodicals and other magazines besides his daily stint as a newspaper critic. He was a contributor to the Christian Science Monitor for several years.

He succeeded Lawrence Gilman, late music critic of the New York Herald Tribune, as program annotator for the Philharmonic-Symphony Socieay at the beginning of the current season. He had also served as a radio commentator for the Philharmonic Orchestra and occasionally acted as radio commentator for the Philharmonic.

Spoke Many Languages.

Mr. Sanborn spoke French, Italian and German fluently, and had a considerable understanding of Spanish and other languages. Extremely painstaking in his writings and criticism, he would pore for hours through libraries for the smallest details he felt were necessary to complete a story.

Ht studied music in his youth and prepared himself for a career of music criticism, which he chose early in life. His study of opera was exhaustive, particularly conicentrated on the works of Mozart, Rossini, Verdi and the early Italians. He became generally accepted as one of the foremost experts of voice and the art of singing and possessed an encyclopedic knowledge of music and musical history.

A man of cultured and discriminating tastes, Mr. Sanborn possessed a tremendous knowledge of the world's great literature and could recall from memory a host of poems, dates and facts in musical history. He could recall whole casts of operatic performances of the 20s, remembering how each person sang in any given cast.

Mr. Sanborn was a member of the Harvard Club.

Pitts Sanborn.

NEW YORK WORLD-TELEGRAM, SATURDAY, MARCH 8, 194

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
POST
MAR 8- 1941

Bostonians Play Ninth of Mahler

Mahler's Ninth Symphony will be played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, [illegible] Koussevitzky conducting, at their Carnegie Hall concert next Thursday night, sharing a program with three Russian works: Moussorgsky's Prelude to "Kohovantschina," Liadov's "Baba-Yaga" and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice."

The orchestra returns to Carnegie Hall Saturday afternoon, March 15, featuring the Symphony No. 3 of Berezowsky. Other works on the program are Mozart's "Eine Kleine Nachtmusik" and Berlioz' "Fantastic" symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY PRESENTS GREAT MUSIC BORN OF SORROW

By LEO GAFFNEY

As if to show how great music can grow in the midst of affliction, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in concerts over the week-end, played works of three immortals, each composed in pain and sorrow.

Two are gay. The other is sublime. None is sombre.

Only a few weeks after Mozart finished his "Magic Flute" opera he was seized with typhus. And while Vienna laughed in delight at the new theatrical marvel, which was to continue to be popular, the maker of masterpieces achieved a pauper's grave.

MOZART WAS ILL

When he penned the overture to "The Magic Flute" Mozart was a sick man. Yet none of his misery appears in the music. It flows like a happy brook, unmindful of destination, content only to ripple and sing.

Seventeen years after Mozart sanded his last page, another troubled Viennese, Ludwig van Beethoven, reflected upon the beauties of nature and wrote them down on music-paper.

It was his Sixth Symphony, called the Pastoral because it told of happy rustics and the joys of the simple life in village and meadow, all on a summer's day.

Jean Bibelius' Fifth Symphony was written when the world was darkened with World War I. But ing. it couldn't shut him out from the glory of creation. Notable is what the venerable Finn wrote in his dairy at the time:

"In a deep dell again. But I begin already dimly to see the mountain that I shall certainly ascend . . . God opens his door for a moment and his orchestra plays the Fifth Symphony."

SIBELIUS LAUDED

If, as Playwright Maxwell Anderson has said, the theater is "the cathedral of the spirit," how must the sympathetic auditor regard the concert hall?

Especially in the Finale of Sibelius' Fifth Symphony, which Lawrence Gilman has called "the crown of the work . . . the most nobly imagined, nobly eloquent page that Sibelius has given us," there were many at Symphony Hall last night who must have felt that they were in church, if not quite in heaven.

Sibelius, Koussevitzky, the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The combination is always overpower-

This Clipping From
BRIDGEPORT, CONN.
SUNDAY HERALD
MAR 9- 1941

Koussevitzky To Conduct at Woolsey Hall

Two big-time symphony orchestras are coming to Woolsey Hall in New Haven.

Serge Koussevitzky conducts the Boston there next Wednesday night, playing Mozart Symphony in A, Brahms' Second, two nocturnes by Debussy and Choreographic Waltz by Ravel.

The New York Philharmonic with John Barbirolli comes Tuesday night, April 15. The Vladimir Horowitz date is April 2.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
BROOKLYN, N. Y.
CITIZEN
MAR 8- 1941

Beethoven "Pastoral" Offered By Boston Symphony on Friday

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give the fourth concert of its current Brooklyn season next Friday evening, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will open with the Overture to "The Magic Flute," by Mozart. The rest of the evening will be given over to two great symphonies: Beethoven's Sixth in F major ("Pastoral") and Sibelius' Fifth in E flat major.

The concert is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, and a Brooklyn committee. Standing room only is available for Friday night's performance.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
MAR 8- 1941

Boston Symphony Concert Tuesday

NORTHAMPTON, March 8 — The Boston Symphony Orchestra under Serge Koussevitsky will present the last concert in the Smith College Concert Course Tuesday at 8 p. m. in John M. Greene Hall.

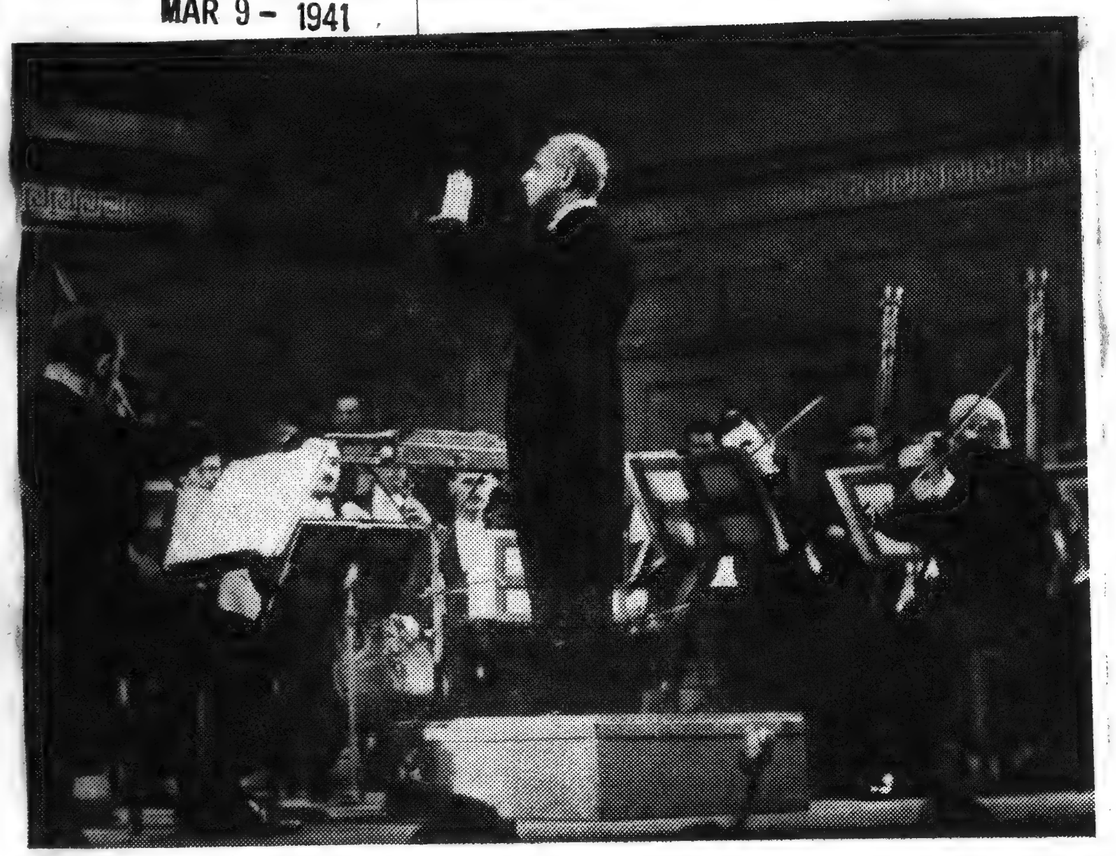
The program will include Haydn's Symphony No. 88 in G major, Bethoven's Lenore Overture No. 3, and Shostakovitch's Symphony No. 5, Op. 48. The selection by Shostakovitch is being played at the special request of members of the Smith College Music department.

The evening of the performance tickets will be placed on sale at the box office in John M. Greene Hall and will be available to the public.

Two Western Massachusetts girls have been selected to membership in the Italian Club, and one to the International Relations Club, according to recent announcement. They are: Doris Alberts, sophomore, of Northampton, and Rena Pasqualini, freshman, of Springfield, as new members of the "Il Tricolore" or Italian Club; and Elizabeth Hern, sophomore, of Pittsfield, who is now a member of the I. R. C.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 9 - 1941

98



Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting a performa nce of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston. The orchestra gives its second local concert of the season in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening as the fifth concert of the current Woolsey Hall Concert Series.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
MAR 9 - 1941

Boston Symphony At Smith Tuesday

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at John M. Greene hall, Smith college, Tuesday evening provides an impressive climax to a season that has already brought five outstanding orchestras and conductors to Springfield and Northampton.

The Smith college series, it will be remembered, opened with the Philadelphia orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. The Community Concert association of Springfield brought the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and John Barbirolli to the Auditorium; the Wagner series provided Jose Iturbi and the Rochester Philharmonic and the Central Y. M. C. A. of Springfield did its share by offering Hans Kindler and the National Symphony and Dr Artur Rodzinski and the Cleveland orchestra.

Serge Koussevitsky, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony, has arranged the following program for Tuesday evening's concert:—

Symphony in G major, No 88 ..... Haydn
Overture to Leonore, No 3, op. 72 Beethoven
Symphony No 5, op. 47 ..... Shostakovitch

Quartet Recital

Next Sunday evening at Sage hall the Smith College String Quartet will offer the Quartet in A minor, op. 29 by Schubert and Quartet in A minor, op. 51, No 2 by Brahms. This recital is also open to the public without charge. Members of the quartet are Gilbert Ross, Milton Aronson, Louise Rood and Marion DeRonde.

Brahms Second Symphony Features Boston Program

Making it second appearance of the season here on Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform one of the finest symphonic programs ever presented in this city. Opening with the Mozart Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) the program continues with two nocturnes by Debussy, Nuages and Fetes. and Ravel's Choreographic Poem "La Valse," and concludes with Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73. The event marks the fifth concert of the current Woolsey Hall Concert Series, which will present Vladimir Horowitz, pianist. on April 2, and the New York Philharmonic Symphony on April 15.

Although each appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven is of great interest to music-lovers throughout this vicinity, attention centers equally in the distinguished conductor of the famous one hundred and ten piece orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who, by the way is the only Russian conductor that the orchestra has had in its sixty years of existence, was born in 1874 in the small Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except for small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The school was full — the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant, and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him — for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone, and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave memorable series of concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. Koussevitzky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, Western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. His span of years covers more than a quarter of the orchestra's history and far exceeds that of any previous conductor. He has touched new heights of his art, and brought the orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of season to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
MAR 9 - 1941

6—Dr. Serge Koussevitsky is shown with his wife and niece after the three of them had passed examinations for citizenship papers. For 17 years Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted what symphony orchestra—
A—Minneapolis.
B—Rochester.
C—Boston.
D—Cincinnati.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 9 - 1941

Bostonians and Renaissance Music Institute Features

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give the fourth concert of its current Brooklyn season on Friday evening, March 14, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will open with the Overture to "The Magic Flute" by Mozart. The rest of the evening will be given over to two great symphonies: Beethoven's Sixth in F major ("Pastoral") and Sibelius' Fifth in E flat major.

The concert is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. Standing room only is available for Friday night's performance.

Renaissance Music

A program of exceptional interest to lovers of early music is announced for Tuesday evening, March 11, at 8:30 o'clock in the Academy of Music. It will be devoted to music of the Renaissance and will feature as soloists Suzanne Bloch, lutenist; Edith Weiss-Mann, harpsichordist, and Alfred Mann, soloist on the recorder and viola d'amore. The Recorder Quartet of the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, will also perform. Members of the quartet are Alfred Mann, Eleanor Mitchel, ohn Krell and Anton G. Winkler. The program is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Miss Bloch is celebrated for her work in the music of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. She is the daughter of the composer, Ernest Bloch, and studied under his as well as with Roger Sessions and Nadia Boulanger. In this concert she will perform not only on the lute, but on virginals and recorders. Edith Weiss-Mann is distinguished in Europe and America as a harpsichordist and musicologist. She is the founder of the Hamburg Society for Ancient Music. Alfred Mann, her son, is another specialist in Renaissance music and is making his American concert debut this season.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 9 - 1941

Fourth Concert to Be Given by Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth of its five concerts of the 1940-41 season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, at 8:30 o'clock. The final concert of the orchestra's 55th season in Brooklyn will be given Friday evening, April 4.

This series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president, the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is executive chairman, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president.

Boxholders for the fourth concert will include Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, of which Mrs. Oscar W. Swift is president; the Alumnae of Adelphi Academy of which Mrs. Charles Gitlin is chairman, Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale; the Army-Navy box will be occupied by representatives from the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and the other boxes will be occupied by the students of Poly Prep Country Day School, Brooklyn Friends School, and the Packer Collegiate Institute.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present the following program: Overture to "The Magic 6 in F major, the Pastoral, by Flute," by Mozart; Symphony No. Beethoven, and the Symphony No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 83, by Sibelius.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
MAR 9 - 1941

BROOKLYN TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky to Direct Fourth Concert of Season Next Friday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will play next Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Beethoven's Sixth ("Pastoral") symphony in F major and Sibelius's Fifth symphony in E flat major. The concert will be the fourth of the orchestra's current Brooklyn season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Music of the Renaissance will be presented Tuesday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute. Soloists will be Suzanne Bloch, lute; Edith Weiss-Mann, harpsichord, and Alfred Mann, recorder and viola d'amore. The Recorder Quartet of the Curtis Institute of Philadelphia will also play. Members of the quartet are Alfred Mann, Eleanor Mitchel, John Krell and Anton G. Winkler.

Frances Shapiro, violinist, will give the final recital in the Institute's "Young Artists" series today at 3 P. M. in the Brooklyn Academy.

David Le Vita will lecture on "Piano Music of the Nineteenth Century" today at 4 P. M. in the Brooklyn Museum.

A musicale and tea, arranged by the advisory committee on Negro health of the Queensboro Tuberculosis and Health Association, will be given today at 4 P. M. in Lost Battalion Memorial Hall, 93-29 Queens Boulevard, Elmhurst. Proceeds will be used to establish a scholarship in public health for Negro nurses. Dr. John E. Lowry is chairman.

Among the artists are W. C. Handy, composer of "St. Louis Blues"; Luckey Roberts and Claude Hopkins, orchestra leaders, and Daisy Mulford, Joseph Holmes, Anna Comer, Eufa King and Lena Roberts. The Crescendo Club, composers' unit, will perform compositions by its members. J. C. Johnson will be master of ceremonies. Mrs. Fred Norman has arranged the program.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER
MAR 9 - 1941

98

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conducting a performa nce of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Symphony Hall, Boston. The orchestra gives its second local concert of the season in Woolsey Hall Wednesday evening as the fifth concert of the current Woolsey Hall Concert Series.

Brahms Second Symphony Features Boston Program

Making it second appearance of the season here on Wednesday evening, the Boston Symphony Orchestra will perform one of the finest symphonic programs ever presented in this city. Opening with the Mozart Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) the program continues with two nocturnes by Debussy, Nuages and Fetes, and Ravel's Choreographic Poem "La Valse," and concludes with Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D Major, Opus 73. The event marks the fifth concert of the current Woolsey Hall Concert Series, which will present Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, on April 2, and the New York Philharmonic Symphony on April 15.

Although each appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in New Haven is of great interest to music-lovers throughout this vicinity, attention centers equally in the distinguished conductor of the famous one hundred and ten piece orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who, by the way is the only Russian conductor that the orchestra has had in its sixty years of existence, was born in 1874 in the small Russian province of Tver. There was no musical life about him, except for small visiting theatrical companies. When his father opposed a career so remote from the experience of their own community, he ran away, and presented himself at the Philharmonic School in Moscow. The school was full — the year begun, but the authorities at once sensed the unusual qualities of the penniless young applicant, and made a place for him. There was only one possible scholarship open to him — for a student of the double-bass, and he accordingly took on this strange instrument. In a short time he astonished everyone by coaxing a lovely 'cello-like tone, and delicate melody from his huge, cumbrous bass, with its fist-wise bow. This was the Koussevitzky who later could elicit such transcendent tone and sheer melodic songfulness from a body of strings. And then, as now, he was tireless in his quest until he had reached new and unprecedented heights of beauty. Koussevitzky was soon known all over Europe as a virtuoso of the double-bass.

Then, coming to the end of its possibilities, Koussevitzky aspired to that richest of instruments, the hundred-fold orchestra. He made his first trials in Berlin, and then, having independent means, he assembled his own orchestra in Moscow, and gave memorable series of concerts there and in St. Petersburg. When his public heard the erstwhile double-bassist on this infinitely more expressive instrument, the effect was electric. Koussevitzky was then, as ever, a pioneer for his art. He chartered a steamer to take his orchestra the length of the Volga through his vast country, taking to the musically starved people of innumerable provincial towns their "first symphony concert."

After the revolution, Koussevitzky conducted for a while under government subsidy, but, fleeing restriction, established his famous "Concerts Koussevitzky," with his own orchestra in Paris. Here, and by guest performances in London and other cities, Western Europe came under the spell of this magnetic and forceful leader.

Such was the leader who came to America and the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1924. His span of years covers more than a quarter of the orchestra's history and far exceeds that of any previous conductor. He has touched new heights of his art, and brought the orchestra even in this present era of much fine music to new and surpassing importance. It requires a succession of season to test the scope of a conductor's interest in new music and old, the extent of his vision and his ability to refine his orchestra into an ever more perfect instrument, to keep his approach to the more familiar "classics" vital and absorbing. Koussevitzky's lengthening term shows him to have these abilities to a transcendent degree. The Boston Symphony concerts have never held such an abundant musical life, utter freedom from routine, such a brilliant and engrossing eloquence.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
SUNDAY UNION
& REPUBLICAN
MAR 9 - 1941

Boston Symphony At Smith Tuesday

The concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra at John M. Greene hall, Smith college, Tuesday evening provides an impressive climax to a season that has already brought five outstanding orchestras and conductors to Springfield and Northampton.

The Smith college series, it will be remembered, opened with the Philadelphia orchestra under Eugene Ormandy. The Community Concert association of Springfield brought the New York Philharmonic-Symphony and John Barbirolli to the Auditorium; the Wagner series provided Jose Iturbi and the Rochester Philharmonic and the Central Y. M. C. A. of Springfield did its share by offering Hans Kindler and the National Symphony and Dr Artur Rodzinski and the Cleveland orchestra.

Serge Koussevitsky, eminent conductor of the Boston Symphony, has arranged the following program for Tuesday evening's concert:—

Symphony in G major, No 88 ..... Haydn
Overture to Leonore, No 3, op. 72 Beethoven
Symphony No 5, op. 47 ..... Shostakovitch

Quartet Recital

Next Sunday evening at Sage hall the Smith College String Quartet will offer the Quartet in A minor, op. 29 by Schubert and Quartet in A minor, op. 51, No 2 by Brahms. This recital is also open to the public without charge. Members of the quartet are Gilbert Ross, Milton Aronson, Louise Rood and Marion DeRonde.

This Clipping From
PITTSBURGH, PA.
PRESS
MAR 9 - 1941

6—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, is shown with his wife and niece after the three of them had passed examinations for citizenship papers. For 17 years Dr. Koussevitzky has conducted what symphony orchestra—
A—Minneapolis.
B—Rochester.
C—Boston.
D—Cincinnati.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 9 - 1941

Bostonians and Renaissance Music Institute Features

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will give the fourth concert of its current Brooklyn season on Friday evening, March 14, at 8:30 o'clock in the Brooklyn Academy of Music. The program will open with the Overture to "The Magic Flute" by Mozart. The rest of the evening will be given over to two great symphonies: Beethoven's Sixth in F major ("Pastoral") and Sibelius' Fifth in E flat major.

The concert is presented under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee. Standing room only is available for Friday night's performance.

Renaissance Music

A program of exceptional interest to lovers of early music is announced for Tuesday evening, March 11, at 8:30 o'clock in the Academy of Music. It will be devoted to music of the Renaissance and will feature as soloists Suzanne Bloch, lutenist; Edith Weiss-Mann, harpsichordist, and Alfred Mann, soloist on the recorder and viola d'amore. The Recorder Quartet of the Curtis Institute, Philadelphia, will also perform. Members of the quartet are Alfred Mann, Eleanor Mitchel, ohn Krell and Anton G. Winkler. The program is held under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences.

Miss Bloch is celebrated for her work in the music of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. She is the daughter of the composer, Ernest Bloch, and studied under his as well as with Roger Sessions and Nadia Boulanger. In this concert she will perform not only on the lute, but on virginals and recorders. Edith Weiss-Mann is distinguished in Europe and America as a harpsichordist and musicologist. She is the founder of the Hamburg Society for Ancient Music. Alfred Mann, her son, is another specialist in Renaissance music and is making his American concert debut this season.

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 9 - 1941

Fourth Concert to Be Given by Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give the fourth of its five concerts of the 1940-41 season at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, Friday evening, at 8:30 o'clock. The final concert of the orchestra's 55th season in Brooklyn will be given Friday evening, April 4.

This series is presented under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences of which James G. McDonald is president, the Brooklyn Committee of which Adrian Van Sinderen is chairman, and Mrs. Henry J. Davenport is executive chairman, and the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society of which Dr. R. Huntington Woodman is president.

Boxholders for the fourth concert will include Mrs. Frank E. Simmons and Mrs. Maxwell Lester, Mrs. Dean C. Osborne, Mrs. Benjamin Prince, the Brooklyn Woman's Club, of which Mrs. Oscar W. Swift is president; the Alumnae of Adelphi Academy of which Mrs. Charles Gitlin is chairman, Mrs. Thomas Lauderdale; the Army-Navy box will be occupied by representatives from the Brooklyn Navy Yard, and the other boxes will be occupied by the students of Poly Prep Country Day School, Brooklyn Friends School, and the Packer Collegiate Institute.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will present the following program: Overture to "The Magic 6 in F major, the Pastoral, by Flute," by Mozart; Symphony No. Beethoven, and the Symphony No. 5 in E flat major, Op. 83, by Sibelius.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
TIMES
(B'klyn, Queens Sect.)
MAR 9 - 1941

BROOKLYN TO HEAR BOSTON SYMPHONY

Koussevitzky to Direct Fourth Concert of Season Next Friday Evening

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, directed by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, will play next Friday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music Mozart's overture to "The Magic Flute," Beethoven's Sixth ("Pastoral") symphony in F major and Sibelius's Fifth symphony in E flat major. The concert will be the fourth of the orchestra's current Brooklyn season under the joint auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society and a Brooklyn committee.

Music of the Renaissance will be presented Tuesday night at the Brooklyn Academy of Music, under the sponsorship of the Brooklyn Institute. Soloists will be Suzanne Bloch, lute; Edith Weiss-Mann, harpsichord, and Alfred Mann, recorder and viola d'amore. The Recorder Quartet of the Curtis Institute of Philadelphia will also play. Members of the quartet are Alfred Mann, Eleanor Mitchel, John Krell and Anton G. Winkler.

Frances Shapiro, violinist, will give the final recital in the Institute's "Young Artists" series today at 3 P. M. in the Brooklyn Academy.

David Le Vita will lecture on "Piano Music of the Nineteenth Century" today at 4 P. M. in the Brooklyn Museum.

A musicale and tea, arranged by the advisory committee on Negro health of the Queensboro Tuberculosis and Health Association, will be given today at 4 P. M. in Lost Battalion Memorial Hall, 93-29 Queens Boulevard, Elmhurst. Proceeds will be used to establish a scholarship in public health for Negro nurses. Dr. John E. Lowry is chairman.

Among the artists are W. C. Handy, composer of "St. Louis Blues"; Luckey Roberts and Claude Hopkins, orchestra leaders, and Daisy Mulford, Joseph Holmes, Anna Comer, Eufa King and Lena Roberts. The Crescendo Club, composers' unit, will perform compositions by its members. J. C. Johnson will be master of ceremonies. Mrs. Fred Norman has arranged the program.

PHILA. FORUM MAG.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.
MARCH, 1941

THE PHILADELPHIA FORUM
MAGAZINE

VOLUME TWENTY · MARCH, 1941 · NUMBER SEVEN

THE FORUM'S PUBLIC SERVICES

IN his review of the Boston Symphony concert Henry Pleasants said in the Evening Bulletin:

"Not the least of the many public services performed by The Philadelphia Forum is its annual presentation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symph Orchestra.

"That the value of the Bostonians' visit is not lost upon the Philadelphia musi public is reflected in the large and discriminating audiences which regularly atte the concerts.

"Such an audience was at the Academy of Music last night when Mr. Kou vitzky and his magnificent ensemble," etc.

Mr. Pleasants is entirely right, The Forum does perform many public servi of which the presentation of the Boston Symphony is one of the most important, our members form an unusually discriminating audience, even if it should be lar Will you help to make it larger next season?

Sometimes it seems as though Philadelphia in general, and some Forum mem in particular, took The Forum entirely too much for granted. It is the envy of n other cities, but Philadelphia does not become as excited about it as other c would.

In addition to the Boston Symphony The Forum presents an infinite variety other delightful evenings which Philadelphia would not otherwise enjoy.

The Forum has introduced some of the most eminent men and women in ev field of activity, to a considerable number of whom, were it not for The Forum, city would have been merely two train stops called North Philadelphia and Thirt Street, somewhere between New York and Washington.

Among these eminent men and women in literature and politics, to name but of these fields, whom The Forum has introduced were H. G. Wells, George W. sell ("AE"), Sir Hugh Walpole, G. K. Chesterton, John Drinkwater, Stefan Zw Alexander Woollcott, Emil Ludwig, André Maurois, Guglielmo Ferrero, John C worthy, Philip Guedalla, Sinclair Lewis, Alfred Noyes, John Masefield, Reb West, Lloyd George, Georges Clemenceau, General Jan Smuts, Viscount Cecil, Earl of Birkenhead, Sir Herbert Samuel, Doctor Annie Besant, Alfred Duff-Co Alexander Kerensky, Grand Duke Alexander, Sir Basil Thomson, Dr. Paul van land, Prince William of Sweden, Dr. Alfred Zimmern, and many others.

Yes, The Philadelphia Forum does perform many public services, and Philadelphians should know about them.

DIRECTION
DARIEN, CONN
MARCH, 1941

Music, Youth and America

Wheeler Beckett
As told to Clarissa Lorenz

Must good music be administered to children like sugar-coated pills? Twenty years ago that was probably true. Children had to be forced or else encouraged to listen to real music, had to be beguiled with slides and jokes, with small doses of important music slipped into a children's concert. One movement of a symphony, or pieces like The Flight of the Bumblebee or The Nutcracker Suite were considered enough.

When I founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra Youth Concerts, I inherited the whole apparatus — slides, choruses, 55-minute programs (the traditional school period) and all. Well, I experimented, and the more I experimented the more I was convinced that children will not be played down to. They want good music with no dilutions. Little by little we moved towards the idea of giving them "straight" concerts, and, with less talking from the podium, we played about twelve more pieces than was customary during a given season. To my mind, this is education in the best sense. By writing out full program notes, I see to it that each of the 2630 members of my audience gets information about the forthcoming concert ten days in advance. These notes contain a paragraph about the numbers to be played, with notes on the composer's life and music examples on the back.

The music masters in the schools tell me that the concerts and the notes are helping enormously to quicken interest in all kinds of music—classical, romantic and modern. And the children react astonishingly to the moderns. They select pieces like Stravinsky's Firebird, Prokoffief's Peter and the Wolf, or Sibelius's Valse Triste. They adore Sibelius. Last year we had a contest in which they voted on a choice of five symphonies out of twenty. Schubert's Unfinished came first, Dvorak's New World second, Mozart's G-Minor third, Tchaikowsky's Fifth was their fourth choice, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony their fifth. Sibelius's First was a runner-up. They voted strongly for Tchaikowsky's Fifth (which furnishes a theme-song for a Children's Hour on the air), for the William Tell Overture, which is the theme-song for the Hi-Ho Silver program, and for Tales of Vienna Woods. In short, like most of us, they like what they hear frequently.

The entire project of the Youth Concerts was based on the democratic idea, that of making music accessible to young America en masse. Children come from forty towns in Massachusetts. We have a wonderful audience in Boston. They listen as attentively as an adult audience. Especially anxious to reach the underprivileged classes, I offer the 25 settlements of Greater Boston tickets at 20c per seat, or $1.20 the series of six concerts. About 250 from this class attend. The majority of club members, i.e., 2000 junior high and high-school students from 12 to 18 years of age, pay 33c a seat, or $2 for the series.

Children like what they hear frequently, but I do not agree that it is better to let them listen to bad music than none at all. Music is too vital a stimulus and in the young, impressionable listener there is no rationalization process. Being absorbed unconsciously, as all music is, bad music in large doses develops sentimentality—another name for false emotion. Many children have voluntarily approached me and said that after hearing my concerts they were all through with swing music. I've tried to take a broad attitude on this question, tried to discourage them from such drastic decisions.

"Swing's all right," I tell them. "After all, you're growing up and you'll be going to dances and hearing a great deal of it. Personally, I don't care for it because it strikes me as monotonous. In good music, you have an infinite and rich variety of rhythm, orchestral color, design, and ideas. In swing, you have this one basic rhythm pulsating over and over. Its melodic weakness is demonstrated by the way certain hit-writers steal from the classics."

I have been interested in children's music for twelve or fifteen years and consider it an important part of my conducting and composing. I like to think that my young audience will form a nucleus of composers, virtuosi and listeners who will one day give American music a place in the sun. Only by playing and hearing it can we build up a tradition of our own. Although we have conquered the fields of the violin, piano and voice, there is not one American conductor on any of our prominent podiums, and this will continue until the public undergoes a change of heart and ceases to worship everything European just because it is European.

I believe that ultimately the American conductor and composer will hold his own with any European. Thanks partly to the present European blackout and partly to our enlightened attitude towards children, American music and American musicians will soon be making their debut!

Clipping From BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 10 1941

IMPRESARIOS PREVAIL in these musical shots ranging from Boston to Palm Beach. At left F. M. Sloan, chief engineer of Westinghouse station W1XK, Boston, and W. C. Swartley, general manager of WBZ-WBZA, greet Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony conductor. The orchestra presented its first FM broadcast Feb. 26 [BROADCASTING, March 3] with Dr. Koussevitsky conducting. He pronounced results "astonishing". Ignace Jan Paderewski, in right photo, receives recordings of CBS broadcast honoring the golden anniversary of his first American concert. The recordings were presented to Paderewski by Steve Willis, general manager of WJNO, West Palm Beach, during a visit there last month by the Polish pianist.

PHILA. FORUM MAG.
PHILADELPHIA PA.
MARCH, 1941

94

THE PHILADELPHIA FORUM
MAGAZINE

VOLUME TWENTY | MARCH, 1941 | NUMBER SEVEN

THE FORUM'S PUBLIC SERVICES

IN his review of the Boston Symphony concert Henry Pleasants said in the Evening Bulletin:

"Not the least of the many public services performed by The Philadelphia Forum is its annual presentation of Serge Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

"That the value of the Bostonians' visit is not lost upon the Philadelphia musical public is reflected in the large and discriminating audiences which regularly attend the concerts.

"Such an audience was at the Academy of Music last night when Mr. Koussevitzky and his magnificent ensemble," etc.

Mr. Pleasants is entirely right, The Forum does perform many public services, of which the presentation of the Boston Symphony is one of the most important, and our members form an unusually discriminating audience, even if it should be larger. Will you help to make it larger next season?

Sometimes it seems as though Philadelphia in general, and some Forum members in particular, took The Forum entirely too much for granted. It is the envy of most other cities, but Philadelphia does not become as excited about it as other cities would.

In addition to the Boston Symphony The Forum presents an infinite variety of other delightful evenings which Philadelphia would not otherwise enjoy.

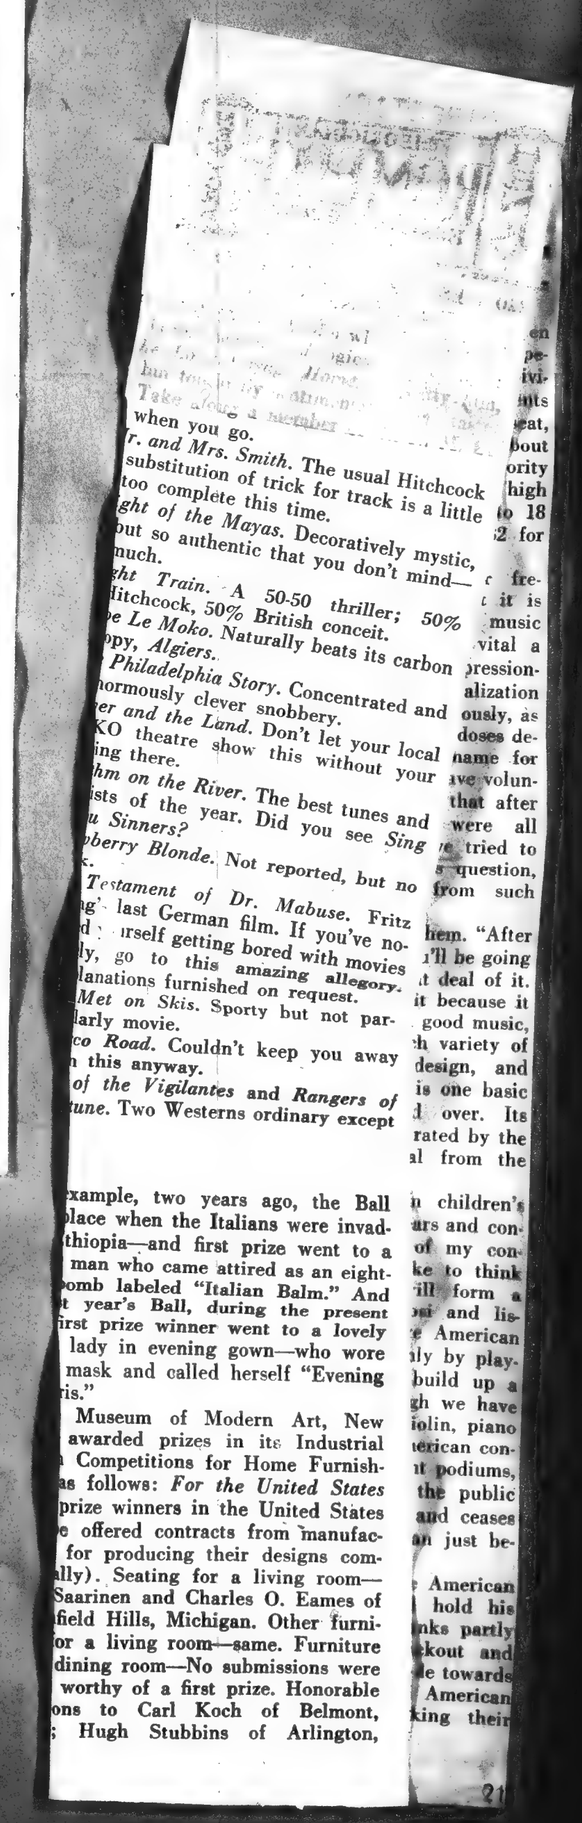
The Forum has introduced some of the most eminent men and women in every field of activity, to a considerable number of whom, were it not for The Forum, this city would have been merely two train stops called North Philadelphia and Thirtieth Street, somewhere between New York and Washington.

Among these eminent men and women in literature and politics, to name but two of these fields, whom The Forum has introduced were H. G. Wells, George W. Russell ("AE"), Sir Hugh Walpole, G. K. Chesterton, John Drinkwater, Stefan Zweig, Alexander Woollcott, Emil Ludwig, André Maurois, Guglielmo Ferrero, John Galsworthy, Philip Guedalla, Sinclair Lewis, Alfred Noyes, John Masefield, Rebecca West, Lloyd George, Georges Clemenceau, General Jan Smuts, Viscount Cecil, the Earl of Birkenhead, Sir Herbert Samuel, Doctor Annie Besant, Alfred Duff-Cooper, Alexander Kerensky, Grand Duke Alexander, Sir Basil Thomson, Dr. Paul van Zeeland, Prince William of Sweden, Dr. Alfred Zimmern, and many others.

Yes, The Philadelphia Forum does perform many public services, and more Philadelphians should know about them.

Clipping From
BROADCASTING
WASHINGTON, D. C.
MAR 10 1941

IMPRESARIOS PREVAIL in these musical shots ranging from Boston to Palm Beach. At left F. M. Sloan, chief engineer of Westinghouse station W1XK, Boston, and W. C. Swartley, general manager of WBZ-WBZA, greet Dr. Serge Koussevitsky, Boston Symphony conductor. The orchestra presented its first FM broadcast Feb. 26 [BROADCASTING, March 3] with Dr. Koussevitsky conducting. He pronounced results "astonishing". Ignace Jan Paderewski, in right photo, receives recordings of CBS broadcast honoring the golden anniversary of his first American concert. The recordings were presented to Paderewski by Steve Willis, general manager of WJNO, West Palm Beach, during a visit there last month by the Polish pianist.



when you go.
r. and Mrs. Smith. The usual Hitchcock substitution of trick for track is a little too complete this time.
ght of the Mayas. Decoratively mystic, but so authentic that you don't mind— much.
ght Train. A 50-50 thriller; 50% Hitchcock, 50% British conceit.
e Le Moko. Naturally beats its carbon opy, Algiers.
Philadelphia Story. Concentrated and normously clever snobbery.
er and the Land. Don't let your local KO theatre show this without your ing there.
hm on the River. The best tunes and sts of the year. Did you see Sing u Sinners?
berry Blonde. Not reported, but no s.
Testament of Dr. Mabuse. Fritz g's last German film. If you've no- rself getting bored with movies ly, go to this amazing allegory. lanations furnished on request.
Met on Skis. Sporty but not par- larly movie.
co Road. Couldn't keep you away this anyway.
of the Vigilantes and Rangers of tune. Two Westerns ordinary except xample, two years ago, the Ball lace when the Italians were invad- thiopia—and first prize went to a man who came attired as an eight- omb labeled "Italian Balm." And t year's Ball, during the present irst prize winner went to a lovely lady in evening gown—who wore mask and called herself "Evening ris."

Museum of Modern Art, New awarded prizes in its Industrial Competitions for Home Furnish- as follows: For the United States prize winners in the United States e offered contracts from manufac- for producing their designs com- lly). Seating for a living room— Saarinen and Charles O. Eames of field Hills, Michigan. Other furni- or a living room—same. Furniture dining room—No submissions were worthy of a first prize. Honorable ons to Carl Koch of Belmont, ; Hugh Stubbins of Arlington,

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 10 1941

Boston Symphony At Northampton Tomorrow Night

The sixth concert in the Smith College concert course tomorrow night will bring Serge Koussevitzky's Boston Symphony Orchestra to John M. Greene Hall, Northampton. Tickets will be sold at the door. The concert starts at 8. The program follows: Haydn's Symphony in G major, No. 88; Beethoven's Overture to Leonore, No. 3, Opus 72; Shostakovitch's Symphony, No. 5. Opus 47.

This Clipping From
NORTHAMPTON, MASS.
HAMPSHIRE GAZETTE

MAR 12 1941

Thrilling Concert By Boston Symphony Here Last Evening

John M. Greene Hall Filled Nearly to Capacity, Despite Heavy Snowstorm. Closes Smith College Series

The faithfulness and affection which a large section of the population harbors for Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra was demonstrated last night when an audience filled John M. Greene Hall to near capacity despite the heavy snowstorm. The reward came in a thrilling concert by the great organization and its world-renowned conductor, thus bringing the Smith College concert series to an auspicious close.

A wealth of classical beauty was unfolded in the playing of Haydn's Symphony in G and Beethoven's Leonore Overture No. 3, but the most arresting part of the evening came in the performance of the colorful and dynamic 5th symphony of Dimitri Shostakovitch, a modern Russian composer.

Although written on the 20th anniversary of the founding of the Soviet Union and first performed in 1937, the symphony bears a much closer relation to the classical symphony which opened the program than to most compositions written today. It is constructed in four movements, each of which has classical form, and between all of which there is unity. The contemporary flavor comes not from its construction but from its content, and in this matter there is an inevitable conclusion: the work is uneven. Its unevenness is the result of ranging from honest emotion to 'effectiveness," the honest emotion deriving from the excellent use of harmonic and melodic material of a century ago, and the effectiveness being modern in that it is almost unalloyed noise. Thus the courageous opening of the 2nd movement, the Bach-like introduction to the third, and the inspiring vigor of the 4th were mixed with unabashed clangor whenever the classical idea became too prominent.

Dr. Koussevitsky worked like a zealot over the symphony and built a work that was alive as an elephant thrashing in a river. His energy and his flaming enthusiasm were at times overwhelming. If all modern composers could have the benefit of such a hearing they would have considerably less reason for complaining of abuse.

The concert began with the lilting, joyous symphony of Haydn. Dr. Koussevitsky's choice of tempi was admirable, and, although the playing of such a "little" work by such a big orchestra is like examining lace under a powerful glass, the work danced and sang and played away without ever losing its classical proportion. From the first measures the audience was thrilled by Dr. Koussevitsky's powerful but unassuming authority.

The Beethoven overture which followed was alive with excitement. It is a powerful score and as such the audience heard it. As usual, Dr. Koussevitsky electrified his men with his tremendous vitality, and through his musical insight wrought the popular overture into a fresh and wonderful work.

As a tribute to a great concert series, the audience shouted and applauded long after the final notes were played.

—R. M. K.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE

MAR 12 1941

Attend Concert In Northampton

Despite the storm last night, several Berkshire music lovers hazarded the trip over the Berkshire Trail to attend the Smith College concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. From Northampton the orchestra went by train to New Haven for its concert at Yale University tonight and then it will continue on to New York for concerts there and in Brooklyn this week.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 13 1941

Music

BOSTON SYMPHONY OFFERS FAMILIAR WORKS AT WOOLSEY

The Boston Symphony Orchestra called up familiar spirits to aid last evening as it appeared before the capacity audience customary for the Woolsey Series. The Mozart Symphony was new, if not novel, the Debussy works are often played, and the Ravel "La Valse" has all the elements of popularity, even though it has not attained the celebrity of the inferior Bolero. Brahms' Second Symphony is a very busy one everywhere, not excepting the repertory of this orchestra which has played it many times within the year. In all probability a rest would be in the best interests of a work which is too movingly beautiful to become an ordinary commodity.

Mozart and Haydn's early symphonies have an unaffected charm for us today; pretending little they frequently convey the sincerest delight with simple and naive means. The example selected from Mozart's 40-odd productions in this form is attractive particularly for the Andante which shows forth the string section of an orchestra at its best, and for the historical fact of the trumpet in the Minuet deriving from the French overture in the time of Lully. The octave figure of the opening movement suggests the later 'Haffner' opus, and thus may be summarized the principal virtues of a work which says nothing, and says it charmingly . Only two of the Debussy 'Nocturnes' were played, the first a rather tenuous 'Nuages,' the second a thrice-popular 'Fetes,' as rhythmically clear and programmatic work as the great Impressionist composer ever penned. Both show the hand of time, as well, and make a chronological relation to Ravel's similarly programmatic "La Valse" whose Viennese grace, spoken with an incomparably more brilliant orchestra, seem infinitely more contemporary and electric.

A Popular Choice

The day when any listener can sympathize with the critic who recommended signs over the doors indicating "This way out in case of Brahms" has quite gone. We find the Second Sympathy immediatel appealing, a response which too the audience of earlier days som time to arrive at; in fact, man find this particular work rather to appealing. The necessary freshnes which the listener brings to a worl must be complemented by the vivi sense of re-creation by the players and there were signs that neithe was present in great quanity las evening. The Boston Symphon can never play badly, but it seemec to play rather absent-mindedly, a suggested explanation of the ir-regular tempos, changing as New England weather, in the first movement, and the unwarranted speed of recurring passages which gave the whole a stop and go aspect. Only the final movement did the requisite glow and vitality appear.

As the seasons pass and the days of Dr. Koussevitsky's leadership grow, we become increasingly grateful for the many uplifting moments brought us through his high standard of selection and interpretation. We shall often have cause to remark in the distant future that we heard him conduct Debussy and Ravel, Prokofieff, Stravinsky, and Hindemith, as well as other works from the entire symphonic literature which are done by others though rarely better. The historical fact will bear out his close association in person and in mind with the great musicians of this century. These become, then, not ordinary concerts, and they are not to be taken for granted because of their regularity; or of their social contribution to the season. As the Boston Symphony departs for the present season, we may look with anticipation to its return in November.

H. EARLE JOHNSON

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
REGISTER

MAR 12 1941

Boston Symphony At Woolsey Hall Tonight

Making its annual spring appearance here the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be heard in Woolsey Hall this evening, the concert commencing at 8:30. The great leader of the world famous orchestra has arranged a brilliant program for the occasion. Opening with Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) the list of selections include Debussy's two nocturners, Nuages and Fetes. Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "La Valse," and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73. This fine group of symphonic compositions comprises one of the most notable programs ever given in New Haven by the Bostonians and will make the fifth concert of the current Woolsey Hall Series an event long to be remembered.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

MAR 12 1941

Boston Symphony in Woolsey Hall Tonight

Making it's annual Spring appearance here the Boston Symphony orchestra under the baton of Dr. Serge Koussevitzky will be heard in Woolsey hall this evening, the concert commencing at 8:30. The great leader of the world famous orchestra has arranged a brilliant program for the occasion. Opening with Mozart's Symphony in A major (Koechel No. 201) the list of selections include Debussy's two nocturnes, Nuages and Fetes, Ravel's Choreographic Poem, "La Valse", and Brahms' Symphony No. 2 in D major, Opus 73. This fine group of symphonic compositions comprises one of the most notable programs ever given in New Haven by the Bostonians and will make the fifth concert of the current Woolsey Hall Series an event long to be remembered. As usual a capacity audience will be in attendance.

Two more concerts remain on the Woolsey Series schedule for the 1940-41 season. On Wednesday evening, April 2 Vladimir Horowitz, distinguished Russian pianist, will be heard, and on Tuesday, April 15, the New York-Philharmonic Symphony Orchestra under the direction of John Barbirolli will bring the season to a brilliant climax.

This Clipping From
WORCESTER, MASS.
TELEGRAM

MAR 12 1941

Boston Symphony Heard in Concert at Smith College

Impressive Climax to Season's Program in Western Massachusetts

By R. JOSEPH RACINE

NORTHAMPTON, March 11.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Serge Koussevitzky gave its only Western Massachusetts concert tonight in the John M. Greene Hall of Smith College here before a big audience, and provided an impressive climax to the season's concerts which brought the country's six outstanding orchestras to Springfield and Northampton since last November.

The Philadelphia orchestra opened the Smith series early last Fall. Springfield heard the New York Philharmonic, the Rochester Philharmonic, the National Symphony and the Cleveland Symphony this season.

Resplendent Performance

Mr. Koussevitzky led his sterling musicians in a resplendent performance tonight, which included the much discussed Shostakovich Symphony No. 5. This symphony was first heard in the U. S. in 1938 when the NBC orchestra directed by Artur Rodzinski played it in New York. Stokowski and the Philadelphia Orchestra gave it a second hearing in March, 1939, in Carnegie Hall, and then the all American youth orchestra played it last September. Mr. Koussevitzky included it in his Boston programs this season, twice in New York and more recently in Hartford. To him must be given the credit for educating the American audiences into full appreciation of the real values of the new symphony. Like so many great scores, first prejudices must be destroyed, before their innate worth becomes an established fact.

Shostakovich's work received its world premiere only three years ago in Leningrad and this fifth symphony marked a clean break from his more classical and formal type of musical structure—to the Slavic earthly realities, which is clearly the intent of the present score. The music is provocative and awakened intense perceptions, as it sways on in turbulent and violent mood. Yet, it has lines of tender expression and is occasionally of a melancholy mood, as played in the first part. It is significantly expressive of the longings and aspirations of a people, and it has heart-stirring appeal.

Of Serene Beauty

The second movement, an allegretto with a waltz-like score, is of serene beauty and in itself an outstanding part of the symphony. In the largo-type movement, there appeared a Leit-Motif, carried on a fatalistic and catchy rhythm, above which were played brilliant solo-combinations for flute, piccolo, violin and celesta—masterpieces of instrumental virtuosity.

Shostakovich's symphony was a huge success, made so in great part by the brilliant orchestra which performed it and which was in rare form. Mr. Koussevitzky's faith in his young countryman-composer probably was never so fully justfied as in tonight's audience reaction, at the conclusion of this resourceful and richly endowed 19th century composition. The conductor and his men won a hearty ovation by an audience which had grasped the significance of the symphony.

Haydn, Beethoven

The other two compositions on the program were Haydn's "Symphony in G Major" and Beethoven's "Overture to Leonore," both were blessed with a spirited and admirable reading. The Haydn symphony, one of close texture, was given a rich tonal dress and was a triumph of musicianship and feeling.

The more familiar Leonore Overture was enhance by an unusual orchestration marked for its subtlety and emotional depth, strikingly communicated, even though it was played to a frequently too rapid tempi. The interpretation was completely unified and of a brilliant finish. It easily was the highlight of the evening in point of masterful execution.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra under its distinguished leader, has won an enviable reputation as the top ranking orchestra in the country, and has permanently earned its niche in the musical hall of fame.

This Clipping From
NEW HAVEN, CONN.
JOURNAL-COURIER

MAR 13 1941

Last Night's Concert

By PATRICIA A. CARR

Boston Symphony In Inspiring Performance

Presenting as rewarding a program and performance as ever was held in New Haven, Dr. Serge Koussevitsky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the second of their bi-annual concerts last night in Woolsey hall. Playing compositions of Mozart, Debussy, Ravel and Brahms, the Orchestra's performance may be said to have been inspired. Dr. Koussevitsky's baton worked miracles and magic—the former on his personnel and the latter on his audience.

The Mozart Symphony in A Major (Koechel No. 201) was an auspicious beginning starting point. This is music imbued with the engaging qualities of happiness and youth. The bright insistance of the strings in the Allegro movement produces an effect as frilly and spritely as a Spring flower, while the melodic content is increasingly emphasized during the progression of the work. Simple but satisfying, the Symphony gaily continues on its attractive way, combining elements in an irrestible manner. The orchestra's fine delineation of the pure melodic line could scarcely have been bettered.

Altogether a composition that is stamped with the unmistakable markings of the French Impressionistic school, Debussy's beautiful Nocturnes, "Nuages" and "Fetes" immediately caused the mood to be switched. Opening with notes of nostalgia, lament and longing fused into poignant sound, the strings and woodwinds stealthily increase in range and degree to reach a muted peak. A tender, twilight mood is evoked, full of the beating and fluttering of linnets wings. In sudden contrast the orchestra played "Fetes", a fanfare of brilliance—colors and sound merged in a circus of riotously gay music. The episode of the procession was given in a determined, inevitable manner, rising to an exciting climax.

Unusual in theme and in treatment, composed of snatches of the 19th century and the present time, Ravel's "La Valse" completed the portion of the program prior to the intermission. Supposedly illustrating according to Ravel's comments on the work, a ball at the Imperial Court about 1855, the music is built upon waltz tempo. Although the proper tempo is maintained, the composition differs from the common acceptance of such music. A sense of impending doom is inescapable upon hearing "La Valse"; warning of unknown horros seemed to be flashed to the dancers again and again, in uneasy succession and fevered brilliance. Wild entreaties burst upon their unlistening ears, and despair envelopes the atmosphere.

The music posseses qualties which link it to the clutching realm of the macabre, and never, despite its scoring, does it bear the lilting sentimentality of waltz music.

The richly satisfying Symphony No. 2 in D Major of Brahms brought the evening's conclusion. The boldly played bright and vigorous music rounded a program of stellar performance and quality. Nothing less could honestly be said of so exceptional a concert, nor could any adjective paler than "dynamic" be used in Dr. Koussevitsky's behalf.

This Clipping From
BROCKTON, MASS.
ENTERPRISE
MAR 12 1941

Swinging Through the Hub

By D. O. T.

In Sanders Theatre "Woody"

CLAUDIA ON CONCERTS.

CLAUDIA, a young matron with whom New York theatre audiences are rapidly becoming very well acquainted, is of the delightful, engaging and unpredictable type that most effectually holds the mirror up to the average. When reading of her experiences we laugh, we chuckle, we weep at ourselves and at all the lovable humanity of family joys and life's small tragedies which so often reach epic dimensions at their climatic point. Finding ourselves in accord with her on so many things it was only too easy to understand her attitude toward concerts, an attitude which so many feel it wiser not to admit to. To Claudia concerts were apt to be long boring affairs. Oh yes, she knew some music, "there had been eight long years of piano lessons, but after a certain point everything sounded alike!"

Within the last few days, however, we have become more than ever convinced that Claudia's aversion is due to the fact that she never had a chance to go to a Harvard Glee Club-Radcliffe Choral Society concert. Her concert experience was very strangely limited—hemmed in, as a matter of fact, by the grandiloquent New York affairs for which her wealthy sister so often sent her the tickets. Probably if sister had a ticket for the aforementioned University concert she would go herself!

HAVING FUN.

IT MAY ALL have been because Mr. G. Wallace Woodworth and his choruses were having fun and that fun was contagious. At any rate, whatever the reason it wasn't only University members that were stamping their feet with intense enthusiasm and demanding an encore at the end, but also dignified grey-haired ladies in evening gown. The variegated programme was like a well-balanced meal, the execution of it like the acting in an extremely well cast play in which the principles and the minor play equally well for the ultimate perfection of the entire performance. From the sublime orchestration felt in the combined voices during the opening number, a thrilling Alleluia written for the opening of the Berkshire Music Centre by Randall Thompson, to the gaiety, lilt and grace of the Strauss, La Reine Indigo, the audience ran the gamut of emotions and the music reflected the past and the bewildering present.

The emphasis lay almost entirely on the English and it seemed quite fitting to all present that it should be so. Perhaps the most outstanding numbers in the first half of the programme was Two Elegies which so poignantly brought to our minds all that the English mean to us, and A Dirge for Two Veterans so thrillingly, movingly rendered by the Glee Club, assisted by brasses and drums from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

But the opening of the second half was enough to waken any dozers or half dead that the audience might have harbored. This was the Rio Grande by the youthful Constant Lambert, a composition for chorus, solo piano and orchestra in which as the author suggests, the chorus is only part of the whole, on an equal footing with the piano but not superior to it. In this tremendously effective and realistic number you catch all the important elements of American jazz fused impressively with the Brazilian dance forms. The final product is an amazing, bewildering affair, in which the orchestration serves as punctuation, the piano as its wit and the chorus as its theme. A modern screech, a thrill, a chaotic fusion of all that is good and bad to-day, it is to-day's world in terms of sound, and at times we felt we could close our eyes and see what Disney would have reproduced on the screen for this composition.

The exquisitely delightful, completely unpretentious rendition of the Strauss, with its grace and rhythm and beautiful melody charmed the lovers of the old and the new alike, nor would any of them leave their seats until a part of that number had been repeated.

RETROCESSION.

IT IS A RARE privilege, that of walking back into the past, and is only occasionally accorded to a few of us—the street of life is so definitely one way and these times it seems as though the danger signals were very clearly printed but gaily, nonchalantly ignored by the majority. Strangely enough this sort of going back does not seem to me to occur at reunions for there you see your own contemporaries and brightly remark, "No one has changed a bit, have they?" But going back to your school with representatives from many other classes from 1889 up to the present, sitting in the lecture hall and listening to a former teacher who really hasn't changed one iota—that is a very different thing.

It was the day after the Sanders Theatre concert that G. Wallace Woodworth, otherwise known as "Woody," held forth on the place of music at Radcliffe. "What business have we to talk of music to-day?" he queries. Then answers his own question thus, "The place of art to-day is not to shut itself up in an ivory tower but to relate and represent in its medium what is going on in the world . . . The arts are only buttresses for what is going on."

The place of music in any college, he reminds us, is an interesting, absorbing and challenging problem because it is an art, a science and a field of learning. Harvard and Radcliffe have taken the conservative side in this problem and choose to draw a distinct line between the college and the conservatory. The theory of music may be studied and applied in these schools but to practice it one should join the conservatory. It is also worth while noting that within the University as well as outside of it during these last few years interest in music has increased greatly. In five years the number of pupils concentrating in this field has just doubled. This country certainly is beginning to take seriously its almost certain job of keeping alive the arts while the other countries drop the torch to preserve themselves.

It was emphatically stated that Radcliffe had a position in the sun where music was concerned, for in this college for many years choral practice has been set at 2 o'clock every Tuesday and Thursday and the academic programme has been built around this set time. This is very rare in colleges in America! Music there is free by tradition. There is no credit for choral practice, as indeed it should, music and the love of it stands on its own feet.

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
NEWS
MAR 10 1941

101

Soloist's Union Card May Ban Boston Job

By joining the AFL Musicians Union in order to solo with the Philadelphia Orchestra at Constitution Hall a week from tomorrow, Frances Nash Watson, concert pianist and unofficial musical adviser to the White House, may have barred herself from keeping a later engagement with the Boston Symphony.

Mrs. Watson, who is the wife of Brig. Gen. Edwin M. Watson, aide to the President, is joining the union to comply with a ruling that instrumental soloists must be union members if they are to play with union orchestras. The Philadelphia Orchestra is unionized.

Mrs. Watson

But the Boston Symphony is the remaining major American symphony which is non-union, and it must remain so under the bequest which provides its main financial support.

To keep her Boston engagement, Mrs. Watson, as a union member, would have to obtain a special dispensation, and that would be entirely up to the union.

Mrs. Watson is speeding her application for union membership in order to rehearse with the Philadelphia Orchestra next Monday. Even rehearsals would be banned if she is not a member by that time.

This Clipping From
NEW ORLEANS, LA.
ITEM
MAR 14 1941

HAILS CITIZENSHIP

(By The United Press)

BOSTON, March 14.—Serge Koussevitzky, Russian-born conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, celebrated his becoming a United States citizen by presenting a special program of American music.

THIS CLIPPING FROM HENDERSON, TEX.
TEXAS NEWS
MAR 16 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM MINERAL WELLS, TEXAS
TEXAS INDEX
MAR 16 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM CHEYENNE, WYO.
WYOMING EAGLE
MAR 19 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NORWICH, N. Y.
SUN
MAR 15 1941

This Clipping From
OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLA.
OKLAHOMAN
MAR 20 1941

This Clipping From
DALLAS, TEX.
JOURNAL
MAR 22 1941

This Clipping From
WASHINGTON, D. C.
TIMES HERALD
MAR 23 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
COHOES, N. Y.
AMERICAN
MAR 19 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM BEND, ORE.
BULLETIN
MAR 14 1941

This Clipping From
ALBANY, N.Y.
KNICKERBOCKER NEWS
MAR 24 1941

THIS CLIPPING FROM
DRUMRIGHT, OKLA.
DERRICK
MAR 19 1941

This Clipping From
BROOKLYN, N.Y.
EAGLE
MAR 11 1941

Jo Ranson's

RADIO DIAL LOG

Television Tip

NBC's television schedule for this week includes a pickup of the final session of the Tournament of Champions at Madison Square Garden tomorrow night and the wrestling matches from the Jamaica Arena on Friday . . . FM (frequency modulation to the uninitiated) received a plug from Dr. Serge Koussevitzky after he heard his own Boston Symphony Orchestra broadcast over the system. He said that FM means a new era in symphonic broadcasting. "Every instrument was never so clear," he said. "Before, a clarinet always was an awaful instrument over the radio. Now it is beautiful. The timbre of the different choirs comes over with exceptional fidelity." Dr. Koussevitzky heard the program over WKX, Hull, Mass., FM station. "Never before in a broadcast," he said, "have I been able to pick out each instrument individually." This is the fourth FM transmitter proposed by CBS. Two of them—at New York and Chicago—have been given FCC approval. A third pends for Boston.

This Clipping From
SPRINGFIELD, MASS.
EVENING UNION
MAR 12 1941

KOUSSEVITZKY GIVEN OVATION IN SMITH HALL

...city Crowd at Last of ...oncert Series in Spite of Storm

NORTHAMPTON, March 12 — In spite of the storm which made traveling an exciting adventure, every seat in John M. Greene Hall was occupied last night and Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were given a veritable ovation before and after the concert, the final in the Smith College series.

In Fine Spirits

Seldom have we seen the eminent Russian conductor in such fine spirits. A broad smile wreathed his countenance as he bowed repeatedly in acknowledgement of applause and he continued in this vein throughout the evening. At his best, few conductors equal him and tonight he was at his best, playing works for which he has a particular fondness and flair. He also appeared in the guise of sponsor for the fifth symphony of Dmitri Shostakovitch, a work he declares he will make popular and one in which he sincerely believes. This was evident tonight as he conducted the work. It was an inspired performance, born of absolute conviction.

This is not a symphony which may be grasped at one hearing. It did seem to this listener that few works should have more popular appeal for there is not a dull moment in the four movements and for the greater part of the time the ear is treated to brilliant colors, provocative rhythms, and not a little pure melody. The work is the exact antithesis of the first symphony which is grim and sardonic. This work has a wildly exciting opening movement and as blood stirring a march theme as one may expect to hear. There is a deal of percussion used, while frequent contrasts provide continued interest. The second movement is embellished with a pert little violin solo, admirably played by concertmaster Bergin, and the theme is then tossed about the other choirs. Loveliest of all the movements is the largo. One gets the fleeting impression of a string quartet, violas and cellos are prominently used and the prevailing color is dark. This movement also has its impassioned moments, but ends in the pastorale strain which pervades most of it. The finale finds Shostakovitch and Koussevitzky, both showmen, in perfect understanding. Every resource of the orchestra is called upon, and it is in such moments that the Boston symphony is at its most astounding. Climax is piled upon climax, and the net result becomes a bit overwhelming.

The youthful audience was vastly impressed and applause continued for minutes with Koussevitzky and his men sharing it equally. This is a work for youth and youth responded tonight.

The concert opened with a superb reading of one of the greatest of the Haydn symphonies, the "Symphony in G major, No. 88." Particularly fine was the largo, one of the loveliest melodies ever written, played with all the richness of tone of which this ensemble is capable. There was a delightful verve to the minuet and trio and to the final rondo was given just the needed dramatic effect.

The remaining work on the program was the overture No. 3 to "Leonora" by Beethoven. This was an unforgettable performance which skilfully kept the feeling of suspense and mounting joy until the triumphant climax of the coda. The off stage horns were particularly effective and the ear was ravished with tonal splendor from beginning to the end. The revival of "Fidelio" at the Metropolitan and its performance on the air this season has given added popularity to these three overtures, all of which were played by Bruno Walter, when he conducted [illegible] three times this season.

The Smith College series next season will open Oct. 30 with a concert by Rachmaninoff. The Rochester Philharmonic and Iturbi will be heard ...v. 10 and Antonio Brosa, violinist, ...play Jan. 14. Artur Rodzinski ... the Cleveland Orchestra will ap...ar Feb. 7 and on Feb. 18, Helen ...raubel, American dramatic soprano, ...ill be heard here for the first time. ...he Boston Symphony will close the ...series on March 10.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
PM
MAR 14 1941

Eight Conductors Named for Philharmonic Centennial; Toscanini Not Among Them

Next year the Philharmonic-Symphony Society will be 100 years old. Last night Marshall Field, President of the Board of Directors, announced plans to celebrate the orchestra's centennial with about as brilliant a list of conductors as has ever appeared with one orchestra in one season. Here they are, with the length of each one's tenancy:

Leopold Stokowski, first two weeks;
Serge Koussevitzky, two weeks;
John Barbirolli, eight weeks;
Bruno Walter, four weeks;
Dimitri Mitropoulos, one month;
Artur Rodzinski, one month;
Eugene Goossens, two weeks;
Fritz Busch, two weeks.

Arturo Toscanini is about the only active, old-line conductor not appearing on the list. As for the others:

Mr. Stokowski resigned last week end from the Philadelphia Orchestra, where he had been conductor for 29 years. Koussevitzky, by grace of the Boston Symphony trustees, will be conducting another major American orchestra for the first time since he came to this country 17 years ago.

Mr. Barbirolli, Mr. Walter and Mr. Mitropoulos conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony this year. The first, being "permanent conductor," will have the longest assignment.

Mr. Rodzinski, conductor of the Cleveland Orchestra for the past eight years, conducted the Philharmonic-Symphony as guest in 1936-37 and last summer won great critical acclaim for his two weeks at the Stadium Concerts.

Mr. Goossens has been conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony for 10 years. Before that he conducted the Rochester Philharmonic for eight. He is an Englishman by birth.

Mr. Busch, brother of the violinist Adolf Busch, was head of the Dresden State Opera for 11 years before the advent of Hitler. Then he left Germany voluntarily and has been dividing his time between England, Buenos Aires and the Scandinavian countries. In England he conducted the Mozart Festivals at Glyndebourne. Recordings made by the Glyndebourne Company and others with a chamber orchestra are particularly treasured by American collectors.

The Society's 100th season opens Oct. 9, 1941. Its aim, says Mr. Field, is still that announced a century ago—"the study and rendering of symphonies, overtures and other classical music in such a manner as to cultivate a more general knowledge and a more correct public taste." There is this difference: during its first season, the Philharmonic gave three concerts; next season there will be about 100.

Other differences: members of the orchestra today need no longer be "professors of music"; they get paid regularly instead of sharing profits (of which there aren't any); and a quaint by-law has been withdrawn. It prohibited "all indecorum of the members . . . at all the Society's meetings, viz.: smoking, the wearing of caps or hats, violent language, etc."

THIS CLIPPING FROM BRADFORD, PA.
STAR RECORD
MAR 20 1941

NEW YORK — (U.P.) — The New York Philharmonic-Symphony, the country's oldest orchestra, will observe the 100th anniversary of its founding next year.

During the anniversary season, which opens at Carnegie Hall next October 9, eight conductors will be heard, including the regular conductor, John Barbirolli, now in his fifth season.

Leopold Stokowski, who has parted company with the Philadelphia Orchestra after many years, will conduct the first two weeks of the season. He has appeared with the Philharmonic-Symphony only once before, in 1930.

Serge Koussevitzky will conduct for two weeks in January. It will be the first time the leader of the Boston Symphony has conducted another American orchestra since coming to this country 17 years ago.

Barbirolli will conduct for eight weeks and Bruno Walter for four. Dimitri Mitropoulos, of the Minneapolis Symphony, and Artur Rodzinski, of the Cleveland Orchestra, have been engaged for one month each. Eugene Goossens, musical director of the Cincinnati Symphony, and Fritz Busch, who was head of the Dresden State Opera until the advent of Hitler, complete the list.

There will be many distinguished soloists, a list of whom is yet to be announced.

THIS CLIPPING FROM
NEW YORK, N. Y.
TELEGRAPH
MAR 16 1941

Leading Maestros Top Philharmonic Festival

Eight of the most distinguished conductors in the field of music, recognized for their achievements not only in America, but abroad as well, will head the New York Philharmonic Symphony's series of concerts next season, according to an announcement made public yesterday by Arthur Judson, manager of the society. The conductors have been engaged by the organization in celebration of the Philharmonic's 100th anniversary celebration.

Among the names to be listed as conducting concerts during the season will be Serge Koussevitsky, conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; Leopold Stokowski, recently resigned conductor of the Philadelphia Symphony; Bruno Walter, just signed by the Metropolitan Opera for the coming season as well; Dmitri Mitropoulos, Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Goossens, Fritz Busch and John Barbirolli, the regular conductor of the Philharmonic. There is also a possibility that Arturo Toscanini will also appear at least once during the season, although he has not yet expressed himself on the matter.

The disclosure that Koussevitzky would conduct the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra raised questions beyond this engagement. Koussevitzky is the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, which is the only non-union major orchestra in the country. A union official reported that his organization had ruled recently that no non-union musician might appear with a union orchestra. The Philharmonic-Symphony has a contract with the Musicians' Union.

Petrillo Only Can Act

Mr. Judson said he anticipated no difficulty with the union about Mr. Koussevitzky's appearance, as he had conferred with union officials and had been assured that there would be no trouble. A union official explained that only James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, could waive the union rule, and that Mr. Petrillo undoubtedly had conferred with Mr. Judson. Mr. Petrillo could not be reached for comment.

Save for an appearance some years ago with a radio orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has not appeared in this country with any other ensemble than the Boston Symphony. His guest leadership with the Philharmonic-Symphony will be his first with this orchestra. He will conduct two weeks in January. His appearance was made possible through the co-operation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

Koussevitzky to Be Guest Of N. Y. Philharmonic

Serge Koussevitzky, conductor of Boston's Symphony Orchestra, will direct New York's Philharmonic-Symphony for two weeks next January as part of the orchestra's one hundredth anniversary celebration. For the same two weeks Bruno Walter will lead the Boston Symphony. This will be the first time since he came to America, 17 years ago, that Koussevitzky has led another American orchestra. His musicians are the only non-union symphonic group in the country and why or whether the A. F. of L. tycoons have lifted their restrictions in this case is not clear. A sentimental consideration for an orchestra's hundredth birthday would hardly be expected to influence President Petrillo, who avowedly considers a tavern fiddler in the same plane with Heifetz.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
WORLD-TELEGRAM
MAR 14 1941

Stokowski and Koussevitzky Head 7 Philharmonic 'Guests'

Leopold Stokowski.

Serge Koussevitzky.

A brilliant array of conductors will be paraded before the Philharmonic-Symphony Society's patrons next season, the 100th of the society's existence, it was announced today by Marshall Field, president of the board of directors of the society. The Centennial season will open on Oct. 9, 1942, in Carnegie Hall.

Eight distinguished conductors already have been engaged for the Philharmonic Centennial Season, including John Barbirolli, regular director. A galaxy of soloists will be announced later.

Leopold Stokowski will conduct the first fortnight of the season. Mr. Stokowski, for many years the conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, a post which he has recently relinquished, has led the Philharmonic - Symphony only once before during a two weeks' interchange with Arthuro Toscanini in the autumn of 1930 when Mr. Toscanini was the leader of Philharmonic.

Serge Koussevitzky, scheduled for two weeks in January, has never before conducted an orchestra other than the Boston Symphony since his arrival in this country 17 years ago.

Mr. Barbirolli, in his fifth season with the Society, will lead the orchestra for eight weeks, two in October and six during February and March.

Bruno Walter will return for four weeks, two in October and two in the latter part of April. Mr. Walter, who had conducted the Philhamonic-Symphony in past seasons, will again double between the orchestra concerts and opera performances at the Metropolitan as he did this year.

Dimitri Mitropolous, director of the Minneapolis Symphony, who made his first appearance with the orchestra this season, also will return for a month of concerts.

Artur Rodzinski, whose regular berth is the conductorship of the Cleveland Orchestra, directed the Philharmonic-Symphony during the wniter season of 1936-1937.

Eugene Goossens, for ten years musical director of the Cincinnati Symphony, is also a noted composer. This will be his first experience as conductor of the Philharmonic-Symphony.

Fritz Busch, once a guest conductor of the old New York Symphony, will be another to make his debut with the Philharmonic-Symphony. Mr. Busch is widely known hereabouts through his European orchestral and operatic affiliations.

This Clipping From
PITTSFIELD, MASS.
EAGLE
MAR 15 1941

Koussevitzky To Conduct Philharmonic Next Season

NEW YORK.—In observance of its centennial next season, the Philharmonic - Symphony Society of New York has arranged for eight distinguished conductors to appear at the head of its orchestra. Marshall Field, president of the society's board, announced yesterday that the leaders would be Leopold Stokowski, Serge Koussevitzky, Bruno Walter, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Artur Bodzinski, Eugene Goossens, Fritz Busch and John Barbirolli, the regular conductor.

One other guest conductor, Arturo Toscanini, was invited to appear on next season's program. However, Arthur Judson, manager of the society, said that Mr. Toscanini had not replied. Mr. Judson added that he did not know when Mr. Toscanini would reply, but if he should accept, arrangements would be made to fix dates for him.

The disclosure that Mr. Koussevitzky would conduct the Philharmonic - Symphony Orchestra raised questions beyond this engagement. Mr. Koussevitzky is the regular conductor of the Boston Symphony, which is the only non-union major orchestra in the country. A union official reported that his organization had ruled recently that no non-union musician might appear with a union orchestra. The Philharmonic-Symphony has a contract with the Musicians' Union.

Petrillo Only Can Act

Mr. Judson said he anticipated no difficulty with the union about Mr. Koussevitzky's appearance, as he had conferred with union officials and had been assured that there would be no trouble. A union official explained that only James C. Petrillo, president of the American Federation of Musicians, could waive the union rule, and that Mr. Petrillo undoubtedly had conferred with Mr. Judson. Mr. Petrillo could not be reached for comment.

Save for an appearance some years ago with a radio orchestra, Mr. Koussevitzky has not appeared in this country with any other ensemble than the Boston Symphony. His guest leadership with the Philharmonic-Symphony will be his first with this orchestra. He will conduct two weeks in January. His appearance was made possible through the co-operation of the trustees of the Boston Symphony.

This Clipping From
NEW YORK, N.Y.
HERALD TRIBUNE
MAR 15 1941

Philharmonic's Plans Revealed For Centennial

Field Says 8 Conductors, Including Barbirolli, Will Aid Celebration Seasons

Marshall Field, president and chairman of the board of directors of the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, announced yesterday plans for the commemorating of the society's centennial during the seasons of 1941-'42 and 1942-'43. As part of the celebration of the one-hundredth anniversary of the oldest symphony orchestra in the United States and the third oldest in the world, eight eminent conductors, including John Barbirolli, the society's present regular conductor, will preside over the Philharmonic-Symphony Orchestra.

Besides Mr. Barbirolli, the conductors will be Leopold Stokowski, Serge Koussevitzky, Bruno Walter, Dimitri Mitropoulos, Artur Rodzinski, Eugene Goossens and Fritz Busch.

Arturo Toscanini, who conducted the Philharmonic during its tour of Europe in 1930, and retired as its conductor in 1936, was invited to participate in the centennial program. Mr. Toscanini declined the invitation, explaining that he was making no commitments for next season.

